On the first daie of Maie the king accompanied with manie lustie batchelers, on great and well doing horses rode to the wood to fetch Maie, where a man might haue seene manie a horse raised on high with carrier, gallop, turne, and stop, meruellous to behold: where he & thre other, as sir Edward Howard, Charles Brandon, and Edward Reuill, which were challengers with the king, shifted themselves into coats of greene sattin garded with crimson velvet. On the other part the earles of Essex, of Devonshire, the marquisse Dorset, & the lord Howard were all in crimson sattin, garded with a pounced gard of greene velvet. And as they were returning on the hill, a ship met with them vnder saile: the maister hailed the king and that noble companie, and said that he was a mariner, and was come from many a strange port, and came thither to see if anie deeds of armes were to be done in the countrie, of the which he might make true report in other countries. An herald demanded the name of his ship; he answered she is called Fame, & is laden with good Renoume: then said the herald, If you will bring your ship into the baie of Hardinesse, you must double the point of Gentilesse, and there you shall see a companie that will meddle with your merchandize. Then said the king, Whatens Renoume is? their merchandize, let vs brite it if we can. When the ship shot a peale of guns, and sailed forth before the kings companie, full of flags and banners, till it came to the tit yard.

At after noone, the king and his thre fellows entered into the field, their bards and bases of crimson and blue velvet, cut in quadzant cuts, embzodered full of pomegranats, and all the walters in lilke of the same colour. The other partie were in crimson sattin and greene velvet. Then began the trumpets to sound, and the horses to run, that manie a speare was burst, and manie a great stripe giuen: and for a tittle the king exceeded in number of slaues all other euerie daie of the thre daies. Wherefore on the third daie, the queene made a great banquet to the king and all them that had iustled: and after the banquet done, she gaue the chiefe prize to the king, the second to the earle of Essex, the thirde to the earle of Devonshire, and the fourth to the lord marquisse Dorset. Then the heralds cried; My lords, for your noble feats in armes, God send you the loue of your ladies that you most desire. The king euer desirous to serue Mars, began another iusts the fiftenth daie of the said moneth. The king & his band were all in greene lilke, and the earle of Essex and his band in blue, garded with gold, and all the speares were painted of the same colours. There was good running and manie a speare burst; but for all the sport euerie man feared lest some ill chance might happen to the king, and saue would haue had him a looker on rather than a doer, and spake thereof as much as they durst: but his courage was so noble that he would euer be at the one end.

In this meane time, the lord Darcie and other appointed to the viage against the Spozes, made such diligence, that they and all their people were readie at Plimmouth by the middes of Maie, and there mustered their souldiers before the lord Howke, and other the kings commissioners. The lord Darcie as capteine generall, ordeined for his prouost marshall Henrie Guilford esquier, a lustie yong man, & wel beloued of the king, for his manifold good seruite. On the mondaie in the Rogation weeke, they departed out of Plimmouth haueu with foure ships roiall, and the wind was so fauourable to them, that the first daie of June, being the euen of the feast of Pentecost, he arrived at the port of Calis in south Spaine; and immediatlie by the aduise of his counsell, he dispatched messengers to the king, whom they found before the citie of Ciuill where he then laie, and declared to him, how the lord Darcie by the king their maisters appointment, was come thither with sixtene hundred archers, and laie still at Calis to know his pleasure. The king of Castile answered them gentle, that the lord Darcie and all other that were come from his louing sonne were welcome, and hartilie thanked them of their paines, requiring the messengers to returne to their capteine, and tell him that in all hast he would send certeine of his counsell to him.

Hereupon they departed from the king, and made report to the lord Darcie, which kept his ship in great estate, and would not land, but onelie suffered such as were sicke and feeble, and few other to go a land. The Englishmen which went aboard, fell to drinking of hot wines, & were scarce maisters of themselves, some ran to the steeles, some brake hedges and spoiled orchards and vineyards, and oranges befoze they were ripe, and did manie outrageous deeds: wherefore the chiefe of the towne of Calis came to complaine to the lord Darcie in his ship, which sent forth his prouost marshall, who scarfelle with paine restrained the yeoman archers, they were so hot and wilfull, yet by commandement & policie they were all brought on board to their ships.

Then vpon saturdaye, the eight of June, a bishop and other of the kings counsell came to Calis, and there abode till wednesdaye, being the euen of Corpus Christi; at which date, the lord capteine took land, and was honorable receiued of the king of Aragon's counsell, and on the morrow was highlie feasted at dinner and supper. And at after supper, the bishop declared the king his maisters pleasure, giuing to the lord capteine as heartie thanks for his pains and trauell, as if he had gone forward with his enterprise against the Spozes. But whereas by the aduise of his counsell, circumspectlie considering the suertie of his owne realme, vpon perfect knowledge had that the Frenchmen meant to invade his dominions in his absence, he had altered his former determination, and taken an abstinence of war with the Spozes, till an other time.

He therefore required the lord Darcie to be contented to returne home againe, promising him wages for all his souldiers; and if it should please him to come to the court, he should receiue high thanks of the king, and such chere as there could be made him. The lord Darcie was nothing pleased with this declaration, but sith he saw there was no remedie, he said, that whatsoever the king had concluded, he could not be against it, considering he was sent to him: but suerlie it was against his mind to depart home, without doing anie thing against Gods enemies, with whom he had euer a desire to fight. And as for his comming to court, he said, he could not leaue his men whom he had brought out of their countrie, without an head; and as for the kings banquet, it was not the thing that he desired.

An. Reg. 23.

In this second yeare, the king being forth on his progresse, heard euerie daie moze & moze complaints of Crompton and Dundle, set forth and aduanced no doubt by the drift of their deadlie enemies. Wherefore he sent writs to the Sherriffes of London, to put them to execution, and so the seventeenth daie of August, they were both beheaded at the Tower hill, and both their bodies and heads buried, the one at the White friers, and the other at the Blacke friers. The king about this season was much giuen to plaie at tennis, and at the disse, which appetite certeine craftie persons about him perceiuing, brought in Frenchmen and Lombards to make wagers with him, & so lost much monie; but when he perceiued their craft, he eschued their companie and let them go.

On the first daie of Maie the king accompanied with manie lustie batcliers, on great and well doing horses rode to the wood to fetch Maie, where a man might haue scene manie a horse raised on high with carrier, gallop, turne, and stop, meruellous to behold: where he & thye other, as sir Edward Howard, Charles Brandon, and Edward Heuill, which were challengers with the king, shifted themselves into coats of greene sattin garded with crimsin velvet. On the other part the earles of Essex, of Deuonshire, the marquess Dorsset, & the lord Howard were all in crimsin satin, garded with a pounced gard of greene velvet. And as they were returning on the hill, a ship met with them vnder saile: the maister hailed the king and that noble companie, and said that he was a mariner, and was come from many a strange port, and came thither to see if anie deeds of armes were to be done in the countrie, of the which he might make true report in other countries. An herald demanded the name of his ship; he answered she is called Fame, & is laden with good Renowme: then said the herald, If you will bring your ship into the baie of Harbinesse, you must double the point of Gentlenesse, and there you shall see a companie that will meddle with your merchandize. Then said the king, Withens Renowme is their merchandize, let vs bue it if we can. Then the ship shot a peale of guns, and sailed forth before the kings companie, full of flags and banners, till it came to the tilt yard.

At after noone, the king and his thye fellows entered into the field, their bards and bales of crimsin and blue velvet, cut in quadrant cuts, embrodereed full of pomegranats, and all the walters in slike of the same colour. The other partie were in crimsin sattin and greene velvet. Then began the trumpets to sound, and the horses to run, that manie a speare was burst, and manie a great stripe giuen: and for a truth the king excelled in number of slaues all other euerie daie of the thye dates. Wherefore on the third daie, the queene made a great banquet to the king and all them that had iusted: and after the banquet done, she gaue the chiefe pisse to the king, the second to the earle of Essex, the thirde to the earle of Deuonshire, and the fourth to the lord marquess Dorsset. In this meane time, the lord Darcie and other ap-

On the next daie in the morning, monie was sent to paie the souldiers their wages for their conduct on againe into England, with diuerse gifts giuen to the lord Darcie, and other gentlemen; yet notwithstanding, he was highlie displeased: notwithstanding, like a wiseman he dissembled the matter. The same daie, being the fourteenth daie of June, and fridaie, there chanced a fraie to be begun in the towne of Calis, betwixt the Englishmen, and them of the towne; by reason that an Englishman would haue had for his monie a loafe of bread from a maid that had bene at the bakers to buie bread, not to sell, but to spend in hir mistresse house. Wherupon the Englishman followed hir, as making proffer not to be denied, in so much that the maid perceiuing what he went about, cried out; A force, a force. Then was the common bell rung, and all the towne went to harnesse, and those few Englishmen that were a land, went to their bowes. The Spaniards cast darts, and the Englishmen shot. But the captaine of England, and the lords of the counsell for their part, toke such paine, that the fraie was ceased; and but one Englishman slaine, though diuerse were hurt: and of the Spaniards diuerse were slaine. Thus of a sparke was kindled a flame to the spoiling of manie; which is no rare thing to see, according to the scriptum esse:

After this, upon request made by the lords of Spaine, the lord Darcie and all his men the same night went aboard their ships, but Henrie Guilford, Weston Brothorne, and William Sidneie, young and lustie esquiers, desired licence to see the court of Spaine: which being granted, they went thither, where they were of the king highlie intertained. Henrie Guilford and Weston Brothorne were made knights by the king, who also gaue to sir Henrie Guilford a canton of Granada, and to sir William Brothorne an egle of Sicill on a chefe, to the augmentation of their armes. William Sidneie so excused himselfe, that he was not made knight. When they had sojourned there a while, they toke their leaue of the king and queene, and returned through France into England.

During which season, the lord Darcie made saile toward England, and arriuing at Plimmouth, came to the king at Windsoe, and so this iourneie ended. During the time that the lord Darcie was in Spaine, the ladie Margaret duchesse of Sauroie, and daughter vnto Maximilian the emperor, and gouernour of Flanders, Brabant, Holland, & Zelant, & other the low countries appertaining to Charles the young prince of Castile, sent in the end of Maie to the king of England, to haue fiftene hundred archers, to aid hir against the duke of Gelders, which soe troubled the countries aforesaid. The king tenderlie regarding the request of so noble a ladie, most gentlie granted hir request, and appointed sir Edward Poinings, knight of the garter, and comptroller of his house, a valiant capteine and a noble warrior, to be lieutenant and leader of the said fiftene hundred archers.

This gentleman accompanied with his sonne in law the lord Clinton, sir Matthew Brothorne, sir John Digbie, John Merton, Richard Wethzill, & Shelleie esquiers, with other gentlemen and yeomen, to the foresaid number of fiftene hundred, toke their ships a mile beside Sandwich, the eighteenth daie of Iulie, and landed at Arnhem the nineteenth daie, not without some trouble, by reason of a little storme. From thence they were conducted to Warowe, whither the ladie Regent came to welcome them. On the sundae, being the fouen & twentieth of Iulie, they departed to Rossendale, and on thursdaie the last of Iulie they came to Bulduke. And the next daie the whole armie of the Almans, Flemings, and other appertaining to the said ladie met with the Englishmen without Bulduke, where they set forth in order; the ladie Regent being there present, which toke hir leaue of all the captaine, and departed to Bulduke.

The armie, to the number of ten thousand, beside the fiftene hundred English archers, passed forward; and the tenth daie of August, being saint Laurence daie, came before a little castle, standing on the higher side of the Raze, called Bismont, belonging to the bastard of Gelderland. The same night, Thomas Hert, cheefe gouernour of the ordinance of the English part, made his approach; and in the morning, made batterie so, that the assault thereupon being giuen, the fortreffe was wonne, and the capteine with eightie and odd men were slaine, and ninetene taken; of the which, eleven were hanged. John Spoxton, capteine of one hundred Englishmen, and one Chiot an esquier of Burgognie, crying saint George, were the first that entered; at which assault, there was but one Englishman slaine. On thursdaie, the fourteenth of August, the armie feried ouer the riuier of Raze into Gelderland. The next daie, they came to a little towne called Aiske.

The people were fled, but there was a little castle raised, and cast downe, which was newlie built up on the side of the said riuier. Upon the twentieth daie of August, they burnt the foresaid towne of Aiske, and all the countrie about it, and came at the last to a towne called Straulle, being verie strong, double diked and walled. Within it were three hundred & firtie good men of war, beside the inhabitants. At the first, they shewed good countenance of defense but when they saw their enemies approach nere vnto them with rampiers and trenches, they yielded by composition, so that the souldiers might depart with a little sicke in their hands. But the townefmen released prisoners, at the will of the prince of Castile. And so on s. Bartholomewes day the admerall of Flanders, and sir Edward Poinings entered the towne with great triumph.

On the six and twentieth daie, the armie came before Arnhem, and sent an herald called Arthois, to summon the towne; but they within would not heare but shot guns at him. On the eight and twentieth daie, the armie remoued vnto the north side of Arnhem, and part went ouer the water, and made trenches to the water, & so besieged the towne as straitlie as their number would giue them leaue; but yet for all that they could doe without, they within kept one gate euer open. At length, the English captaine perceiuing that they laie there in vaine, considering the strength of the towne, and also how the armie was not of number sufficient to enuiron the same on each side, wrote to the king, who willed them with all speed to returne, and so they did. Sir Edward Poinings went to the court of Burgognie, where he was receiued right honozable of the young prince of Castile and of his aunt the ladie Margaret.

John Spoxton, John Fog, John Scot, and Thomas Linde, were made knights by the prince. And the ladie Margaret perceiuing the soldiers coates to be woone and foule with lieng on the ground (for euerie man laie not in a tent) gaue to euerie yeoman a coate of wollen cloth of yeallow, red, white, and greene colours, not to hir little land & praise among the Englishmen. After that sir Edward Poinings had bene highlie feasted and more praised of all men for his valiantnesse and good order of his people, he returned with his crue into England, and had lost by war and sicknesse not fallie an hundred persons. When the Englishmen were departed, the Gelders issued out of the gates of Arnhem, daily skirmished with with the Burgonions, and asked for their archers, and herewith to inter began sharple to approach, and the river of Spaze by abundance of raine rose so high, that it drowned by the trenches: so that all things considered, the capitaine without determined to raise their siege, and so they did, and after they had wasted all the countie about Aculow, they returned euerie man to his home.

In June the king being at Leicester, heard tidings, that one Andrew Barton a Scottishman and pirat of the sea, saleng that the king of Scots had warre with the Portugals, robbed euerie nation, and stopped the kings treasures, that no merchant almost could passe. And when he took Englishmens goods, he bare them in hand that they were Portugals goods, and thus he haunted and robbed at euerie hauens mouth. The king displeased herewith, sent sir Edward Holward lord admerall of England, and lord Thomas Howard, forme and heire to the earle of Surrie in all hast to the sea, which hastilie made ready two ships, and taking sea, by chance of weather were seuered. The lord Holward lieng in the dolomes, percelued where Andrew was making toward Scotland, and so fast the said lord chased him, that he ouertoke him; and there was a foze battell betwixt them. Andrew euer blew his whistle to encourage his men, but at length the lord Holward and the Englishmen did so valiantlie, that by cleane strength they entered the maine decke. The Scots fought foze on the hatches: but in conclusion Andrew was taken, and so foze wounded, that he died there. When all the remnant of the Scots were taken with their ship called the Lion.

All this while was the lord admerall in chase of the barke of Scotland, called Jennie Pirwine, which was wont to saile with the Lion in companie, & so much did he wish other, that he laid him aboard: and though the Scots manfully defended themselves, yet the Englishmen entered the barke, slue manie, and took all the residue. Thus were these two ships taken, and brought to Blackewall the second of August (and all the Scots were sent vnto the bishop of Poskes place, where they remained at the kings charge, till other direction was taken for them. After this, the king sent the bishop of Winchester, and certene of his counsell, to the archbishop of Poskes place, where the Scots were prisoners: and there the bishop rehearsed to them, whereas peace was yet betwixt England and Scotland, that they contrarie to that, as thieues & pirats, had robbed the kings subsidies within his treasures. Wherefore they had deserved to die by the law, and to be hanged at the low water marke. Then said the Scots; We acknowledge our offense, and aske mercie and not the law. Then a preest which was also a prisoner, said; My lords we appeale from the kings iustice to his mercie.

Then the bishop asked him if he were authorized by them to saie so, and they cried all; Yea, yea. Then (said he) you shall find the kings mercie about his iustice. For where you were dead by the law, yet by his mercie he will reuiue you; wherefore you shall depart out of this realme within twentie daies, by on paine of death, if you be found after the twentieth daie; and praise for the king: and so they passed into their countie. Thus was their captiuitie conuerted into libertie, and their liues saued by the kings mercie. The king of Scots hearing of the death of Andrew Barton, and the taking of the two ships, was wonderfull ioyful, and sent letters to the king requiring restitution, according to the league and amitie. The king wrote to the king of Scots againe with brotherlie salutation, of the robberies done by the said Andrew, and that it became not a prince to laie breach of peare to his confederat, for doing iustice vpon a pirat and these: and that all the Scots that were taken, had deserved to die by iustice, if he had not extended his mercie. And with this answer the Scottish herald departed.

About this season, the French king made sharpe warre against pope Iulie: wherefore the king of England wrote to the French king, that he should leaue off to vex the pope in such wise, being his friend and confederat. But when the French king seemed little to regard that request, the king sent him word to deliuer him his lawfull inheritance both of the duchie of Normandie and Guien, and the countie of Anou & Paine, and also of his crowne of France; or else he would come with such a power, that by fine force he would obtaine his purpose: but notwithstanding those writings, the French king still pursued his warres in Italie. Wherevpon the king of England, joining in league with Maximilian the emperour, and Ferdinando king of Spaine, with diuerse other princes, was resolved by aduise of his counsell to make warre on the French king and his countie, and made preparation both by sea and land, setting forth ships to the sea for safegard of his merchants.

The foresaid pope Iulie, the kings confederat, was (before his aduancement to the popedom) cardinal of saint Petri ad Vincula, a man mightie in friends, reputation, and riches, who had done to him the voices of so manie cardinals, that entering the conclaue, he was with an example all new and without shutting the conclaue, elected pope the verie same night following the deceasse of his predecessor pope Pius (those that were of the contrarie opinion not daring to oppose against him.) He, either hauing regard to his first name Iulie, or (as coniectures were made) to signifie the greatnesse of his conceptions, or lastlie because he would not giue place to Alexander, no not in the excellencie of name, took vpon him the name of Iulie, the second of that name. Amongest all the popes that had passed, it was wondered that by so great consent, they had created for pope, a cardinal who was knowne to be of a disposition rigorous and terrible, and in whome was no expectation of rest and tranquillitie, hauing consumed his youth in continuall trauels, offended manie by necessitie, and exercised hatreds against manie great personages; a man to whose wit nothing was more familiar, than the inuention of trouble, faction, and conspiracie.

But on the other side, the causes of his election to that degre appeared clarelie, and surmounted all other difficulties: for he had bene of long time a cardinal of great power and might, & with his magnificence, wherein he had alwaies excelled the residue, and with the greatnesse of his spirit, by the which he did great things, he had not onlie made himselfe mightie in opinion and friends; but by times and degrees had erected high his authoritie in the court of Rome, bearing the name, title, and dignitie of the principall defendor of the ecclesiastike libertie. But that which serued most to his aduancement, was the promises immoderate and infinite which he made to the cardinals, princes, and barons, and to all others whome he might make profitable to him in that action. Besides, he had the meane to distribute monie, benefices, and spirituall dignities, as well such as were his owne, as those that were the rights of others; for that such was the haste & renoume of his liberalitie, that manie made willing offers to him to dispose as he best liked of their treasures, their names, their offices, and benefices.

They considered not that his promises were farre too great, than that being pope he was either able or ought to obserue, for that he had of so long continuance inioined the name of iust and vpright, that pope Alexander himselfe (his greatest enemy) speaking ill of him, in all other things could not but confesse him to be true of his word. A praise which he made no care to defile and staine, to the end to become pope; knowing that no man more easilie beguileth an other, than he that hath the custome and name neuer to deceiue anie. Which practise of dissimulation was much frequented of those that aspired & possessed the popedom; inso much that the same was in Alexander the first so notable, that it was a proverbe ordinarie in Rome, that the pope did neuer the thing which he said, and his sonne the duke of Valentinois seldome spake that which he ment. Which kind of people (pretend they what they will) are excluded from the rest of Mankind, as the psalmist saith:

In this yeare the king kept his Christmasse at Greenwich, where was such abundance of viands serued to all comers of ante honest behaviour, as hath bene few times sene. And against Twetyeres night was made in the hall a castell, gates, towers, and dungeon, garnished with artillerie and weapon after the most warlike fashon: and on the front of the castell, was written Le fortresse dangereux, and within the castell were six ladies, cloathed in russet sattin, laid all ouer with leanes of gold, and euerie one knit with laces of blew silke and gold. On their heads, coifs, and caps all of gold. After this castell had bene caried about the hall, and the quene had beheld it, in came the king with fine other, apparelled in coats, the one halfe of russet sattin, spangled with spangles of fine gold, the other halfe of rich cloth of gold, on their heads caps of russet sattin, embroidered with works of fine gold bullion.

These six assaulted the castell. The ladies seeing them so lustie and couragious, were content to solace with them, & vpon further communication, to yeeld the castell and so they came downe & dancet a long space. And after the ladies led the knights into the castell, and then the castell suddenly vanished out of their sight. On the daie of the Epiphanie at night, the king with eleuen other were disguised, after the manner of Italie, called a maske, a thing not sene before in England: they were apparelled in garments long and broad, wrought all with gold, with visors and caps of gold. And after the banquet done, these maskers came in, with six gentlemen disguised in silke, bearing staffe tozches, and desired the ladies to dance; some were content, and some refused. And after they had dancet, and communed together, as the fashon of the maske is, they toke their leaue and departed, and so did the quene, and all the ladies.]

The five and twentieth daie of Januarie began the parlement, where the bishop of Canturburie began his oration with this verse Iustitia & pax osculate sunt. Vpon which words he declared how iustice should be ministered, and peace should be nourished, and by what meanes iustice was put by, and peace turned into warre. And thereupon he shewed how the French king would do no iustice in reioyng to the king his right inheritance: wherefore for lacke of iustice, peace of necessitie must be turned into warre. In this parlement was granted two fifteens of the temporalltie, and of the clergie two tenths. After that it was concluded by the whole bodie of the realme in the high court of parlement assembled, that warre should be made on the French king and his dominions. Whereupon was wonderfull speed made in preparing all things necessarie both for sea and land.

In this parlement was sir Robert Schekeld knight, sometime recorder of London, speaker for the commons. During this parlement, in the moneth of March, a yeoman of the crowne, one of the kings gard, named Jettwolt, slue within the palace of Westminster a seruant of maister Willoughbies, for the which offense the king commanded to be set by a new paire of gallowes in the same place where the said seruant lost his life; and vpon the same the said Jettwolt was hanged, and there remained on the gallowes by the space of two daies. A notable example of iustice, whereby the king berefted the report that was commonlie noised abroad of him; namely that he could not abide the wedding of mans blood, much lesse wilfull murder. Wherein he shewed how tender he was ouer his subiects, and also how severe against malefactors, speciallie mankillers; whom he thought unworthy of life, that had bene the instruments of others death; according to the law:

oculos oculis & dentibus esse Pensandos dentes: sic par erit vltio culpa.

In this season one Jerome Bonuise, which was bozne in Luke, and was factor in London for merchants of that nation, and had plaid bankrupt, and was conueied out of the realme for debt, was now in such fauour with pope Iulie, that he made him his collector and proctor in England: & so he kept a great port, and resorted to the king and his counsell for the popes affaires (which then was sore troubled by the French king) so that he knew both the popes counsell and the kings, and falselie and vntruilie resorted by night to the French ambassadours lieng in London, and to them discovered what the king and the pope intended, which was not so closelie done, but the king knew it: and so he was laid for, & was taken communing with one of the said ambassadours vpon London wall at midnight, and brought to the Tower, where he remained until by the sute of his friends he was deliuered, and shortly for shame voulded the realme.]

The king of Aragon also, hating at that time warre with the French king, wrote to his sonne in law king Henrie, that if he would send ouer an armie into Wilskaie, and so to invade France on that side, for the recouerie first of his duchie of Guien: he would aid them with ordinance, horsemen, beasts, and cariages, with other necessities appertaining to the same. The king and his counsell putting their affiance in this promise of king Ferdinand, prepared a noble armie all of footmen, and small artillerie, appointing the noble lord Thomas Grele marquisse Dorset to be chiefe condutor of the same. The king dailie studieng to set forth his warre which he had begun against the French king, caused sir Edward Howard his admerall with diligence to make readie diuerse goodlie tall ships, as the soueraigne and others to the number of eightene, beside other smaller vessels.

Therewith hating in his companie sir Weston Botune, Griffith Doluine, Edward Cobham, Thomas Windham, Thomas Lucie, William Pirton, Henrie Shireborne, Stephen Bull, George Willwange, John Hopton, William Guntton, Thomas Draper, Edmund Coke, John Burdet, and diuerse others, he toke the sea, and scowling the same, about the middle of Maie he came before Dorsetmouth. About the verie selfe time the lord marquisse Dorset, and other noblemen appointed for the iourne of Wilskaie, as the lord Howard some and better to the earle of Surrie, the lord Wake, the lord Willoughbie, the lord Ferrers; the lord John, the lord Arthonie, and the lord Leonard Grete, all these brethren to the marquisse; sir Griffith ap Iwe, sir

An. Reg. 4.

Baris Berkeleie, sir William Sands, the baron of Warford, sir Richard Cornwell brother to the said baron, William Husleie, John Pelton, William Kingston esquier, sir Henrie Willoughbie, and diuerse others, with souldiers to the number of ten thousand.

Amongst these were five hundred Almans clad all in white, vnder the leading of one Cutot a gentleman of Flanders, all which (with the residue abouenamed) came to Southampton, and there mustered their bands which were appointed and trimmed in the best manner. On the sixteenth daie of Maie they were all bestowed aboard in Spanish ships furnished with vittells, and other necessaries for that iournie. The wind serued so well for their purpose, that they came all in safetie on the coast of Biskiaie at the port of Passaghe southwester of Ffonterabie; and so the third daie of Iune they landed, and toke the field, imbatelling themselves for their safegard right strongly. Within thre daies after that the armie was thus aland, there came to the marquesse an earle and an other noble man, to welcome him and his companie.

Then the lord capteine remoued his field, & toke an other place nearer to Ffonterabie, where he laie a long time, looking euerie daie to haue aid of horsemen and artillerie of the king of Aragon, but none came. Sir John Stille caused to be bought two hundred mules and asses of such price as the Spaniards gained greatlie, and when they were put to carie and draw, they would not serue the turne, for they were not exercised thereto before that time; and so for want of beasts to draw such ordinance as the Englishmen had there with them, they lost the doing of some great exploit against the Frenchmen on the frontiers of Gascoigne, for they might haue run a great waie into that countrie, being as then destitute and unpurueied of men and munitions.

On a daie the Frenchmen made a skrie toward the English campe, but the Englishmen perceiuing them, passed the riuer that was betwixt them, and with arrowes chased the Frenchmen; so that for hast manie of their horses foundered, and fell, yet they came to Baion: if there had bene anie horsemen amongst the Englishmen, they had fore indamaged their enimies. The king of Nauarre doubting least the Englishmen were come into those parties for no good meaning towards him, sent to the lord marquesse a bishop, and diuerse other, offering to minister vittells vnto the Englishmen for their monie, if it should stand so with his pleasure. The lord marquesse thanked him for the offer, and promised that if they of Nauarre would vittell his people, they should paie them well and trulie for the same.

He said also that he would warrant their passing and repassing in safetie, and that by the Englishmen no prejudice should be done to his realme. Whereupon were the Englishmen vittelled out of Nauarre, to their great comfort. After that the armie had laine thirtie daies in the second campe, there came from the king of Aragon a bishop and other nobles of his counsell. This bishop was the same that made the answer to the lord Darcie at Calis the last yeare. The effect of his message was, to desire the lord capteine and his people to take patience for a while, and they should see that such preparation should be made for the furnishing of their enterpryse, as should stand with the honour of his maister and their aduancements.

The Englishmen fore discontented with their idling till in the field, misliked with his excuses, supposing the same (as they proued in deed) to be nothing but delays. In the meane time that the Englishmen thus lingered without attempting any exploit, their vittells were much part garike, & they eating thereof with all their meats, and drinking hot wines, & feeding also on hot fruits, procured the ir blond to boile within their bellies, that there fell sicke thre thousand of the sir: & thereof died an eightene hundred persons. The lord marquesse perceiuing this mischance, sent to the king of Spaine certeine of his captains to know his pleasure. The king told them that thostlie the duke of Alua should loine with them, bringing with him a mightie power; so that they might the more assuredlie proceed in their enterpryse. With this answer they returned to the lord marquesse, who liked it neuer a deale; because he iudged that the king meant but to dylue time with him, as after it proued.

In the meane time there began a mutinie in the English campe thorough a false report, contriued by some malicious person; which was, that the captains should be allowed eight pence for euerie common souldier; where the truth was, that they had allowed to them but onelie six pence. The lord generall aduertised that the souldiers began to gather in companies, found meanes to apprehend the chafe beginner, and deliuered him vnto William Kingston esquier, then prouost marshall; and so was he put to death to the terrour of all other. Whilste the Englishmen laie thus in campe on the borders of Biskiaie towards Cusen, the archers went oftentimes a foraging into the French confines almost to Baion, and burnt manie pretie villages. The king of Spaine raised an armie, and sent forth the same vnder the leading of the duke of Alua, which came forward as though he meant to haue come to the Englishmen; who being aduertised of his approach, were maruellouslie glad thereof, in hope that then they should be imploted about the enterpryse for the which they were come.

But the duke intending an other thing, when he was aduanced forth within a daies iournie of them, suddenly remoued his armie toward the realme of Nauarre, and entering the same, chased out of his realme the king of that land, and conquered the same to the king of Spains vse, as in the historie of Spaine more plainelie it doth appeare. After that the king of Spaine was thus possessed of the kingdom of Nauarre, he sent vnto the lord marquesse, promising to loine with him thostlie, and so to inuade the borders of France; but he came not. Wherefore the Englishmen thought themselves not well bled: for it grieued them much, that they should lie so long idle, although there was so great hope conceiued at their setting forth, that there should be some great exploit atchieued by them, thorough the aid that was promised by the king of Spaine.

Thus whilste the armie lingered without remouing, there chanced an affraie to rise betwixt the Englishmen and the townes-men of Santa Maria, a village so called, whereunto such Englishmen as fell sicke, had their resort; and thereupon the alarms brought into the campe, the Englishmen and Almans ran in great furie to the succour of their fellowes: and notwithstanding all that the captains could do to staie them, they slue and robbed the people without mercie. The Biskaines that could get awaie, fled ouer that waier into Cusen. The captains yet so ordered the matter, that all the pillage was restored, and one and twentie souldiers were condemned, which were apprehended as they were fleeing awaie with a boatie of ten thousand duckats into Gascoigne; seauen of them were executed, and the residue pardoned of life, at the sute of certeine lords of Spaine, which were as then present.

of Wafon, to see and understand the manner thereof; but perceiving that the Englishmen had desiered them, suddenly they returned. The Englishmen followed, & coming to the towne of S. Jehan de Lucie, they burnt and robbed it, & slue the inhabitants. Divers other villages they spoiled on the borders of Guen; but because they wanted both horses of service, and horses to draw forth their ordnance, they could not do anie such damage as they might and would have done, if they had bene furnished according to their desires in that point. Thus continued the English armie in such wearisome sort till the month of October, and then fell the lord marquisse sick, and the lord Howard had the chiefe governance of the armie.

Then were sent from the king of Spaine divers lords of his privie counsell unto the said lord Howard, to excuse the matter for that he came not according to his promise, requiring them, that sith the time of the peare to make warre was past, it might please them to breake up their campe, and to divide themselves abroad into the townes and villages of his realme till the spring time of the peare, that they might then go forward with their first pretended enterprise. The lord Howard shewed well in words that the Englishmen could not thinke well of the king of Spaines faulced excuses, and unprofitable delays, to his small honor & their great hinderance & losse, having spent the king their master so much treasure, and done so little hurt to his adversaries. The Spaniards gave faire words; and so in courteous manner departed.

Then about the end of October it was agreed amongst all the lords of the English host that they should breake up their campe, and so they did. The lord marquisse and his people went to saint Sebastian, the lord Howard and his retinue to Hendre, the lord Willoughbie to Carlshang, and sir William Sands with manie other capitaines repaired to Fotherbie, and so euerie capitaine with his retinue was placed in one towne or other. The king of England advertised of the king of Spaine his incarking, sent an herald called Windsor with letters unto his armie, willing his men there to tarry, & promising to send over to them right shortly a new supplie, under the guiding of the lord Herbert his chamberlaine.

When this letter was read, and the contents thereof notified, the souldiers began to be so highly displeased; and spake such outrageous words, as it was marvell to heare: & not contented with words, they were bent to have done outrageous deeds; insomuch that in their furie they had slaine the lord Howard and divers others, if they had not followed their intents: and hereupon they were glad to hire ships, and so embarked themselves in the month of November. When the lord marquisse was brought aboard, he was so weake and feeble of remembrance thorough sickness, that he asked where he was. In the beginning of December they landed here in England, and were glad to be at home, and got out of such a countrie, where they had little health, lesse pleasure, and much losse of time. The king of Spaine seemed to be soe discontented with their departure, openly affirming, that if they had tarried untill the next spring, he would in their companie have invaded France.

mirall in Britaine.

About the same time that the marquisse went into Spaine, that is to wit, about the middell of Maie, sir Edward Howard lord admirall of England, being on the sea afoze Portsmouth, made forth againe to the sea, and directing his course towards Britaine on Trinity sundate arrived at Bertham baie with twenty great ships, and suddenly set his men on land, and there was a bullwoke, which the Britains kept and defended a while; but being overcome, fled out of their hold, & left it to the Englishmen. Then the lord admirall passed seaven miles into the countrie, burning and wasting townes and villages, and in returning, skirmished with divers men of armes, and slue some of them: and notwithstanding that the Britains fought valiantlie in defense of their countrie; yet they were put to the worse, and so the lord admirall returned to his ships.

On the thre & twentieth daie of Maie being mondaie, he landed in the morning, and commanded to burne the house of the lord Piers Hoguns, with the towne of Conquet, & divers other places, and chased the Britains into the castell of Brest: and notwithstanding all the assemblies and shewes that the Britains made, yet they suffered the English peace, able to returne with their priees and booties. The first of June the Englishmen took land in Croiton baie, and then the lords of Britaine sent word to the lord admirall, that if he would abide, they would give him battell. The admirall rewarded the messenger, and willed him to say to them that sent, that all that day they should find him in that place taring their coming.

Then to encourage divers gentlemen the more earnestlie to shew their valiance, he dubbed them knights; as sir Edward Wyke, brother to the lord Cobham, sir Griffith Dohne, sir Thomas Windham, sir Thomas Lucie, sir John Burdet, sir William Pirston, sir Henrie Shirborne, and sir Stephan Bull. When the lord admirall saw the Frenchmen come, he comforted his men with pleasant words, thereby the more to encourage them. The whole number of the Englishmen was not much above 25 hundred, where the Frenchmen were at the least ten thousand; and yet when they saw the order of the Englishmen, they were suddenly astonished.

Then a gentleman of good experience and credit amongst them, advised the other capitaines not to fight; but to retire a little and take a strong ground, there to remaine till the Englishmen returned toward their ships: and then to take the advantage. And so the capitaines began to retire, which when the commons saw, they all ran awaie as fast as they might, supposing that the capitaines had some knowne some great perill at hand, because they were not privie to the purpose of their capitaines. The lord admirall seeing what happened, when the night came departed to his ships. After this the gentlemen of Britaine sent to the admirall for a safer conduct for divers persons, which they ment to send to him about a tratie. The lord admirall was of his gentleness content to grant their request. Then certaine lords of Britaine took a bote, and came to the ship of the lord admirall, where he was set with all his counsell of the armie about him.

The request of the Britains was, that it might please him to surcease his cruell kind of warre, in burning of townes and villages: but the admirall plainlie told them, that he was sent to make warre and not peace. Then they required a truce for six daies, which would not be granted; and to their request, the admirall told them, that gentlemen ought to defend their countrie by force, rather than to sue for peace. And thus (making them a banquet) he sent them awaie. And after hearing that there was ships of warre on the seas, he coasted from thence along the countrie of Normandie, still scotching the sea, so that no enimie durst appeare. And at length he came and laie by the Ile of Wight, to see if anie enimies would appeare. During which time, divers ships were kept in the north seas, under the conduct of sir Edward Ichingham, John Lewes, John Loundaie, and others.

In Reg. 4.

This yeare also in June, the king kept a solemne totes at Grænewich, the king & sir Charles Brandon taking upon them to abide all commers. & first came the ladies all in white and red silke, set upon courfers trapped in the same lute, treated ouer with gold; after whom followed a founteine curiouse made of russet latten, with eight gargils spouting water: within the founteine sat a knight armed at all pices. After this founteine followed a ladie all in blacke silke drenched with fine siluer, on a courser trapped in the same. Then followed a knight in a houselitter, the courfers & litter apparelled in blacke with siluer drops. When the founteine came to the tilt, the ladies rode round about, and so did the founteine, and the knight within the litter. And after them were brought two goodlie courfers apparelled for the iusts: and when they came to the tilts end, the two knights mounted on the two courfers abiding all commers. The king was in the founteine, and sir Charles Brandon was in the litter. Then suddenly with great noise of trumpets entered sir Thomas Kneuet in a castell of cole blacke, and ouer the castell was twittien. The dolorous castell, and so he and the earle of Essex, the lord Howard, and other ran their courers with the king and sir Charles Brandon, and ouer the king brake most speares, and likewise was so to doo per he began, as in former time; the passe fell to his lot: so luckie was he and fortunat in the pise of his pices in martiall activitie, where to from his yong yers he was giuen, as the poet saith:

Et sic erat a teneris annis ars bellica cordi.

After this, the king having prepared men and ships ready to go to the sea under the gouernance of sir Anthoine Doughtred, sir Edward Ichingham, William Somer, and diuers other gentlemen, appointed them to take the sea, and to come before the Ile of Wight, there to ioine with the lord admer all, which they did, but in their passage a galle was lost by negligence of the maister. The king hauing a desire to see his naue together, rode to Portsmouth, and there appointed captains for one of his chiefest ships called the Regent, sir Thomas Kneuet master of his horses, & sir John Carew of Devonshire; and to the Soueraigne he appointed for captains, sir Charles Brandon, and sir Henrie Gilsford; and with them in the Soueraigne were put the best of the tallest yeman of the kings gard. Manie other gentlemen were ordeined captains in other vessels. And the king made them a banquet before their setting forward, and so committed them to God. They were in number five and twentie faire ships of great burden, well furnished of all things necessarie.

The French king in this meane while had prepared a naue of thirtie nine saile in the haven of Brest; and for chiefe he ordeined a great Carrike of Brest, appertaining to the quene his wife, called Cordelier a verie strong ship, and verie well appointed. This naue set forward out of Brest the tenth of August, and came to Britaine baie, in the which the same day was the English fleet arrived. When the Englishmen perceived the Frenchmen to be issued forth of the haven of Brest, they prepared themselves to battell, and made forth towards their enimie, which came fiercely forward; and coming in sight ech of other, they shot off their ordinance so terrible together, that all the sea coast sounded of it. The lord admer all made with the great ship of Depe, and chased hir; sir Henrie Gilsford and also sir Charles Brandon made with the great Carrike of Brest, being in the Soueraigne, and laid them to stem to the Carrike; but by negligence of the maister, or else by smoke of the ordinance, or otherwise, the Soueraigne was cast at the sterne of the Carrike, with which aduan-tage the Frenchmen shuted for toy.

But when sir Thomas Kneuet, who was ready to haue boarded the great ship of Depe, saw that the Soueraigne missed the Carrike, suddenlie he caused the Regent (in the which he was aboard) to make to the Carrike, and to grapple with hir a long boord And when they of the Carrike perceived they could not depart, they let slip an anchor, and so with the streame the ships turned, and the Carrike was on the weather side, and the Regent on the lee side. The fight was cruell betwixt these two ships, the archers on the English side, & the crossebowes on the French part doing their vttermost to annoie each other: but finally the Englishmen entered the Carrike, which being perceived by a gunner, he desperatlie set fire in the gunpowder, as some say; though there were that affirmed, how sir Anthoine Doughtred following the Regent at the sterne, botwaged hir in diuerse places, and set hir powder on fire.

But howsoever it chanced, the whole ship by reason of the powder was set on fire, & so both the Car-rike and the Regent being grappled together, so as they could not fall off, were both consumed by fire at that instant. The French naue perceiuing this, fled in all hast, some to West, and some to the Isles adjoining. The Englishmen made out boats to helpe them in the Regent: but the fire was so terrible, that in manner no man durst approach; saving that by the James of Hull certeine Frenchmen that could swim were saued. Capteine of this Carrike was sir Piers Morgan, and with him he had in the same nine hundred men: and with sir Thomas Kneuet and sir John Carew were seven hundred; but all drowned and burnt. The Englishmen that night laie in Bertham baie, for the French fleet was disperst (as ye haue heard.) The lord admer all after this mis-chance thus happened to these two worthie ships, made againe to the sea, and scowzed all alongest the coasts of Britaine, Normandie, and Picardie, taking manie French ships, and burning such as they could not well bring away with them.

The king of England hearing of the losse of the Regent, caused a great ship to be made, such a one as the like had neuer bene scene in England, and named it Henrie grace de Dieu. The French king about the same time sent to a knight of the Rhodes called Piorre Jehan, a Frenchman bozne, of the countrie of Guien, requiring him to come by the streits of Sparrocke into Britaine: the which he did, bringing with him three gallees of force, with diuerse foists and row-gallees, so well ordinaed and trimmed, as the like had not bene scene in these parties before his coming. He had laide on the coasts of Barbarie to defend certeine of the religion, as they came from Tripolie. This yeare in the moneth of Nouember the king called his high court of parlement, in the which it was concluded, that the king himselte in person with an armie roiall shuld invade France; wherupon notice being giuen to such as shuld attend, they made their purueiance with all diligence that might be. In this parlement was granted to the king two fifteens, and foure denies; and head monie, of euerie duke ten markes, an earle five pounds, a lord foure pounds, a knight foure marks, & euerie man rated at eight hundred pounds in goods, to paie foure marks, and so after that rate, till him that was valued at foure shillings, paid twelue pence, and euerie man that toke foure shillings wages twelue pence, and euerie man and woman of fifteene yeares or by-ward foure pence. The steeple and lanterne of Wols-church in Cheape was this yeare finished. By fire this yeare a great part of the kings palace of Westminster, and the chappell in the Towre of London, and manie other places in England were burned.

thousand men to the sea. On Maie euen, Edmund de la Pole was beheaded on the Tower hill, his brother Richard was after slaine in France.]

After this parlement was ended, the king kept a solemne Chiffmasse at Greenwich, with dances and mummeries in most princelie maner. And on the Twelue daie at night came into the hall a mount, called the rich mount. The mount was set full of rich flowers of silke, and especiallie full of bosome slips full of cods, the branches were greene sattin, and the flowers flat gold of damaske, which signified Plantagenet. On the top stood a goodlie beacon giuing light, round about the beacon sat the king and five other, all in cotes and caps of right crimsin veluet, embroidered with flat gold of damaske, their cotes set full of spangles of gold. And foure woodhouses drey to the mount till it came before the quene, and then the king and his companie descended and danced. Then suddenlie the mount opened, and out came six ladies all in crimsin sattin and plunket, embroidered with gold and pearle, with French hoods on their heads, and they danced alone. Then the lords of the mount toke the ladies and danced together: and the ladies reentered, and the mount closed, and so was conueied out of the hall. Then the king shifed him, and came to the quene, and sat at the banquet which was verie sumptuous.

Ed. Charles Brandon created vicount Lisle.

The nauie set out againe.

The English nauie purposing to set upon the French in the haven, are defeated by a mischance.

The lord admirall would haue the king present in person at the encounter, and is rebuked.

After Candlemasse, the king created sir Charles Brandon vicount Lisle. In March following was the kings nauie of ships roiall & other set forth to the number of fortie and two, beside other balangers vnder the conduct of the lord admirall, accompanied with sir Walter Deuereux, lord Ferrers, sir Wolstan Browne, sir Edward Chyngham, sir Anthoine Pointz, sir John Mallop, sir Thomas Windham, sir Stephan Bull, William Fitz Williams, Arthur Plantagenet, William Sidneie esquires, and diuerse other noble and valiant capteins. They sailed to Portemouth, and there laie abiding wind, and when the same serued their turne, they weighed anchor, & making saile into Britaine, came into Berthram baie, and there laie at anchor in sight of the French nauie, which kept it selfe close within the haven of Berth, without proffering to come aboard.

The English perceiuing the maner of the French men, determined to set on them in the haven, and making forward in good order of battell, at their first enterie one of their ships, whereof Arthur Plantagenet, was capteine, fell on a blind rocke, and burst in sunder, by reason whereof, all the other staid: and the English capteins perceiuing that the haven was dangerous to enter without an expert lodesman, they cast about, and returned to their harborough at Berthram baie againe. The Frenchmen perceiuing that the Englishmen meant to assaile them, moored their ships so nere to the castell of West as they could, and placed bulwokes on the land on euerie side, to shoot at the Englishmen. Also they trapped together foure and twentie great hulkes that came to the baie for salt, and set them on a row, to the intent that if the Englishmen had come to assault them, they would haue set those hulkes on fire, and haue let them drine with the streame amongst the English ships.

Prior Jehan also laie still in Blanke sable baie, and plucked his galleys to the shore, setting his bassilikes and other ordinance in the mouth of the baie, which baie was bulwoked on euerie side, that by water it was not possible to be wone. The lord admirall perceiuing the French nauie thus to lie in feare, wrote to the king to come thither in person, and to haue the honour of so high an enterprife: which writing the kings counsell nothing allowed, for putting the king in leoparde upon the chance of the sea.

Wherefore the king wrote to him Harprie againe, commanding him to accomplish that which appertained to his duetie: which caused him to adventure things farther than wisdom would he should (as after ye shall heare) to his utter vndoying and casting alwaie, God hauing ordeined the means by his prouidence, which the pagans implied (though wanting the light of grace) in the name of destinie, of them counted inuitable. [A destinie lamentable considering the qualitie of the person, with the maner of his dieng. Wherein although manie vainlie dispute, that fortune led him to so miserable an accident: yet if we will lift by our considerations to God, we shall find that he hath reserved such a prerogative ouer all things which he hath created, that to him onclie belongeth the authoritie to dispose all things by the same power wherewith he hath created them of nothing.] And yet the foolish world (doting in blind ignorance, but pretending a singular insight in matters of secrecie) blinseth not to falke or rather to asseure, casualtie, chancemellie, misfortune, and such like foolish imaginations: whereas (indeed) the prouidence of God compasseth all things whatsoever, for nothing can be privileged from the amplest of the same.

Prior Jehan keeping him still within his hold, as a prisoner in a dungeon, did yet sometime send out his small foists to make a shew before the English nauie, which chased them to the baie. But because the English ships were mightie vessels, they could not enter the baie: and therefore the lord admirall caused certeine boats to be manned forth, which toke one of the best foists that Prior Jehan had, and that with great danger: for the gallees and bulwokes shot so freshlie all at one instant, that it was maruell how the Englishmen escaped. The lord admirall perceiuing that the Frenchmen would not come aboard, called a counsell, wherein it was determined, that first they would assaile Prior Jehan and his gallees lieng in Blanke sable baie, and after to set on the residue of the French fleet in the haven of West. When first it was appointed, that the lord Ferrers, sir Stephan Bull, and other, should go along with a conuenient number to assault the bulwokes, while the admirall entered with row barges and little gallees into the baie, and so should the Frenchmen be assailed both by water and land.

The lord admirall by the counsell of a Spanissh knight called sir Alfonso Charant, affirming that he might enter the baie with little leoparde, called to him William Fitz Williams, William Cobe, John Colleie, and sir Wolstan Browne, as his chiefe and most trustie friends, making them piete to his intent, which was to take on him the whole enterprife, with their assistance. And so on S. Markes daie, which is the five and twentieth of Aprill, the said admirall put himselfe in a small row barge, appointing three other small rowing ships, and his owne ship bote to attend him; and therewith upon a sudden rowed into the baie, where Prior Jehan had moored up his gallees iust to the ground: which gallees with the bulwokes on the land, shot so terrible, that they that followed were affraid. But the admirall passed forward, & as soone as he came to the gallees, he entered & drove out the Frenchmen. William Fitz Williams within his ship was sore hurt with a quarell. The baie was shallow, and the other ships could not enter, for the tide was spent.

Which thing the Frenchmen perceiuing, they entered the gallees againe with moxie pikes, and fought with the English in the gallees. The admirall perceiuing their approach, thought to haue entered againe into his row barge, which by violence of the tide was driven downe the streame, and with a pike he was ding the armie which he had there with him into three battells. The lord Little marshall of the host was capteine of the fore-ward, and under him three thousand men: sir Richard Carew with three hundred kept on the right side of the same fore-ward as a wing there: to: and the lord Darcie with other three hundred men was a wing on the left hand. The fore-riders of this battell were the Northumberland men on light geldings. The earle of Essex was lieutenant general of the speares, and sir John Dechie was vicegovernour of all the horsemen, and sir John Burdet standard-bearer to the kings speares. An eight hundred Almans went on a plumpe by themselves before the kings battell, and the duke of Buckingham with six hundred men was on the kings left hand, equall with the Almans, in like manner as sir Edward Poynings was on the right hand, with other six hundred men equall with the Almans.

In the kings battell, there was the standard of the armes of England borne by sir Henrie Guilford, there were three thousand; & the lord of Aburgauenie with eight hundred men was wing on the right hand, and sir William Compton with the retinue of the bishop of Winchester, and of maister * Wolfeie the kings almoner, being in number eight hundred was in manner of a reere-guard. Sir Anthoine Dugh-tred and sir John Penill with the kings speares that followed were four hundred, and so the whole armie contained eleven thousand and three hundred men. The number of the carriages were thirtene hundred, and the number of them that attended the same were nineteene hundred men, and all these were reckoned in the battell: but of good fighting men & soldiers appointed for the purpose, there were not full nine thousand. In this order the king with his armie marched forward through the confines of his enemies to the siege of Terrouan, entering into the French ground the five and twentieth of Julie being mondaie. On the morrow after as the armie marched forward, by negligence of the carvers that mistooke the waie, a great curtall (called the John C-uangelist) was overthrowne in a deepe pond of water and could not quicklie be recovered.

armie appro-ched, & their number.

The king being advertised that the Frenchmen approached to fight with him, left the gun (because the maister carpenter undertooke to wic it shortlie out of the water): & set forward, passing on by Cornohan, whiche he left on his right hand, and a little beyond pitched downe his field abiding for his enemies, the which (as he was informed) were not far off. On the morrow after being wednesdaie, the Reliefe of the speares brought word that they had ascried the French armie coming forward in order of battell, to the number of eleven thousand footmen, and foure thousand horsemen. Capteins of this armie were the lord de la Palice, the lord de Polennes, the duke of Longuile, the earle of S. Paule, the lord of Floranges, the lord of Cleremont, & Richard de la Poole a banished man, son to John duke of Suffolke. They came within two miles of the kings armie, and there the footmen scaled, and came no further.

The northern pickers plaie
the men.

But certeine of the horsemen to the number of three thousand came forward, and at the end of a wood shewed themselves in open sight of the English armie. And thus they stood countenancing the Englishmen. Some of the northerne pickers made to them, and in skirmishing with them, took some of them prisoners. About none the same daie, that valiant Welsh knight sir Rice ap Thomas with his retinue of horsemen being departed from the siege of Terrouan came to the king, and straightwaies was sent to the earle of Essex, which with two hundred speares was laid in a skale, if the Frenchmen had come nearer. When they were joined together, they drew about the hill, having with them sir Thomas Guilford, with two hundred archers on horsebacke, meaning to set on the Frenchmen: which perceiving that, and doubting least more companie had followed, they suddenlie drew backe, and joined them with their great battell.

Then the earle of Essex and the English horsemen followed them, till they came nere to the armie of France, and then scaled and sent forth light horsemen to biele the demcanos of the Frenchmen. When the Frenchmen of armes were returned to their battell, then both the horsemen and footmen with drew in order of battell, and still the English carres followed them for the space of three leagues, and then returned to the earle, making report to him of that they had done, who then brake up his skale, and came to the king, declaring to him how the Frenchmen were gone backe. This was called the dye wednesdaie; for the daie was wonderfull hot, and the king with his armie stood in order of battell, from six of the clocke in the morning till three of the clocke in the after none. And some died for lacke of moisture, and generallie euerie man was burned about the mouth with heat of the stomack; for drinke lacked, and water was not nere.

After this the king remoued toward Terronan, and as he was setting forward, the lord Malon of Flanders came to him with his horsemen, which were already in the kings wages. As the armie passed, by negligence the same daie in a lane was overthrowne one of the kings bombardes of iron, called the red gun, and there left. The king lodged that night two miles from saint Omers on the north side of the towne. On the thursdaie, being the eight and twentieth of Julie, the maister carpenter with an hundred carpenters and labourers, without knowledge of the marshall, went to wic by the great gun that was in the pond (as ye haue heard) and by force of engines drew it up, and carted it ready to being away: but suddenlie there came an eight hundred Frenchmen with speares, crossbowes, and hand-guns, which set on the labourers so fiercely, that notwithstanding their manfull defense, the most part of them were slaine and the residue taken, and both they and the peece of ordinance conueied to Wallongne.

The Frenchmen glad of this chance, assembled a great number to fetch the other gun, which lay yet in the lane. But the lord Werners being captaine of the pioneers, and hearing all these things, prepared to recover that gun; and so in the morrow went to fetch it. There were appointed to go backe to see him safe conduced, the earle of Essex with his companie of speares, sir Rice ap Thomas with his retinue, and sir John Penill with the Northumberland men. The Almans also were commanded to retire backe to the succours of them that were gone for the gun. The Almans went forth, till they came within two miles of the place where the gun lay, and further they would not go. The Frenchmen to the number of nine or ten thousand men (as some reckened) were abroad, and came toward the place where the Englishmen were carting the peece of ordinance.

The Northumberland horsemen having espied them, gaue knowledge to the residue of the Englishmen; who prepared themselves to defend their ground against the enemies: and the earle of Essex sent to the lord Malon, willing him with his companie to come to his aid: but the lord Malon sent word againe, that he was come to ferre the king of England more than for one daie, and therefore he wished that all the Englishmen should returne, sith that with the great power of France they were not able to match. This answer was much diffeasant to the earle of Essex and the other captains. In this manner time time the foreriders of the French part were come to the hands of the Englishmen, and so they fell in fair- with very hottie: but at length all things considered, and specialie the small number of the Englishmen, being not above seven hundred ho:semen, it was thought best that they should returne and follow the gun, which they had sent forward.

Whereupon they retreated in order, and not in a tie- sieng manner, still following the gun. The French- men perceiuing that, picked forward to the number of two thousand ho:semen, & came iust to the backs of the Englishmen, who the while with cast about, and made returne to the Frenchmen. Sir William Tel- ler and sir John Sharpe were the first that charged, and after all the other Englishmen. The Frenchmen fled immediatlie so fast backe, that happie was he that might be for most. The whole host seeing the ho:semen thus had in chase, suddenlie returned. The earle of Essex withdrew to an hill, and there caused his trumpet to blow to the standard for feare of sub- tile dealing; and when his men were come in, and ga- thered together, he returned. On the same daie be- ing fridaie, the nine and twentieth of Julie, the king came to Arkes, & there incamped; whither the earle of Essex came to him, and declared what had bene done that daie, the king thanking him and other the captains for their paines and diligence.

The king laie here at Arkes till mondaie the first of August, and then removed to a village midwaie betwixt Terwine and saint Omers, where he lay till thursdaie the fourth of August, and came that daie in good order of battell before the citie of Terwine, & there pitched up his tents and pavillions in most roiall manner, sending his campe right stronglie with ordi- nance and other warlike deuises. [The king for him- selfe had a house of timber with a chimnie of iron, and for his other lodgings he had great and goodlie tents of blew water worke garnished with yelloe and white, diuerse comes within the same for all offi- cers necessarie. On the top of the pavillions stood the kings beastes holding fances, as the lion, the dragon, the greihound, the antelope, the dun cow: all within the lodging was pointed full of the sunnes rising, the lodging was one hundred and siue and twentie fote in length.]

The king lieng before Terwine, his great ordi- nance did foze beat the towne walles, & they within likewise shot ordinance out of the towne, and siue di- uerse Englishmen in the trenches, among which shots they had one gun that euerie daie and night was ordinarilie shot at certeine houres without faile: this gun was of the Englishmen called the whistling gun, but it neuer did harne in the kings field. The siege thus lieng before the citie of Terwine, sir Alexander Wainam a capteine of the miners, caused a mine to be enterpiled to enter into the towne: but the Frenchmen perceiuing that, made a countermine, and so destroyed the other mine, and di- uerse miners slaine within the same. The French ar- mie houred euer a farre to take the Englishmen at advantage, as they went a foraging; and manie a skirmish was done, and manie good seates of armes atchued on both sides, and diuerse prisoners taken. Among the Frenchmen were certeine light ho:se- men called Stradiots, with short stirrops, better hats, small speares, and swords like cimiteries of Turkie: diuerse times the northerne light ho:smen under the conduct of sir John Penill skirmished with these Stradiots and took diuerse of them prisoners, and brought them to the king.

While the king laie thus before Terwine, the capteine of Bullongne knowing by his espials, that manie of the garrison of Calis were with the king at the siege, and also that vittels were daile brought out of England to Calis to succour the campe, ima- gined a great enterpise, and sent for all the men of warre under his dominion and rule, and declared to them what honour they should obtaine if they hurted or spoiled the out parts of Calis, the king of England on that side of the sea. The men of warre perceiuing the good courage of the capteine, assented to his pur- pose, and so with all diligence they, to the number of a thousand men, in the evening set forward, & came to Betonam bidge by three of the clocke in the mo- rning, and found the watchmen that kept the bidge asleepe, & so entered the bulworke and slue the watch- men, and took the ordinance of the bidge, and then let the bidge fall, so that all entered that would.

The capteine of Bullongne kept six hundred men for a scale at the bidge, & sent the other into the ma- rishes and medows to fetch a waite the beastes and cat- tell which they should find there. This was done, and some of them came so nere the walles of Calis, that they were cried. And about a six score coupers, ba- kers, shipmen & other which laie without the towne, hearing the alarme, got together, & setting on those Frenchmen which were advanced so nere the towne, slue them downe that abode, chased them that fled euen into Betonam bidge, and recovered the same, and put backe their enemies. About siue of the clocke in the morning, the gate of Calis called Bullongne gate was opened, and then by permission of the deputie, one Culpeper the under-marshall with two hundred archers under a banner of saint George issued forth.

All these in great hast came to Betonam bidge, where they found the other Englishmen that had woone the bidge of the Frenchmen, and so altoget- her set forward to assaile the Frenchmen that kept the scale, and taried till the residue of their companie which were gone a foraging vnto Calis walles were come: for the other that had spoiled the mari- shes were returned with a great hottie. At the first, when the Frenchmen saw the Englishmen approach, they thought they had bene their owne fellows. But when they saw the banner of saint George, they per- ceiued how the matter went, & so determined to de- fend themselves against their enemies; but the Eng- lishmen set so fiercelie on, that finally the French- men were discomfited, and foure and twentie of them slaine, beside twelue score that were taken prisoners, and all the ordinance and hottie againe recovered.

These prisoners were brought to Calis, & there sold in open market. [Among all other, a couper of the towne of Calis bought a prisoner of this hottie that dwelt in Bullongne, and had of the prisoner an hun- dred crowns for his ranfome. When the monie was paid, the Frenchman praised the couper to see him safe deliuered, and to conduct him out of danger. The couper gentlie granted, and without anie know- ledge of his friends, all alone went with the French- man till he came beyond the causeie, & there would haue departed: but the Frenchman perceiuing that the couper was aged, and that no rescue was nie, by force took the couper prisoner, and caried him to Bullongne, & made him paie two hundred crowns for his ranfome: thus through follie was the poze cou- per deceived. Wherefore it is wisdome for a man to hold fast his possession, and to supplie his want of strength by subtiltie; imitating therein the fox, which although in force he be inferior to the lion, as not able to beare the perking of his taile, or a pelt of his paw; yet in craft he goeth beyond that boisterous beaist, and so escapeth danger, which otherwise he might susteine.]

Atre. The king prepared all things necessarie to meet with the emperor in triumph. The noble men of the kings campe were gorgeously apparelled, their courters barded with cloth of gold, of damaske and byoderie, their apparell all tissue, cloth of gold and silver, and goldsmiths worke, great chains of bauderikes of gold, and belles of bullion: but in especiall the duke of Buckingham, he was in purple sattin, his apparell and his bard full of antelops and swans of fine gold bullion, and full of spangles, a little bells of gold marvellous costlie and pleasant to behold. The king was in a garment of great riches in jewels and stone, he was armed in a light armour. The master of his horse followed him with a spare horse, the henchmen followed bearing the kings peeces of harnesse, euerie one mounted on a great courser.

furniture.

The one bare his helmet, the second his grangard, the third his speare, the fourth his are, and so euerie one had something belonging to a man of armes. The apparell of the nine henchmen were white cloth of gold, and crimson cloth of gold, richlie embroidered with goldsmiths worke, the trappers of the courters were mantell harnesse coulpned, and in euerie bent a long bell of fine gold, and on euerie pendent a deepe tassell of fine gold in bullion, which trappers were verie rich. The king and the emperor met betwene Atre and the campe, in the foulest weather that lightlie hath bene seene. The emperor gentlie interloined the king, and the king likewise him, and after a little communication had betwene them, because the weather was foule, they parted for that time. The emperor & all his men were at that daie all in blacke cloth, for the emperesse his wife was latelie deceased.

A letter of defiance sent by the Scottish king to king Henric.

Within a day or two after this interuiew, and that the king was returned to his campe, thither came a king at armes of Scotland called Lion, with his cote of armes on his backe, who within short time was by Cartier king of armes brought to the kings presence, where he being almost dismayed to see the king so noble accompanied, with few words & meetlie good countenance, deliuered a letter to the king, which his grace receiued and read it himselfe; and therewith hauing conceiued the whole contents thereof, made this answer immediatly to the herald.

Englands
speech to the Scottish kings herald differed without premeditation.

Now we perceiue the king of Scots our brother in law, and your master to be the same person whom we euer take him to be, for we neuer esteemed him to be of anie truth: and so now we haue found it. For notwithstanding his oth, his promise in the word of a king, and his owne hand and seale; yet now he hath broken his faith & promise to his great dishonour and infamie for euer, and intendeth to inuade our realme in our absence, which he durst not once attempt, our owne person being present. But he sheweth himselfe not to be degenerat from the conditions of his fathers, whose faiths (for the most part) haue euer bene violated, and their promises neuer obserued, further than they list. Therefore tell thy master, first, that he shall neuer be comprised in anie league wherein I am a confederat; and also that I suspecting his truth (as now the deed proueth) haue lest an earle in my realme at home, which shall be able to defend him and all his poluer. For we haue provided so, that he shall not find our land destitute of people as he thinketh to do: but this saie to thy master, that I am the very owner of Scotland, & that he holdeth it of me by homage. And inso much as now, contrarie to his bounden dutie, he being my vassall, doth rebell against me, with Gods helpe I shall at my returne expell him his realme, and so tell him.

Sir said the king of armes, I am his naturall subiect, and he is my naturall lord, and that he commandeth me to say, I may boldlie say with fauour, but the commandements of other I may not, nor dare say to my soueraigne: but your letters, with your hono- sent, may declare your pleasure, for I may not say such words of reproch to him, to whom I owe onlie mine allegiance and faith. Then said the king, Wherefore came you hither? Will you receiue no answer? Yes said Lion, but your answer requireth doing and no writing, that is, that immediatly you should returne home. Well said the king; I will returne to your damage, and not at thy masters summoning. Then the king commanded Cartier to take him to his tent, and to make him good cheare, which he did, and cherished him well: for he was fore abashed.

After he was departed, the king sent for all the capteins, and before them and his counsell caused the letter to be read, the contents whereof were, that king Henric had not dealt with him uprightlie in sundrie points, as in mainteining of those which had laine his people of Scotland by sea, and also in succouring bastard Heron with his complices, which had (under trust of daies of meeting for iustice) laine his warden. Also his twines legacie was by him withholden: & moreover, where first he had desired him in fauour of his dere cousin the duke of Gelder, not to attempt anie thing against him; yet had he sent his people to inuade the said dukes cuntry, which did what in them lay to destruye and dishonour the said duke, that had nothing offended against him.

And now againe, where he had made the like request for his brother & cousine the most christian king of France: yet notwithstanding, had the king of England caused him to lose his duchie of Millaine, and at this present inuaded his realme with all his puissance, to destruye him and his subiects, whereas yet the said king of France had bene ever friend to him, & neuer giuen him occasion thus to do. In consideration of which injuries receiued in his owne person, and in his friends, he must needs seeke redress, and take part with his brother and cousine the said king of France. Wherefore he requited him to desist from further inuasion and destruction of the French dominions, which to do if he refused, he plainlie declared by the same letters, that he would do what he could to cause him to desist from further pursuit in that his enterpryse, & also giue letters of marque to his subiects for the deniall of iustice made to them by the king of England.

The letters thus sent to the king of England, were dated at Edinburgh the six and twentieth daie of Iulie, and giuen vnder the signet of the said Scottish king. When the king had thus caused these letters to be read, and thoughtlie considered of them as appertained, he sent them straight to the earle of Surrie, which then late at Pomfret, and caused other letters to be deuised to the king of Scots, the effect whereof was; that although he well perceiued by the kings letters, which he had receiued from him, in what sort, vnder colour of contriued occasions and feined quarrelles, he meant to breake the peace, he did not much maruell thereat, considering the ancient accustomed manners of some his progenitors.

Howbeit, if loue and dread of God, mightnesse of blood, honour of the world, law and reason had bound him, it might be supposed, that he would neuer so farre haue proceeded; wherein the pope and all princes christned might well note in him dishonorable demeanour, which had dissembled the matter, whilst he was at home in his realme; and now in his absence thus went about upon forged causes to bitter his old rancor, which in covert manner he had long kept secret. Neuer thelesse, upon mistrust of such wickednesse, he had put his realme in a readinesse to resist his enterpryses, as he doubted not through Gods fauour, and the assistance of his confederats, he should be able to resist the malice of all schismatiques, and the pretended griefs therein amongst other comprised, for denieng of a safe conduct to the Scottish am-bassadour to haue bene lastly sent vnto him. Where-vnto thus he answered; that the same safe conduct had bene granted, if the Scottish herald would haue taken it with him.

And finally, as touching the Scottish kings request, to desist from further attempting against the French la. he signified to him, that he knew him for no competent iudge of so high authoritie, as to require him in that behalf, and therefore God willing he went with the aid and assistance of his confede-rats & allies to prosecute his begun attempt. And as the Scottish king should doe to him, & to his realme, so it should be hereafter remembered and acquitted.
These letters were written in the campe before Teruine the twelfe of August, and given vnder the kings signet, and therewith deliuered to Lion king of armes, who had of the king 1000 angels in reward.

Then departed he with his letters into Flanders, there to take ship to saile into Scotland, but yet he could haue a vessel and wind for his purpose, his maister was laine, as after ye shall heare. In this meane while the Frenchmen being assembled and lodged in campe at Blangie on this side Amiens, the French king appointed that all the hoisemen to the number of eight thousand (as Paulus Iogius recordeth) should go with vittels vnto Teruine, and put the same into the towne, if by anie meanes they might, for that those within stood as then in great necessitie for want of vittels.

The charge of this conuete was committed vnto Monsieur de Piennes, because he was lieutenant of those marches: notwithstanding there were amongst the number, other noble men of more high degree in honor, and also of great prowesse, fame, and experience, furnished with sundrie bands of men at armes of long appoyued ballancie, and vied to go awaie with victorie in manie a dangerous conflict and battell, wanting at this present nothing but their old accustomed god fortune. Whilest the Frenchmen were thus prepared to come with vittels to Teruine, the emperor Maximilian came from Aire to the kings campe before Teruine the twelfe of August, wearing a crosse of saint George as the kings souldier, & receiuing of him salarie for seruice; which Anglorum praelia noteth as noteworthie, saieing:

Sub rege Anglorum magnus meret induperator.

The emperor was honourable received, and lodged in a rich tent of cloth of gold prepared for him, according as was conuenient for his estate. He tarried vntill sundae being the fourteenth of August, and then returned to Aire: and on the morrow after came againe being mondaie the fiftenth of August, on which daie there chanced a great fraie betwixt the Almans of the kings campe, and the Englishmen, insomuch that manie were laine. The Almans ran to the kings ordinance and toke it, and imbattelled themselues, and bent the ordinance against the king and his campe. The English prepared their bowes, and the Almans made redie their pikes: but the cap-teins toke rich paines in the matter, that the fraie was appeased.

Now as this trouble was in hand, the emperor came from Aire, and saw all the demeanour of both parts, and was glad to behold the discreet behauiour of the capteins. After that the emperor was thus come to the kings field, the king called a counsell, at the which the emperor was present, where it was debated, by what meanes they might best constreine them within to deliuer by the towne, and especial-lie how to keepe them from vittels & other succours, which the French armie (as it was knowne) meant verie thortlie to minister vnto them. Some were of this mind, and namelie the emperor; that bridges should be made ouer the riuer, to passe ouer a part of the armie to besiege the towne on that side; where otherwise the French armie might hitell the towne at their pleasures.

Others were of a contrarie mind, doubting what might happen, if the armie should be so diuided, least the Frenchmen setting on the backe of the one part of the armie, and they within the towne to fallie out in their faces, some misfortune might happen per the other part could passe the riuer to the succour of their fellowes. Yet at length the former purpose was allowed as most necessarie; and therefore commandement was given to the maister of the ordinance, that in all hast he should cause fise bridges to be made ouer the water for the armie to passe. The cappenters so applied their worke that night, that the bridges were made by the next morow, and all the hoisemen first passed ouer, and then the king with his whole battell, and the great ordinance followed and passed ouer to the other side of the water. This was on the sixteenth daie of August being tuesday.

On the same morning the Frenchmen were com-ming with their conuete of vittels to refresh the towne, hauing appointed one part of their troops to keepe on that side the riuer where the English armie was first incamped, and where the earle of Shrews-burie still kept his field; that in offering the skirmish on that side, the residue of the hoisemen might with more ease and safetie put the vittels and other necessarie things into the towne on the other side.
Here might a man haue scene of what force in wars sudden chance is oftentimes. For the king thus with his battell passing the riuer, meaning to besiege the towne on euerie side, and the Frenchmen at that same instant hauing also passed the riuer with other carriages laden with vittels, purposing to releue the towne on that side, caused no small doubt to be conceiued of ech others meaning, on both parts, least that the one, hauing knowlege of the others purpose, had bene prepared for to hinder the same.

And yet was it nothing so, for neither the king knew of the Frenchmens approach that daie, neither they of his passing ouer the water. But when the king had aduertisement given him (by the light hoisemen that were sent abroad to discouer the countrie) how the Frenchmen were at hand; he prepared himselfe to the battell, and first set forth his hoisemen, and then followed himselfe with his battell of footemen. The French capteins being hereof advised, determined not to fight without their footmen; and therefore with all speed sent backe their carriages, and staled with their hoisemen, vntill the carriages might haue leasure to get out of danger.
In the meane time the Englishmen aduanced forward, and their hoisemen mounted by the hill, where the French hoisemen were in troope, with thirtie and thre standards sped, & might see the Englishmen comming, and the kings battell marching forward with the Almans.

There were amongst the Frenchmen certeine companies of Estradiots, which being placed before skirmish with the Englishmen saw where the banners of the English horsemen were coming, and the kings battell following upward, weening verelie that all had bene horsemen, whereupon they cast themselves about and fled. The Frenchmen were so fast in arraie, that the Estradiots could not enter; and so they ran still by the ends of the Frenchmens ranks. Here with the English horsemen set on, and about an hundred archers on horse-backe, being lighted beside their hostles, and set by an hedge all alongest a village side called Somie, shot freshlie at their enemies; & also certeine culuerings being placed on the top of an hill were discharged amongst the thickest prease of the Frenchmen; so that finally the French were discomfited: for those that were behind saw the fall of some of their standards, which the Englishmen overthrew, and their Estradiots also (in whome they had great confidence) returne.

They that were furthest off fled first, and then the Englishmen & Burgognian horsemen, which were with them, egerlie followed the chase, in the which were taken the duke of Longuile, brother to the earle of Dunois that had married the daughter and heire to the marquesse of Rothlois, the lord of Clermont, capteine Baiard, monsieur de Wasse, and other, to the number of twelue score prisoners, and all brought to the kings presence with six standards, which were likewise taken. The Burgognians brought not their prisoners to fight. Monsieur de la Palice, and monsieur de Imbre-court being taken of them and knowne, were put to their ransomes, and licenced mainentantlie to depart vpon their word. Thus was the power of the French horsemen by the sharpe encounter of the English horsemen, and full sight of the battels of the footmen, following in arraie at the backs of the horsemen, and the discharging of certeine culuerings amongst them, quickelie put to flight without anie great resistance.

The emperor encouraged his Germans to place the men.

The emperor Maximilian was present with the king, and wore saint Georges crosse, greatlie encouraging the Germans to shew themselves like men, sith the place was fortunate to him and them, to trie the chance of battell in: as they might call to remembrance by the victorie there obtained against the Frenchmen a foure and twentie yeares past. This encounter chancing thus on the sixteenth daie of August, being tuesday, in this fift yeare of king Henries reigne, which was the yeare after the incarnation 1517, was called the battell Des espours, by the Frenchmen themselves, that is to saie, the battell of spures: forsomuch as they in stead of sword and lance used their spures, with all might and maine to picke forth their hostles to get out of danger; so that in them was verified the old prouerbe, One paire of hoels is worth two paire of hands.

spures.

That wing of the horsemen also, which was appointed to skirmish with the Englishmen on the other side the river, whilst the other might have conueied the vittells into the towne, was fiercelie beaten backe by the martiall prowesse of the valiant erle of Shrewesburie, sir Kice ap Thomas, and other worthy capteins, which late on that side the water. The duke of Alanson, the earle of saint Paule, and monsieur de Flozenges, had the leading of those Frenchmen. They within the towne were in great hope of succour this daie, and when they saw the French power approach, they sallied forth on that side where the lord Herbert late, and skirmished with his people verie proude, but they were repelled to the gates of their towne, and manie of them slaine by the high valiancie of the said lord Herbert and his capteins.

After that the Englishmen were returned from the chase of the Frenchmen, whome they had followed a thre long miles from the field, the king made sir John Pechie a baneret, and John Carre knight, which was sore hurt: sir John Pechie had his gaudon taken, and diuerse of his men hurt, they followed so farre in the chase. After this overthrow of the French horsemen, the R. compassed the towne more streitlie on ech side, and the batterie was brought so nigh the walls as might be, with breaches were made in sundrie places, by meanes whereof the lord Pontremie despairing any long time to keepe the towne, fell to a composition, and yielded it up to the kings hands. This encounter and overthrow, with the giving up of Teruine, is entant to the knowledge of foreyn nations (to be read) recorded as followeth:

*Francorum pugnax equitatus prelia misceat, Succurruntque suis, sed frustra infirmior arma Turba capit; palmam bellando potentior Anglus Aufert, lathifera transfusus hostilibus hastis.
Diruta turris fragu bombardarum mania praebeat Britigena ingressum facilem, Gallique timorem Iniciunt, tandem Terrouana deducit Angli.*

Howbeit this yielding up of the said towne was with condition, that the souldiers might depart with horse and armour, & that such townsmen as would there remaine, might haue their liues and goods saued. Thus (I saie) was the citie of Teruine deliuered up to the king of England, with all the ordinance and munitions then being found within the same. This was on the eighteenth of August. The earle of Shrewesburie entered the same night, and caused the banner of saint George to be set up in the highest place of the towne in signe of victorie. When the lord Pontremie, and all the souldiers were departed, and that the earle of Shrewesburie had searched all the towne to see that enerie thing was sure, he called the townsmen afore him, and swore them to be true to the king of England. The foure and twentieth of August the king himselfe entered the towne with great and roiall triumph, and dined in the bishops palace. At after none he returned to his campe, and on the six and twentieth daie of August he removed againe to Cuingate, where he first incamped after the chase of the French horsemen.

Here it was determined in counsell, that the walls and fortifications of Teruine should be raised, which was done, and the towne burned; except the cathedrall church and the palace. All the ordinance was sent to Aire to be kept there to the kings vse. After this, it was concluded that the king should laie siege to the citie of Coimate; whereupon he set forward in thre battels: the earle of Shrewesburie leading the backward, the king and the emperor governing the battell, and the lord Chamberleine following with the reereward. The first night they incamped beside Aire. Diuerse Englishmen tarieng behind at Teruine for pilkage, were surprised by the Frenchmen, which slue some of them, & cast some into the fire. Those that fled escaped verie narrowlie. The king with his armie passed forward towards Coimate, and by the waie visited the yong prince of Castile and the ladie Margaret, governess of the prince, in the towne of Aliste, whilst his armie laie adjoind in the fields beyond Pont Auandien.

There was appointed to attend the king vnto Aliste the duke of Buckingham, the lord marquesse Dorset, the earle of Essex, and the lord Aisle, with diuerse other; the charge of his campe he committed for the time to his counsell. Then mounted the king vpon a courser, his apparrell & bard were cloth of silver of small quadzant cuts traucersed and edged with cut cloth of gold, and the border set full of red roses, his armour fresh & set full of ietwels. followed (as you haue heard before) and the coursers rightlie apparelled, and so were manie capitains that waited on the king: by the waie met the king the lord Knaues with manie noble men. And a mile without the towne there met with him the burgeses of Lille, and presented to him the keyes of the towne, saying, that the emperor their soueraigne lord had so commanded them to do.

The king praised their obedience to their soueraigne, and thanked the emperor and them for so high a present as the keyes of such a towne. Neuertheless, he had such confidence in them, that he trusted them no lesse than his owne subiects, and so deliuered the keyes to the prouost of the towne, which was well accompanied. Then met the king a great number of nobles of Flanders, Brabant, Holland, and Henaud, which noble received him. After them came the countie Palatine or Palgrave, one of the electors of the empire, with thirtie horses, all his men gorgeouslie apparelled after the fashion of his countie, and humbly saluted the king. At the gate of Lille the capitaine of the towne stood with a garison in armor well appointed, all the streets were set on both sides with burning torches and diuerse goodlie pageants pleasant to behold. Thus he passed thorough the towne with his sword and maces borne before him, and alighted at the hall doore with his sword borne, where met with him the emperor, the prince of Castile, and the ladie Margaret, and humbly saluted him.

Then for reuerence of the emperor, the king caused his sword to be put up, and his maces to be laid downe; & so was the king and all other nobles lodged and feasted according to their degrees. In the towne of Lille was a noise that thre gunners with handguns should haue slaine the king: for which rumor manie were attached, but nothing proved. But when these tidings came to the campe, they were neuer merrie till they saw the king againe. Great was the there, with bankets, plaies, comedies, maskes, and other pastimes that were shewed to the king in the court of Burgognie, and so in solace he sojourned there sundrie and moneths the nineteenth daie of September. On the twentieth daie he sent word that his armie should remoue toward Tozaine, and so they remoued to a place conuenient betwene Tozaine and Lille, and certeine capitains were appointed to keepe the passage at the bydge of Aumoulen.

After that the king had taried at Lille thre daies, and had well reposed himselfe, he toke his leaue, and thanked the emperor and the yong prince, the ladie Margaret & all the ladies for all his high chere and solace, and about six of the clocke at night, he departed out of Lille, and the noble men brought the king forth and so returned, and then the capitaine shut the gates. When the king was a mile and more out of the towne, he asked where his campe laye: And no man there could tell the waie, and guide had they none, the night was so darke & mistie. Thus the king taried a long while, and wist not whither to go; at last they met with a vitteler coming from the campe, which was their guide and brought them thither. The maister of the ordnance shot diuerse peces of ordnance, but they were not heard; but in safetie the king with all his companie returned.

On the one and twentieth daie of September the king remoued his campe toward Tozaine, and lodged within thre miles of the citie, on a cozne ground by the riuer. On which night came to the king the emperor and the Palgrave, which were lodged in rich tents, and noble serued of all viands and things necessarie. The people about Tozaine were with their gods fled to the citie, and yet the citie had no men of warre to defend it, but with multitude of inhabitants the same was well replenished. The king commanded sir Rice and his hoisemen to view one quarter, and the earle of Essex and his companie another quarter; and the lord Wallon and the lord Lignie the other quarters. Then the two and twentieth daie of September, these foure capitains at one time were sone openlie with banners displayed before the towne, and there made a long scale, and returned.

Then the king sent Cartier king of armes to summon them to yeld it ouer into his hands, to whome they made answer, that they receiued no citie of the king of England to keepe, nor anie would they render him, with which answer he departed. Then they fortified their walls, and made prouision for vittels, cozne, wine, and artillerie, and for all fortifications that might be gotten. And the citie of it selfe was strong, well walled, and furnished with good bulwarks and defenses. But when they saw the king with such a puissance draw nere the citie, they were sore abashed, and called a generall councell. Then the prouost said; Brethren, you know how that the king of England sent an herald to summon vs to render vp to him this citie, or else he would put it and vs to the sword, fier, and blood. We answered he would be at defense. Now he is come in our sight to fulfill the message sent by the herald, & now is come the time of our defense.

Howbeit in this matter standeth thre mischefts, one is our bounden dutie and allegiance that we owe to our soueraigne lord king Lewes of France; the second the liues of vs, our wiues, children, and neighbors; the third how to defend the finall destruction of this ancient citie, now likelie to fall, which citie was neuer conquered. Now our citie is whole, your liues in safetie, your goods your owne; determine whether you will haue war or peace. Then the common people cried all; War, war, war. Then said the prouost, Take compassion of wiues and children and of the old folke; consider if you haue no quicke rescue, you cannot continue against ponder puissance, although your courages were neuer so great, this the wisest of the citie and I haue considered. Then suddenly was there in the councell a vaunt-parler, a boister, which hearing this, called a great number of his affinitie, and went out of the councell and so out of the gates, and set fire of the suburbs on all sides. When the councell saw the minds of the commons, and that their waies might not be followed, they comforted the people, and maintained them for their defense.

After this the king approached the citie with his whole armie, and they of the citie issued forth to professe the skirmish: but the archers beat them backe. Also the carriage men that came with the herbingers, saw where certeine wagons were entering the citie, vnto the which they ran, and toke some of them. At this skirmish the horse of the lord John Grate was slaine vnder him, as he came to defend the carriage men; but he himselfe had no hurt. The king with his battell planted his siege on the north side the citie. The earle of Shrewsburie with the forward lodged toward the south side of the riuer, and there laye that night. The lord Herbert with the rearward incamped himselfe on the west side, and beat the walls and towers of the citie with the great ordnance. The next daie after their coming thither, being the thre and twentieth of September, the earle of Shrewsburie with the forward passed the riuer, & planted his siege on the southside of the citie, stretching to the east end, and bent his ordnance against the walles. And thus was the citie of Tozaine besieged on all parts.

king receiued letters from the earle of Surrie with the Scotch kings gantlet, whereby he was certified of the slaughter of the said king, and how all things had bene handled at the battell of Floddon, whereof hereafter ye shall find further mention. The king thanked God of the newes, and highlie commended the prowesse of the earle, and other the capteins: howbeit he had a secret letter, that Chiefhiremen and other fled from sir Edmund Howard in the battell, which letter caused great hartburning, and manie words: but the king toke all things in good part, and would that no man should be dissatisfied. On the six and twentieth daie, fiers were made in the host, in token of that victorie against the Scots, and on the seauen and twentieth daie being tuesday, made was song by them of the kings chappell, with Te Deum, and the bishop of Rochester made a sermon, declaring the death of the king of Scots, and lamenting his euill hap and periturie. But now to our purpose of the siege of Tornaie.

The king of England lieng afront before Tornaie, caused his great ordinance to be planted round about the citie, and diuerse trenches were cast, and rampiers made, and the lord Lisle and the lord Willoughbie were appointed to mainteine the ordinance with their bands, and the earle of Kent was lodged before the gate called port Valencien: so that the citizens could not issue out, nor no aid could come in. The ordinance dailie beat the gates, towers, & wals, which made a great battertie: and a few Englishmen assaulted the port coquerell, but they were too few in number; and if they had bene more in number, they had taken the towne, as the Tornaies confessed after. The citizens of Tornaie considering their estate came together to counsell, and there the prouost said in effect as followeth. Friends and brethren of this noble citie, I cannot too much praise your trust and fidelitie to your soueraigne lord the king of France, considering how manfully you haue defended this citie since the beginning of this siege.

But alas! although it be written on the gates gratien in stone, lammes ton ne a perdu ton pucelage, that is to say; Thou hast neuer lost thy maidenhead: yet if this citie had not bene well furnished and euery at the daie appointed sure of rescue, it could not haue continued. Now you see that rescue faileth, our gates be raised, our towers beaten downe, our chiefe tower like to fall, so that if this perillous siege continue, or else if our enemies assault vs, we be not able to defend vs: wherefore now, all these things considered, I would know whether you will treat with the king of England or abide the chance. Then they which at the last counsell cried War, war; now cried Peace, peace: yet all were not agreed. Then one wise man said, Sirs if the towne be assaulted once againe with a great number, suerlie it will be taken: you sawe the experience at the last assault, and then consider if it be taken by force, who is there that can save he is sure of his life: but by intreatie, the king of England is so mercifull that we may fortune to saue both life and goods. Then finally all agreed to treat.

Then the prouost sent to the king a trumpet, desiring a safe conduct for him & certeine other to come and to speake with him: which request was to him granted. Then the prouost of the citie, accompanied with eleven with him of the best of the citie, came to the armie, & spake with the lords of the counsell, and after were led to the kings presence. The prouost kneeled downe and all his companie, and said: Right high and mightie prince, although the citie of Tornaie is strong, well walled, well replenished with people, vittels, artillerie, yea and the people in feare and dread of nothing; yet we know that against your great puissance it can not continue long, although it were ten times as strong as it is. Wherefore we knowing by report your honoz, your wisdom, your iustice, & noble hart, are content to become your subjects & vassals, so that we may haue and enjoy our old lawes, customes, liberties, and franchises, vnder you, as we haue before this done vnder other princes.

Then said the king; We haue well heard your petition, we will common with our counsell & make you answer. And when he had communed with his counsell, he answered saying: Sirs, he that asketh mercie of vs, shall not be denied; and seeing you come to treat, we remit you to our counsell. Then they went into the tent of counsell, & there the Tornaies fell at a point, and in conclusion they yielded the citie and ten thousand pounds sterling for the redemption of their liberties, and so departed to the citie, making relation of the king and his noble courage. On thursdaie the nine and twentieth daie of September, the king was in his rich tent of cloth of gold vnder his cloth of estate, to whome came the citizens of the citie, and were sworne to him, and became his subjects.

Then the king appointed the lord Lisle, the lord Burgauenie, & the lord Willoughbie to take possession, which with six thousand men entered the citie, and toke the market place and the wals, and searched the houses for feare of treason. Then master Thomas Wolse the kings almoner called before him all the citizens young and old, and swore them to the king of England, the number whereof was foure score thousand. Thus the king of England by conquest came to the possession of the citie of Tornaie. On sundaie the second daie of October, the king entered the citie of Tornaie at port founteine, and foure of the chiefe of the citie ouer him bare a canopy with all the armes of England. Euerie person was in his best apparell, the ladies & gentlewomen late in the windowes beholding the king and his nobilitie, euerie citizen had in his hand a staffe toych. The king himselfe was richlie appareled in rich armour on a barbed courser, his henchmen bearing his peeces of war, as ar, speare, and other, their coursers were barbed with the armes of England, France, Ireland, and other the kings dominions all richlie bedorred. Thus the king with his nobilitie all richlie appareled with his sword borne before him, his heralds and sergeants of armes with trumpets and minstrells entered the citie, and came to our ladie church, and there Te Deum was song.

Then the king called to his presence, Edward Cullford, William Fitz Williams, John Danlie, William Tiler, John Sharpe, William Dulle, John Sauage, Christopher Garnish, and diuerse other balliant esquires, and gaue to them the order of knight-hood, and then went to his lodging, and at after none he came to the market place, where was prepared for him a roome. Then he caused a proclamation to be made in his name king of England & France, that no man should gréue the citizens. During which proclamation the Tornaies scarce looked up, nor they ed once to him any amiable countenance, which was much marked. The cite finished, the king departed to his campe, leaving the citie in safe keeping. This while the king rode to see the castell of spoton, and there his grace toke great pleasure. The king remembering the great chere that the prince of Castile and the ladie spargaret had made him at Lisle, which was but twelue miles English from Tornaie, desired the said prince & ladie, with diuerse other to come to him to his citie of Tornaie, and made preparation for the same, and appointed a iusts, whereof he himselfe would be one, and caused a tilt to be made in the market place.

While these things were preparing, the king and his his counsell ordered for the sure keeping of the citie of Tornate, and there ordeined sir Edward Poynings knight of the order of the garter to be his lieutenant with foure hundred archers, with capitains, horsemen, and artillerie convenient, and to haue aid of Venauo and other the kings friends adioining; and of his gard he left there foure hundred archers, and ordinance was appointed for the defense of the same. On mondaie the eleuenth daie of October the king without the towne receiued the prince of Castile, the ladie Margaret, and diuerse other nobles of their countries, and them brought into Tornate with great triumph. The noyse went that the lord Lisle made request of marriage to the ladie Margaret duchesse of Saucie, and daughter to the emperor Maximilian, which before that time was departed from the king with manie rich gifts and monie bestowed: but whether he proffered marriage or not, the fauoured him highly. There the prince and duchesse sojournd with great solace by the space of ten daies.

During which time, the eighteenth daie of October began the iusts, the king and the lord Lisle answering all comers: vpon the king attended foure & twentie knights on foot in coats of purple velvet and cloth of gold. A tent of cloth of gold was set in the place for the armorie & helicse. The king had a base and a trapper of purple velvet both set full of Sh of brillion, and the lord Lisle in the same suite, there were manie speares broken, and manie a good buffet given, the strangers, as the lord Malon and lord Cumerie and other did right well. When the iusts were done, the king & all the other unhelmed them, & rode about the tilt, and did great reuerence to the ladies, and then the heralds cried to lodging. This night the king made a sumptuous banquet of an hundred dishes to the prince of Castile and the ladie Margaret, and to all other lords and ladies; and after the banquet the ladies danced, and then came in the king and eleven in a maske, all richly apparelled with bonets of gold, and when they had passed the time at their pleasure, the garments of the maske were cast off amongst the ladies, take who could take.

On the twentieth daie of October, the prince of Castile and the ladie Margaret (with manie great gifts to them giuen) returned to Lisle and all their traine. After that the king was informed that all directions were taken, and euery thing put in an order for the sure keeping of the citie of Tornate, he betooke the same to sir Edward Poynings knight, which valiantly kept it in good order and iustice. The king & his counsell before this considering, that the Frenchmen would giue them no battell, and that winter approached, which was no time to lie at siege of other townes, concluded to keepe Tornate safelie, and to breake by his campe for that winter, and to begin againe warre in the spring of the yeare. This was a full conclusion taken by the king and his counsell, and so the king and all his people (except such as were appointed to be with sir Edward Poynings) departed out of Tornate the twentieth daie of September: and the king and the noble men made such speed, that shortly they came to Calis.

Thither came the lord admerall, whome the king heartilie thanked of his paines, and there euery man was paid his full wages and conduct monie, and ships prepared for the passage; and so the foure and twentieth daie of September, the king with a priue companie toke ship, and the same day landed at Dover, and shortly after all his people folloved; then he with a small companie rode to Richmond in post to the queene, where was such a louing meeting, that euery creature reioiced. This season began a great mortalitie in London and other places, where much people died. All this winter the kings nauie kept the seas, and robbed and spoiled the Frenchmen on their coasts, so that they were euery not afflicted by the English, & with not which way to remedie it, bearing grudge in their hearts, and wishing a generall destruction of their enemies, against whome they did swell with malignitie and indignation, both for their late ouerthrowes and losses aswell of lands as liues; the surrender of Terwin sticking in their stomachs, and the yielding of Tornate nipping them at the heart, which had lost the proprietie, & was now forced to obteine new lordes and new lawes, as our poet saith:

dominorum serua nouorum,

* Accipit ecce nouas Henrico principe leges.

But now I must returne to speake of the doings in the North parts, betwene the Englishmen and Scots. Whilist the king was occupied in his warres against France in the summer of this yeare (as before is mentioned) yet haue heard how the king of Scots sent his letters vnto the king, as then lieng at the siege before Teruine, and what answer was made thereto by the king. Immediately vpon the sending of those his letters containing in effect a defiance, the king of Scots assembled his people to invade the English confines: but before his whole power was come together, the lord Humes that was lord chamberleine of Scotland, on a day in August entered England with seven or eight thousand men, and getting together a great bottie of cattell, thought to haue returned therewith into his countrie.

But as he came to passe through a field ouergrown with brome, called Millfield, the Englishmen vnder the leading of sir William Bulmer, and other valiant capitains, hauing with them not past a thousand souldiers, being laid within that field in ambushment, brake forth vpon him: and though the Scots on foot defended themselves right manfully, yet the English archers shot so wholie together, that the Scots were constrained to giue place. There were of them slaine at this bickering flue or six hundred, and foure hundred or more taken prisoners; the lord chamberleine himselfe escaped by flight, but his banner was taken. This was called by the Scots the ill rode. In the meane time was the whole power of Scotland assembled, with the which king James approaching to the borders, and comming to Rozham castell, laid siege thereto, hauing there with him an hundred thousand men.

Rozham castell besieged.

After he had beaten this castell with his ordinance for the space of six daies together, the same was deliuered by into his hands; for the capitaine was so liberal of his shot and powder, spending the same so freelie before he had cause so to do, that when it should haue stood him in stead, he had none left to aid him, so that in the end he yielded himselfe without more resistance. In which meane time the earle of Surrie being lieutenant of the north parts of England, in absence of king Henrie, had giuen order to assemble a power of six and twentie thousand men; and comming to Alnwike the thirde of September being saturday, taried there all the next day till the whole number of his people were come, which by reason of the foule way were staied, and could not come forward with such speed as was appointed. This fourth daie of September then being saturday, his sonne the lord admerall, with a thousand souldiers and able men of warre, which had bene at sea, came to his father; whereof he greatlie reioiced for the great wisdom, manhood, and experience, which he knew to be in him.

Then the earle and his counsell, with great deliberation appointed his battels in order, with wings, and with horsemen necessarie. First of the foreward was ordeined capitaine the lord Howard admerall of England, as well with such as came with him from the sea, as others. First the lord Clifford, the lord Coniers, the lord Latimer, the lord Scrope of Up-sall, the lord Ogle, the lord Lomlie, sir Nicholas Appleyard master of the ordnance, sir Stephen Bull, sir Henrie Shirburne, sir William Sidneie, sir Edward Ichingham, sir William Bulmer, with the powder of the bishopricke of Durham, sir William Gascoigne, sir Christopher Ward, sir John Curingham, sir Thomas Spetham, sir Walter Griffith, and manie others.

Of the wing on the right hand of the fore-ward, was capteine sir Edward Howard knight marshall of the host, & with him Brian Lunsall, Rafe Hcarton, John Laurence, Richard Bold, esquiers: sir John Both, sir Thomas Butler, knights: Richard Dore, John Wigod, Thomas Fitz Williams, John Claruis, Brian Stapleton, Robert Marcop, Richard Cholmele, with the men of Hull, and the kings tenants of Hatfield, and others. Of the wing on the left hand, was capteine sir Parmaduke Constable, with his sonnes and kinsmen, sir William Perse, and of Lancashire a thousand men. Of the reere-ward was capteine the earle of Surreie himselfe, and with him the lord Scrope of Bolton, sir Philip Thelme, sir George Darce, sir Thomas Berkeley, sir John Kocliste, sir Christopher Pikeering, Richard Tempest, sir John Stanleie, with the bishop of Elies servants, sir Brian Stapleton, Lionell Perse, with the abbat of Whitbys tenants, Christopher Clapham, sir William Gascoigne the younger, sir Guie Dawneie, master Spagnus, master Dobbies servants, sir John Poymaule, the citizens of Yorke, sir Antian Sparkanulle, sir John Willoughbie, with others.

Of the wing on the right hand, was capteine the lord Dacres with his powder. Of the left hand wing, was capteine sir Edward Stanleie knight, with the residue of the powder of the two counties palantine of Cheshire and Lancaster. Thus was the host appointed and divided into wards and wings at the first, though afterward (upon occasion) this order was somewhat altered. And now that currie man knew what to do, the earle of Surrie with his powder comming toward the place where he thought to find the Scottish host, was informed how king James being remoued six miles from Forham, late imbatteled upon a great mountaine called Floddon, a place of such strength, as it was not possible for the Englishmen to come nere him, but to their great disadvantage: for at the foot of the same hill on the left hand, there was a great marshy ground full of reed and water.

On the right hand it was defended with a riuer called Till, the course whereof being so swift, and the chanell in some places so deepe, that it might not conveniently be passed. On the backe halfe there were subterraggie rocks and thicke woods, that it was not possible to assaile him to anie advantage that waie forth. And on the forepart of the campe, where nature had left an easie entrie for men to come to the same, all his ordnance was planted aloft upon the sides of such trenches, as he had caused to be cast for defense on that part. The earle of Surrie hereupon, considering with himselfe, that unless he might devise some policie to cause the Scottish armie to descend the hill, it were not possible for him to accomplish his desire, he called about him his counsell, and with them took advise in this point.

At length it was concluded and determined among other things, to send Rouge Crosse, pursuant at armes, with a trumpet to the king of Scots, with a message and certeine instructions: which in substance was, to shew and declare unto the said king of Scots, that where he (contrarie unto his oth and league, and unnaturallie against all reason and conscience) had entered and invaded this his brothers realme of England, and done great hurt to the same, in casting downe castles, towers, and houses, burning, spoiling, and destroing the same, and cruelly murdering the king of England his brothers subjects; he the said earle would be ready to trie the rightfulness of the matter with the king in battell, by a daie next comming at the furthest, if he of his noble courage would giue him tacieng and abode. And the same did the said earle promise, as he was a true knight unto God & the king of England his master.

And before Rouge Crosse should depart with the said instructions, the lord admerall gaue him in credence to shew the said king of his comming, and part of his companie from the sea with him, and that he had sought the Scottish naue then being on the sea, but he could not meet with them, because they were fled into France by the coast of Ireland. And in as much as the said king had diuerse and manie times caused the said lord to be called at daies of truce, to make redresse for Andrew Barton a pirat of the sea, long before that banquished by the same lord admerall, he was now come in his owne proper person, to be in the vant-gard of the field, to iustifie the death of the said Andrew against him and all his people, and would see what could be laid to his charge the said daie.

Furthermore, that he no; none of his companie should take no Scottish noble man prisoner, no; anie other; but they should die if they came in his danger, unless it were the kings owne person; for he said he trusted to none other courtessie at the hands of the Scots. And in this manner he should find him in the vant-gard of the field, by the grace of God, and saint George, as he was a true knight. Yet before the departing of Rouge Crosse, with the said instructions and credence, it was thought by the earle & his counsell, that the said king would faine and imagine some other message, to send an herald of his with the same, onelic to view and ouerse the manner and order of the kings rofall armie, ordnance, and artillerie then being with the earle, whereby might haue ensued great danger to the same.

And for the eschuing thereof, he had in commandement, that if anie such message were sent, not to bring anie person comming therewith within three or two miles of the field at the night, where the said earle would come, and heare what he would saie. And thus departed Rouge Crosse, with his trumpet, apparelled in his coat of armes. On mondaie the first daie of September, the earle took his field at Bolton in Glendale, as he had appointed, where all the noble men and gentlemen met him with their retinues, to the number of six and twentie thousand men. And about midnight next ensuing came the trumpet which went to Rouge Crosse, and declared how the king of Scots, after the message done to him by Rouge Crosse, according to his instructions, the said king detained him, & sent one Flaie an herald of his with him unto the earle, to declare to him the kings pleasure; to whom the earle sent Poike herald at armes, to accompanie the said Flaie, at a village called Wilsa, two miles from the field, untill the comming thither of the said earle the next morow.

On the first daie of September, earle in the morning, the earle accompanied with the most part of the lords and knights, and gentlemen of the field, enerie man hauing with him but one servant to hold his horse, rode unto the place: and so the said herald met with the earle, and with blunt reuerence declared to him that he was come from his master the king of Scots, which would know whether the earle sent anie such message by Rouge Crosse. The earle misliked the same, saing further; that Rouge Crosse had the same message of him in writing, signed with his owne hand. Whereunto the said Flaie said: As to the abiding for battell betwene that and fridaie then next following, the king his maister bade him shew to the earle, that he was as welcome as anie noble man of England unto the said king, and that if he had bene at home in his towne of Edinburgh, there receiuing such a message from the said earle, he would gladly haue come, and fulfilled the said earles desire.

And the herald assured the earle, on the king his masters behalfe, that the same king would abide him battell at the date prefixed. Whereof the said earle was right iolous, and much praised the honorable agreement of the said rotall king, and esteemed the same to proceed of an high and honorable courage, promising the herald, that he, and good suertie with him should be bound in ten thousand pounds sterling, to keepe the said date appointed; so that the king would find an earle of his, and thereto a good suertie with him to be bound in like summe, for the performance of the same. And furthermore the earle bade the herald to saie unto his maister the king; that if he for his part kept not his appointment, then he was content that the Scots should battell him, which is a great reproch among the Scots, and is vsed, when a man is openlie perjured, and then they make of him an image painted, reuered, with his heeles backward, with his name, reuered, crying, and blowing out on him with hornes, in the most despitefull manner they can, in token that he is worthe to be eriled the companie of all good creatures. Then Flaie deliuered to the earle a litle schedule written with the kings secretaries hand and ensigned, as followeth.

The tenor of the said schedule.

AS to the causes alledged of our comming into England against our band and promise (as is alledged) thereto we answere; our brother was bound as farre to vs, as we to him. And when we sware last before his ambassador, in presence of our counceill; we expressed especiallie in an othe, that we would keepe to our brother, if our brother kept to vs, and not else. We sweare our brother brake first unto vs. And since his breach we haue required diuers times him to amend; & latelie we warned our brother, as he did not vs, yet he brake. And this we take for our quarrell, and with Gods grace shall defend the same at your assured time, which with Gods grace we shall abide.

The Scotch king's ambassador
to the king.

And forsomuch as the king kept Rouge Crosse with him, who was not yet returned, the same earle caused the same Flaie to be in the keeping of Sir Dumtrie Lisle and Porke herald in the same village, untill the time that a seruant of the same Flaie might ride in all hast to the king of Scots, for the de-liuering of the said Rouge Crosse. Then the earle iolous of the kings answer, returned to his campe, and set forward five miles, to a place called Weiler Wangh, in such order of battell, as euen then he should haue fought, and there lodged for that night, three litle miles from the king of Scots. And be-twene the king & him was a goodlie & large come field called spilsfield, which was a conuenient & faire ground for two hostes to fight on: there either host might perceiue other. The earles desire was to procure the Scots to descend the hill into some euen ground, where he might fight with them without disaduantage of place.

But the king, though he had a great desire to fight, yet vpon diuerse considerations, by aduise of his counceill he still kept his ground, and meant not to remoue at all out of his strength. Wherevpon the earle of Surrie not able long to continue in such grounds of disadvantage, by reason of mires, and marishes, amongst the which he lodged with his armie that was almost famished for lacke of sufficient vittells, which could not be recovered in such a barren countrie, determined to seeke all waies possible, if he might constrain the Scotch king to come downe beside the hill. He therefore raised his campe, and leauing his enemies on the left hand, and passing ou-er the water of Till, he drew into a more conuenidious ground, at the end of Warmore wood; to the end he might refresh his souldiers somewhat hereby after they had bene toiled for the space of three daies together in cloggie mires, and soule filthy waies, to their disease and wearinesse.

The earle of Surrie re-moueth his campe ouer
the water of Till.

The earle of Surrie being thus lodged, the water of Till ran betwixt the two campes of Scots and Englishmen, diuiding them in sunder: and still by reason the one was within the shot of a culuering of the other, they ceased not to beset with shot and pou-der either at other, though without doing anie great hurt at all. For the English campe on that part which laie toward the Scots, was covered with an hill rising from the hither banke of Till water, with an easie steepnesse to the height of a miles space or thereabouts. Thomas lord Howard sonne and heire to the earle of Surrie, from the top of this hill beholding all the countrie on euerie side about him, declared to his father, that if he did effrons remoue his campe, and passe the water of Till againe in some place a litle above, and by fetching a small compasse come & shew himselfe on the backe halfe of his enemies, the Scotch king should either be enforced to come downe south of his strength and giue battell, or else be stopped from receiuing vittells or anie other thing out of Scotland.

The lord Howard taketh view of the Scotch armie.

The earle of Surrie desirous of nothing so much as to ioine with the Scots in battell; after he understood that his sonne had informed him nothing but truth, he raised his field: and marching a three miles upward by the riuer side, passed ouer his armie in two parts at two severall bridges, all at one time.
King James when he saw this manner of his enimies, and perceiuing what their meaning was, by coniecture of their doings, thought it stood not with his honor to sit still, and suffer himselfe to be forestalled south of his owne realme: and againe, that it might soe diminish the opinion of his princelie power, if he seemed to remaine as it were besieged within a fortresse, hauing more confidence in strength of the place, than in the manhood of his people: where-vpon immediatlie he raised his campe, and got an hill, which he doubted least the enemy should haue taken before him.

Surrie returneth
againe
ouer the water of Till.

But by such diligence as he vsed, and by reason of the great smoke which was raised and spread ouer all the countrie, by burning of the litter and cabbins wherein the Scots had lodged, purposelie set on fire to the same intent, he was got to the place whither he intended, before the Englishmen knew for anie certeintie that he was dislodged, though they were as then within a mile of him. Thus king James keeping the tops of the hills, the earle of Surrie with the English armie came to the foot of the same hills, and staing there a while, so much as he saw how the hill

hill to the which the Scots were gotten, was neither steep nor hard to ascend, he determined to mount the same, and to fight with the Scottish host per they should have leisure to fortifie their campe.

Wherewith calling his people together, he made unto them a bræfe oration, declaring, unto them both what necessitie there was for them to shew their manhood, and what iust causes they had also to fight against those enemies, that against both the lawes of God and man had most cruellie invaded the reline of England, in the quarrell of a schismaticke, and one that was accursed and excommunicated by the censures of the church. The Englishmen kindled with desire to fight, the more thorough those wordes of the earle, required incontinentlie to be led forth against the Scots, that they might shew what earnest wills they had to be reuenged; not onelie of new receiued wronges, but also of ancient iniuries; for there should neither heighth of hill, nor any other obstacle hinder them, but they would either returne with victorie, or else lose their liues in the paine.

The ordering of the English armie.

The earle of Surrie conceived no small hope of victorie in this chearefull readinesse of his souldiers, and thereupon with all speed (as the occasion then moued him at that instant) diuided his armie into three battels, or rather sours: vnto the vant-gard whereof, the lord Howard was capteine, his brother sir Edmund Howard was ioined as a wing; the earle himselfe led the middle-ward, and the reere-ward was guided by sir Edward Stanleie, afterwards created lord Mounteagle. The lord Dacres with a number of horsemen was set apart by himselfe to succor where need should seeme to appeare. The ordinance was placed in the front of these battels, & in places betwene, as was thought expedient. In this order, forward they made with manlie courages towards the Scots a good marching pace.

kings thought at the view of the English
armie.

In the meane time, king James beholding all the demeanour of the Englishmen, from the heighth of the hill, thought with himselfe, that there was offered him that daie a goodlie occasion of victorie, if he might come to fight with the enemies at such aduan-tage of place and number. And therefore, being hastened forward through the strenuous force of destiny, or rather Gods ordinance, he commanded his standards to be raised and spread, and euery man to resort to his appointed place, that they might forthwith in-counter the enemies, that presumed thus to seeke battelle with the Englishmen. Whereupon, without de-laie, king James putting his horse from him, all other as well nobles as meane men did the like, that the danger being equall, as well to the greatest as to the meanest, and all hope of succour taken awaie, which was to be looked for by sight, they might be the more willing to shew their manhood, with their safe-gard onelie rested in the edges and points of their weapons. Then was the whole armie diuided into five wards or regiments, to this intent, that the battelle wherein the king himselfe stood with his standard, might be inclosed as it were with two wings, on either side one. In the right wing, the earles of Hunt-leie, Crawford, and Montrosse, were placed as cheefe leaders thereof; and in the left were the earles of

King James and all the rest horsebacke.

The order of
host.

He had scarce made an end of his tale, but the soldiers with great noise and clamor cried; Forward, Upon them; shaking their weapons in signe of an earnest desire they had (as then they shewed) to burle with the Englishmen. Whereupon, without de-laie, king James putting his horse from him, all o-

Lenor, and Argile, with the lord Hume, lord cham-berleine of Scotland, being men of great skill in warlike affaires, as was reported.

Moreover, in euery band (almost generallye thro-roughout) there was a knight appointed for capteine and guider, and amongst them certaine French cap-teins, the which king Lewes had sent ouer into Scotland latelie before, to traine the Scots in the practise of warres. The ordinance was lodged in places most conuenient; though by reason they marched downe the hill, their shot did small damage to the Englishmen coming by towards them, and yet they bestowed it freshlie on either side one vpon an other.
Wherewith sir Edmund Howard with his wing was got by on the hill side, with whom the lord Hume and the two foresaid earles of Lenor and Argile in-countered with such violence, that this battell of Scots with speares on foot on that part, beat downe and broke that wing of the Englishmen, in such wise that sir Edmund Howard was in manner left alone, and felled to the earth, that (had not barbard Heron come to his succours at that instant) he had bene slaine there without all remedie.

On the other part, the lord Dacres watching to aid where need appeared, came in on the sides of the Scots, & gaue a charge on them with his horsemen, whereby sir Edmund Howard being somewhat relieued, escaped to the English vant-gard, which was led (as before is mentioned) by his brother, lord Howard, who being now also got aloft on the hill, pressed still forward to renew the battell, & to succor those whome he saw put to the worse, so that thereby they tooke new courages, & laid about them againe. Herewith the earles of Crawford & Montrosse came with their battell of speares also on foot, and incounting with the said lord Howard, after sore fight on both sides continued, with more malicious hatred than force of the parties, both the said earles were slaine, besides a great number of other; the whole battell which they led being put to flight and chased out of the field, maimed, wounded, and slaine. And though they did what they could to the bittermost resistance, in hope to haue bathed their blades in English blood; yet the contrarie came to passe, as in stories is left recorded, to the honour of the English; namelye:

Sustinet infictos duris umbonibus ictus, Imbuat & gladiis manante cruore Britannum.

On the left hand at the same instant, sir Edward Stanleie hauing begun to incounter with the Scots on that side, forced them to come downe into a moie even ground; and brought to that point with such incessant shot of arrowes as his archers bestowed amongst them, that to auoid the danger of that sore and sharpe strome, the Scots were constrained to briake their arraie, & to fight not closed together in order of battell, but insunder one separated from another, so that their standards began to shrinke here and there. Which thing when sir Edward Stanleie perceiued, forthwith bringing about three bandes; which he had kept in store for such like purpose; he in-uaded the open sides of his enemies by a fresh onset, and put them in such disorder, that they were not able any longer to abide the violence of the Englishmen mightilie preadling vpon them: so that taking them selues to flight, and running headlong downe the steep descent of the mountaine, they escaped to the woods and there saued themselves. But the earles of Argile and Lenor, doing what they could to saie their people from running awaie, were slaine in the same place.

In the meane time, the king, who a little before had ioined with the earle of Surrie, perceiuing that the wings of his battell were distressed, and that his enemies began to inclose him on eche side, he bathed nothing at the matter, but with assured countenance exhorted those that were about him to sticke to him, and to remember their worthie ancestors, in committing nothing that might anie waies forth sound to their reproch. And herewith rushing against his enemies, a new battell more egre than the first began to arise; for that battell being well appointed and armed passed little for the Englishmens arrowes, in so much that perling the earles battell, they entred well nere so farre within the same, that they were at point to have ouerthorne his standards.

There were on either part a number of tall men of bodie, chosen forth of purpose by the capteins, for the good opinion conceived of their hardie valiancie, & the battell betwixt them seemed long time doubtful and variable, now one while favourable to the one part, and an other while to the other. The king himselfe on foot even in the foremost ranke, fought right valiantlie, encouraging his people, as well by example as exhortation, to doe their deuoirs. Neither did the earle of Surrie for his part faile in the datie of a right worthie generall. But while the battell was thus foughten in most earnest manner about the standards with doubtful chance of victorie, the lord Howard and sir Edward Stanleie hauing banquished the enemies in either wing, returned to the middleward, and finding them there thus occupied, they set on, in two parts severallie, with great violence.

At the same time, the lord Dacres came with his horsemen upon the backs of the Scots; so that they being thus assailed behind and before, and on either side, were constrained (as inuironed about) to fight in a round compasse. King James as he beheld sir Adam Fozman his standard-bearer beaten downe, thought fuerlie then, there was no waie for him but death, and that euen out of hand. Wherefore to deliuer himselfe from such despitefull reproch, as was like to follow, he rushed forth into the thickest prease of his enemies; and there fighting in most desperat wise, was beaten downe and slaine. And a little beside him, there died with like obstinate wilfulnesse, or (if ye list so to terme it) manhood, diuerse honorable prelates, as the archbishop of saint Andrews, and two other bishops, besides foure abbats; also of lordes and knights of hono: a sir and thirtie.

The lord Hume and the earle of Huntleie got horses, and escaped awaie together with certaine bands, placed in two the hindermost wards, which of all that daie neuer came to hand strokes, but stood still and gaue the looking on. Thus thorough the power of God, on fridaie being the ninth of September, in the yeare 1513 was James the fourth of that name, king of Scots, slaine at Brampton, and his armie discomfited by the earle of Surrie, lieutenant to Henrie the eight king of England, which a little before had wonne the towne of Terwine, and was then preparing to go to besiege Tornale. There were slaine in this battell on the Scottish part, of all sorts, the number of eight thousand persons at the least: some saie twelue thousand, besides prisoners that were taken, as sir William Scot, chancelor to the said king, and sir John Fozman his sergeant porter, with diuerse others. Also in manner, all the Scottish ensignes were taken, and a two and twentie peces of great ordinance, amongst the which were seauen culuerings of a large assise, and verie faire peces. King James named them (for that they were in manner one verie like to an other) the seauen sisters. This conflict with egernesse on both sides was continued thre full houres, as Anglorum praelia fasti;

Though the victorie thus remained with the Englishmen, yet they bought it deere, losing no small number of their people, as well of those that were slaine in the field, as of others that were taken prisoners; for the Scots fought verie stoutlie, and gaue it not ouer for a little, insomuch that there were taken and slaine about fiftene hundred men, as appeared by the booke of wages, when the soldiers were paid. Manie Englishmen that followed ouer rashlie in the chase of the Scots, went so farre, that they wist not which waie to returne, and so were taken of the Scots that were in the two battells that went awaie with cleare hands, and neuer fought. Also, diuerse were taken by the lord chamberleine, which fought with the wing of sir Edmund Howard, and were carried awaie by him and his companie into Scotland, as John Fitton esquier, and others. During the time of the fight, and the night after, manie Englishmen lost their houses, and such stuf as they left in their tents and pavillions, by the robbers of Lindale and Tuidale.

When the field was done, and that the Scots brought word that there was no more appearance of the Scots, but that they were all auoided and gone, the earle gaue thanks to God, and called to him certaine lordes and gentlemen, and them made knights; as sir Edmund Howard his sonne, the lord Scrope, sir William Berke, sir Edward George, and diuerse others. The earle and the lord admerall departed to Berman wood, & there lodged that night, leaving sir Philip Tilneie knight and diuerse other worthie capteins, with a conuenient power of men, to keepe the place where the field had bene fought, for safegard of the ordinance. The bodie of the king of Scots was not found untill the next daie, and then being found and knowne by the lord Dacres, there appeared in the same diuerse deadlie wounds, and speciallie, one with an arrow, and an other with a bill. But some saie he died of two, both which were inflicted upon him to his deadlie bane (and well worthie for truce-breaking) by the sword; as Anglorum praelia reporteth:

The same daie, there appeared some Scots on a hill, but one William Blackenall that had the cheefe rule of the ordinance, caused such a peale to be shot off at them, that the Scots fled; or else the lord admerall, which was come to view the field, had bene in great danger; as was supposed. But now that the Scots were fled, and withdrawne, all the ordinance was brought in safetie to Citill, and there remained for a time. After that the earle of Surrie had taken order in all things, and set the forth parts in good quiet, he returned to the queene with the dead bodie of the Scottish king cered. When the king was returned into England from his conquest made in France of the cities of Terwine and Tornale, he forgot not the good seruice of those that had bene with the earle of Surrie at the battell at Brampton: wherefore he wrote to them his louing letters, with such thanks and favourable words, that euerie man thought himselfe well rewarded.

On the daie of the Purification of our ladie, at Lambeth, the king created the earle of Surrie duke of Norfolk, with an augmentation of the armes of Scotland, and sir Charles Brandon vicount Lisle he created duke of Suffolke; and the lord Howard high admerall he created earle of Worcester: and after this, he also made sir Edward Stanleie (for his good seruice shewed at Brampton field) lord Mounteagle; and in March following was maister Thomas Wolseie the kings almoner, consecrated bishop of Lincoln. This man was bozne at Ipswich, wolseie was a good philosopher, verie eloquent and full of wit; but passinglie ambitious, as by his doings it well appeared. In the time of king Henrie the seventh nenth it was agreed betwixt the said king and Philip king of Castile (that Charles king Philips eldest son should marrie the ladie Marie, daughter to the said king Henrie, with a dowry to him appointed: but for want of sufficient assurance of the dowry, the rest of covenants were made void, and yet had the king highlie prouided for the sending of him ouer, now after his coming from Tornaie.

This yeare the citizens of London, finding themselves grieved with the inclosures of the common fields about Mlington, Horton, Shorditch, and other places nere to the citie, whereby they could not be suffered to exercise their bowes, nor other pastimes in those fields, as before time they had bene accustomed, assembled themselves on a morning, and went with spades and shovels unto the same fields, and there (like diligent workemen) so besetted themselves, that within a short space, all the hedges about those towns were cast downe, and the ditches filled. The kings counsell coming to the grate friers, to understand what was meant by this doing, were so answered by the mayor and counsell of the citie, that the matter was dissembled: and so when the workemen had done their worke, they came home in quiet manner, and the fields were neuer after hedged.

Edw. Hall in Hen. 8. fol. 46.
The king and the new duke of Suffolke defenders at the tilt against all commers.

George Honor for this yeare Mayor of London, of his goodlie disposition reedified the decayed temple of the parish church of Walthamstow, in the countie of Essex, adding thereto a side Ale, with a chappell, where he lieth buried. And on the northside of the churchyard there, he founded a faire large almshouse for an almshouse priest or scholemaster, and thirtene poore almes folke, eight men, and five women, appointing to the said almes priest or scholemaster for his yearelie wages, six pounds thirtene shillings foure pence; and to euerie one of the said almes folke seven pence a weeke, and five pounds to be bestowed yearelie amongst them in coles. And ordeined that the said almes priest should on sunnidaies and festiuall daies, be helping and assistant to the vicar or curat there in celebration of diuine seruice, & on the weeke daies shoulde to applie and teach yong children of the said parish, to the number of thirtie, in a scholehouse by him there builded for that purpose. Moreover, he gaue to the parish cleark there for the time being, a yearelie spend of twentie six shillings eight pence, for euer, and a chamber by the said almes house, to the intent he should helpe the said scholemaster to teach the said children. And hath given faire lands and tenements in the citie of London, for the perpetual maintenance of the premises to Gods glorie for euer. He also for the great commoditie of travellers on foot, made a continuall cause of timber ouer the marches from Walthamstow to Lockebridge towards London.

In the moneth of Maie, the king and the new duke of Suffolke were defenders at the tilt against all commers. The king was in a scolpelarie mantle, an hat of cloth of siluer, and like a white hermit, and the duke apparelled like a blacke hermit, all of blacke velvet, both their berds were of damaske siluer: and when they had ridden about the tilt, & shewed themselves to the quene, then they threw off their apparell, and sent it to the ladies for a larges. Then was the king in blacke, and the duke in white, with blacke fraues, on the fraues was written with white letters, Who can hold that will away: this posie was indged to be made for the duke of Suffolke, and the duchesse of Sauoie. At these iustes were the duke of Longuile, & the lord Cleremont, and there the king & duke did so valiantlie, that they obtained the prise. At these iustes were broken an hundred and fourtene speares in a short space. The king at this season sent againe into Flanders, for the performance of the marriage of the yong prince of Castile, and the faire ladie Marie his sister, and shewed how he had prepared all things necessarie and conuenient for such a high estate. The counsell of Flanders answered, that they would not receiue him that yeare, with manie subtil arguments; by reason whereof, the perfect loue betwene England and the low countries was much slaked.

On the nineteenth daie of Maie was receiued into London a cap of maintenance & a sword, sent from pope Iulie, with a great companie of nobles and gentlemen, which was presented to the king on the Sunday then next ensuing, with great solemnitie in the cathedrall church of saint Paule. Touching this pope (saith Guicciardine) disappointed of so manie hopes, we may laie him in comparison with that which is written by the poets of Anteus, that being tamed by the forces of Hercules, as often as he was throwne to the ground, so often did appeare in him a greater strength and courage; such warning had the pope amongst his aduersities, for when he seemed most abused and oppressed, it was then that he did most lift up him selfe with a spirit more constant and resolute, promising better of his fortune than euer.

After he had plaied all his troublesome pageants, and had got by sundrie aspiring practises & tooke not what pærelesse primasie, he fell sicke. And happlie he was then more full of high conceits and traouelling thoughts than at anie time before: for notwithstanding he had brought his fortune to be equall with his desires, & obtained the thing he aspired unto, yet his deuises and plots did nothing diminish, but grew increasing by the same meane which should haue satisfied them. He had determined in the beginning of the spring and first opening of the yeare, to send to the enterprize of Ferrara which he so much desired, and his opinion was, that that state was able to make no resistance, both for that it was naked of all succours, and because the Spanissh armie was to ioin with his companies: he had secretlie bought of Cesar for the price of thirtie thousand duckets, the citie of Sienna for the behoofe of the duke of Arbin, to whom (except Desera) he would neuer giue anie thing of the estate ecclesiastike, to the end to reserue to himselfe the whole glorie to haue simple and onelie studied for the exaltation of the church. He agreed to lend to Cesar fortie thousand duckats, receiuing Spodona in gage. He threatened them of Luquoie, who in the heat of the affaires of the duke of Ferrara, were become lords of Carfagnana; making instance that they would deliuer it to him.

He was out of conceit with the cardinal of Medets, for that he thought him to cleaue more to the king catholike, than to him. And because he knew he was not able to dispose of the citie of Florence as he thought, he studied alreadie new plots, and new practises to alter that estate. He was ill contented with the cardinal of Sion, from whom he took the name of legat, and intioined him to come to Rome, for that in the duchie of Spillan he had appropriat to himselfe a yearelie rent of more than thirtie thousand duckats, of the estates and goods of diuerse persons. The better to assure the duke of Arbin of Sienna by intelligences of his neighbours, he had of new taken into his pay Charles Bailion, to chaile out of Perousa John Paule, who by affinity was verie nere ioined to the sonnes of Pandolfe Petruccio succedours to the greatnesse of their father. He would of new create duke of Genes, Adaulan Fregosa, deposing Janus from that dignitie: an action whereunto did consent the others of the house of Fregosa, because for the degree that his ancestors held in that state, it seemed best to appertene unto him.

He studied continuallie either how he might make out of Italie the Spanishe armie, or cut it in pieces by the aid of the Swizzers, whome aboue all others he exalted and embraced. In this deuise hee had this intention, that the kingdome of Naples being occupied by him, Italie should remaine free from strangers; a speech that often passed out of his mouth: and to that end hee had hindered that the Swizzers did not confederate with the king catho-like. And yet, as though it had bene in his power to batter all the world at one time, he continued his accustomed rigour against the French king. And notwithstanding he had had a message from the queene, yet he stirred by to make warre, the king of England, to whome he had transferred by publike decree of the councell of Lateran, the name of Christianissimo, whereof there was already a bull written, and in it likewise was contained the punction of the dignitie & name of the king of France, giving his kingdome to who could occupie it.

In these conceptions, no lesse strange for their varietie, than great for the importance they beware, and perhaps in other thoughts more secret and singular (for in a mind so fierce and terrible, all sorts of imaginations, how great and vaine so euer they be, are not incredible) after the continuation of his sick-nesse for manie daies, he declined towards death:
and feeling the end of his mortalitie to hasten on,
and the same to prevent the execution of his high thoughts, he caused to call together the consistorie, which albeit he could not assist in person by reason of his disease; yet by the authoritie of it, he caused to be confirmed the bull which he had published before against such as by simonie would cline by into the popedom. He declared, that the election of his successor appertained to the college of cardinals, and not to the councell: and that the cardinals schismatiques could haue no preience or communitie there, to whom he protested there to pardon the injuries they had done him, and praised to God to forgive them the wrongs they had done to his church. After this he besought the college of cardinals, that in his fauor, and for his sake, they would grant to the duke of Urbino his nephew, the citie of Pesera in patronage or vicarage, alledging the consideration, that by meane of the duke it had bene recovered to the church after the death of John Sforce. In no other matter he expressed anie pynate or particular affection.

Insomuch as Madame Felice his daughter (following with her the petitions of manie others) beseech-ing him with great importunitie, to create cardinall Guido de Montfalcon being his brother by the mothers side, he answered roundlie, that he was not worthy of that degree. He made not his affections conformable to their desires. In that last action of his he shewed no parcialitie in worldly causes: his present debilitie could diminish nothing of his ancient resolution, but expressed in all things the same constancie and severitie, together with that iudge-ment and force of mind which he had before his sick-nesse: in which firme estate and disposition of spirit, he receiued deuoutlie the offices of the church, and the one and twentieth daie of Februarie he ended his course of these mortall and present paines. He was a prince of incredible constancie and courage, but so full of furie & vnrulie conceptions, that the reuerence that was borne to the church, the discord of princes, & the conditions of times, did more to skale him from his ruine, than either his moderation or his discretion: who this no doubt of great glorie, if either he had bene a prince secular, or if that care and intention which he had to raise the church into temporall great-nesse by the meane of warre, had bene imployed to exalt it by the meane of peace in matters spirituall.

Penetratelesse, he was lamented aboue all his predecessors, & no lesse esteemed of those, who hauing either lost the true consideration of things, or at least ignorant how to distinguish and peise them rightlie, iudged it an office more duellie appertaining to popes to increase the insidication of the see apostolicke by armes and blood of christians, than by good example of holie life and due curing and correction of corrupt maners, to traueile for the sauing of those soules, for whom they glorie so much that Iesus Christ hath named them his vicars in earth: and therefore it is a good consequent that he is a brance or rather a brand of the diuell, as one concludeth against him, saying:

Impius est igitur natus cacodæmone papa,

Turpibus & genis est homicida satru.

About the same time the warres yet continuing betwene England & France, Prior Jehan (of whom we haue heard before in the fourth yeere of this kings reigne) great capteine of the French nauie, with his gallies and foists charged with great basilisks and other artillerie, came on the borders of Suffer in the night season, at a poze village there called Bright-helmston, & burnt it, taking such goods as he found.
But when the people began to gather, by firing the becons, Prior Jehan sounded his trumpet, to call his men aboard, and by that time it was daie. Then cer-teine archers that kept the watch folowed Prior Jehan to the sea, and shot so fast, that they beat the gallie men from the shore; and wounded manie in the foist, to the which Prior Jehan was constrained to wade and was shot in the face with an arrow, so that he lost one of his eyes, and was like to haue died of the hurt: and therefore he offered his image of waie before our ladie at Bullongne, with the English arrow in the face for a miracle.

The lord admerall offended with this proud part of the Frenchmen, in making such attempt on the English coasts, sent sir John Wallop to the sea with diuers ships, which sailing to the coasts of Normandie, landed there, and burnt one and twentie villages and towne, with diuerse ships in the haven of Trepport, Staples, and other where. When maruelled greatlie at the manfull doings of sir John Wallop, considering he had not past an eight hundred men, and toke land there so often. In June sir Thomas Louell was sent ouer to Calis with sir hundred men to strengthen that towne, and other the fortresses within the English pale, for doubt of anie sudden attempt to be made by the Frenchmen; because mon-seur de Montremie, with a mightie armie and great ordnance was come downe nere to Ard: howbeit he taried not long, but raised his campe within a while after his coming thither, and returned without anie more doing. The French king perceiuing what losses he had sustained by the warres against England; and doubting least one euill lucke should still follow in the necke of an other, determined to make sute for peace; and first agreeing with pope Leo, desired him to be a meane also for the procuring of some agreement betwixt him and the king of England.

This pope Leo, of that name the tenth, before his election, cardinall of Medicia, bare but seauen and thirtie yeeres of age, which albeit was so much the more marvellous and wonderfull, by how much the election was contrarie to custome; yet the pong cardinals were the principall causers of it by their inbusherie, hauing long time afore secretlie agreed amongst themselves to create the first pope of their number. The most parts and nations of christen-dome reioiced much at this election, euerie one interteining an assured expectation of his vertues, as well by the present and graine memoire of the baloy of his late father, as for an vniuersall reputation that went of his owne inclinations and liberalities. To this estimation was ioined a generall opinion of his continencie and life not atteinted, togethir with a glad some hope, that by the example of his father, he would be a furtherer of learning, and beare sauoy to wits disposed to studie and knowledge. So that vnto these hopes was much helping the manner of the election, being made in his person sincerelie, and without simonie or suspicion of other corruption.

The first act of this new pope was his coronation, which was represented according to the vse of his predecessors in the church of saint John de Lateran. The pompe was so great both of his familie and his court, and also of the prelates and multitudes that were there, togethir with the popular and vniuersall assemblies of people, that by the opinion and iudgement of men, the pride and maiestie of that action did farre surpass all the celebrations done in Rome since the tyrannies of the Goths and sauage nations. In this same solemnitie the Consalon of the church was caried by Alfonso de Este, who hauing obtained a suspension of his censures & paines, was come to Rome, with great hope, that by the clemencie and facilitie of the pope, he should be able to compound for his affaires. The Consalon of the religion of Rhodes was bozne by Julius de Medici mounted vpon a statelie courser armed at all points: by his nature he bare an inclination to the profession of armes, but by destinie he was gauen to the life ecclesiastike, in which estate he made serue as a wonderfull example of the variation of fortune.

One matter that made the memoire of that date wonderfull, was this consideration; that the person who then in so high & rare pompe was honozed with the most supreme and soueraigne dignitie of the world, was the yere before, and on the berie same date miserablie made prisoner. The great magnificence that appeared vpon his person, and his expences, confirmed in the generalitie and multitude of men, the expectation that was had of him; euerie one promising that Rome should be happie vnder a pope so plentifullie indued with the vertue of liberalitie, whereof that date he had giuen an honorable experience, his expences being aboue an hundred thousand duckats. But wise men desired in him a greater granitie and moderation: they iudged that neither such a maiestie of pompe was conuenient for popes, neither did the condition of the present time require, that he should so vnprofitablie disperse the treasures that had bene gathered by his predecessour to other vses.

The befall of amitie betwene the king of England & the French being first broched by his popes letters, the French king by an herald at armes sent to the king of England, requiring of him a safe conduct for his ambassadors, which should come to intreat for a peace and attonement to be concluded betwixt them and their realmes. Upon grant obtained thereof, the French king sent a commission with the president of Rome and others, to intreat of peace and alliance betwixt both the princes. And moreover, because they vnderstood that the marriage was broken betwene the prince of Castile and the ladie Sparte, they desired that the said ladie might be ioined in marriage with the French king, offering a great dowrie and tierries for the same. So much was offered, that the king moved by his counsell, and namely by Wolsey the bishop of Lincolne, consented vpon condition, that if the French king died, then the should (if it stood with his pleasure) retorne into England againe with all his dowrie and riches.

After that they were accorded vpon a full peace, and that the French king should marrie this young ladie, the indentures were drawn, ingrossed, & sealed, and peace therevpon proclaimed the seventh daie of August; & the king in presence of the French ambassadors was swozne to keepe the same: and likewise there was an ambassage sent out of England to see the French king sweare the same. The dowrie that was assigned vnto the bzide to be receiued after his husbands decesse, if he suruiued him, was named to be 32000 crownes of yearelie reuenues, & to be receiued out of certeing lands assigned forth therefore during all his naturall life. And moreover, it was further agreed & conuenanted, that the French king should content and paie yearelie vnto king Henrie, during the space of five yeares, the summe of one hundred thousand crownes. By conclusion of this peace was the duke of Longueuil with the other prisoners deliuered, paying their ransoms, and the said duke assisted the ladie Sparte in the name of his maister king Lewis. In September following, the said ladie was conueied to Douer by the king his brother & the queene, and on the second daie of October she was shipped, and such as were appointed to giue their attendance on her, as the duke of Norfolk, the marquess Dorset, the bishop of Durham, the earle of Surreie, the lord de la Ware, the lord Werners, the lord Montagu, the four brethren of the said marques, sir Spaurice Berkeley, sir John Pechie, sir William Sands, sir Thomas Bulleine, sir John Car, and manie other knights, esquires, gentlemen and ladies. They had not sailed past a quarter of the sea, but that the wind arose and seuered the ships, driuing some of them to Calis, some into Flanders, and his ship with great difficultie was brought to Bullen not without great leoparchie at the enterfing of the haven, for the maiester ran the ship hard on thore.

But the boats were readie, and receiued the ladie out of the ship, and sir Christopher Gurnish stood in the water and took her in his armes, and so caried her to land, where the duke of Landolme, and a cardinal, with manie other great estates receiued her with great honoz. From Bullen with easie iourneys she was conueied vnto Abbe, & there entered the eighth of October (where she was receiued by the Dolphin with great honoz, she was apparelled in cloth of siluer, her horse was trapped in goldsmiths worke berie richlie. After her followed 36 ladies all their palfries trapped with crimsin beluet embodered. After them followed one chariot of cloth of tisse, the second cloth of gold, & the third crimsin beluet embodered with the kings armes & hers, full of robes. After them followed a great number of archers, and then wagons laden with their stuffe. Great was the riches in plate, iewels, monie, apparell, and hangings that this ladie brought into France.

On the morrow following being mondaie, and s. Denise day, the marriage was solemnized betwixt the French king and the said ladie, with all honoz, tog, & roialtie, both apparelled in goldsmiths worke. Then a great banquet and sumptuous feast was made, where the English ladies were honorable intertelled, according to the dignitie of the persons, and to the contentment of them that had no dregs of malice or mistaking settled in their hearts. For vnpossible it is, that in a great multitude meeting togethir, though all about one matter, be it of pleasure and delight, there should not be one of a repugnant disposition, and (though not apparantlie perceiued) frameling with grudge malignant mind; as we see some apples vnperished and other some wormeaten, albeit one bough beare them, and one tree giue them sap.

cers with the said quene, were discharged; which was a great sorrow for them, for some had serued hir long in hope of preferment, & some that had honest comes left them to serue hir, and now they were without seruice, which caused them to take thought, in so much some died by the waie returning, and some fell mad, but there was no remedie. After the English lords had done their commission, the French king willed them to take no longer paine, and so gaue to them good rewards; and they took their leaue of the quene and returned. Then the Dolphin of France called lord Francis duke of Alouis, and by his wife duke of Britaine, for the more honour of this mariage before the Englishmen departed from Abailie, caused a solemne iusts to be proclaimed, which should be kept at Paris in the moneth of Nouember next ensuing.

When this proclamation was reported in England by the noble men that returned from the mariage: the duke of Suffolke, the marquesse Dorset, and his four brethren, the lord Clinton, sir Edward Denill, sir Giles Capell, Thomas Cheneie, and other sued to the king to be at the chalenge, which request he graciously granted. Then the lords and knights prepared all things necessarie for their enterprise, and shipped there horses and harnesse, and did so much by iourneie, that they came to Paris at the end of October, which were hartlie welcomed of the king and the Dolphin: but most of all of the French quene which then laie at saint Denise, and was not yet crowned nor entered into Paris. The Dolphin desired the duke of Suffolke and the lord marquesse Dorset, to be two of his immediat aids, which thereto assented.

Therefore was erected an arch of witnessse at the tombs before the street of saint Anthoine, disrealie before the bassell, on the which were set foure targets or scutthions, the one silver, and he that set his name vnder that shield, to run at tilt according to the articles. He that put his name vnder the golden target should run with the sharpe speares and fight with sharpe swords. They that put their names to the blacke shield, should fight on foot with speares and swords for the one hand. And he that touched the fatw nic shield should cast a speare on foot with a target on his arme, and after to fight with a two hand sword. On this arch aboue stood the armes of the king & the quene, and beneath them stood the armes of the Dolphin and his aids, and vnderneath stood the foure scutthions that you haue heard of, and vnder them all the armes and names of such as set their names to anie of the said foure scutthions.

While all these things were preparing, the ladie Marie of England the first daie of Nouember, then being lundaine, was with great solemnitie crowned quene of France in the monasterie of S. Denise, and the Dolphin all the season held the crowne ouer his head, because it was of great weight to his grace, at which coronation were the lords of England, all according to their degrees well intertained. On mondaie the first daie of Nouember, the said quene was receiued into the citie of Paris after the order that followeth. First the gard of the citie met with hir without saint Denise all in coats of goldsmiths worke, with ships gilt, and after them met hir all the priests and religious, esteemed to be three thousand. The quene was in a chaire covered about (but not ouer hir person) in white cloth of gold; the horses that drew it, in cloth of gold; on hir head a coronall all of great pearles, hir necke and breast full of iewels.

Before hir went a gard of Almans after their fashion, and after them all noblemen, as the Dolphin, the duke of Alanson, the duke of Bourbon, the duke of Wandosme, the duke of Longeuille, and the duke of Suffolke, the marquesse Dorset, five cardinals, and a great number of estates; about hir person rode the kings gard, which were Scots. Thus was this quene receiued into Paris, and so conueied to the cathedraall church, and there offered, & from thence to the palace, where she offered at the holie chapell; and from thence she went to hir lodging for that night: for whome was provided a great supper, and the heralds cried a largesse, and had to them giuen a ship of silver and gilt, and other plate, to the value of two hundred marks, and after supper began dancing and pastime. On the morow began the iusts, and the Dolphin with his aids entered the field, the apparell and bars were cloth of gold, cloth of silver, and crimson velvet kanteled together all in one sute, they shewed themselves before the king and quene, who were on a goodlie stage, and the quene stood so that all men might see hir, and wondered at hir beaultie: but the king was feeble & laie on a couch for weakenesse.

Then entered the counter part by a ralle for coming to the place. These iusts continued three daies, in the which were answered three hundred and five men of armes, and euerie man ran five courses, and with sharpe speares; diuerse were slaine & not spoken of. At the random and turneie the duke of Suffolke hurt a gentleman, so that he was like to die. The Marques Dorset stroke monsieur Crue an Albanois with his speare, perced his headpiece, and put him in ieopardie. The duke of Suffolke in the turneie ouerthrew a man of armes, horse & man; and so did the lord Marquesse another, and yet the Frenchmen would in no wise praise them. At this turneie the Dolphin was hurt in the hand, so that he could not performe his chalenge at the barriers, and put one of his aid in his roome. The next daie after began the fight at the barriers. And because the Dolphin was not present, the duke of Suffolke and the lord Marques Dorset that daie began the field, and took the barriers with speares in his hand abiding all commers.

The Dolphin brought a man secretlie, which in all the court of France was the tallest & the strongest man, and he was an Alman, and put him in the place of an other person to haue had the duke of Suffolke rebuked. The same great Alman came to the bars sterrelie with face hid, because he would not be knowne, and bare his speare to the duke of Suffolke with all his strength, and the duke him receiued and for all his strength put him by strong strokes from the barriers, and with the but end of the speare strake the Alman that he staggered: but for all that the Alman strake stronglie and hardlie at the duke, and the iudges suffered manie more strokes to be foughten than were appointed; but when they saw the Alman rale and stagger, then they let fall the ralle betwene them. The lord marquesse Dorset at the same time, euen at the same barre fought with a gentleman of France that he lost his speare, and in manner withdrew. When the ralle was let fall, these two noble men put vp their visers and toke aite, and with swords, the points and edges abated, they came to the barriers.

The Alman fought sore with the duke, which imagined that he was a person set on for the nonce, but the duke by pure strength toke him about the necke, and pomeled him so about the head that the bloud issued out of his nose, and then they were parted, and the Alman was conueied by the Dolphin least he should be knowne. These two noblemen of England that daie fought valiantlie diuerse feats, and the Frenchmen likewise noble them defended. But it happened the lord Sparquelle on a time to put for his aid his yongest brother called the lord Edward Greie of the age of nineteene yeare, and to him was put a gentleman of France of great stature and strength, to the intent to plucke him over the barres, but yet the yong lord was of such strength, power, & policie, that he so stroke his aduersarie that he disarmed him, all the face bare. Thus were these enterprises finished to the laud of all parties, & the Englishmen receiued much honoꝝ and no spot of rebuke, yet they were puiſlie set at in manie ieopardies.

titt.

For the declaration of this triumph, he that saw it can tell how goodlie the courſers trotted, bounded, and quicklie turned: how valiantlie the men of armes behaued themselves, and how the duke of Burbons hand was apparrelled and backed in taberne veluet, and cloth of siluer cloude, the hand of the earle of saint Paule apparrelled and barded in purple veluet all to cut on purple sattin, the infant of Arragon, sonne to Frederike last king of Naples, and his hand all in cloth of gold and siluer paled. This lord was but yong, but yet verie toward. The duke of Glendornic and his hand in cloth of gold and pluncket veluet. The Dolphin and his aids were euerie daie new apparrelled at his cost, one daie in siluer and gold, another in crimſin veluet and yelloe veluet, and another daie in white veluet and greene, some daie mired with sattin, some daie embzodered, some daie pounced with gold, and so euerie daie in change as the workes fantasie could deuise, but the Englishmen had euer on their apparell red crosses to be knowne for loue of their countrie.

At this triumph the countie Calcas came into the place on a genet trapped in blew sadden, and he himselfe likewise apparrelled, and ran a course with a speare, which was at the head five inches on euerie side square, that is twentie inches about, and at the butt nine inches square, that is six and thirtie inches, this speare was massie timber, and yet for all that he ran cleane with it a long course and slightlie auoided it to his great honour. Also there was another gentleman called Anthonie Bounarime, which came into the field all armed, and on his bodie brought in eight ten speares, that is to wit, thre speares set in euerie stirrop forward, and under euerie thigh two speares upward, and under his left arme was one speare backward, and the tenth in his hand; and when he came before the queene, he let his houlle run, and neuer stopped till he had taken euerie speare after another and broken it on the ground, and he neuer stopped his houlle till all were broken. This gentleman was highlie praised, and so he was worthy. When all this great triumph was done, the lords of England toke their leaue, and were highlie thanked of the king, queene, Dolphin, and all the lords, and so departed and came into England before Christmas. In Nouember the queene was deliuered of a prince which liued not long after.]

Touthing the accord of peace betwene England and France, you shall heare the report of Guicciardine, which to this place maketh passage to know ledge, as oile giueth maintenance of light to the lampe. [At the first opening of this practice for peace, there fell out manie difficulties, for that the king of England demanded Fullongne in Picardie, with a great summe of monie: but at last all the differences fell upon the towne of Cozmaie, the king of England struing to retaine it, and the French ouerleaving some difficultie: in so much as the king of England dispatched in post to the French king the bishop of Tricarco, whome he charged, without imparting in what nature of particularitie considered the difficultie, to declare to the king from him, that in regard of so great a benefite, he should not stand upon so manie subtilie difficulties, but to consider that in a prince reason shuld beare more imperie than passion.

The French king, because he would neither do wrong to his crowne, nor ill content his people, the towne of Cozmaie being verie noble and loiall to the crowne of France, caused the matter to be debated in full counsell, wherein was an assistance of the principals of his court, who advised him with one voice to embrace peace, yea vnder the condition offered. And yet in that time the king catholike did what he could to bpeake it, offering the king manie plots and deuises, but speciallie to minister to him all his means and fauours to conquer the duchie of Spillan. But the answer being returned into England, that the French king had content with the resolution of Cozmaie, the peace succeeded & was concluded in the beginning of August betwene the two kings during their liues, & a yeare after their death.

In the capitulation it was expressed, that Cozmaie should remaine to the king of England, to whom the French king should paie six hundred thousand crownes, and that in such sort of distribution, that the French king should make payment of an hundred thousand franks euerie yeare, untill the full payment was satisfied: that they should be bound to defend their estates mutuallie and reciprocallie with ten thousand footmen if the warre went by land, and with six thousand onelie if the warre were made by sea: that the French king should be bound to serue the king of England in all his affaires with twelve hundred lances, and the king of England likewise to minister to his seruices with ten thousand footmen: the expenses to be defraied by either of them that should haue need of the men: both the one and the other of them named the Scotch king, the archduke, & the empire: but Cesar and the king catholike were not named: the Switzers had a nomination, but it bare a condition, that whosoener would defend against the French king, the estate of Spillan, Venes, or Ast, should be excluded out of the nomination.

This peace, which was made with a wonderfull readinesse, was confirmed by the marriage of the kings sister of England with the French king, vnder condition, that he should acknowledge to haue receiued foure hundred thousand crownes for his dowrie: the contract or handfastings were made in England, where the king catholike ambassador was not in presence, for the great hatred the king of England bare to the king his maister. And euen vpon the conclusion and resolution of this peace, came to the court of France the instrument of ratification which Cesar had made, together with his commission, and the king catholike, for conclusion of the marriage that was solicited betwene Ferdinando de Austrich and the second daughter of France not yet foure yeares of age: but the practise of that marriage vanished presentlie by reason of the peace that was now established: and the French king to satisfie better the king of England, gaue order that the duke of Suffolke, captaine generall of the lance knights that were in his paie, should depart the dominions of France, in whome the honours and recompenses compenseth that the king made to him ouercame all occasions of discontentment, the bountie and liberality of the one being no greater than the affabilitie and disposition of the other.]

In December, one Richard Hun a merchant tailor of London, that was laid in Lollards tower by commandement of the bishop of London, called Richard Fitz James, and his chancelloz doctor Hozsle, was found dead, hanging by the necke in a girdle of silke within the said tower. That ye maie understand the cause of his imprisonment, the beginning was this. The same Hun had a child that died in his house, being an infant; the curat claimed the bearing thereof for a mortuarie. Hun answered, that the infant had no propertie in the sheet. Whereupon, the prest ascited him in the spirituall court. He taking to him counsell, sued the curat in a premunire: and when this was knowne, meanes was found, that Hun being accused of heresie, was attached, and laid in Lollards tower, where he was found dead, as ye haue heard. Much adoe was made about his death, for the bishop and the chancelloz said, that he hanged himselfe.

But manie of the tempoalitie affirmed, that he was murdered, greatlie lamenting the case: for he was well beloued, and namelie of the poore, which cried out against them that were suspected to haue made him awaie. He was a good almes-man, and greatly releued the needie. The question of his death was so farre put forth, that vpon the suspicion he should be murdered, twelue men were charged before the coroner. After they had taken view of the bodie, the same was burned in Smithfield by the bishops appointment: notwithstanding the coroners quest indicted doctor Hozsle, with one John Spalding, otherwile called Welringer, and Charles Folsch the summoner of the murdered; howbeit, vpon his arraignment, through great sute and corruption of monie (as manie iudged) the kings attorneie declared doctor Hozsle not to be gillie.

This Christmasse on Tweluepeares night, the king, the duke of Suffolke, & two other were in mantels of cloath of siluer lined with blew veluet, the siluer was pouned in letters that the veluet might be seene thorough, the mantels had great capes like to the portingall floss, and all their hosen, dublets, and coats were of the same fashion cut, and of the same stiffe. With them were foure ladies in gowns, after the fashion of Hauoie, of blew veluet, lined with cloath of gold, the veluet all cut, and mantels like tipets knit together all of siluer, and on their heads bonnets of burned gold, the foure torch-bearers were in fatten white and blew. This strange apparell pleased much euerie person, and in especiall the queene. And thus these foure lordes & foure ladies came into the quenes chamber with great light of torches, and danced a great season, and then put off their visors, and were all well knowne, and then the queene hartlie thanked the kings grace for his goodlie pastime and dispos.

Likewile on the Twelue night, the king and the queene came into the hall of Greenwich, & suddenlie entered a tent of cloath of gold, and before the tent stood foure men of armes, armed at all points with swords in their hands; and suddenlie with noise of trumpets entered foure other persons all armed, and ran to the other foure, and there was a great and a fierce fight. And suddenlie came out of a place like a wood eight widmen, all appareled in greene mosse, made with fleued silke, with onglie weapons & terrible visages, and there fought with the knights eight to eight; and after long fighting, the armed knights drove the wild men out of their places, and followed the chace out of the hall: and when they were departed, the tent opened, and there came out six lordes and six ladies richlie appareled, and danced a great time: when they had danced their pleasure, they entered the tent againe, which was conuied out of the hall; then the king & the queene were serued with a right sumptuous banquet.

On the third day of Februarie, the king made a solemne iusts, and he and the marquesse Dorset would answer all comers, their apparell and barres were of blew veluet and cloath of siluer, all to cut in subtil knots, richlie embodered, all the seruitors in white & blew silke. The counterpart, which were foureteene in number, richlie appareled in beluet, cloath of gold, and emboderie, euerie man after his owne deuise. The king was that daie highlie to be praised, for he brake thre & twentie speares beside atteints and bare downe to ground a man of armes and his horse: the lord marquesse and all other did valiantlie, and had much praise, for euerie man did passing well, which is selborne seene in such a case. But the king for a fuerie exceeded all other.

On the fourth daie of October, the king removed to Lambeth, and on the morow began the high court of parlement, sir Thomas Penill was then speaker. In this parlement were diuerse acts made, but in especiall two, which were much spoken of: the one was the act of apparell, and the other act for labourers: of these two acts was much communing, and much businesse arose. For the labourers would in no wise labour by the daie, but all by taske & in great, and therefore much trouble fell in the countrie, and in especiall in harvest time, for then husbandmen could scarce get workemen to helpe in their harvest. This parlement continued untill Easter, in the which diuerse subsidies were granted to the king, toward his great costs and charges that he had bene at in his biage roiall to France.

After Easter the nineteenth daie of the moneth of Aprill, the king deliting to set forth yong gentlemen, called Nicholas Carew, and Francis Btarn, and caused diuerse other yong gentlemen to be on the counter-part, and lent to them horse and harness to incourage all youth to seeke deeds of armes. This yeare died at Rome by poison (as was reported) the archbishop of Yorke and cardinall, called doctor Benbyske, who was the kings ambassadour there: his was a wiseman and of a folie courage. The king then gaue the said archbishoplike to Thomas Wolseie, then bishop of Lincolne, who at that time bare all the rule about the king, and what he said was obeyed in all places. Now when he was once archbishop, he studied daie and night how to be a cardinall, and caused the king, and the French king to write to Rome for him, and at their requests he obtained his purpose, as you shall heare afterward.

At this time was much communing, and berelie (as it appeared) it was intended, that the king in person would passe the sea to Calis, and there on the marches of the same, the French king and queene to come and see the king their brother: and for the same iournie manie coslie works were wrought, much rich apparell prouided, and much preparation made against the next spring: but death which is the last end of all things let this iournie. For before the next spring the French king died at the citie of Paris, the first daie of Januarie, when he had bene married to the faire ladie Marie of England foure score and two daies (whom he so feruentlie loued, that he gaue himselfe ouer to behold too much his excellent beautie bearing then but eightene yeares of age, nothing considering the proportion of his owne yeares, nor his decayed complexion; so that he fell into the rage of a feauer, which drawing to it a sudden sur, ouer came in one instant the life, that nature gaue ouer to preferue anie longer. He was a king iust & much beloued of his people, but touching his condition, neither before he was king, nor after he had the crowne he neuer found constancie nor stabilitie in either fortune.

For, rising from a small duke of Mleance with great happinesse to the crowne, and that by the death of Charles yonger than he, and two of his sonnes, he conquered with a verie great facilitie the duchie of Millan and the kingdome of Naples, and almost all the residue of the regions of Italie, being gouerned for manie yeares by his direction: he recovered with a verie great prosperitie, the state of Genes that was in rebellion: and vanquished with no lesse glorie the armies of the Venetians, being in person at both those victories. But on the other side, euen when he was in his youth and best disposition of bodie, he was then constrained by king Lewes the elcuenth to marrie his daughter that was both barren and deformed; and yet could neuer get the god will nor countenance of his father in law.

nelle of his fortune.

And after his death, such was the greatnesse of the ladic of Bourbon, that he could neuer get the institution of the new king, being then in minority, being almost compelled to retire himselfe into Britaine: where being taken in the battell of saint Aubin, he liued two yeares in the calamitie of a prisoner. To these afflictions maie be added the siege and famine of Pauarre, the manie discomfites he had in the realme of Naples, the losse of the estate of Millan, Genes, and all the townes which he had taken from the Venetians: and lastlie the greuous warre he had in France against verie mightie enemies, his eyes beholding into what lamentable perils his realme was brought: neuertheless, before he died it seemed he had conquered all his aduersities, and fortune shewed good tokens of his reconcilment, both for that he had defended his kingdome against mightie enemies, and also established a perpetuall peace and alliance with the king of England, with whome by how much his amitie was great and assured, by so much it gaue him hope to be able to reconquer the duchie of Millan.]

The king of England being aduertised of the French kings death, caused a solemne obsequie to be kept for him in the cathedrall church of S. Paule, with a costlie hearfe: at which manie nobles were present. After this he sent a letter to comfort the queene his sister, requirring to know hir pleasure, whether she would continue still in France, or returne into England. And when he was aduertised of hir mind (which was to returne into England) the duke of Suffolke, sir Richard Wingfield deputie of Calis, and doctor West, with a goodlie band of gentlemen and yeomen, all in blacke, were sent into France, and coming to Paris, were well receiued of the new French king, Francis the first of that name [who was the next heire male of the blood roiall and of the same line of the dukes of Mleance: he was preferred to the succession of the kingdome before the daughters of the dead king by vertue and disposition of the law Salike, a law verie ancient in the realme of France, which excludeth from the roiall dignitie all women; so long as there is anie issue male of the same line.

first comes to the crowne.

This praiseworthy properties.

He would had such a hope in his vertues, and such an opinion of his magnanimitie, and such a conceipt of his iudgement and wit, that euerie one confessed, that of verie long time there was none raised up to the crowne with a greater expectation. He was made the more agreeable to the fancies of men, by the consideration of his age bearing then but two and twentie yeares; his excellent stature and proportion of bodie, his great liberalitie, and generall hu-manitie, together with the ripe knowledge he had in manie things. But speciallie he pleased greatly the nobilitie, to whome he transferred manie singular and great fauours. Unto this king Francis de Angoulesine did the foresaid English nobilitie declare the effect of their commission, which was to receiue the queene Dowager, according to the contents of the marriage.]

The councill of France (by the kings appointment) assigned forth hir dowrie, and the duke of Suffolke put in officers, and then was the queene deliuered to the duke by indenture, who behaued himselfe so towards hir, that he obtained hir good will to be hir husband. It was thought, that when the king created him duke of Suffolke, he perceiued his sisters good will towards the said duke; and that he meant then to haue bestowed hir vpon him; but that a better offer came in the waie. But howsoeuer it was now, he won hir love; so as by hir consent, he wrote to the king hir brother, mchellie beseeching him of pardon in his request, which was humble to desice him of his good will and contentation.

The king at the first staide, but after long sute, and speciallie by meane of the French queene his selfe, and other the dukes friends, it was agreed that the duke should bring hir into England unmarried, and at his returne to marrie hir in England: but for doubt of change he married hir secretly in Paris at the house of Clugnie, as was said. After he had receiued hir with hir dowry appointed, & all hir apparell, jewels, and household stuffe deliuered, they toke leaue of the new French king, and so passing thorough France, came to Calis; where she was honourable intertained, and after openlie married with great honour vnto the said duke of Suffolke. Doctor West (as then nominated bishop of Elie) remained behind at Paris, to go thorough with the full conclusion of a new league betwixt the king of England, and the new French king.

The court lieng at Gréuolich, the king and the queene, accompanied with manie lords and ladies, road to the high ground of shooters hill to take the open aire; and as they passed by the waie, they espied a companie of tall yeomen, clothed all in greene with greene hoods, and bowes and arrowes, to the number of two hundred. Then one of them, which called himselfe Robin hood, came to the king, desiring him to see his men shoot; and the king was content. Then he whiffled, and all the two hundred archers shot and loosed at once; and then he whiffled againe, and they likewise shot againe; their arrowes whiffled by craft of the head, so that the noise was strange and great, and much pleased the king, the queene, and all the companie. All these archers were of the kings gard, and had thus apparelled themselves to make solace to the king.

Then Robin hood desired the king and queene to come into the greene wood, and to see how the outlawes liued. The king demanded of the queene & hir ladies, if they durst aduenture to go into the wood with so manie outlawes. Then the queene said, that if it pleased him she was content. Then the hoines blew, till they came to the wood under shooters hill, & there was an arbor made of boughes with a hall, and a great chamber; and an inner chamber verie well made and covered with flowers & sweet hearbes, which the king much praised. Then said Robin hood; Sir, outlawes breakfasts is venison, and therefore you must be content with such fare as we vse. Then the king and queene sat downe, and were serued with venison and wine by Robin hood and his men, to their great contentation.

When the king departed and his companie, and Robin hood and his men them conducted; and as they were were returning, there met with them two ladies in a rich chariot drawn with five horses, and every horse had his name on his head, and on every horse sat a lady with his name written. On the first courser called Canoe, sat Humilde, or Humble. On the second courser called Heyncon road lady Mer. On the third called Pheton sat lady Tegetur. On the fourth called Kimphon sat lady Pleasant. On the fifth called Lampace sat sweet Odour. And in the chaire sat lady Haie, accompanied with lady Floza, richly apparelled, and they saluted the king with diuerse goodlie songs, and so brought him to Grænewich. At this making was a great number of people to behold it to their great solace and comfort.

The same after none, the king, the duke of Suffolk, the marquisse Dorset, and the earle of Essex, their barbes and bases of greene velvet and cloth of gold, came into the field on great coursers, on whome waited diuerse gentlemen in silke of the same colour. On the other side entered sixteen lords and gentlemen, all apparelled richly after their deuises, and so valiantly they ran their courses appointed: after that, they ran volant one as fast as he might once take another, which was a goodlie sight to see: and when all was done they departed, and went to a goodlie banquet. This summer the king took his progress westward, and visited his townes and castles there, and heard the complaints of his poore communalitie; and euer as he roode he hunted and liberalitie departed with venison.]

This yeare in September, the king being at his manour of Oking, after his returne from his progress which he made that yeare into the west parts, the archbishop of Poike came thither to him. Whilke he scoured there, a letter was brought to the said archbishop from Rome, aduertising him that he was elected cardinall, which letter incontinentlie he shewed to the king, disabling himselfe in words, though his intent was otherwise; and so the king did encourage him, and willed him to take that dignitie upon him, and called him from thenceforth my lord cardinall. But his hat, bull, nor other ceremonies were not yet come. In November, the king assembled his high court of parlement at Westmynster, wherein, diuerse acts made in the first yeare were reformed and altered, and especiallie the act of apparel, and the act of labourers, as by the booke of statutes more plainelie appereth.

At the end of this parlement, doctor Warham archbishop of Cantuarburie, and as then lord chancelour, perceiving how the new lord cardinall medled further in his office of chancelorship than he could well suffer, except he should aduenture the kings displeasure; for this and for other considerations gaue by his office of chancelor into the kings hands, and deliuered to him the great seale, which incontinentlie was deliuered by the king unto the lord cardinall, and so was he made lord chancelor. He was no longer in that office, but he directed forth commissions into euery shire, for the execution of the statutes of apparel and labourers, and in all his doings shewed himselfe more losse and presumptuous than became him. And he himselfe on a daie called a gentleman named Simon Fitz Richard, and took from him an old tacket of crimsin velvet and diuerse broches, which extreme doing caused him greatly to be hated: and by his example manie cruell officers for malice euill intreated diuerse of the kings subiects, in so much that one Shinning, maior of Rochester, set a young man on the pillorie for wearing of a riuen or gathered shirt.]

In the end of November, the cardinals hat was sent into England, which the gentlemen of Kent received, and brought to London with such triumph, as though the greatest prince in Europe had bene come to visit the king [much like that of the people at Rome in the yeare 1515, when were scene in the said citie two elephants, a nature of creatures which hapilie had not bene scene in Italie since the triumphs and publike plaies of the Romans. Emanuel king of Castile sent to pope Leo the tenth a verie honorable ambassage, and withall presented him with these huge and statelie elephants, which his ships had brought by sea from India; their entring into Rome was celebrated with a verie great concourse of people, some wondering at the strange forme and stature of the beasts, some maruelling to what uses their nature inclined them, and some considering the respects and purposes of such a present, their ignorance making their wonder farre greater than their reason.]

No lesse adu was there at the bringing of the cardinals hat, who on a sundae (in S. Peters church at Westmynster) received the same, with the habit, the piller, and other such tokens of a cardinall. And now that he was thus a perfect cardinall, he looked about all estates, which purchased him great hatred and disdaine on all sides. For his ambition was no lesse discernable to the eyes of the people, than the sunne in the firmament in a clere and cloudlesse summer daie; which procured against him the more hatred among the noble and popular sort; for that his base linage was both noted and knowne, in so much that his insatiable aspiring to supereminent degrees of dignitie kindled manifest contempt and detestation among such as pretended a countenance of god will and honorable dutie vnto him, though in verie deed the same parties (if frelie and without checke they might haue spoken their fanke) would haue intitled him a proud popeling; as led with the like spirit of swelling ambition, wherewith the rable of popes haue bene bladder like puffed and blowne vp: a diuelish and luciferian vice, in the iudgements of men abhominable, and in the sight of God most damnable; as the poet in this distichon tralie witnesseth:

After the end of the parlement, sir Edward Poyninges laboured to be discharged of the keeping of Coznaie, because he could not haue health there; and so he was discharged, and sir William Blunt lord Mountjoy was sent thither to haue that come, and for marshall was appointed sir Sampson Positon. Immediatly upon their comming thither chanced a great riot, raised by the souldiers, so that to appease them, the lord Mountjoy was put in leoparde of his life. In conclusion, to quiet them sir Sampson Positon was banished the towne for euer, but what the matter was I haue not found rehearsed by anie writer. After that the citie was appeased, and euery thing thought to be forgotten, diuerse of the offenders were executed, and diuerse banished the towne, some fled, and were confined both out of England and the towne.

After the parlement was ended, the king kept a solenne Christmasse at his manor of Eltham; and on the Twelue night in the hall was made a goodlie cassell, wonderouslie set out; and in it certeine ladies and knights, and when the king and quene were set, in came other knights and assailed the cassell, where manie a good stripe was giuen; and at the last the assailants were beaten awaie. And then issued out knights and ladies out of the cassell, which ladies were rich and strangelie disguised: for all their apparel was in haizes of gold, stref with mounting spangls of siluer and gilt, set on crimsin sattin lose and not fastned: the mens apparell of the same sute made like Julius of Hungarie; and the ladies heads and bodies court at once.

This yere the new league accorded betwixt king Henrie & the French king was openlie proclaimed through the cite of London by a trumpet. Margaret quene of Scots eldest siller to the k. came this yere into England, & at Harbottell castell was deliuered of a daughter, begot by hir second husband the lord Archembald Douglasse earle of Angus. This daughter was called at the fontstone after hir mother Margaret. The said quene after the death of hir late husband king James married the said earle of Angus, without consent of hir brother king Henrie, or other of hir friends; chædie (as some haue thought) for hir sonnes sake, doubting if she should not haue taken hir choise at home, she should haue married in some other place, and so haue bene sequestred from hir sonne, whose bringing vp apertained now chædie unto hir. But such contention rose shortly after in Scotland amongst the lords, that both she and hir husband were glad to seeke succor in England at hir brothers hand, who was contented to releue them, assigning them the said castell of Harbottell to lie in, with apparell and all other necessities, till his further pleasure should be knowne. The eighteenth daie of Februarie this yere, the ladie Marie, daughter to king Henrie the eight was borne at Grenewich. This was she that afterwards was quene of this realme, & married the king of Spaine. This yere also died the king of Aragon, father to the queene; for whom was kept a solemne obsequie in the cathedrall church of Paules.

As ye haue heard the last yere how the quene of Scots with hir husband was come for succor into England, and laie at Harbottell in Roxthumberland, till the kings pleasure was to send for them; so now know you that he (like a naturall brother) sent for hir and hir husband to come to his court for their solace; for the which kindnesse the earle humble thanked the king, and promised to giue his attendance on the queene his wife to the court. Whereupon the king sent William Blacknall esquier, clerke of his spicerie with siluer vessel, plate, and other things necessarie for the conuenance of hir, and sent to hir all manner of officers for hir estate conuenient. Now when she was ready to depart, she asked for hir husband, but he was departed into Scotland, and left hir alone; nothing remembryng his promise. Which sudden departing much made hir to muse; howbeit, the lords of England greatly encouraged hir to keepe hir promise with the king hir brother.

Now when she was somewhat appeased, she set forward; and in euerie towne she was well receiued, & so on the thirde day of Maie she made hir entrie into London, riding on a white palfrey (which the quene of England had sent unto hir) behind sir Thomas Parre richlie besene, and with a great companie of lords and ladies she rode through the cite to Batnards castell, and from thence she was conueied to Grenewich, and there receiued solousie of the king, the quene, the French quene hir siller, and highlie was she feasted. And when the king heard that the earle of Angus hir husband was departed, he said it was done like a Scot. This quene sometime was at the court, and sometime at Batnards castell, and so she continued in England all this yere.

The king for the honour of his siller the nineteenth and twentieth daie of Maie prepared two solemne daies of iusts: and the king himselfe, and the duke of Suffolke, the earle of Essex, and Nicholas Carew esquier, took on them to answer all commers. The apparell of them and their horses was blacke veluet, couered all ouer with branches of honic-suckles of fine flat gold of damaske of loose worke, euerie leafe of the branch moning, the embroidery was verie cunning and sumptuous. On the king was attending in one sute on horsebacke, the lord marquesse Dorset, the earle of Surrie, the lord Burgaunnie, the lord Hastings, sir John Pechie, the lord Ferrers, sir William Fitz Williams, and twelue other knights. All these were in frockes of blew veluet, garded with rich cloth of gold, and their horse trappers of blew veluet fringed with gold: and on foot were fortye persons all in blew sattin garded with cloth of gold. And so they entred the field with trumpets, drummes and other minstrells. Then in came the counterpartie richlie apparelled, to the number of twelue: and on that daie euerie man did well, but the king did best, and so was adiudged; and so at night they ceased, and came to supper.

The king the next daie and his companie were apparelled (horse and all) in purple veluet, set full of leaues of cloth of gold ingrailed with fine flat gold of damaske embroidered like to rose leanes, and euerie leafe fastned to other with points of damaske gold, and on all their borders were letters of gold bullion. And on the king waited five lords, fourteen knights in frockes of yellosh veluet, garded and bound with rich cloth of gold: and thirte gentlemen were in like apparell on foot, and fortye officers in yellosh sattin edged with cloth of gold. Thus with great triumph they entred the field. Then the counterpartie entred all clothed and barbed in white sattin trauesed with cloth of gold richlie. This daie was manie a great stripe giuen. The king and sir William Kingston ranne together; which sir William Kingston was a strong and a tall knight, & yet the king by strength overthrew him to the ground. And after that the king and his albs had performed their courses, they ranne volant at all commers, which was a pleasant sight to see. And when night approached, they all disarmed them, and went to the queenes chamber, where was a great banquet for the welcome of the quene of Scots.

In this moneth of Maie were sent out of England twelue hundred masons and carpenters, and thre hundred laborers to the cite of Lorraine; for the king and his counsell considered that the garrison that was kept there was chargeable: and therefore it was determined that there should be builded a castell to chastise the cite if they rebelled, and to minish the garrison. And therefore these workemen were sent thither, which this yere began a strong castell, and wrought still on it. In this yere, by the cardinall were all men called to account that had the occupieng of the kings monie in the warres or elsethere, not to euerie mans contentation: for some were found in arrerages, and some saved themselves by policie and byberie, and wared rich, and some innocents were punished. And for a trust, he so punished pericarie with open punishment, and open papers wearing, that in his time it was lesse vsed. He punished also lords, knights, and men of all sorts, for riots bearing and mainteining in their countries, that the poore men liued quietlie: who perceiving that he punished the rich, complained without number, and brought manie an honest man to trouble and vexation.

Now when the cardinall at the last perceived their untrue surmises, and feined complaints for the most part, he then wared wearis of hearing their causes, and ordeined by the kings commission diuerse vnder courts to heare complaints by bill of poore people. The one was kept in the White hall, the other before the kings almoner doctor Stokellete, a man that had more learning than discretion to be a iudge, the third third was kept in the lord treasurers chamber beside the starr chamber, and the fourth at the rols at the after none. These courts were greatlie haunted for a time: but at the last the people perceived that much delat was used in these courts, and few matters ended, and when they were ended, they bound no man by the law, then euery man was werie of them and resorted to the common law.

It was strange to see the cardinall (a man not skilled in the laws) sit in the seat of iudgement and pronounce the law, being aided at the first by such as according to the ancient custome did sit as associates with him: but he would not sticke to determine sundrie causes, neither rightlie decided nor adiudged by order of law. And againe, such as were cleare cases, he would sometime prohibit the same to passe, call them into iudgement, frame an order in controuersies, and punish such as came with vntue surmises afore the iudges, & shapelle repproue the negligence of the iudges themselves, which had received such surmises, and not well considered of the controuersies of the parties. And such was the administration of the cardinall under a colour of iustice at the first: but because the same seemed at length to be but a verie shadow or colour in deed, it quicklie banished awaie, he taking vpon him the whole rule himselfe, for that he saw the king made small account of anie other but onlie of him.

Whereby it came to passe, that manie of the pères and high estates of the realme withdrew them from the court; as first the archbishop of Canturburie, and the bishop of Winchester, which got them home into their diocesses. But yet before their departure (as good fathers of their countrie) they instantlie besought the king that he would not suffer anie seruant to erre and passe his maister: borrowing that sentence out of the gospell of saint John, where our Saviour speaking to his disciples, saith to them, Verelie, verelie, I say vnto you, the seruant is not greater than his maister. Herevnto the king, knowing that they meant this by the cardinall, made this answer, That he would diligentlie see, that euery seruant should obeye, and not command. But the cardinall notwithstanding (during the time of his flattering felicitie) held out, thinking soone to be countermanded; behauing himselfe more like a prince, than a prelat, so blinded was he with vaine glorie, and drunken with the transitorie delights of the world: obstinate impediments and most horrible hinderances to the permanent ioies of heauen, as the poet saith:

After this, the duke of Suffolke departed home into his countrie, and last of all the duke of Suffolke also followed the other. For he hauing spent liberalie in his iournies when he went as ambassado into France, also in the solemnization of his marriage, and in housekeeping since he was married, borrowed great summes of monie of the king, which he hoped should haue bene forgiven him: but the cardinall would not haue it so, to the intent that the duke being behind hand in debt, should be the more at commandment. For as wealth maketh men loslie, so debt want make them lowlie. In the moneth of October, in this eight yeare of king Henrie, at the bishop of Sion or Sittin, a cardinall (commonlie called the cardinall of the Switzes) came into England from the emperor Sparmilian.

At the contemplation of this cardinall, the king lent to the emperor a great summe of monie. But the chiefest matter that moued the king to be so free to Sparmilian, was because the same monie should be employed on men of warre against the French king, towards whome the king (or rather cardinall Wolfe) of late had conceived a grudge, as thus. True it is, that the king bestowed the reuenues of the see of Lonaie vpon the cardinall, at what time that see came into the kings hands: and therefore the cardinall being desirous to assure to himselfe the same, made sute to the French king, that he would prouide Guillard the former bishop of Lonaie of some other bishoprike in France, so that he might resigne the bishoprike of Lonaie clearelie into his hands. The French king, perceiuing how much this should make against his purpose, that vpon occasion hoped euer to recouer the possession of Lonaie, would not gratifie the cardinall herein.

Wherevpon the cardinall turning the kings mind at his pleasure, persuaded him, that the next way to abate the French kings puissance (which in the beginning of his reigne had recouered Milan, and grew euery daie in power more than other) should be to mainteine the emperor with monie against him, so as the Frenchmen should be chastised without the trauell of him or his people. Herevpon was Richard Pale sent first into Germanie with a great summe of monie to wage the Switzes, which vnder the conduct of the emperor Sparmilian invaded the duchie of Milan; but without anie great gaine returned from thence, leauing Milan in the Frenchmens hands at that time. And now for a new reliefe was this cardinall of Sion sent from Milan, at whose instance monie was assigned to be deliuered, and certeine Genouaies undertooke the exchange, which made not payment thereof at the day, although they had received it of the king.

In this yeare the king kept his Christmasse at his manor of Greenwich, & on the Twelue night, according to the old custome, he and the queene came into the hall: and when they were set, and the queene of Scots also, there entered into the hall a garden artificiall, called the garden of Esperance. This garden was towred at euery corner, and railed with railles gilt, all the bankes were set with flowers artificiall of silke and gold, the leaues cut of greene sattin, so that they seemed verie flowers. In the midst of this garden was a pillar of antique worke, all gold set with pearles and stones; and on the top of the pillar, which was six square, was a tower or an archembolwed, crowned with gold: within which stood a bush of roses red and white, all of silke and gold, and a bush of pomegranats of like stuffe. In this garden walked six knights, and six ladies richlie apparelled; and then they descended and danced manie goodlie dances, and so ascended the garden againe, and were conueied out of the hall, and then the king was serued of a great banquet. After this Christmasse the king exercised himselfe much in hawking.

This yeare, and about this time, Richard For bishop of Winchester builded and founded Corpus Christi college in Oxford, and minded to haue appointed the same for a house of monks: but Hugh Aldom then bishop of Excester changed his mind from that purpose by these meanes. This Hugh Aldom albeit hee were not the best learned of himselfe, yet verie much and well affected towards learning and learned men; and was minded to haue enlarged Excester college. But being denied the preferment of a scholer, which stood then in election for a roome, his good will was withdrawne from that college, and he would haue joined with William Smith bishop of Lincolne, who then was in building of Walsen nose college; but it took no effect. And then being aduertised that Richard For bishop of Winchester was in hand to build Corpus Christi college, hee did send his letters vnto him, and offered to ioine with him therein, who was verie glad thereof and well contented. Now these two bishops conferring together what

Bishop For was of the mind and determination to haue made the college for religious men. But bishop Oldom (whether it was because he fauoured not those sects of cloistered monks, or whether he foresaw anie fall towards of those sects) dissuaded bishop For what he could from that his purpose and opinion, and said vnto him; What my lord, shall we build houses, and prouide liuelodes for a companie of bustling monks, whose end and fall we our selues maie lue to see? No, no, it is more meet a great deale, that we should haue care to prouide for the increase of learning, and for such as who by their learning shall do good in the church and commonwealth. To this bishop For at length yelded, and so they proceeded in their buildings. Wherin Oldom reseruing to For the name of the founder, was contented with the name of a benefactor, and berie liberallie did contribute great masses of monie to the same: and since (according to his wish and desire) the same college hath bene and is the nurse of manie notable good scholars.]

About this season there grew a great hartburning and malicious grudge amongst the Englishmen of the citie of London against strangers; and namelie the artificers found themselves sore grieved, for that such numbers of strangers were permitted to resort hither with their wares, and to exercise handie crafts to the great hinderance and impouering of the kings liege people. Besides that, they set nought by the rulers of the citie, & bare themselves too bold of the kings fauor, whereof they would insolentlie boast; vpon presumption thereof, & they offered manie an inuisurious abuse to his liege people, inso much that among other accidents which were manifest, it fortuned that as a carpenter in London called Williamson had bought two stockdowes in Cheape, and was about to pay for them, a Frenchman took them out of his hand, and said they were not meate for a carpenter.

Well said the Englishman I haue bought them and now paid for them, and therefore I will haue them. He said the Frenchman I will haue them for my lord the ambassadour. And so for better or worse, the Frenchman called the Englishman knave, and went awate with the stockdowes. The strangers came to the French ambassadour, and surmised a complaint against the poore carpenter. And the ambassadour came to the lord maiour, and said so much, that the carpenter was sent to prison: and yet not contented with this, so complained to the kings counsell, that the kings commandement was laid on him. And when sir John Baker knight and other two shipfull persons sued to the ambassadour for him, he answered by the bodie of God that the English knave should lose his life, for he said no Englishman should denie that the Frenchmen required, and other answer had they none.

There was also a Frenchman that had slaine a man, and should abiure the realme, and had a crosse in his hand. When suddenly came a great sort of Frenchmen about him, and one of them said to the constable that led him; Sir is this crosse the price to kill an Englishman. The constable was somewhat affonted & answered not. Then said another Frenchman, On that price we should be banished all by the masse. This saying was noted to be spoken spitefully. Howbeit, the Frenchmen were not alonely oppressors of the Englishmen. For a Lombard called Francis de Barb, enticed a mans wife in Lombard street to come to his chamber with his husbands plate, which thing she did. After, when his husband knew it, he demanded his wife, but answer was made he should not haue her: then he demanded his plate, and in like maner answer was made that he should neither haue plate nor wife. And when he had sued an action against the stranger in the Guildhall, the stranger so faced the Englishman, that he fainted in his sute. When the Lombard arrested the poore man for his wifes body, while he kept her from his husband in his chamber.

This abuse was much noted, so that the same and manie other oppressions done by them, increased such a malice in the Englishmens hearts, that at the last it burst out. For amongst other that sore grieved at these matters, there was a broker in London called John Lincolne, that busied himselfe so farre in the matter, that about Palmes funde in this eight yeare of the kings reigne, he came to one doctor Henrie Standish with these words; Sir I vnderstand that you shall preach at the lanternie spittle on mondaie in Easter weeke, and so it is, that Englishmen, both merchants and other are vnderdone, for strangers haue more libertie in this land than Englishmen, which is against all reason, and also against the common-weale of the realme. I beseech you therefore to declare this in your sermon, and in so doing ye shall deserue great thanks of my lord maiour, and of all his brethren: and herewith he offered vnto the said doctor Standish a bill, containing this matter more at large.

But doctor Standish (wiselie considering that there might more inconuenience rise thereof, than he would wish, if he should deale in such sort) both wiselie refused the bill, and told Lincolne plainlie, that he ment not to meddle with anie such matter in his sermon. Wherevpon the said Lincolne went vnto one doctor Bele a canon of the foresaid spittle, that was appointed to preach likewise vpon the tuesday in Easter weeke at the same spittle, whome he perswaded to read his said bill in the pulpit. Which bill in effect contained how miserable the common artificers liued, and scarce could get anie wo:ke to find them, their wiues & children: there were such a number of artificers strangers that took awate all their liuing in manner. And also how the English merchants could haue no utterance, for the merchant strangers bzing in all sikkes, cloth of gold, wine, oile, iron, and such other merchandize, that no man almost buieth of an Englishman.

Furthermore, they carie out so much English wool, tinne, and lead, that Englishmen who adventure outward can haue no liuing: which things (said Lincolne) hath bene shewed to the counsell, and cannot be heard. And further (said he) the strangers compass the citie round about, in Southwarke, in Westminster, Temple barre, Holboirne, saint Martins, saint Johns street, Algate, Tower hill, and saint Katharins, and forest all the market, so that no good thing for them cometh to the market: which is the cause that Englishmen want and starue, & they lue aboutantlie in great pleasure. Wherefore (said Lincolne) maister doctor, sith you were borne in London, and see the oppression of the strangers, and the great miserie of your owne native countrie, erport all the citizens to iotne in one against these strangers, raueners, and destroyers of your countrie. Spallier doctor hearing this, said he much lamented the case, if it were as Lincolne had declared.

Yes said Lincolne, that it is, and much more. For the Dutchmen bzing ouer iron, timber, leather, and weincoat readie wrought; also nailes, locks, balckets, cupboards, stoles, tables, chests, girdles, with points, saddles & painted clothes, so that if it were wrought here, Englishmen might haue some wo:ke and liuing by it. And besides this, they grow into such a multitude, that it is to be looked vpon: for I saw on a funde

On sūndae this Lent, six hundred strangers shating at the poppingate with croobolles, and they keepe such assemblies and fraternities together, and make such gathering to their common bor, that euerie botcher will hold plic with the cite of London. Well said the doctor, I will do for a reformation of this matter as much as a priest maie do, and so recited Lincolns bill, and studied for his purpose. Then Lincolne berieolous of his enterprise, went from man to man, saying that shottlie they should heare news, and dailie excited yong people and artificers to beare mallice to the strangers. When Easter came, and doctor Beke should preach the tuesday in Easter weeke, he came into the pulpit, and there declared, that to him was brought a pittifull bill, and read it in this wise.

The tenor of the bill of complaint which doctor Beke read in open audience at the Spitle.

Tall you the worshipfull lordes & maisters of this cite, that will take compassion ouer the poore people your neighbours, and also of the great importable hurts, losses, and hinderances, whereof proceedeth the extream pouertie to all the kings subiects, that inhabit within this cite and suburbs of the same. For so it is, that the aliens & strangers eat the bread from the fatherlesse children, and take the liuing from all the artificers, and the intercoule from all merchants, whereby pouertie is so much increased, that euerie man bewaileth the miserie of other; for craftmen be brought to beggerie, and merchants to needinesse. Wherefore the premises considered, the redresse must be of the commons, knit and vnitied to one part. And as the hurt and damage graueeth all men, so must all men set to their willing power for remedie, & not to suffer the said aliens so highlie in their wealth; & the naturall bozne men of this region to come to confusion. ¶ Of this letter was moze, but the doctor read no further.

When he had read this letter, or the chiefest part thereof, comprehending (as ye haue heard) much seditions matter, he began with this sentence, Celum calis Dominus, terram autem dedit filijs hominum, and upon this text he intreated, how this land was giuen to Englishmen. And as birds defend their nests, so ought Englishmen to cherish and mainteine themselves, and to hurt and grieue aliens for respect of their common-wealth. And upon this text Pugna pro patria, he brought in, how by Gods law it was lawfull to fight for their countrie. And thus he subtilie moued or rather vnderstandie prouoked the people to rebell against strangers. By this folish sermon, manie a light person toke courage, and openlie spake against strangers. And as vn hap would, there had bene diuerse euill parts played of late by strangers, in and about the cite of London, which kindled the peoples rancour the moze furiously against them.

Now as the diuell would, the sūndae after at Greenwich in the kings gallerie was Francis de Bard, who (as ye haue heard) kept an Englishmans wife and his goods, and yet he could haue no remedie; and with him were Domingo, Anthonie Caueler, and manie moze strangers, and there they talking with sir Thomas Palmer knight, iested and laughed how that Francis kept the Englishmans wife, saying that if they had the maiors wife of London they would haue hir. Sir Thomas said, Sirs you haue too much fauour in England. There were diuerse English merchants by, who heard them laugh, and were not content, in so much as one William Bolt a mercer said; Well you whoreson Lombards, you reioice and laugh, by the masse we will one daie haue a sting at you, come when it will. And that saying the other merchants affirmed. This tale was reported about London, and the yong and euill disposed people said they would be reuenged on the merchants strangers as well as on the artificers strangers. ¶ On monday the morow after, the king remoued to his manor of Richmond.

On the eight and twentieth daie of Aprill, diuerse yong men of the cite piked quarels to certeine strangers as they passed by the streets, some they did strike, some they buffeted, and some they threw into the kennell: wherefore the maior sent some of the Englishmen to prison, as Stephan Stubleie skinner, Wets, Stephanson, and diuerse other. Then suddenly rose a secret rumour, and no man could tell how it began, that on spais daie next the cite would rebell and slea all the aliens, insomuch that diuerse strangers fled out of the cite. This brute ran so into euerie mans eares, that it came to the knowledge of the kings counsell, whereupon the lord cardinall sent for the maior, and other of the counsell of the cite, giuing them to vnderstand what he had heard.

The maior, as one ignorant of the matter, told the cardinall that he doubted not but so to gouerne the cite, as peace should be obserued. The cardinall willed him so to do; and to take god heed, that if anie such riotous attempt was intended, he should with good policie prevent it. The maior came from the cardinals house at foure of the clocke in the after none on spais euen, and in all hast sent for his brethren to the Guildhall; yet was it almost seuen of the clocke per the assemble was set. Upon conference had of the matter touching the rumour that was spied abroad of the rebellion against the strangers, some thought it necessarie that a substantiall watch should be set, of the honest citizens householders which might withstand the euill doers, if they went about anie misrule.

But other were of this opinion, that it was dangerous to raise men in armour, because it was hard to tell whome they might trust; but rather they thought it best that commandement should be giuen to euerie man through euerie ward, to shut in his doores, & to keepe his seruants within. Before eight of the clocke the recorder was sent to the cardinall with these opinions; who hearing the same, allowed the latter for best and most surest. And then the recorder and sir Thomas More (late vnder shiriffe of London, and now of the kings priuie counsell) came to the Guildhall halfe an houre before nine of the clocke, and there shewed the pleasure of the kings counsell; whereupon euerie alderman sent to his ward, that no man should stirre after seauen of the clocke out of his house, but to keepe his doores shut, and his seruants within, till nine of the clocke in the morning.

After this commandement giuen, in the evening, as sir John Spundie (an alderman) came from his ward, and found two yong men in Cheape plaining at the bucklers, and a great manie of yong men looking on them (for the commandement was then scarce knowen) he commanded them to leaue of. And for that one of them asked, why? he would haue him to the Counter. Then all the yong prentises kept to, and resisted the alderman, taking the yong fellow from him, & cried; Prentises and clubs. Then out at euerie doore came clubs and weapons. The alderman fled and was in great danger. Then more people arose out of euerie quarter, and forth came servingmen, watermen, courtiers, and others; so that by eleven of the clocke, there were in Cheape, six or seven hundred; and out of Paules churchyard came three hundred, which knew not of the other. So out of all places they gathered, & brake by the counters, took out the prisoners that the maior had thither committed for hurting the strangers, and came to Newgate, and took out Studeleie and Petit committed thither for that cause.

The maior and shiriffes were present there, and made proclamation in the kings name, but nothing was obeyed. Herewith being gathered in plumpes, they ran thorough saint Nicholas shambles, and at saint Martins gate there met with them sir Thomas More, and others, desiring them to go to their lodgings. And as they were thus intreating, and had almost persuaded the people to depart, they within saint Martins threw out stones, bats, and hot water; so that they hurt diuerse honest persons that were there with sir Thomas More, persuading the rebellious persons to cease, inasmuch as at length one Nicholas Downes a sergeant of armes being there with the said sir Thomas More, & soze hurt amongst others, in a furie, cried; Downe with them. And then all the misruled persons ran to the houses and windows of the houses with saint Martins, and spoiled all that they found.

After that, they ran headlong into Cornhill, & there likewise spoiled diuerse houses of the french men that dwelled within the gate of maister Hewitts house called Greene gate. This maister Hewitt was a Picard borne, and reputed to be a great bearer of frenchmen in their occupiengs and trades, contrarie to the lawes of the citie. If the people had found him, they would surely haue stricken off his head: but when they found him not, the watermen and certeine young preests that were there fell to riling, and some ran to Blanchapelson, and brake by the strangers houses, and spoiled them. Thus from ten or eleven of the clocke, these riotous people continued in their outrageous doings till about three of the clocke, at what time they began to withdraw, and went to their places of resort: and by the waie they were taken by the maior and the heads of the citie, and sent some of them to the Tower, some to Newgate, and some to the Counters, to the number of three hundred.

Manie fled, and speciallie the watermen, preests, & servingmen, but the prentises were caught by the backs and had to prison. In the meane time, whilest the hottest of this ruffling lasted, the cardinall was aduertised thereof by sir Thomas Parre: whereupon the cardinall strengthened his house with men and ordinance. Sir Thomas Parre rode in all haste to Richmond, where the king laie, and informed him of the matter; who incontinentlie sent forth bassilie to London, to vnderstand the state of the citie, and was truelie aduertised how the riot was ceased, and manie of the misdoers apprehended. The lieutenant of the Tower sir Roger Cholmeleie (no great friend to the citie) in a franticke furie, during the time of this uprore, shot off certeine peeces of ordinance against the citie. And though they did no great harme; yet he wan much euill will for his hastie doing, because men thought he did it of malice, rather than of anie discretion.

About five of the clocke the earles of Shrewsburie and Surrie, Thomas Dokerie lord of saint Johns, George Peuill lord of Aburgauennie, and others, which had heard of this riot, came to London with such strength as they could make upon that sad-den, and so did the Iunes of court. But before they came, whether with feare of the hute of their coming, or otherwise, the riotous assemblie was broken by, and manie of the misdoers taken (as ye haue heard.) Then were the prisoners examined, and the sermon of doctor Beke called to remembrance, and he taken and sent to the Tower. Herewith was a commission of oier and determiner directed to the duke of Norfolk, and to diuerse other lords, to the lord maior of London, and the aldermen, and to all the iustices of England, for punishment of this insurrection. [The citie thought the duke bare them a grudge for a lewd preest of his, which the yeare before was slain in Cheape, inasmuch that he then in his furie said; I praise God I maie once haue the citizens in my danger! And likewise the duke thought that they bare him no good will; wherefore he came into the citie with thirtene hundred men in harness to keepe the oier and determiner.]

Now upon examination it could neuer be proued of anie meeting, gathering, talking, or conuenticle, at anie daie or time before that daie; but that the chance so happened without anie matter premeditated of anie creature sauing Lincoln, and neuer an honest person in maner was taken but onelie he. When proclamations were made, that no women should come together to babble and talke, but all men should keepe their wiues in their houses. All the streets that were notable stood full of harnessed men, which spake manie opprobrious words to the citizens, which grieved them soze: and if they would haue bene reuenged, the other had had the worse: for the citizens were two hundred to one, but like true subiects they suffered patientlie. Now for the due correction (according to law) of this disorder, all the iustices with all the kings counsell learned in the lawes, assembled at the house of sir John Fincur lord chiefe iustice of England nere to saint Brides by Fleetstreet, to take advise, and conclude vpon the order which they should follow in this matter, and first there was read the statute of the third yeare of Henrie the first, the effect whereof is thus in these words following.

The which statute being read and well considered of, because there was diuerse leagues of truces betwixt the king and diuerse other princes, as one betwixt him and the French king, and another betwixt him and the archduke of Burgognie, and another betwixt him & the king of Spaine (all the which truces were violated by the said insurrection) it was determined by the whole councell there assembled, that the kings sergeants and attournies should go to the lord chancellor, to haue a sight of all the said leagues and charters of truces, to the intent they might frame their indictments according to the matter. And note that iudge fineur said, that all such as were parties to the said insurrection, were guiltie of high treason, as well those that did not commit anie robbery, as those that were principall doers therein themselves, because that the insurrection in it selfe was high treason, as a thing practised against the regall honour of our soveraigne lord the king.

And the same law holdeth of an insurrection (said fineur) made against the statute of laborers. For so (said he) it came to passe, that certeine persons within the countie of Kent began an insurrection, in disobedience of the statute of laborers, and were attainted therfore of high treason, and had iudgement to be hanged, hanged, and quartered. He shewed where and when this chanced. It was further determined by the said fineur, and all the iustices of the land, that upon the said commission of oier and terminer in London, the iustices named in the said commission, might not arreigne the offenders, and proceed to the trial in one selfe daie, no moze than might the iustices of peace. But iustices in oier might so do, as well as the iustices of gaole deliuerie: and as the sufficiency of the turois within the citie to passe betwixt the king and the said traitors, the iustices determined, that he that had lands, and goods, to the value of an hundred marks, should be inabled to passe upon the said indictments. And this by the equitie of the statute of Anno undecimo Henrici septimi, the which will, that no man be admitted to passe in anie inquest in London in a ple of lands, or other action, in which the damages shall passe the value of fourtie shillings, except he be worth in lands or goods the value of an hundred markes.

On saturdaye the second of Maie, in this ninth yeare, all the commissioners, with the lord maiors, aldermen, and iustices, went to the Guildhall, where manie of the offenders were indicted, as well of the insurrection, as of the robberies by them committed against the truces. Whereupon they were arreigned, & pleading not guiltie, had day given till monday next ensuing. On which daie being the fourth of Maie, the lord maiors, the duke of Norfolk, the earle of Surrie and others came to sit in the Guildhall, to proceed in their oier and terminer as they were appointed. When the lords were set, the prisoners were brought through the streets tied in ropes, some men, and some lads of thirtene yeres of age. Among them were diuerse not of the citie, some priests, some husbandmen, and labourers. The whole number amounted unto two hundred thre score and eightene persons.

This daie was John Lincolne indicted as a principall procurer of this mischievous insurrection, and thereupon he was arreigned, and pleading not guiltie, had daie given ouer till wednesdaye, or as Hall saith till thursday next ensuing. He was charged with such matter (as before ye haue heard) concerning his sute unto doctor Standish, and doctor Bele, for the reading of this bill in their sermons, and opening the matter (as before ye haue heard) all which matter with the circumstances he had confessed on saturdaye the third of Maie, unto sir Richard Cholmeie, sir John Danlie, & sir Hugh Skeneington. Diuers other were indicted this mondaie, and so for that time the lords departed. The next daie the duke came againe, & the earle of Surrie with 2000 armed men, which kept the streets. When the maiors, the duke, the earles of Shrewsburie and Surrie were set, the prisoners were arreigned, and thirtene found guiltie, and adiudged to be hanged, hanged, and quartered. For execution whereof were set up eleuen paire of gallowses in diuerse places where the offenses were done, as at Algate, at Blanchappelton, Crations streete, Leaden hall, and before euerie counter one, also at Jewgate, at saint Martins, at Aldersgate, and at Bishopsgate.

Then were the prisoners that were iudged brought to those places of execution: and executed in most rigorous maner, in the presence of the lord Edmund Howard son to the duke of Norfolk, & knight marshal, who shewed no mercie, but extreme crueltie to the poore wailing in their execution: and likewise the dukes servants spake manie opprobrious words, some bad hang, some bad draw, some bad set the citie on fire, but all was suffered. On thursdaye the twentieth of Maie, was Lincolne, Shrivin, and two brethren called Betts, and diuerse other adiudged to die. Then Lincolne said, My lords, I meant well: for if you knewe the mischief that is infused in this realme by strangers, you would remedie it, & manie times I haue complained, and then I was called a buffe fellow: now our Lord haue mercie on me. They were laid on hardels, & drawne to the standard in Cheape, and first was John Lincolne executed. And as the other had the ropes about their neckes, there came a commendement from the king to respite the execution. Then the people cried, God saue the king, and so was the oier and terminer deferred till another daie, and the prisoners sent againe to ward: the armed men departed out of London, and all things set in quiet.

On the eleuenth daie of Maie, the king came to his manors of Greenwich, where the recorder of London and diuerse aldermen came to speake with his grace, and all wore gownes of blacke colour. And when they perceived the king comming out of his private chamber into his chamber of presence, they kneeled downe, and the recorder said: Our most naturall, benigne, and soueraigne lord, we knowe well that your grace is displeased with vs of your citie of London, for the great riot late done: we ascerteine your grace, that none of vs, nor no honest person were condescending to that enormitie, and yet we, our wives, and children, euerie houre lament that your fauour should be taken from vs. And for so much as light and sole persons were the doers of the same, we most humbly beseech your grace to haue mercie of vs for our negligence, and compassion of the offenders for their offense and trespass.

Trulie said the king, you haue highlie displeased and offended vs, and you ought to waille and be sorie for the same. And where as you saie that you the sub-

And with this answer the Londoners departed, and made relation to the maior.

The blacke wagon that followed all Maie daie.

On the eighteenth day of this moneth, the queene of Scots, which had bene at the court, and at Barnardes castell, a whole yeare at the kings charge, and was richlie appointed of all things meet to hir estate, both of iewels, plate, tapistrie, arras, coine, hories, & all other things of the kings gift & liberalitie, departed out of London toward Scotland with great riches, albeit she came into England with great povertie, and she entered into Scotland the thirteenth daie of June, whome hir husband receiued at Berwick, but the Englishmen smallie regarded him. All hir charges within the realme, comming to the court and returning, were of the kings purse.

On thursdaie the two & twentieth daie of Maie, the king came into Westminster hall, for whome at the upper end was set a cloth of estate, and the place hang'd with arras. With him was the cardinal, the dukes of Norfolkke and Suffolke, the earles of Shrewsburie, of Essex, of Wiltshire, & Surrie, with manie lords and other of the kings counsell. The maior & aldermen, with all the chiefe of the citie were there in their best luerie (according as the cardinal had appointed them) by nine of the clocke. When the king commanded that all the prisoners should be brought forth, so that in came the poore yonglings and old false knaues bound in ropes all along, one after another in their shirts, and euerie one a halter about his necke, to the number of foure hundred men, and eleuen women. And when all were come before the kings presence, the cardinal rose laide to the maior and comminallie their negligence, and to the prisoners he declared that they had deserued death for their offense. When all the prisoners togither cried; Mercie gracious lord, mercie. Herewith the lords altogether besought his grace of mercie, at whose sute the king pardoned them all. When the cardinal gaue vnto them a good exhortation, to the great gladnesse of the hearers.

Now, when the generall pardon was pronounced, all the prisoners shouted at once, & all togither cast by their halters into the hall rose, so that the king might perceiue they were none of the discreetest sort. There is to be noted, that diuerse offenders, which were not taken, hearing that the king was inclined to mercie, came well appavelled to Westminster, and suddenlye stripped them into their shirts with halters, and came in among the prisoners willinglie, to be partakers of the kings pardon. By which doing, it was well knowne, that one John Gelson peoman of the crowne was the first that began to spoile, and exhorted other to do the same: and because he fled and was not taken, he came in with a rope among the other prisoners, and so had his pardon. This companie was after called the blacke wagon. When were all the gallows within the citie taken downe, and manie a good praier said for the king, and the citizens toke more heed to their seruants. But the kings mercie ministred abundant matter of communication, euerie one (speciallie the pardoned and their allies) founding the benefit of his royal clemencie, whereby of dead men they became liuing, and had susteined the seuerer sentence of law, had not mercie remitted the fault and the punishment, which beareth the force of iudgement, as the poet trulie saith:

In June the king had with him diuerse ambassadors, for solace of whome he prepared a collie tustres, he himselfe & twelue more against the duke of Suffolke and other twelue. His base and bard was the one halfe cloth of siluer, & the other halfe blacke tinsell. On the siluer was a curious lose worke of beluet imbrodered with gold, cut on the siluer, and euerie cut ingrailed with gold, so that that side was gold, siluer, and beluet. On the blacke tinsell side was blacke beluet imbrodered with gold, and cut, and euerie cut was ingrailed with flat gold of damaske. The base and bard were brodered with great letters of maslie gold bullion, full of pearles and stones, maruellous rich: all his companie were in like sute, sauing that they had no iewels. The king had on his head a ladies heere full of diamonds. On the king attended gentlemen, armouers, and other officers, to the number of an hundred and twentie fine persons, all in white beluet and white satten, horse and harness for horsemen, caps and hosen for footmen, all white, at the kings cost. Thus rolalie the king and his companie with his waiters came to the tilts end.

Then entered the duke of Suffolke, with the marques Dorset, the earles of Essex and Surrie, and eight other of his band, in bardes and bases of white beluet and crimson satten losenged, set full of letters of C. M. of gold, for Charles and Marie, and they toke the other end of the tilt. Then the trumpets blew, and the king and the duke ran fiercelly togither, and brake manie speares, and so did all the other, that it was hard to saie who did best. But when the courses were run, they ran volant one at another, so that both by the report of sir Edward Clifford maister of the armourie, and also of the iudges and heralds, at these iustes were broken five hundred and sir speares: and then the king the same night made the ambassadors a sumptuous banquet, with manie riddels and much pastime. After this great triumph, the king appointed his ghefts for his pastime this summer; but suddenlye there came a plague of sicknesse, called the sweating sicknesse, that turned all his posture.

This maladie was so cruell, that it killed some within three houres, some within two houres, some merrie at dinner, and dead at supper. Marie died in the kings court, the lord Clinton, the lord Erle of Wiltton, and manie knights, gentlemen, and officers. For this plague Michaelmasse tearme was adourned. And because that this maladie continued from Iulie to the midd of December, the king kept himselfe euere with a small companie, and held no solenne Christmasse, willing to haue no resort for feare of infection: but much lamented the number of his people, for in some one towne halfe the people died, and in some other towne the third part, the sweat was so feruent and infectious. [By the extreme thereof, and the multitudes with such suddennesse and present mortallitie drooping auaie: it should seme that they little remembered, or at least, little neglected the preservative remedie used in the first great sweating sicknesse in king Henrie the seuenths time, whereby as then manie a mans life was saued, so now the like benefit (by applieng of the same wholesome meanes) might haue rebounded to the patients.]

In the beginning of this yeare, Trinitie tearme was begun at Drenford, where it continued but one daie, and was againe adourned to Westminster. This yeare came to Calis from pope Leo, a legat De latere, called Laurence Campesius borne in Salogno lague la Gresse, commonlie called cardinal Campeius, to require the king of aid against the Turke. At the request of the king of England, and also of the French king (which sought now to be received into friendship with the king of England) the cardinal Wolsey meanes) pope Leo constituted the said cardinal Wolsey his legat in England, joining him in commission with the said Campeius, the which said at Calis untill the bulles were brought from Rome touching that matter. There was also an other cause that said Campeius at Calis, & that was a sute which cardinal Wolsey had moved for the obtaining of the bishopricke of Bath, which benefice cardinal Adrian Castellan intoid by the collation of king Henrie the seventh.

This cardinal Adrian being fallen in the popes displeasure, withdrew out of the court of Rome into Venice: and in the meane time cardinal Campeius, at the instance of cardinal Wolsey, wrote to the pope, that cardinal Adrian might be deprived of that bishopricke, to the end that cardinal Wolsey might have the same. Which request was accomplished, and the bulles sent unto Calis; so that then cardinal Campeius, after he had remained at Calis three monthes, came over into England, and was received with all pompe & honour that might be desired. Inasmuch that cardinal Wolsey had sent to the legat (whilest he late at Calis) red cloth to cloath his servants, which at their coming to Calis were but meanelie appareled. And when all things were ready, he passed the sea and landed at Dover; and so kept forth his iourneie toward London.

At euery towne as they passed, he was receiued with procession, and accompanied with all the lords & gentlemen of Kent. And when he came to Blackheath, there met him the duke of Norfolk, with a great number of prelates, knights, & gentlemen, all richly appareled. And in the waie he was brought into a rich tent of cloath of gold, where he shifted himselfe into the robe of a cardinal, edged with ermines; and so toke his mule riding towards London. The night before he came to London, the cardinal of Poike, to furnish the carriages of the cardinal Campeius, sent to him twelue mulets with emptie coffers covered with red: which twelue mulets were led thorough London amongst the mulets of Campeius, which were but eight; and so these twentie mulets passed thorough the streets, as though they had bene full of treasures, apparell, & other necessities.

Now when they came into Cheape, one of the mulets brake from his keeper, and ouerthrew the chests, and ouerturned two or three other mulets carriages, which fell with such a violence, that diuerse of them vnlocked; & out of some fell old hosen, broken shoes, and roasted flesh, peeces of bread, egges, and much vile baggage. At which sight the boies cried; See, see my lord legats treasure: and so the muletters were ashamed, and toke vp all their stuffe and passed forth. About three of the clocke in the after none on the twentieth day of Iulie the said legat entered the cite, and in Southwicke met him all the clergie of London, with crosses, censours, and copes, and censed him with great reuerence. The mayo; and aldermen, with all the occupations of the cite in their best liveries stood in the streets, and him highlie honoured: to whom sir Thomas More made a braue oration in the name of the cite.

Now when he came to Paules, there he was receiued with bishops mitred, and under a canopie entered the church: which canopie his servants toke for their fees. And when he had offered, he gaue his benediction to all the people, & toke againe his mule, & so with all his traine aforesaid was conueied to Bath place, and there rested: where he was welcommed of cardinal of Poike. On sundate next ensuing, these two cardinals as legats toke their barges, & came to Greenwich, each of them had besides their crosses two pillars of silver, two little axes gilt, and two cloake-bags embroidered, & the cardinals hats borne before them. And when they came to the kings hall, the cardinal of Poike went on the right hand: and there the king roiallie appareled and accompanied, met them euen as though both had come from Rome and so brought them both vp into his chamber of presence.

Then a solemne oration was made by an Italian, declaring the cause of the legacie to be in two articles, one for aid against Gods enemies, and the second for reformation of the clergie. And when masse was done, they were had to a chamber, and serued of lordes and knights, with much solemnitie: and after dinner they toke their leaue of the king, and came to London, and rode through the cite together, in great pompe and glorie to their lodgings. This cardinal Campeius for his friendship shewed in helping the cardinal of England to the bishopricke of Bath, was considered (besides other great rewards) with the bishopricke of Salisbury, the profits whereof he receiued, untill the act was established, that no forrenner should inioine any spirituall benefice within this realme. But for the chiefest errand that this cardinal Campeius came, he could haue no toward answer: which was (as you haue heard) to haue leauiued a summe of monie by waie of tenths in this realme, to the maintenance of the warre in defense of the christen confines against the Turke.

There were at the same time other legats sent into other parts of Christendome about the same matter, as into France, Spaine, and Germanie. For pope Leo calling to remembrance, that the feare conceived of the Turkes had brought no small gainnes to diuerse of his predecessours, he began to feare too. But for that such feare was now too well knowne to be used as an ordinarie shift of the popes, when they stood in need of monie, this practise was at this time vied in vaine; so that Campeius hearing that it toke not place in other parties, left off his earnest sute about it, and with great rewards receiued of the king and cardinal, returned to Rome, not without hope yet (by reason of promises made unto him by his friends) that the popes request might hereafter be granted, according to his motion. There attended him to Rome one John Clarke a lawier, as ambassador from the king.

This man obtained for the cardinal, authoritie to dispense with all men for offenses committed against the spirituall lawes, which part of his power legantine was verie profitable and gainefull. For then he set vp a court, and called it the court of the legat: in the which he proued testaments, and heard causes, to the great hinderance of all the bishops of this realme. He visited bishops, and all the cleargie exempt and not exempt, and under colour of reformation he got much treasure. For thorough bribes & rewards, notorious offences were dispensed with, so that nothing was reformed, but came to more mischief. The example of his pride, caused prelates and all spirituall persons to wax so proud, that they raised it out in velvet and silks, which they wore both in gounes, sackets, doublets, and shoes. They vied open lecherie, and bare themselves so stout by reason of his authorities and faculties, that no man durst reprove any thing in them. So that we see here verified in proufe how forcible the examples of great men be in the inferiour sort; as the wise man truelie saith; accidents, it were good to heare a full discourse, for the exact vnderstanding of the popes affaires, whereabouts he addrested so manie cardinals into so manie parts of chrisendome, as solicitors to obtaine succour against the Turke. ¶ Now followeth (saith mine authoꝝ) the yeare 1518, in which the regions of Italia, contrarie to the precedent of manie yeares before, felt not the least impression or motion of war, yea there appeared the selfe same disposition in all other princes of chrisendome, betwene whome by the operation of the pope, though happilie more with faire reason, than with substantiall counsels, was solicited an vniuersall expedition of all chrisendome against the pride of Selim prince of the Turkes.

This man the yeare before, had so enlarged and extended his greatnesse, that comparing with his power, his ambition to be greater, pushed on with manie helpes of nature, it was twofolde to be doubted, that if he were not prevented by the inuasions of the christians, he would in his pride lift vp his victorious hands against them. ¶ For Selim discerning that Baseth his father, reduced to extreme old age, sought to establish the succession of the empire in the person of Acomath his elder brother, drew into rebellion against him, and by force of armes, concurring the corruption of the souldiours of his gard, constrained him to resigne vp to him the authoritie of the gouernment: and not suffering his ambition to staie there, it was belueued of all men, that for his more absolute assurance he took awaie his life by poison: and afterwards giving an overthrow to his brother in an incounter of a battell, he confirmed fullie the seat of his empire, by depriving him of his life in publike shew, exercising the like rage of crueltie vpon Cocu the yongest brother of all. And being not satisfied according to the tyrannie of the house of Dromanni, with the blood and slaughter of all his nephues, or anie others that remained of that line and stocke, he was in thought oftentimes (by the rage and furie of his disposition) to take awaie the life of Soliman his onclie sonne.

¶ Of these beginnings breeding one warre vpon another, after he had subdued the Aduliti, a people of the mountaines, he passed ouer into Persia against the Sophi, to whome he gaue battell and overthrow him, and in that felicitie of warre he took the citie of Tauris the soueraine seat of that estate, together with the greatest part of Persia which he was constrained to abandon, not through the valour of his enemies, who for their disability to support their army were retired into the mounteins and places desert, but for the vniuersall dearth and barrennesse of that yeare, he fell into an extreme want of vittels: he returned some after this expedition to Constantinople, where after he had done execution vpon certeine souldiers seditious, and for certeine moneths had refreshed his armie, he gaue out that he would eisonsa returne to make warres vpon Persia. But indeed he turned his forces against the Soldan king of Sozia and Aegypt, a prince not onclie of most ancient reuerence and dignitie for that religion; but most mightie for the amplitude of dominion, most rich in tributes, and verie glorious by the discipline of the Hammelukes, of whose armes and forces that state was possessed with great reputation thre hundred yeares.

¶ For that empire, being ruled of the Soldans, they not by succession but by election ascended to it, and to the supreme seat of gouernement were not preferred but men of manifest vertue, and confirmed by all the degrees of warre, in the administration of prouinces and armies, and also the sinewes and strengthes of their forces stood not vpon souldiours mercenarie and forreine, but of men elected, who taken of children in the prouinces adjoining, and trained by by succession of yeares in hardnesse of face, in suffering of labour and toile, and in the exercise of armes and all customes appertaining to the discipline and law of warre, they ascribed and intolled them in the order of the Hammelukes. There succeeded from hand to hand in this order, not the sons of the Hammelukes that were dead, but others, who being taken of children for slaues, had their rising by the same discipline, and by the same industrie and artes, by the which their predecessours had passed from hand to hand.

These not being in number aboute seuentene or eightene thousand, held subiected vnder a most heauie yoke, all the people of Aegypt and Sozia, whom they spoiled of the vse of all armes, and practised to manage horses: yea such was their fiercenesse and valour, that oftentimes they made warre of themselves, for that of their numbers and by their election were chosen the Soldans, and in their power refused all authoritie to distribute the honours, offices, and profits of that most rich empire. By the oportunitie of which, hauing subdued manie nations adjoining, and reduced to obedience the Arabians, and maintained manie warres with the Turkes, they were manie times victorious, but verie seldeome or neuer vanquished of others. Against these people did Selim conuert his forces, whome he overthrow in manie battels fought in plaine field, wherein was slaine the Soldan, and afterwards in another battell was taken prisoner the other Soldan his successor, whome he caused to be publike murdered with an vntwoythe kind of torment. Thus hauing satisfied his bloudie humour with such great slaughters, and also wasted the name of the Hammelukes, he proceeded to the inuasion of Cairo a most populous citie, wherein were resident the Soldans, and in short time subdued vnder his iurisdiction all Sozia and Aegypt.

These drew vnto him so great an increase of imperie, such amplification of tribute and reueneue, and removing the impediments of so mightie enemies, and of so great reputation, that with great reason he was to be feared of the christians. A feare which took his degrees of increasing by his consideration, that to so great a power and valour was joined a settled impression of ambition to beare rule, & by manie victories, to make glorious his name to all posterities: wherein reading oftentimes the legends and actions of the great Alexander, and Julius Cesar, he seemed to suffer griefe and perplexitie of mind, that his actions & exploits of warre could in no wise hold comparison with so manie great triumphs and victories. In which humour, returning continuallie his armies, and building of new a great number of ships, and leuising all prouisions necessarie for the warre, it was feared when his preparations were accomplished, that he would inuade Rhodes, the bulwke of the christians in the east parts, or else the kingdome of Hungaria, made fearefull by the valour of the inhabitants: to the nation of the Turkes, which at that time was in division amongst themselves, and made weak by the minority of their king, who was gouerned by the priests and barons of the realme.

Others were of opinion, that he had addrested all his thoughts to the inuasion of Italia, taking his encouragement vpon the discord of the potentates and naturall princes, whome he knew to be much shaken with the long warres of those regions. To this was joined the memorie of Spahomet his grandfather, who with a power farre lesse than his, and with a small naue sent vpon the coasts of the realme of Naples, had wonne by assault the citie of Dronto: and (sauiug he was prevented by death) had both opened opened the way, and established the meane to persecute the regions of Italie with continuall devastations: so that the pope together with the whole court of Rome being made astonished with so great success, and no lesse proud to eschew so great a danger, making their first recourse vnto the aid and succour of God, caused to be celebrated through Rome most devout inuocations, which he did assist in presence bare-footed.

And afterwards calling vpon the helpe of moir, he wrote letters to all christian princes, both admonishing them of the perill, and perswading them to lay asid all ciuill discords and contentions; and attend speedilie to the defense of religion & their common safetie, which he affirmed would moze and moze take increase of most grievous danger, if with the unitie of minds, and concordances of forces, they sought not to transference the warre into the empire of the Turke, & invade the entrie in his owne countrie. Upon this aduise and admonition, was taken the examination and opinion of men of warre, and persons skillfull in the discouerie of countries, the disposing of prouinces, and of the nature and vsage of the forces and weapons of that kingdome, and thereupon a resolution was set downe to make great levies of monie by voluntarie contributions of princes, and vniuersall imposts of all people of christendome.

It was thought necessarie that Cesar accompanied with the horsemen of Hungaria and Polonia, nations warlike, and practised in continuall warre against the Turke, and also with the footmen of Germanie, should saile along Danubi into Bosna called ancientlie Bissa, and from thence to Thracia, and so to drave neare Constantinople, the seat of the empire of Ottomans: that the French king with all the forces of his kingdome, the Venetians, and the other potentates of Italie, accompanied with the infanterie of Switzerland, should passe from the port of Spidiss in Albania, a passage verie easie & short, to invade Greece, a countrie full of christian inhabitants, and for the intollerable yoke of the Turkes, most readie to rebell: that the kings of Spaine, of England, and Portugall, assembling their forces together in Cartagena, and the ports thereabouts, should take their course with two hundred ships full of Spanishe footmen and other souldiers, to the streit of Calipoli, to make rodes vp to Constantinople having first of all subdued the castles and forts standing vpon the mouth of the streit: and the pope to take the same course, imbarcking at Ancona, with an hundred ships armed.

With these preparations, seeming sufficient to couer the land, and ouerspread the sea, it was thought that of a warre so full of deuotion and pietie, there could not be but hoped a happie end, speciallie adding the inuocation of God, and so manie feuerall inuasions made at one time against the Turkes, who make their principall foundation of defense, to fight in the plaine field. These matters were solicited with no small industrie, and to stop all matter of imputation against the office of the pope, the minds of princes were throughlie founded, and an vniuersall truce for fure yeares betwene all the princes of christendome, published in the consistorie, vpon paine of most grievous censure to such as should impugne it. So that the negociation continuing for all things appertaining to so great an enterprise, he assigned ambassadours to all princes: to the emperor he sent the cardinall S. Sisso, to the French king he dispatched the cardinall of S. Maria in Portico, the cardinall Siles to the king of Spaine, and the cardinall Campeius to the king of England.

ente in affaires, or for opinion of their doctrine, or for their familiaritie with the pope. All which things albeit they were begun with great hope and expectation, and the vniuersall truce accepted of all men, and all men with no little ostentation and buzzerie of words, made shew of their readinesse with their forces to aduance so good a cause: yet, what with the consideration of the perill esteemed vncertaine and farre off, and extending more to one prince than to another, and what by the difficulties and long tract of time that appeared, to introduce a zeale and vnion so vniuersall, priuat interests and respects particular seemed to preuaile moze, than the pietie of the expectation: insomuch that the negociation stood not one lie naked of all hope and issue, but also it was followed verie lightlie, and as it were by ceremonie.

This being one propertie in the nature of men, that those things which in their beginnings appeare fearefull, do daillie take such degrees of diminution and vanishing, that vnles the first feares be reniued by new accidents, they lead men in proceesse of time to securitie. Which propertie of negligence, both touching the affaires publike, and affection of priuate and particular men was well confirmed by the death that succeeded not long after to Selim, who, having by a long maladie suspended the preparations of the warre, was in the end consumed by the passions of his disease, and so passed into the other life, leauing so great an empire to Soliman his sonne, young in yeares, and iudged to beare a wit and mind not so disposed to the warres, although afterwards the effects declared the contrarie.

At this time appeared betwene the pope and the French king a most great and strict contention: for the king gaue to hise to Laurence his nephew, the ladie Spagdaen noble descended of the blood and house of Bullognie, with a yearelie reuenue of ten thousand crownes, whereof part was of the kings gift, and the residue rising of his owne patrimonie. Besides, the king hauing borne to him a sonne, the pope required that in his baptism, he would impose vpon him his name. By which occasion Laurence making preparations to go to marrie his new wife, for his moze speed, performed his iourne by post into France, where he was receiued with manie amities and much honour of the king, to whome he became verie gracious and of deare account, the rather for that (besides other generall respects) he made a dedication of himselfe whole to the king, with promise to follow in all accidents, his fortune.

And now to returne to cardinall Wolle, who grew so into exceeding pride, that he thought himselfe equall with the king. For when he said masse (which he did oftener to shew his pompe, rather than for anie deuotion) he made dukes and earles to serue him of wine, with a lay taken, and to hold to him the bason at the lauatorie. Thus was the pride of the cardinall and other priests so past the compasse of reason, that in maner all good persons abhorred and disdained it (as altogether degenerating from the example of Christ & his poore traine, of whome in name and title they seemed to be professors, but of their manners and trade of life open defiers; yea in such manifest sort, both in apparell and diet, as also in all other respects, that few there were (if they perceived anie thing by discretion) but saw the euident abuses of their behaviours, tending greatlie to the dishonour of the place which they possessed, as also to the no small offense of the modest sort of the cleargie, whereof some did so well like of this ruffling and masking presbyterie, that they abhorred it as strong poison in their bosome.)

It fortuned that the archbishop of Canterburie wrote to the cardinall, anon after that he had receiued ued his power legantine, the which letter after his old familiar manner he subscribed thus: Pour luy the William of Canturburie. With which subscription, because the archbishop wrote him brother, he was so much offended, as though the archbishop had done him great iniurie, that he could not temper his mood, but in high displeasure said, that he would so worke within a while, that he should well understand how he was his superiour, and not his brother. When the archbishop (being a sober wise man) heard of the messenger that bare the letter, how the cardinal tooke it not well, but so as it might seeme there was a great fault in the letter, and reported the tale as one that disliked the cardinals presumption herein: Peace (said the archbishop) knowest thou not how the cardinal forgetting to hold the right path of true laud and praise, sought to be feared rather than be-

In this meane time the French king greatlie con-must make waie thereunto thorough the cardinals that the cardinall, as one tickled with vaine-glorie more than can be imagined, thought that he could and there amiable received the ambassadours of France. The yong gallants of France had coats garded with one colour, cut in ten or twelue parts verie richlie to behold: and so all the Englishmen ac-coupled themselves with the Frenchmen longinglie together, and so rood to London. After the two ad-meralls followed foure and twentie of the French kings gard, accompanied with foure and twentie of the English gard. And after them a great number of archers, to the number of foure hundred. And in this order they passed thorough the citie to tailors hall, and there the chiefe ambassadours were lodged, and the remnant in merchants houses about.

ambassadors

court.

When these lords were in their lodgings, then the French harder men opened their wares, & made the tailors hall like the paund of a mart. At this doing manie an Englishman grudged, but it auailed not. The last daie of September, the French ambas-sadoys toke their barge, and came to Greenwich.
The admerall was in a gowne of cloath of silver calsed, furred with rich fables; and all his companie almost were in a new fashioned garment, called a the-new, which was in effect a gowne cut in the middle.

The gentlemen of France were brought into the kings presence, where the bishop of Paris made a solemne oration; which being ended, & answer made thereto, the king highlie intertained the admerall and his companie, and so did all the English lords and gentlemen.

The ambassadours after this were daillie in coun-cell, till at length an agreement was concluded, under pretense of a marriage to be had betwene the Dolphin of France, and the ladie Marie, daughter to the king of England: in name of whose marriage monie, Roanue should be delivered unto the French king, he paying to the king of England for the castle which he had made in that citie, five hundred thousand crownes, to be paid in twelue yeares space, that is to saie, fiftie thousand euerie yeare during that terme. And if the marriage chanced not to take effect, then should Roanue be againe restored to the king of England. For performance of which article, hostages should be delivered, that is to wit, monsieur de Montmorencie, monsieur de Montpesac, monsieur de Hople, monsieur de Poyret. Where-after the French king should paie to the lord cardinall of England a thousand marks of yearelie pension, in recompense of his revenues before time received of the bishopricke of Roanue: and likewise to other of the kings counsell he should also giue certaine summes of monie as yearelie pensions, in like maner as his ancestors had done to the counsellors of the kings of England before time.

The French is agreed to call backe the duke of Al-banie out of Scotland, that the suertie of Ia. James might the better be provided for, and lesse occasion of trouble ministred to the king of England. And further the French king was contented that the said king James should be received as a confederat in this peace. When all things were concluded, the king and the ambassadours rood to the cathedrall church of saint Paule in London from Durham place, where the cardinall of England sang the masse in most pompous maner: and after that masse was ended, doctor Pace the kings secretaire made an eloquent oration in praise of peace: and that done, the king and his nobles with the ambassadours went to the bishops palace, and there dined, and after dinner, the king rode againe to Durham place. That night the cardinall of Poike made to the ambassa-dours a solemne banquet, and them accompanied manie lords and ladies of England. And when the ban-ket was done, in came six minstrels, richlie disguised, and after them followed three gentlemen in wise and long gownes of crimsin sattin, euerie one hauing a cup of gold in their hands.

The first cup was full of angels and roials, the second had diuerse bales of dice, and the thir had certaine paires of cards. These gentlemen offered to plaie at mumchance, and when they had plaied the length of the first bowd, then the minstrels blew up, and then entered into the chamber certaine ladies disguised, on whose attended twelue knights disguised bearing torches. All these thirtie & six persons were in one sute of fine greene sattin, all covered ouer with cloth of gold, under tied together with laces of gold, and masking hoods on their heads: the ladies had tiers made of bzards of damaske gold with long haire of white gold. All these maskers danced at one time, and after they had danced, they put off their visors, and so were they all knowne. The admerall and lords of France hartilie thanked the king, that it pleased him to visit them with such disposit. When the king & his companie were banketed, and had high chere: and so they departed euerie man to his lodging.

15. Reg. 10.

gang. The eight of October at Grēnewich, was long a solemn masse by the bishop of Durham, and after masse, docto: Wunstall, maister of the rolles, made an eloquent proposition in praise of the matri-monie to be had betwixt the Dolphin and the ladie Marie. All that daie were the strangers feasted, and at night they were brought into the hall, where was a rocke full of all manner of stones, verie artificiallie made, and on the top stood five trees, the first an olive tree, on which hanged a shield of the armes of the church of Rome; the second a pincapple tree, with the armes of the emperor; the third a roffier, with the armes of England; the fourth a branch of lillies, bearing the armes of France; and the fift a pomegranat tree, bearing the armes of Spaine: in token that all these five potentates were ioined together in one league against the enemies of Chyfties faith.

In and vpon the middelt of the rocke sat a faire ladie, rightie apparelled with a dolphin in hir lap. In this rocke were ladies and gentlemen apparelled in crimfin sattin, covered ouer with floures of purple sattin, embroidered vpon with wythes of gold, knit together with golden laces, and on euerie floure a hart of gold mowing. The ladies apparell was after the fashion of Inde, with herchifes of pleasance, hatched with fine gold, and set with letters of Græke in gold of brillon; and the edges of their herchifes were garnished with hanging perle. These gentlemen and ladies sat on the neiber part of the rocke, and out of a cane in the said rocke came ten knights, armed at all points, and fought together a faire tournie. And when they were senered and departed, the disguisours descended from the rocke, and dancd a great space: and suddentlie the rocke moued and receiued the dis-guisours, and immediatlie closed againe.

Then entered a person called Xepoit, apparelled in crimfin sattin full of fonges, sitting on a sieng hofste with wings and feet of gold called Pegasus. This person in French declared the meaning of the rocke, the trees, and the tournie. After this pastime ended, the king and the ambassadours were serued at a banquet with two hundred and firtie dishes, and after that a bodice of spices with firtie spice plates of siluer and gilt, as great as men with ease might beare.
 This night the cupbord in the hall was of twelue stages all of plate of gold, and no gilt plate. When that euerie man had bene plentiouslie serued, the tables were taken vp, and the king with the quene and all the strangers departed to their lodgings.

After diuerse iusts & feasts made for the said ambassadours by the king and lords: sir Thomas Cr-new maior of London made to them a coslie dinner at Goldsmiths hall, which dinner they highlie praised, it was so well ordered. And when the time came, they took their leaue of the king, the quene, and the kings counsell, and deliuered into the kings possession their foure hostages (as you haue heard before.) At which departing the king gaue to the admerall of France a garment of gilt vessel, a paire of co-uered basens gilt, twelue great gilt boles, foure paire of great gilt pots, a standing cup of gold, garnished with great pearles: and to some other also, he gaue plate, to some chains of gold, to some rich apparell, and to some great hosties with rich bards, so that euerie gentleman was well rewarded; which liberalitie the strangers much praised: and after that all their trus-les were readie they departed towards the sea, and took ship and linded at Bullogne.]

Shortlie after their departure, the earle of Worcester, lord chamberleine, the bishop of Elie, the lord of saint Johns, sir Nicholas Laue, sir John De-chie, sir Thomas Sullen, as ambassadours from the king of England, accompanied with thre score and ten knights, gentlemen and peomen, to the number of foure hundred and aboue, passed the sea to Ca-lis, and so from thence went to Paris, where they were noble receiued, & being brought to the French kings presence, the bishop of Elie made a solenne oration touching the mariage and peace concluded.

 And interteine the English ambassadours and gentlemen; the French king had made a banketting house in the bastill of Paris betwene foure old walles. This house was covered with cords streined by craft, and euerie cord was wound about with bar, and so laid crossewise one ouer an other in fret, and at the meetings a great knop gilt with gold foile. Ouer their cords was streined wollen cloaths of light blew: this rose was foure score foot high, and on e-uerie side thre stages high: all the pillars of the stages were covered with antike works, & the bræs of the stages curiously wrought with armes, vniets, and branches: the rose was set full of starres gilt & furnished with glasses betwene the frets. In this house was two hundred and twelue branches gilt hanged, & on euerie branch a great number of lights of white war.

Diuerse sorts of maskes were shewed also that night: and at euerie side of the palace a great cupbord of masse plate of much greatnesse was set, the French king welcomming the lords and ambas-sadours with good countenance. ] Here is to be re-membred, that immediatlie after the conclusion of the mariage, a rumor was raised, that the Dolphin was dead before, and that this marriage was but a colourable pretext, deuised of the Frenchmen for a policie to come by their purpose: and therefore, after that the English ambassadours had bene feasted and interteined with banketting and princelie pastime, the bishop of Elie, with sir Thomas Sullen, and sir Richard Weston, were appointed to go vnto Comaiche to see the Dolphin, where they were honorable receiued, and brought vnto the presence of the Dolphin, being a goodlie young child, whome they kissed and embraced in most louing wise.

The earle of Worcester, and with him sir Nicholas Laue, sir John Dechie, sir Edward Belknap, and diuerse others at the same time, took leaue of the French king, and rode to Comaiche to see the citie deliuered to the Frenchmen. Wherevpon, the eight of Februarie, the lord Chatillon came thither with one and twentie hundred men; and after some con-trouersie moued about the deliuerie of his commission, and sealing an indenture, which the earle had there readie ingrossed, containing the articles of a agreement, in consideration whereof it was deliue-red, the capteine sir Richard Feringham was discharged, and the Frenchmen suffered to enter with drummers and minstrells, but not with standards nor banners, which the Englishmen caused them to roll vp greatlie against their wils. Before they came to the gates, they sealed the indenture, confessing how they receiued the citie as a gift, and not as a right, and deliuered their commission, whereby they were authorized to receive it, which at the first they refused to do, affirming that it was sufficient for them to shew it.

Thus was Comaiche deliuered in this tenth yeare of the kings reigne, on the eight daie of Februarie, & the Englishmen returned into England, soe displeased in their minds, for thereby manie a tall peo-man lacked liuing, the which would not labour after their returne, but fell to robbing, pilfering, thieving, and other extraordinarie meanes of maintenance, whereas before they were staied vpon a certaintie of hope, so long as they had allowance by the king. So that this resignation of Comaiche, though it were answerable to the desire of the French king, and commodious for his people, yet that benefit of theirs byed fol. lxvii.

The light and mildedde-meanour of diuerse yong gentlemen of England & the French king.

During this time remained in the French court diuerse yong gentlemen of England, and they with the French king rode daile disguised through Paris, throwing egges, stones, and other foolish trifles at the people, which light demeanour of a king was much discommended and leasted at. And when these yong gentlemen came againe into England, they were all French, in eating, drinking, and apparell, yea, and in French vices and brags, so that all the estates of England were by them laughed at: the ladies and gentlewomen were dispraised, so that nothing by them was praised, but if it were after the French turne, which after turned them to displeasure, as you shall heare.

After the kings ambassadours were returned, and Tournai deliuered to the Frenchmen vpon the conditions aforesaid, the hostages that were here left for the payment of the great summes and performance of the conditions compassed in the league (of the which one was, that if the marriage toke none effect, then the citie of Tournai should be redeliuered vpon repayment of the same summes) the said hostages knew not in what case they stood, but when they knew it, they were verie heauie and sorrowfull: howbeit, they dissembled the matter in the best wise they could. The king vsed familiarlie these foure hostages, and on the seventh daie of Maie prepared a disguised, and caused his great chamber at Greenwich to be staged, and great lights to be set on pilloes that were gilt, with basons gilt, and the roose was couered with blue satten set full of presses of fine gold and flowers: and vnder was written loumes, the meaning whereof was, that the flower of youth could not be oppressed.

for solenne disposit.

A comedie of Plautus plaid before
the king.

Into this chamber came the king, and the quene, with the hostages, and there was a goodlie comedie of Plautus plaid; and that done, there entered into the chamber eight ladies in blacke veluet bordered about with gold, with hoes from the waist downeward, and sleeves ruffed and plited at the elbow, and plaine in the middell, full of cuts, plucked out at euerie cut with fine camerike, & tired like the Egyptians verie richlie. And when these ladies had passed about the place, in came eight noble personages in long gownes of taffata set with flowers of gold bullion, and vnder that apparell cotes of blacke veluet embroidered with gold all to cut, and plucked out with cuts of white sarcenet, and euerie man had buskins of blacke veluet full of agglets of gold.

Then the eight men danced with the eight ladies all being disguised, and suddentlie the men cast off their large gownes, and then their vnder apparell was seene. And when all was done, euerie lord and ladie put off their visards, and then it was knowne that the king, the duke of Suffolke, and the French quene were there, which were present at the plaitime. On the eight daie of March was a solenne iustices, the king himselfe, and eight yong gentlemen bared and barbed in blacke veluet embroidered with gold: against the duke of Suffolke, and eight of his band, all in white satten with drops of gold. And that daie they all ran exceeding well, which the strangers highly commended.

Justices.

About the end of March, the king sent for all the yeomen of the gard that were come from Tournai, and after manie good words giuen to them, he granted to euerie of them foure pence the daie without attendance, except they were speciallie commanded.

And here it seemeth requisite to adde the report of a forreine chronicler touching the league of amitie and conditions of the same, knit by in vnicitie and good tearmes as followeth. Now (saith he) the differences betwene the French and English were also reconciled. And for the more stabilitie of which agreement, it was confirmed with a contract of parentage and alliance, wherein the king of England promised to giue his onelie daughter, to whome hauing no sons, there was hope of the descending & succession of the kingdom to the Dolphin the eldest sonne of the crowne of France, adding for a portion foure hundred thousand duckets. Both the one and the other bore yet so tender age, that infinit accidents might happen, before perfection of yeeres would make them able to establish matrimonie. There was made betwene them a league defensiu, wherein were comprehended Cesar, and the king of Spaine, in case they would ratifie it in a certeine time.

The king of England bound himselfe to restore Tournai, receiuing presentlie for detraiments expended vpon that towne, two hundred and threescore thousand duckets, and three hundred thousand to be defalked of the portion, and to paie three hundred thousand more in the space of twelue yeares. The French king also was bound, that if the peace and the parentage folowed not, to render by againe into the hands of the English, the towne of Tournai. Manie ambassadours were sent from both the realmes to negotiate this league, and to receiue the ratifications and othes, by whome in the courts of both the kings the acts of the accord were dispatched with great solemnitie and ceremonie, with a resolution of an interueto of both the kings betwene Calis and Boulongne, immediatlie after the restitution of Tournai.

About the same time, the daughter of the French king, appointed to be married to the king of Spaine, being dead, the former peace and capitulation was effronces reconfirmed betwene them, wherein was promised the marriage of the second daughter of France. Both the kings celebrated this conuention with most great demonstrations of perfect amitie: for the king of Spaine, hauing paid in at Lyons an hundred thousand duckets, ware publickly the order of saint Michael vpon the day of the celebration of the same, and in recompense of that honour: the French king, vpon the daie dedicated to saint Andrew, was honozable attired in the robes and colour of the golden fleece.

About this time, John Ja. Crinulce, whome neither old age reduced almost to the last time, nor his vertue so oftentimes expressed in the service of the fruce of France could anie waie aid or comfort (being both ambitious and impatient, and therefore enuied) following the French court, fell sicke at Charters, where he gaue vp to the king, his innocencie and complaints, and made to God the last reckoning of his aged daies. He was a man in the indgement of manie, and confirmed by sundrie experiences, of singular valour in the discipline of warre, and ran a race alwaies opposed to the inconstancie of fortune, who (according to his mutabilitie) made him feele the operation of both his humors, sometimes reioicing in his fauour, and erst againe finding his sorow and of a bitter fall. By his commandement were written vpon his tome these words, not disagreeable to the variable condition and course of his naturall life:

I find the rest within my graue,
Which in my life I could not haue.]

15. Reg. 11.

The French king in hope to be emperor as well as the Spaniard.

In this yeare the twelue of February, died the emperor Sparmilian, for whome the king caused a solemn obsequie to be kept in Poules church. ¶ He died at Lutz, a towne upon the marches of Austria, where he remained for his delight and pleasure in hunting the wild boze, and other chases of the field. He lived allwaies under one condition of fortune, who manie times fauoured him, in offering him manie faire occasions, & as often wrought against him in not suffering him to take the fruit and effect of them. He was by nature inconstant and remouable, and had conceits and impressions verie ill disposed and different from the iudgement of other men, joined to an excessive prodigalitie and dissipation of monie.

¶ Matters which cut off from him the effects and successe of all occasions, being otherwise a prince most perfect and instructed in the ordering of warre, secret to late and dispose a plot, diligent to follow it, of bodie able and suffering, of mind affable and easie, and replenished with manie other excellent gifts and ornaments. ¶ Into some of these properties, the god service which he did the king of England at Terwin giueth proofe, at what time both he and his people marched vnder the English ensigne, and receiued paie as stipendarie souldiours; whose wages the king had a care to paie, as maie appeare by his coining of silver monie, whereof was scarstie in his campe, in respect of gold, wherewith the souldiours were well stored, as one doth verie well make report, saieing:

Pro mercede nihil nisi fuluum soluitur aurum, Auri militibus radiantis copia totis Tanta fuit castris, ut rex cudiisse coactus Nummum ex argento fuerit.

The French king in hope to be emperor as well as the Spaniard.

¶ As soon as the emperor was dead, the French king and the king of Spaine began manifestlie to aspire to the empire, the purchase whereof albeit was a matter of right great importance, and no lesse the emulation running betwene two so mightie princes, yet they ordered their ambition with great modestie, neither vsing words of iniurie, nor threats of armes; but either one labouring by his authoritie, & by his meanes, to draw on his side the electors. The French king sundrie times reasoned touching the election with great comelinesse with the Spaniard ambassadours, to whom he said it was a matter both agreeable and conuenient, that either of them seueralie should seeke by honest meanes to increase the honour of his house by so great a dignitie: which for that in times before had bene transferred into the families of their predecessours, there was now the lesse occasion to breed betwene them two matter of iniurie, nor diminution of their amitie and good will.

¶ But rather he wished, that in the action of the empire, they might follow the example and order of two young louers, who albeit they follow the quest of one ladie, and either one labourer by his industrie to carie hir; yet they forbere to come to contention. The king of Spaine alluded with good right, that the empire appertained to him, as hauing continued by a long succession of time in the house of Austria, and that it had not bene the custome of the electors to depriue the issue of the emperor, without manifest cause of their disability, neither was there anie in Germanie of that puissance and authoritie to make him equall to stand competitor with him in that election. And least of all did he hold it iust or like, that the electors would transport to a forreine or strange prince, so great a dignitie continued by so manie ages in the nation of Germanie.

red in time conuenient, not doubting also but the other electors also would oppose against him, and the princes and free townes of Germanie would not endure so vnfortunall an infamie, speciallie to suffer it to be laid upon the person of the French king, which would be no other thing than to make great the puissance of a king enemie vnto their nation, and from whence there was no libertie that the imperiall dignitie would ever returne into Germanie: he thought it would be an action easie to obtaine and reduce to perfection, that which had bin solicited by his grandfather, who had already compounded for recompenses and donations, and other diuidents for euerie of the electors.

¶ On the other side, the desire of the French king was as great, and no lesse were his hopes, which took their principall foundation upon an opinion he had to corrupt the voices of the electors with his huge summes of monie: especiallie for that there were amongest them both pensionaries to him, and otherwise assured by manie good offices, who encouraging him with the facilitie of the enterprise, pushed him on to embrace it. And for his part, as mostall men are apt to beleue the thing they desire, so he nourished that hope with reasons rather apparant than true: he knew that commonlie it was a matter grievous to the princes of Germanie to haue the emperors mightie; being gealous that in so great a puissance, they would not either in part or in all, quarrell the iurisdiction and authorities imperiall occupied by manie of them. In which reason he perswaded himselfe, that they would in no sort consent to the election of the Spaniard, & so of themselves to subiect themselves to an emperor more mightie than had bene since a long descent and race of emperors. A matter which in his person seemed to be qualified, for that hauing neither estates nor ancient alliances in Germanie, they had no occasion of suspicion of his greatness.

¶ The same reason also made him beleue well of the conuinitie of the free townes, in whom much lesse that the regard of the glozie of the nation would carie it from him, seeing it would helpe to peize the ballance on his side, for that with most men the motions of proper and priuate interest maie doe more, than the respect of publike and generall profit. He knewe it was not a little grievous to manie noble houses of Germanie, pretending to be capable of such a dignitie, to see the empire continue so long time in one house; but much more did it discontent them to suffer that so great an estate, which of right ought sometimes to be giuen to one of them, and sometime to passe to another, should become a perpetuall descent and succession in one line: insonmuch as they might call inheritance and succession that election, which durst not leaue the line of the emperors. That in that sort the empire was translated from Albert de Austria to Frederike his brother, and from Frederike to Sparmilian his sonne; and now there was deuise to passe it from Sparmilian to the person of Charles his grandchild.

¶ By these humors and indignations of the princes of Germanie, he took hope that the discords and gealousies among themselves might helpe on his cause, the rather for that it often happeneth in the contentions of men, that he that is excluded, or the partie to whom he fauoureth, runneth with a naturall rashnesse rather to call in, and to aduance a third, than to giue place to him that hath opposed against his intention. ¶ Moreover, the French king was not without his hopes in the fauour of the pope, both in regard of the amitie and alliance netwlie past betwixt them; and also for that he was not ignorant how in conuenient it would be to the see apostolike to haue the

the imperiall crowne inuested in Charles, no; so much for his owne greatnesse, as for that by the opportunitie and neighbourhod of the realme of Naples to the estate of the church, and the adherencie of the barons of the Gebelins, he had a plaine and open passage to run vp to the gates of Rome.

But in that discourse he considered not that the same reason, which he iudged true against Charles, was also against himselfe: for that the empire being ioined to his person, he was no lesse to be feared of the pope & all others, than Charles. For that though the one of them possessed hapilie more realmes and states; yet the other was not to be lesse esteemed, hauing his power not dispersed nor separate in manie places, but was prince of a realme entierlie assembled and vniited, where the obedience and fidelitie of his subiects was no lesse wonderfull, than his treasure and riches infinite. Heurthelesse, not knowing in himselfe that which he considered in an other, he had recourse to the pope, and imploied his fauor: vnder the offer and protestation of his person and kingdomes, with all other deuotions of a loving son. Notwithstanding all this, the French king was abused by his vaine hope, which fed him with fancies of the empire, whereto he was not allotted nor elected.

For on the twentie eight of June was elected to be emperor Charles king of Castile, and nephew to the queene, by the whole assent of the electors of the empire: namely, the archbishop of Spaine, the archbishop of Cullen, the count Palatine, and the duke of Baran. Although the French king sent his great messenger to cause him to be cleared to the high maiestie of the empire; yet his ambassado; and great messenger of his household (called Confiere lord of Boffie, and brother to William Confiere lord Boncuert, amercall of France, which was ambassado; in England the last yere, as you haue heard) did not so his message that it toke any effect. The king which had sent doctor Pace his secretarie for the advancement of his nephew the king of Castile, to the dignitie imperiall, because he had the duchie of Austrie, and manie other seignories in Almaine, was verie iolous of this election, and caused a solemne masse to be sung at Paules the seventh date of Iulie: at which masse was present the cardinall Campeius, the cardinall of Boke, the duke of Buckingham, of Norfolk, & Suffolke, with the ambassadours of Spaine, France, Venice, and Scotland.

After masse was done, the quier sang Te Deum, and then all the lords departed to Wainards castell to dinner, and that night were solemne fires made thorough London, and great pientie of wine giuen by Italians, Dutchmen, and Spaniards for these newes. In this yere the king with all the knights of his order being in England, rode on double horses, with the henchmen following the king from Colbroke to Windsor in gorgeous apparell, and there he kept with great solemnitie the feast of saint George, and dined in the hall. The bishop of Winchester prelat of the order sat at the bowd end alone. The king was solemnelie serued and the surnap cast like the feast of a coronation. All things were plentiful to strangers that resorted thither. At the masse of requiem were offered the banner & other habillements of honour belonging to Maximilian the emperor late deceased.

affablenesse & familiaritie with the inferior sort of people gradd-ged at of the councell.

After this feast ended, the king came to Richmond, and so to Grenewich, and there late all spate. In which moneth the kings councell secretlie communed together of the kings gentlenesse and liberallie to all persons: by the which they perceived that certaine yong men in his priue chamber, not regarding his estate or degree, were so familiar and homelie with him, that they forgot themselves. Which things although the king of his gentle nature suffered, and not rebuked nor reprimoued it: yet the kings councell thought it not meet to be suffered for the kings honour, and therefore they all together came to the king, beseeching him to haue more regard to his roialtie.

To whome the king answered, that he had chosen them of his councell, both for the maintenance of his honour, and for the defense of all things that might blemish the same: wherefore if they saw any about him misuse themselves, he committed it vnto their reformation. When the kings councell caused the lord chamberleine to call before them diuerse of the priue chamber, which had bene in the French court, and banished them the court for diuerse considerations, lateng nothing particularlie to their charges, & they that had offices were commanded to go to their offices. Which discharge out of court grieved sore the hearts of these yong men, which were called the kings minions. Then was there sone sad & ancient knights put into the priue chamber, whose names were; sir Richard Wingfield, sir Richard Feringham, sir Richard Weston, and sir William Kingston; and diuerse officers were changed.

In this summer the queene desired the king to bring to hir manor of Haurring in the Bowler in Essex the gentlemen of France being hostages, for whose welcomming she purueied all things in the most liberrall manner: and especiallie she made to the king such a sumptuous banquet, that the king thanked hir hartlie, & the strangers gaur hir great praise. The king lieng there did hunt, and run battie with the hostages to their great ioy. This yere in September the king late at his manor of Netherhall in Essex, otherwise called Beaulieu, where the king had newlie builded a costlie mansion, there to welcome the queene, the lords, and the French gentlemen, he made to them a sumptuous banquet, and all along the chamber sat a ladie & a lord, or a knight, which were plentifullie serued.

After the banquet ended, with noise of minstrels entered into the chamber eight maskers with white beards, and long and large garments of blew sattin paired with spers, powdered with spangles of bullion gold, and they danced with ladies sadlie, and communed not with the ladies after the fashion of maskers, but behaued themselves grauelie. Wherefore the queene plucked off their visors, and then appeared the duke of Suffolke, the earle of Essex, the marquesse Dorset, the lord Aburgaennie, sir Richard Wingfield, sir Robert Wingfield, sir Richard Weston, sir William Kingston: all these were somewhat aged, the yongest man was fiftie at the least. The ladies had good sport to see these ancient persons maskers.

When they departed, the king and the foure hostages of France, and the earle of Denonshire with sir other yong gentlemen entered the chamber, of the which sir were all in yelow sattin, hose, shoes, and caps, and sir other were in like maner in graine: the yelow sattin was frettyed with siluer of damaske, and so was the graine verie richlie to behold: then euerie masker toke a ladie and danced. When they had danced and communed a grete while, their visors were taken off, and they knowne, and the king gaue manie bowches and proper gifts where he liked. In the moneth of Nouember the king came from Lambeth to Westminster hall, and so to the Starre chamber, and there were brought before him the lord Digle, the lord Howard, sir Pat the lord Bolborne, sir William Bulmer, and John Scot of Camerwell, for diuerse riots, misdemeanors, & offenses by them committed: but the king speciallie rebuked sir William Bulmer knight, because he being his seruant swoyne, refused the kings seruice, and became for- want uant to the duke of Buckingham: yet at length by on his humble craving of mercie, still kneeling on his knees before his grace, the king pardoned him his offense: and likewise he pardoned the lord Howard, and sir Paterne Wolvone, their offenses: but because the lord Dyles matter concerned murder, he remitted him to the common law. And then he rose and went to his barge, and by the waie made James Parford maior of the citie of London knight, and so returned to Lambeth.

The French king desirous to continue the friends-ship latelie begun betwixt him and the king of England, made meane unto the cardinall, that they might in some convenient place come to an interview together, that he might have further knowlege of king Henrie, and likewise king Henrie of him.
But the same went that the cardinall desired great-lie, of himselfe, that the two kings might meet, who measuring by his will what was convenient, thought it should make much with his glorie, if in France also at some high assemble of noble men, he should be seen in his vaine pompe and shew of dignitie: he therefore breaketh with the king of that matter, declaring how honourable, necessarie, and convenient it should be for him to gratifie his friend therein, and thus with his persuasions the K. began to conceiue an earnest desire to see the French king, and thereupon appointed to go ouer to Calis, and so in the marshes of Guines to meet with him.

Then were there sent unto Guines, vnder the rule of sir Edward Welknay three thousand artifi-cers, which builded out of the earth on the plaine before the castell of Guines, a most pleasant palace of timber, right curiously garnished without and within. Hereunto were letters written to all such lords, ladies, gentlemen, and gentlewomen, which should giue their attendance on the king and quene, which incontinentlie put themselves in a readinesse after the most sumptuous sort. Also it was appointed that the king of England, & the French king, in a campe betwixt Ard and Guines, with eightene aides, should in June next ensuing abide all commers being gentlemen, at the tilt, at tourneye, and at bart-ers, whereof proclamation was made by Orleans king of armes of France here in the court of England, and by Clarenceur king of armes of England in the court of France, and in the court of Burgognie, and in diuerse other courts and places in Almanie and Italie.

During the time of these preparations, newes were brought to the king, that Charles his nephew led emperor of Almanie, would shortly depart out of Spaine by sea, and come by England to go to Acon or Ayr a citie of fame and renowne in Ger-manie, for the ancient residence and sepulchre of Charlemaine where he receiued the first crowne.
Wherefore the king hearing of this determination of the emperor, caused great promises to be made at euerie haue, for the receiuing of his welbeloued nephew and friend: & dallie prouisions were made on all sides for these noble meetings of so high princes: and especiallie the quene of England, and the ladie Dolwager of France, made great cost on the apparell of their ladies and gentlewomen.

On the first daie of Februarie being Candle-masse euen, as the king and quene were come from cuntesong at there manour of Greenwich, before the quenes chamber there blew a trumpet suddenly, and then entered into the quens chamber foure gentlemen apparelled in long and large garments of blew damaske bordered with gold, and brought with them a trickie waggon, in the which sat a ladie richly apparelled, with a canopie ouer hir head: and on the foure corners of the waggon were foure heu-pieces called armifes, euerie peece being of a fundrie deuise. The said ladie put up a bill to the king, the effect whereof was, that the foure gentlemen present would (for the loue of their ladies) answer all com-mers at the tilt at a daie by the king to be appointed: which daie was appointed at Shrouetide next ensuing. At which daie the foresaid gentlemen valiantlie accomplished their enterpise, with great lauds of the king, the quene, and the ladies.

Whereover, now that it was concluded, that the kings of England and France should meet (as ye haue heard) then both the kings committed the order and manner of these meetings, and how manie daies the same should continue, & what preheminence each should giue to other, unto the cardinall of Poike, which to set all things in a certaintie, made an instrument, containing an order and direction concerning the premises by him desired and appointed.

The whole manner of the interview committed to the cardinall.

made by the cardinall.

Thomas archbishop of Yorke and cardinall, &c. Whereby that by the treatie and meeting of the right high, and right puissant princes, Henrie by the grace of God, king of England, and of France, lord of Ireland, my so-ueraigne lord: and Francis by the same grace, K. of France right christened, made and concluded at London the eight daie of October, the yeare of our Lord one thousand five hundred and eightene, be among other things concluded and accorded, that the same meeting shall be in place indifferent, and not subiect to any of the said princes. Neuerthelesse we, considering the honour, profit, and vtilitie, that shall redound by the interview of the said two princes, and not onelie to the said two princes, their realmes and subiects, but also to all christendome, after declaration hereupon had with the said princes.

fol. lxx.

Also considering that the said illustre king of England my soueraigne lord, in passing the sea with his retinue, shall susteine great costs and expences, and dispose himselfe to great labors and dangers, leauing his realme and puissance for certeine time, we haue thought & esteemed, that he should not be wholie satisfied to the honour and dignitie of the same, right illustre king of England my soueraigne lord, and should not haue in regard condigne of his labours and dangers, if the said interview or meeting after the first treatie shuld be in place indifferent. Wherefore it is that we desiring to weie equallie the honor and dignitie of the said two kings, by vertue and power of the commissions to vs giuen, of whom the tenours shall be hereafter declared: we haue made, declared, and orde-ned certeine articles accepted & approved by the same princes respectiuelie, which they will obserue, and by these presents we make, declare, and ordeine as followeth.

And first we declare and ordeine, that before the end of the moneth of Maie next comming, the said illustre king of England shall come personallie to the castell of Guisnes, with his bedfellow the quene, and his sister sister the Dowaresse of France: & sembla-ble the right christened k. of France, shall come in person to his castell of Arde with the quene & his mother: and some day, houre, and time, within foure daies at the most, after the end of Maie, that shall be assigned by the commissioners of the one and the other partie, the said king of England shall issue out of his castell of Guines half a mile long, without that that he shall issue out of the limits of his demaign of Guines, and shall come towards the said castell of Arde: and there within the territoire of the said castell of Guines, he shall rest in some place not fortified nor walled, and nere the limits of France, that the said commissioners shall assigne (as aboue said.)

The manner of their meeting and mutuall greeting.

And the said right christened king, parting from his castell of Arde, shall come toward the said king of England the same day, place, time, and houre, that shall tarie him within the demaign of Guines, as is said. In the which shall not be set or defined any pavilions or tents, and there the said two kings being on horsebacke, with their retinue shall see the one the other, and salute each other, and speake together familiarly, and common in that sort and maner, and so long as shall seme to them good.
And after the said salutation and communication finished for that time, the said il-lustre king of England shall returne to his castell of Guines, and the said right christened king to his castell of Arde.

what both the kings were to do the morrow after the said interview.

Item, for so much that we thinke to be satisfied touching the labours, dangers, & honour of the said king of England, my so-ueraigne lord of so much, that the said right christened king at the first speaking, he shall come forward unto, and within his territoire of Guines, we will keepe the honour of the said kings: & therefore declare and ordeine, that on the morrow after the first interviue, the same kings shall meet together in some fit place, indifferent be-twene Arde and Guines, that shall be al-signed by the said commissioners.

And after the salutation made on the one and the other partie, the said right il-lustre king of England shall go to the castell of Arde, to see, salute, and visit the quene of France, and also the sister of the said christened king, with whome he shall dine priuily. And likewise the said right christened king shall go to the castell of Guines, to visit and salute the quene of England, and the Dowaresse of France, with whome he shall dine. In the which places the said princes shall be receiued familiarly and amiably, unto mutuall loue, and also to the honour of the said princes.

Order for seats of che-ualrie and ac-tuitie and the place thereto appointed.

Item, as the said serene princes of England & France, be like in force corporall, beautie, & gift of nature, right expert & having knowledge in the art militant, right cheualrous in armes, & in the flower and vigour of youth, whereby seemed to us a right assemble, that for to adorne and honoz the same assemble, and to shew their forces in armes, they shall take counsell and dispose themselves to do some faire feat of armes, as well on foot as on horsebacke, against all commers: we declare and or-deine, that the place where shall be the said fight and feat of armes, shall be chosen be-twene Guines and Arde, and assigned by the commissioners of the one and the other partie.

And for a suertie of the persons of the said kings & their companie, the said place shall be apparellied, ditched, fortified, and kept of the one and the other partie, by equall number of men of armes, respectue-lie committed and deputed that to do. And during the time of the said iusts and feats of warre, the same kings and quenes with their retinue, shall see each other familiarly, and conuerse and speake together. And e-uerie date towards the evening, after the iusts, triumphs, bankets, & familiar communications done, the said kings with their retinue shall returne into their cas-tells, that is to say, the king of England into his castell of Guines, & the said right christened king into his castell of Arde, and thus they shall do daillie, during the said fight and feat of armes.

Item, we declare and ordeine, that when the same king of England and the quene his bedfellow, & the Dowaresse of France his sister, with their retinue, shall go to the territoire and entrie of the foresaid right christened king, the supertoritie and preheminence shall be given to the said king of England, to the quene his bedfellow, and to their retinue respectuelie, during the time that they shall tarie and be there: and semblable when the said right christened king, and the quene his bedfellow and his right illustre ladie and mother, with their retinue shall come to the territoire and en-trie of the said illustre king of England, the supertoritie and preheminence shall be gi-uen to the said right christened king, to the quene his bedfellow, and to his mother, and to their retinue during the time that they shall continue and abide there.

Item, forso much as the castels and places where the said interviue shall be, be so little and narrow, that if entrie and licence to come thither be given to all them that would go thither, diuers annoyances, troubles & impechments should follow: wherefore it is so, that we the cardinall aboue said, by these presents declare and ordeine, that none of the retinue of the said kings, quenes, or other lords and nobles, of what estate, qualitie, or condition that he or they be of, shall not come to the said assemble with more great number of persons or horse, than shall be written by letters subscribed by the said kings: the which shall containe the estates and conditions of the persons, as well men as women, and number of seruants and horse, except the common consent and licence of the said kings.

Item, forso much as peradventure it shall come that the said princes, lords, gen-gentlemen and household seruants, shall see and conuerse together familiarly, to the end that it maie ingender betwene them an amitie more firme and stable, for that cause, and that more suerlie and agreeable they may be together, as well by day as by night without any danger or feare, which we desire to prouide: we declare and ordeine that two gentlemen, with sufficient companie of equall & like number, be committed and deputed, respectiuelie by the said kings for the keeping and suertie of the waies and watches, that shall be made continuallie during the assemble of the said kings. The which gentlemen, with their companies, shall ordeine and depute explozatozs and spies in the bailies, forrests, woods, towngs, burrowes, villages, castels, passages, and waies: and other places dangerous and suspect: from time to time, and houre to houre, as well towards Flanders, as Picardie, Artois, & England, to exploit and watch there.

And if any be found suspect, them to re- pulle and take awaie, to the end that not onelie the said princes, their gentlemen, and household seruants, maie suerlie and without feare visit the one the other, as said is: but also those that shall bring bit- tels necessarie to the said assemble, maie without danger, trouble, impeachment, or noisance go and come: the which exploza- tozs shall be bounden euerie daie in the morning and evening, to make report to the said princes or to their said counsellors respectiuelie, of that which they found, and in what estate the waies be. We declare further and ordeine, that all men of armes and of warre, of the one and the other par- tie, shall not approach nether than two iour- nes, to the place where the said interuiew shall be, except the retinue and men of war that be committed and deputed to keepe Bullongne and Calis: and that the same men of warre nor none other, during the assemble of the said princes, shall not pre- sume to come nether, vnllesse by the consent, accord, and licence of the said princes.

Item, we cardinall aboue said, by ex- presse authoritie and power to vs giuen, by these presents, bind the said princes to do, fulfill, and accomplish, all and euerie things aboue said herein contened. final- lie, we declare and ordeine, that ech of the said kings on his partie, shall ratifie, con- firme, and approue all and euerie the chap- ters and articles aboue said, by their let- ters pattents sealed with their hands. And by the same letters of ratification they shall be bounden, to accomplish with good faith and word of a king, all and eue- rie the things aboue said: the which let- ters made, subscribed, and sealed, as is said, they shall giue the one the other, and shall change in the cite of London, within one moneth next after the date of these presents. Made the twelue of March, the yeare of our Lord a thousand five hun- dred and ninetene,

The peres of the realme receiuing letters to pre- pare themselves to attend the king in this iourne, and no apparant necessarie cause expresse, why nor wherefor: seemed to grudge, that such a costlie iour- nie should be taken in hand to their impotunate charges and expences, without consent of the whole bozd of the counsell. But namelie the duke of Buc- kingham, being a man of a lostie courage, but not most liberall, fore repined that he should be at so great charges for his furniture forth at this time, saing: that he knew not for what cause so much monie should be spent about the sight of a vaine talke to be had, and communication to be ministred of things of no importance. Wherefore he sticked not to saie, that it was an intollerable matter to be- lieve such a vile and impotunate person.

The duke indeed could not abide the cardinall, and spectallie he had of late conceiued an inward malice against him for sir William Bulmers cause, whose trouble was onelie procured by the cardinall; who first caused him to be cast in prison. Now such grie- uous words as the duke thus vttered against him, came to the cardinals eare: whereupon he cast before hand all waies possible to haue him in a trip, that he might cause him to leape headlesse. But bicause he doubted his friends, kinnesmen, and alics, and chief- lie the earle of Surrie lord admerall, which had mar- ried the dukes daughter, he thought good first to send him some whither out of the waie, least he might cast a trumpe in his waie. There was great enmitie be- twixt the cardinall and the earle, for that on a time, when the cardinall toke vpon him to checke the earle, he had like to haue thrust his dagger into the cardis- nall.

At length there was occasion offered him to com- passe his purpose, by occasion of the earle of Bil- dare his comming out of Ireland. For the cardinall knowing he was well provided of monie, sought occasion to flace him of part thereof. The earle of BILDARE being unmarried, was desirous to haue an English woman to wife; and for that he was a suter to a widow contrarie to the cardinals mind, he ac- cused him to the king, of that he had not bozne him- selfe vprightlie in his office in Ireland, where he was the kings lieutenant. Such accusations were fra- med against him when no bises would come, that he was committed to prison, and then by the cardinals good preferment the earle of Surrie was sent into Ireland as the kings deputie, in lieu of the said earle of BILDARE, there to remaine rather as an erile, than as lieutenant to the king, euen at the cardinals plea- sure, as he himselfe well perceiued.

In the beginning of Aprill, the said earle passed ouer into Ireland, and had with him diuerse gentle- men that had bene in the garrison of Tozmate, and one hundred yeomen of the kings gard, and others, to the number of a thousand men, where he by his manhood and policie brought the earle of Desmond and diuerse other rebels to good conformitie and or- der. He continued there two yeares, in which space he had manie bickerings and skirmishes with the wild Irish. There rested yet the earle of Northum- berland, whome the cardinall doubted also, least he might hinder his purpose, when he should go about to breake his malice against the duke of Bucking- ham: and therefore he picked a quarell to him, for that he had seized vpon certeine wards which the car- dinall said appertained of right to the king. And be- cause the earle would not giue over his title, he was also committed to prison, & after toke it for a great benefit at the cardinals hands, that he might be deli- uered out of his danger.

Now in this meane while, the cardinall ceased not to bring the duke out of the kings fauour, by such such forged tales, and contrived surmises, as he daie put into the kings head: insomuch that (through the infelicitie of his fate) diuerse accidents fell out to the aduantage of the cardinall; which he not omitting, atchiued the thing whereat he so studioulie (for the satisfieng of his cankered & malicious stomach) laid full ayme. Now it chanced that the duke coming to London with his traine of men, to attend the king into France, went before into Kent vnto a manor place which he had there. And whilest he staid in that countrie till the king set forward, greuous complaints were exhibited to him by his farmers and tenants against Charles Kinquet his surcouer, for such bybing as he had vied there amongst them. Whereupon the duke toke such displeasure against him, that he depriued him of his office, not knowing how that in so doing he procured his owne destruction, as after appeared.

The king set forth forward towards France.

The kings maiestie persecuting in purpose to meet with Francis the French king, remoued with the queene, and all his court, the one & twentieth day of Maie being mondaie, from his manor of Greenwich towards the sea side: and so on the fridaie the nine and twentieth of Maie, he arrived at the citie of Canturburie, intending there to keepe his Whit-suntide. On the morrow after, the emperor being on the sea returning out of Spaine, arrived with all his traine of ships roiall on the coast of Kent, direct to the port of Whith the said daie by none, where he was saluted by the viceadmirall of England, Sir William Fitz William, with six of the kings great ships well furnished, which late for the safegard of passage betwixt Calis and Douer. Towards evening the emperor departed from his ships, and entered into his bote, and coming towards land, was met and receiued of the lord cardinall of Borke with such reuerence as to so noble a prince appertained.

Thus landed the emperor Charles the first at Douer, vnder his cloth of estate of the blacke eagle, all spread on rich cloth of gold. He had with him manie noble men, and manie faire ladies of his blood. When he was come on land, the lord cardinall conducted him to the castell of Douer, which was prepared for him in most roiall manner. In the morning, the king rode with all hast to the castell of Douer to welcome the emperor, and entering into the castell, alighted. Of whose coming the emperor hauing knowledge, came out of his chamber, and met him on the staires, where either of them embraced other in most louing manner, and then the king brought the emperor to his chamber. On Whit-sundae earlie in the morning, they toke their horses, and rode to the citie of Canturburie, the more to keepe solemne the feast of Pentecost: but speciallie to see the queene of England his aunt was the emperor his intent, of whome he may be sure he was most iustlie receiued and welcomed.

Polydor.

Thus the emperor and his retinue, both of lords and ladies, kept their Whit-suntide with the king and queene of England, in the citie of Canturburie with all ioy and solace. The emperor yet himselfe seemed not so much to delight in pastime and pleasure, but that in respect of his youthfull yeares, there appeared in him a great shew of grauitie: for they could by no means bring him to danse amongst the residue of the princes, but onelie was contented to be a looker on. Peraduenture the sight of the ladie Marie troubled him, whome he had sometime loued, and yet through fortunes euill hap might not haue hir to wife. The chiefe cause that moued the emperor to come thus on land at this time, was to perswade that by word of mouth, which he had before done most earnestlie by letters; which was, that the king should not meet with the French king at anie interuiew: for he doubted least if the king of England & the French king should grow into some great friendship and faithfull bond of amitie, it might turne him to displeasure.

But now that he perceived how the king was forward on his iourne, he did what he could to procure, that no trust should be committed to the faire words of the Frenchmen: and that if it were possible, the great friendship that was now in breeding betwixt the two kings, might be dissolued. And for so much as he knew the lord cardinall to be to some with rewards, as a fish with a bait: he bestowed on him great gifts, and promised him much more, so that he would be his friend, and helpe to bring his purpose to passe. The cardinall not able to susteine the least assault by force of such rewards as he presentlie receiued, and of such large promises as on the emperours behalfe were made to him, promised to the emperor, that he would so be the matter, as his purpose should be sped: onelie he required him not to disalew the kings intent for interuiew to be had, which he desired in anie wise to go forward, that he might shew his high magnificence in France, according to his first intention.

The emperor remained in Canturburie till the thursdaie, being the last of Maie, and then taking leaue of the king, and of his aunt the queene, departed to Sandwich, where he toke his ships and sailed into Flanders. The same daie, the king made saile from the port of Douer, and landed at Calis about eleuen of the clocke, and with him the queene and ladies, & manie nobles of the realme. His grace was receiued into the chequer, and there rested. The fourth of June, the king and queene with all their traine remoued from Calis, to his princelie lodging newlie erected beside the towne of Guines, the most noble & roiall lodging that euer before was seene. For it was a palace, the which was quadrant, and euerie quadrant of the same palace was three hundred and twentie eight foot long of allise, which was in compass thirtene hundred and twelue foot about. This palace was set on stages by great cunning & sumptuous worke.

At the entering into the palace before the gate, on the plaine greene, was builded a fountaine of imbold worke, gilt with fine gold, and vice, ingrailed with antique worke: the old god of wine called Bacchus burling the wine, which by the conduits in the earth ran to all people plentifullie with red, white, and claret wine, ouer whose head was written in letters of Romane in gold, Faicte bonne chere qui voudra. On the other hand or side of the gate was set a pillar, which was of ancient Romane worke, bozne with foure lions of gold, the pillars wrapped in a wreath of gold curiously wrought and intrailed, and on the summit of the said pillar stood an image of the blind god Cupid, with his bow and arrowes of loue, readie by his shooting to strike the yong people to loue.

The foregate of the same palace or place with great and mightie masonrie by sight was arched, with a tower on euerie side of the same port, reered by great craft, and imbattelled was the gate and tower, and in the fenestres and windows were images resembling men of warre, readie to cast great stones. Also the same gate or tower was set with compassed images of ancient princes, as Hercules, Alexander, and other by intrailed worke, richlie linned with gold and albine colours: and well and warlike was made ouer the gate loupes, and inforced with battlements, and in the same gate a lodge for the porter, which there appeared, and other sumptuouslie apparelled like vnto kings officers. By the same gate all people passed into a large court faire and beautiful, small, for in this court appeared much of the outward beautie of this place, for from the first water table, to the ceiling or ceiling pieces, were baie windowes, on euerie side mixed with cleare stonies curiouse glasse, the posses or moulds of euerie window was gilt.

Thus the outward part of the place linned the eyes of the beholders, by reason of the sumptuous worke. Also the tower of the gate (as seemed) was built by great masonrie, and by great engine of mans wit, for the sundrie countenances of euerie image that there appeared, some shooting, some casting, some ready to strike, and firing of gunnes, which showed verie honorable. Also all the said quadrants, haies, and collicies, were roiallie intrailed, as there as unto the same court appertained. And direct against the gate was deuised a halpas, and at the entrie of the staire, were images of fore and terrible countenances, all armed in curiouse worke of argentine. The baie of the same halpas pendant by craft of timber, & under it antique images of gold in-crowned with verdoy of olife cast in compasse, mounting their countenances toward the entring of the palace. The staire of the said halpas was cast of passage by the wents of hynde steps, so that from the first water to the top of the step, any person might without paine go unto the highest place of the same halpas.

On euerie hand was their chamber dore, and enterings into the chambers of the same palace, which were long and large, and well proportioned, to receiue light and aire at pleasure: the rofes of them from place to place, and chamber to chamber were siled, and covered with cloth of silke, of the most faire and quicke invention that before time was seene. For the ground was white ingrailed, embowed, and batoned with rich clothes of silkes, knit and fret with cuts and braids, and sundrie new castes, that the same clothes of silke showed like bullions of fine burned gold: and the rofes in losenges, that in the same rofe were in kindle course, furnished so to mans sight, that no living creature might but loy in the beholding thereof. For from the iawpée of the said siling (which péece was gilt with fine gold) were lookes in pane paleo, all the walles to the cress in-countering the cleare stonies, the same cress which was of large dapprefie, the worke was antique knots with bosses cast and wrought with more cunning than I can write, all which worke and ouerages were gilt, and to set it the more to the glorie, the scourt-lyng bise was comparable to the rich amell.

Also at the foot of the same palace was another cress all of fine set gold, whereon hanged rich & maruelous clothes of arras wrought of gold and silke, compassed of manye ancient stonies, with which clothes of arras euerie wall and chamber were hanged, & all the windowes so richly covered, that it passed all other sights before seene. In euerie chamber and euerie place convenient were clothes of estate, great and large of cloth of gold, of tissue, and rich embroderie, with chaires covered with like cloth, with pommels of fine gold, and great cushions of rich worke of the Turkie making, nothing lacked of honourable fur-nishment. Also to the same palace was reared a chappell with two closetes, the quire of the said chappell siled with cloth of gold, and thereon fret ingrated best clothes of silke, all was then silke and gold.
The altars of this chappell were hanged with rich re-vesture of cloth of gold and tissue, embrodered with perles. Over the hie altar was hanged a rich canopie of maruelous greynesse, the altar was apparellled with fine paire of candlesticks of gold, and on the altar an halpas, and thereon stood a crucifix all of fine gold, and on the same halpas stood twelue images of the byrges of foure peeres of age, all gold.

All the copes and vestments were so rich as might be prepared or bought in the cite of Florens, for they were all but of one péece, so woven for the purpose, cloth of tissue and powdered with red roses purpled with fine gold. The vestments set with pearles and precious stones. And all the walles and desks of this chappell were hanged with rich cloth of gold, & there rich great crosses were there ready to be borne at festiual times, and basons and censers, gospellers, pares, cirewets, holie water vessels, and other ornaments all of gold. Also in the first closet was a trauerse for the kings person of cloth of gold, & in it his place & chaire, with cushions of cloth of gold: before the trauerse was an altar of presence, which altar was adorned with cloth of broderie, and rich pearles and precious stones, set in goldsmiths worke of fine gold.
On the altar was a deske or halpas, whereon stood a pattible of the crucifix of fine gold, with an image of the Trinitie, an image of the virgine Marie, and twelue other images, all fine gold & precious stones, two paire of candlesticks of fine gold, with the ba-sons, cirewets, pases, and other ornaments.

The said closet was hanged with tapets embro-dered with rich worke fret with pearles and stones, the rose of the same closet was siled with worke of inmouled, gilt with fine gold, and senoper, and bise.
The second closet was for the queens person, in which was a trauerse of rich cloth of gold, the altar so richly appareiled, that there lacked neither pearles nor stones of riches. On the altar were twelue great images of gold, the closet hanged with cloth of gold, all other ietwels misall I suppose neuer such like were seene, and the rose of the same closet was siled with like worke that the kings closet was, as is before rehearsed. And from this palace or place into the mightie & strong fortreffe & castell rofall of Gulesnes, was a gallerie for the secret passage of the kings person into a secret lodging within the same castell, the more for the king ease. Also to this palace was all houses of offices, that to such an honourable court should appertene, that is to wit, the lord chamberlein, lord steward, lord treasurer of the household, for the comptrolloz, the office of greene cloth, warbyobes, sewell house, and office of household seruice, as cibrie, pantrie, cellar, butterie, spicerie, pitcher house, larder and poultrie, and all other offices so large and faue, that the officers might & did maruell, as in the craft of viands, by ouens, harthes, veredoxes, chymnies, ranges, & such instruments as there were ordeined.

In this palace (as ye haue heard) was the kings grace lodged, and all the nobles after their degrees.
And for that the towne of Gulesnes was little, and that all the noble men might not there be lodged, they set up tents in the field, to the number of twen-tie and eight hundred sundrie lodgings, which was a goodlie sight. Thus was the king in his palace rofall at Gulesnes. Francis the French king was with all his nobles of the realme of France come to the towne of Art, which was prepared for his coming, manie tents, halles, and paulions were set and pitched in the field. On the French partie also there was at the same towne of Art builded the French kings lodging full well, but not finished. Much was the provision in Picardie on euerie part thorough all. The French king commanded his lodging to be made a little out of the towne of Art, in the territorie of an old castell, which by the warre of old time had bene beaten. On the same place was edified a house of solace and sport, of large and mightie compasse, which was chieftie suffained by a great mightie mast, whereby the great copes and tackle streined the same mast was staid. All the rose of the same house hony on the same mast, and with tackle was streined & bozine by the supporters of the same mast or tree, the colours of the same was all blew, set with flarres of gold foile, and the o:bs of the heavens by the craft of colours in the rose, were curiously wrought in maner like the skie or firmament, and a cressant strained some deale towards the towne of Ard, this cressant was covered with frets and knots made of iute bushes, and bor branches, and other things that longest would be greene for pleasure.

Now like as diuerse of the French nobilitie had visited the king of England while he laie in Calis, so likewise the lord cardinall, as ambassadeur to the king, rode with a noble repaire of lords, gentlemen, and prelates, to the towne of Ard, where he was of the French king highlie intertained, with great thanks, for that by his meanes hee had ioined in friendship with the king of England, to his high contentation and pleasure, as hauing obtained the thing which he had long desired. The noble port, sumptuous shew, and great traine of gentlemen, knights, lords, and number of seruants, in rich apparell & futes of li-neries attendant on the cardinall, made the French men greatlie to wonder at his triumphant doings.

The king of England had giuen vnto the said cardinall full authoritie, power, and libertie, to assirme and confirme, bind and vnbind, whatsoeuer should be in question betwene him and the French king: and the like authoritie, power, and libertie, did the French king by his sufficient letters patents, grant to the same cardinall, which was accepted to be a signe of great loue, that he should commit to great a trust vnto the king of Englands subiect. The date of the meeting was appointed to be on the thursday the seauenth of June, vpon which daie the two kings met in the vale of Andren, accompanied with such a number of the nobilitie of both realmes, so richlie appointed in apparell, and costlie iewels, as chaines, collars of SS, & other the like ornaments to set forth their degrees and estates, that a wonder it was to behold and view them in their order and romes, which euerie man kept according to his appointment.

The two kings meeting in the field, either saluted other in most louing wise, first on horsebacke, and after alighting on foot embraced with courteteous words, to the great reioicing of the beholders: and after they had thus saluted ech other, they went both together into a rich tent of cloath of gold, there set vp for the purpose, in the which they passed the time in pleasant talke, banquetting, and louing deuises, till it drew toward the evening, and then departed for that night, the one to Guilnes, the other to Ard. At this meeting of the two kings in open sight, & then well perceived (saith Hall) the habillements of all of the French king. His garment was a chemise, of cloath of siluer, culponed with cloath of gold, of da-maske, cantell wise, and garded on the borders with the Burgon bands.

person.

ouer that he had a cloake of broched sattin, with gold of purple colour, wrapped about his bodie trauerse, beaded from the shoulder to the waist, fastned in the loope of the first fould: this said cloake was richlie set with pearles and pretious stones. This French king had on his head a coife of damaske gold set with diamonds, and his courser that he rode on was co-uered with a trapper of tisse, bordered with de uise, cut in fashion mantell wise, the skirts were embor-ed and fret with frized worke, and knit with cor-belles & buttons tasseled of Turkie making, raines and headstall answering of like worke: and verelie of his person the same Francis the French king, a goodlie prince, statelie of countenance, merie of chere, browne coloured, great eyes, high nosed, big lipped, faire bearded, broad shoulders, small legges, & long feet.

On saturday the ninth of June, in a place within the English pale were set vp in a field called the campe, two trees of much honour, the one called the Aubessine, that is to saie, the bathhouse in English, for Henrie: and the other the Framboisier, which in English signifieth the raspis berie, after the signification in French. These trees were curiously wrought, the leanes of greene damaske, the branches, boughs, and withered leanes of cloath of gold; and all the bodie and armes of the same cloath of gold laid on timber: they were in height from the foot to the top thirtie foure foot of assize, in compasse about an hundred twentie and nine foot, & from bough to bough fortie three foot: on these trees were flowers and fruits in kindlie wise, with siluer and Venise gold: their beautie shewed farre.

On the same daie the two kings came to those trees of honour, noble accompanied, in such roiall fozt as was requisit. The campe was in length nine hundred foot, and in bredth three hundred and twentie foot, ditched round about (saueing at the entrie) with broad and deepe ditches. Diuerse scaffolds were reared about this campe for the ease of the nobles. On the right side of the field stood the queene of England, and the queene of France, with manie ladies. The campe was stronglie railed and barred on euerie end: in the entrie there were two lodgings prepared for the two kings, wherein they might arme themselues, and take their ease. Also in the same compasse there were two great cellars couched full of wine, which was liberallie bestowed on all men. The two kings, as byethen in armes, undertooke to deliuer all persons at iusts, tournie, and barriers.

With these two kings were associate by the order of armes, the duke of Glendore, the duke of Suffolke, the countie saint Paule, the marquess Dorset, monsieur de Roche, sir William Kingston, monsieur Brian, sir Richard Farningham, monsieur Canaan, sir Giles Capell, monsieur Buccall, maister Nicholas Carew, monsieur Pontafillon, and master Anthonic Lineet. On mondaie the eleuenth of June, the two queenes of England and of France came to the campe, where either saluted other right honourable, and went into a stage for them prepared. At the houre assigned, the two kings armed at all paces mounted on horsebacke, and with their companies entered the field; the French king on a courser barded, couered with purple sattin, broched with gold, & embodered with corbines fetters round and buckled, the fetter was blacke and hatched with gold: on his head piece he bare a fleur de. All the parteners of the French kings chalenge were in like ap-parell, euerie thing correspondent in cloath of silke embodered, on his person were attendant on horsebacke noble persons, and on foot foure persons all apparelled in purple sattin.

The king of England was vpon a fresh courser, the trappers of cloth of gold, of tisse, the arson man-tell wise, and on the hount of the trapper bard fashyon, cut in waues of water worke, and euerie waue raw wrought and frized with damaske gold: this worke was laid lose on russet veluet, and knit together with points of gold, which waues signified the lordship of the narrow seas. All the parteners of the kings chalenge were in the same sute, their hofles as well as their persons. Attendant on the king on horsebacke were sir Henrie Guilford maister of the kings hofle, sir John Perchie deputie of Calis, sir Edward Guilford maister of the kings armie, and monsieur Aporet of the French court. All the se foure were appa-relled in the kings luerie, which was white on the right side, and the left side gold and russet both hose and garment: on him were attendant on foot sir honourable knights, twentie squire, and officers to the

the number of an hundred and twelue persons, of the which number all the knights and gentlemen had coats, the one halfe siluer, and the other cloath of gold and russet beluet, and the other officers coats were of right sattin of the same colour, and all their hosen were of the same fute verie coslie.

Thus with honour and noble courage these two noble kings with their companies entered into the field, and then presented vnto the quenes. After reuerence done, they rode round about the tilt, and so toke their places appointed, abiding the answers: which was for the first the duke of Alanfon and ten men of armes on his band, on courfers barded, the bards couered with white and blacke beluet, fastened the one within the other, garded with Burgon bands of tinell sattin, as well their garments as their bards. Then entered on courfers barded twelue gentlemen of the band of the lord aduerall of France, their garments and bards were russet sattin, bryched with gold and white and purple sattin, after the deuise of their pleasure with great plumes. When these bands were entred the field, they shewed themselves about the tilt, and did reuerence vnto the quenes. The band of the duke of Alanfon toke first place, they made them prest on both sides, the French king was the first that ran, he did valliantlie and bryake speares mightlie.

Then ran the king of England to monsieur Crandeuille with great vigor; so that the speares bryake in the kings hand to the vantage all to shivers. And at the second course he gaue the said monsieur Crandeuille such a stroke, that the charnell of his headpiece, although the same was verie strong, was broken in such wise that he might run no more, where by the king wanted three courses. Then ran the duke de Glendoune, & met his counter part right noble, and bryake speares right valliantlie. The noble duke of Suffolke charged his course, and met right valliantlie his counter part, and furnished the five courses right noble together like good men of armes. And when all parties of the challenge had right valliantlie furnished their courses, then ran againe the two noble kings, who did so valliantlie, that the beholders had great ioy, after which courses the heralds cried Desamnee, and the trumpets sounded to leading.

On tuesdaye the twelue of June at houre conuenient the two quenes toke their places, and the band of challenge in the field prest to answer and deliuer all comers, to whome came ten gentlemen armed on barded hoes of the band of monsieur de Salons, their bards and apparell cloath of beluet full of friers knots siluer. After they had presented them vnto the quenes, then they toke the end of the tilt, and so course after course they ran to the challengers right egerlie, and the challengers of the partie of the two kings deliuered to the end of their articles of luffs. Then entered eleuen men of armes of the band of monsieur de Tremoiell, on hoes barded with yellow beluet, losenged with friers knots of blacke beluet; and after they had saluted the quenes, they likewise toke the end of the tilt, and course after course ran untill they were deliuered of their challenges of luffs. Valliantlie this daie was finished.

On wednesdaye the thirtieth of June, the two hardie kings armed at all peeces, entered into the field right noble apparellled. The French king and all his parteners of challenge were arrayed in purple sattin, bryched with gold and purple beluet, embrodered with little rolles of white sattin, wherein was written, Quando their bards & garments were set full of the same, and the residue where was no rolles were powdered & set with the letter elle, as thus. L. which in French is she, which was interpreted to be, Quando elle, when she: and insuing the deuise of the first daie, it signifieth together, that fastened in paine endles, when she. The king of England with all the band of parteners of his challenge were likewise on hoes: backe, apparellled in trappers of losenges russet beluet and cloath of siluer of damaske, embrodered and set in euerie losenge a branch of eglantine of gold, the apparell of the persons were of the same correspondent to the trapper. This eglantine tre is sweet, pleasant and greene, if it be kinde and frendlie handled; but if it be rodelie dealt with, it will picke and he that will pull by the whole tre by the top, his hands will be hurt.

The two kings with their companies thus apparellled, presented themselves to the quenes, and so toke the end of the tilt. Then entered into the field monsieur Leskelw called lord Leskin, with him came eleuen men of armes, himsele the twelue on hoes barded and richlie apparellled, and so rode about the tilt and saluted the quenes, and toke the end of the tilt. Monsieur de Leskelw and his eleuen companions had their baces and bards all of blacke cloath of gold of damaske all cut on blacke sattin, their garments had mantell sleeves on the left arme, to the waist behind fast to the shoulder, which was praised for the strangenesse. The French king ran to monsieur de Ambois, one of the band of monsieur Leskelw, and the king of England charged his course and ran to monsieur Leskelw, and so furnished their courses (as they saie) right noble and valliantlie in bryaking speares that were strong. Thus course after course ech with other, his counter partie did right valliantlie: but the two kings furnished all the rest in prouesse and valliantnesse.

This band thus furnished, entered the marquesse de Salons and his band, twelue persons all riding on courfers barded and apparellled in white sattin and blacke, bryched with gold and siluer, with cuts and culprits much after tawnie and blacke sattin billots: after reuerence done to the quenes, they toke the end of the tilt. To the marquesse de Salons ran the king of England, and the king of France to another of the same band, still course after course ran all the noble men, till the marques de Salons and his band were deliuered, who bare them right valliantlie: then blew the trumpets the retreat, & the two kings then unarmed and after departed, the French king vnto Ard, and the king of England to his castell of Cusnes.

On thursdaye the thirtieth daie of June by the nonetide the two quenes met in the campe & toke their places, the people were come to behold the honour, and to see the two kings, who all readie armed entered the field, to receiue and deliuer all men by answer of luffs. Then entered the earle of Denonshire, on his band the lord Pontacate, lord Herbert, lord Leonard Greie, maister Arthur Pole, maister Francis Blant, maister Henrie Bozris, and foure other all richlie apparellled, the one side blew beluet embrodered with a mans heart burning in a ladies hand holding a garden pot stilling with water on the heart: the other side was white sattin embrodered with letters of gold. This companie rode about the tilt, and did reuerence to the quenes, and so abode at the end of the same.

The earle of Denonshire charged his speare, and the French king likewise charged his course to meet the same earle, and ran so hard together, that both their speares bryake, and so mainteined their courses noble. Then ran the king of England to monsieur Amozancie, and him encountered, & both bare together and gaue great strokes; the kings most noble grace neuer disloozed no: breathed untill he ran the five courses & deliuered his counterpartie. marquesses, knights, esquires, and others ran as fast as cuer they might, there was none that abode when the courtes came, untill the earle of Donothire and his band were deliuered of demands. Then entered the lord Howard some to the duke of Norfolkke and eleuen companions apparelled and barbed in crimlin sattin full of flames of gold, the borders ribbed with crimlin beluet, and with much hono<sup>r</sup> (after due reuerence done to the quenes) were brought with heralds of armes about the tilts; and so toke the place to them appointed: right rich was their apparel.

Then ran the French king and incountered the same lord Edmund, they brake both their stauces ballantlie course after course, the incounter ceased not till they had furnished their fine courtes; so was the lord Edmund deliuered by the French k. Then ran the king of England to a strong gentleman named Rafe Brooke and brake his speare, and ran course after course, untill he had finished his courtes right noble and like a prince of most valiancie. The residue ceased not untill they had ech deliuered other of their chalenge. On fridaie the fiftenth daie of June the king of England mounted on a courser rosall, his person armed at all peeces, his apparell and trappers was the one side rich cloath of gold of tisse, the other side cloath of tisse of siluer, and cloath of gold of tisse entered ound the one with the other.

The ound is a worke waiting by a doune, and all the borders as well trappers as other was garded with letters of fine gold, and all the other side that was ound was set with signes called cifers of fine gold, the which were set with great and orientall pearles. The cifers signified letters knit together in a knot, which was to wit; God my friend, my realme and I maie. This was the deuil and reason thereof. All the kings band were apparelled in like apparell. The French k. likewise armed at all points mounted on a courser rosall, all his apparell as well bard as garments were purple beluet, beluet ringed the one with the other, embroidered full of little booke of white sattin, in the booke were written Ame. About the borders of the bards and the borders of the garments a chaine of blew like iron, resembling the chaine of a well or prison chaine, which was interpreted to be Libber, a booke. Within this booke was written (as is said) Ame. Put these two together and it maketh Libberame. The chaine betokeneth prison or bonds, and so maketh together in English, Deliu<sup>r</sup> me of bonds. Then they toke the end of the tilt.

Readie was monsieur Flozengis and with him twelue men of armes with courfers barbed: the bards and apparell was crimlin beluet, tawnie beluet, and plunket beluet embroidered borderwise with shepheardes hookes of cloath of siluer. When they with honour had passed about the tilt (due reuerence to the quenes and ladies done) the two kings had their speares readie, and then began the rushing of speares. The king of England this daie ran so freshly and so manie courses, that one of his best courfers was dead that night, this band was deliuered man after man of their vttermost of iusts. Then entered bands of monsieur de Rameurs and monsieur de Puts, ech having eleuen persons in number, the one band all white sattin embroidered with blacke, and the other all blacke dopped with siluer drops; who after reuerence done to the quenes, at the end of the tilt toke their places. Then began a new incounter hard and sore, manie of them bare great strokes of the kings, to their honour: and with such violence they ran, as they set their hollies in a sweating heat, and themselves meeting with full force made the fragments or broken peeces of their stauces mount aloft in the air like an arrow out of a bow; as the poet saith;

On saturdaye the seuententh daie of June, the French king with a small number came to the castle of Guisnes about the houre of eight in the morning. The king being in his priue chamber had thereof knowledge, who with glad hart went to receive the same French king, and him met and welcomed in friendlie and honorable maner; and after communication betwene them had, the king of England departed, leauing the French king there in the famous place before named. Then was busie the lord chamberleine, the lord steward, and all other officers, to make readie feast and cheare. It were too long to rehearse all, for such a feast and banquet was then made, that of long time before the like had not bene seene. The king of England thus departing, he toke his hollie, and with a companie of noblemen rode to Ard, where the French quene and other noble men receiued him with much honour.

After which receiuing, he was by the said quene and lords brought into a chamber hanged with blew beluet embroidered with flowers delice of cloth of gold, wherein was a great bed of like worke, from whence he was conueied to another chamber, in the which was a kings state. This chamber was hanged and sieled with cloth of gold, embroidered with great cordels or friers knots of cloth of siluer. In the same chamber were two supboards, on either side one, furnished with great and goodlie plate gilt. Noble feasting and cheare was there made. After dinner the ladies dressed them to banke, and certeine yong honourable lords of England, apparelled after the maner of Rusland or faire Castland, whose hosen were of rich gold sattin called aureat sattin, ouerrolled to the knee with scarlet, and on their feet shoes with little pikes of white nallies after the Castland guise, their dublets of rich crimlin beluet and cloth of gold, with wide sleeves lined with cloth of gold: ouer this they had clokes of crimlin beluet ho<sup>r</sup>t, lined with cloth of gold, on euerie side of the clokes rings of siluer, with laces of Venice gold, and on their heads they had hats made in the towne of Danke, and purses of scales skinned, and girdels of the same: all these yong lords had bisards on their faces, and their hats were oratene with like hatbands full of damaske gold.

Other ten lords were apparelled in long gobones of blew sattin of the ancient fashion, embroidered with reasons of gold that said Adieu iunesse, fare well youth: they had tippets of blacke beluet, hats hanging thereby, on their heads hie violet standing caps, and girdels of silke, and purses of cloth of gold after the ancient maner, with bisards on their faces of like ancience. After all these triumphs and hautes, great store of spices, fruits, iellies, and banqueting viands were brought, which being done and ended, the king toke leaue of the French quene and ladies, to whom were brought thirtie hollies trapped in damaske, white and yellow, and so passed he and his traine the towne of Ard into the field and campe. Right rosallie also was the French k. interteined, and all other after their degree and state. Now when all this solemmitie was ended, the French king toke leaue of the quene and ladies of the court. The lord cardinall in statelie attire, accompanied with the duke of Buckingham, and other great lords, conducted forward the French king, and in their way they incountered and met the king of England and his companie right in the ballie of Anderne, apparelled in their masking apparell, which gladdened the French king. After reuerence done, the said two kings departed for that night, the English to Guisnes, and the French to Ard.

On mondaie, the eightenth of June, was such an horrible storme of wind and weather, that manie contempered it did prognosticate trouble and hatred hostile after to follow betwene princes. On tuesdaye the nineteenth of June, the two kings came to the campe againe armed at all peeces, and there abode them that would come, so that then began the iustices aforesaid. On wednesdaye the twentieth of June, the two kings began to hold tourneys with all the parteners of their chalenge armed at all peeces. The quene of France and the quene of England were in the places for them prepared, and there was manie a goodlie battell performed: the kings doing as well as the best, so that the beholders spake of them honor. On thursdaie the one and twentieth of June, the two kings likewise kept the tourneys, so that all those noble men that would prove their valiances, were delivered according to the articles of the tourneys, which this daie take end. On fridaie the 22 of June, the two kings with their retinue did battell on foot at the barriers, and there delivered all such as put forth themselves to trie their forces. On saturdaye the thirtieth and twentieth of June, the lord cardinall sang an high solemne masse by note, aloft upon a pompous stage before the two kings & quenes, the which being finished, indulgence was given to all the hearers. The two kings dined in one chamber that daie, and the two quenes in another. After dinner, the two kings with their band entered the field on foot before the barriers, & so began the fight, which continued battell after battell, till all the combats were answered. There were delivered this day thus at the barriers by battell, an hundred and six persons: the two last battells did the kings trie. And so that saturdaye the whole chalenge was performed, and all men delivered of the articles of iusts, tourneys, and battells on foot at the barriers, by the said two kings and their aids.

After this, there followed retaill maskes, and on the saturdaye the four and twentieth of June, the king of England with foure companies, in euerie companie ten, trimlie appointed in masking apparell, rode to Ard: and likewise the French king accompanied with eight and thirtie persons as maskers repaired to Cusines. They met on the waie, & each companie passed by other without any countenance making or disfavoring. They were honorablie received, as well at the one place as the other. And when they had ended their pastime, banquetting, and dances, they returned and met againe on the way homeward, and then putting off their visards, they lovinglie embraced: and after amiable communication together, they took leave each of other, & for a remembrance gave gifts either to other verie rich and princelie.

During this triumph, much people of Flanders and west Flanders drew to Cusines, to see the king of England & his honor, to whom vittels of the court were given in plenty, the conduit of the gate did run wine alwaies. There were vagabonds, plovmen, labourers, and of the bragerie, wagoners and beggers, that for drunkenness laie in routs and heapes. So great resort came thither, that knights and ladies, who were come to see the nobleness, were faine to lie in haie and straw, and held them thereof highly pleased. From the court of the emperor, noz of the ladie Margarets court, noz of Flanders,abant, noz Burgognie came neuer a person to answer to the chalenge. By that it seemed that there was small love betwene the emperor & the French king. Moreover, monsieur Fajot capitaine of Bullogne with monsieur Chastillon, did their denoir to have taken the towne of saint Omer, of which doing was thought no goodnesse to the emperor.]

On mondaie the five and twentieth of June, the king with the quene removed from Cusines to Calis, where he remained till the tenth of Julie, on which daie he rode to Graueling, and was received on the waie by the emperor, and so by him conducted to Graueling, where not onlie the king, but also all his traine was cheered and feasted, with following manner, that the Englishmen highly praised the emperours court. [When the French king and his lords had knowledge of the meeting of the emperor and the king of England in the towne of Graueling, they were therewith greatlie grieved, as by manie things appeared. For as the Englishmen were in France disdained, and in their lutes there greatlie deferred, and had little right, and much lesse favour: so from day to day still more and more began hartburning, and in conclusion open warre did arise betwene the two realmes.]

On Wednesdaye the eleventh of Julie, the emperor and his aunt the ladie Margaret duchesse of Sauoy came with the king of England to the towne of Calis, and there continued in great ioy and solace, with feasting, banquetting, dancing and masking untill the fourteenth of Julie. For the intertaining of these estates (the English lords and gentlemen displaced of their lodgings to serve the other and their traine) there was builded a banquetting house eight hundred foot compasse, like a theatre, after a goodlie devise, builded in such maner as (I thinke) was neuer scene, with firtene principals made of great masts, betwixt euerie mast foure and twentieth foot, and all the outsidcs closed with boyd and canvas.

Ouer it, and within round about by the sides, were made thre scaffolds or lofts one above another for men and women to stand upon. And in the midst of the same banquetting house, was set by a great pillar of timber made of eight great masts, bound together with iron bands, for to hold them together: for it was an hundred and foure and thirtie foot of length, and cost six pounds thirtene shillings and fourepence to set it byright. The banquetting house was covered ouer with canvas, fastened with ropes and iron as fast as might be devised. And within the said house was painted the heauens, with starres, sunne, moone, and clouds, with diuerse other things made about our mens heads: and there were great images of wickers covered, and made like great men of diuerse strange nations: and diuerse reasones were written by them of the countries that they likened to be of, with the armes of those countries hanging by them.

Also there was made as it were manie ships under saile, and windmills going, and about the high pillar of timber that stood byright in the midst, was made stages of timber for organs and other instruments to stand upon, and men to plaie on them, & for other musicians & pageants to be plaied, when the king of England & the emperor should be at their banquet. But in the morning of the same day, the wind began to rise, & at night blew off the canvas, and all the elements, with the starres, sunne, moone, and clouds, and the wind blew out about a thousand torches, and other lights of wax, that were prepared to give light to the banquet, & all the kings seats that were made with great riches, besides all other things, were all dashed and lost.]

The same daie at night that the states were intertained, the king and his estate persons were appareled all in blacke velvet covered with cloth of gold, cut on the velvet, fastened with knots of gold, on the which knots hang spangles of gold like tuzza, and bonnets of the same, & clothes of crimlin sattin and cloth of gold wrapped traucers, and their buskins of the same cloth of gold. All these lustie maskers went to the emperours lodging, and were received, and in the chamber of presence danced and reuelled, the which at the emperours request, the king and other disordered themselves, whereby the king was knowne: then the king took his leane, and departed for that night. On tuesday the twelfth of Julie, because the banquetting house could not be finished, the emperour and the ladie Margaret supped with the king & the queene at the chequer, where the same night after supper reuelled ninetie and six maskers: after the reuels was a banquet, after which banquet the king brought the emperour and the ladie Margaret to the stape, and after withdrew him.

This night were eight companies of maskers, and in euery companie twelue persons all in gold, silver and velvet, richly appareled, but because the roome was small, the shew was the lesse. In these reuels were put in maskers apparell diuerse gentlemen of the French court vnderwriting to the R. or anie other that bare rule. For diuerse young gentlemen of the French court fancied more the French partie, than the emperours partie; through which means they saw and much more heard than they should haue done. On friday the thirtieth daie of Julie, the emperour did intend to haue departed from Calis, but the counsell was such that he departed not that night.

On saturday the fourteenth of Julie, the emperour took his leane of the queene of England his aunt, and departed toward Grauling, being conducted on his waie by the king of England, to a village towards Flanders called Wlack, and there they embraced and took their leane either of other in most louing manner. They did not altogether spend the time thus while they were together, in vaine pleasures, and sporting reuels; for the charters before time concluded were read ouer, and all the articles of the league tripartite, agreed betwixt the emperour, the king of England, and the French king, were at full declared, to the which the French king had fullie consented. And for the more proofe thereof, and exemplification of the same, he sent monsieur de Noch with letters of credence to the emperour, that in the word of a prince he would obserue, fulfill, performe and keepe all the same articles, for him, his realme and subiects. Shortlie after that the emperour and the king had taken leane each of other, and were departed, the king shipped, and with the queene and all other the nobilitie returned safelie into England.

The king kept his Christmas at Wrenthwith this yeare, with much noblenesse and open court. And the tenth daie of Februarie, in his owne person, inlisted with all commanders. On Twelue daie his grace and the earle of Denonshire, with foure aids, answered at the tournaie all commanders, which were sixtine persons: noble and rich was their apparell, but in feats of armes the king excelled the rest. About this time the king hauing regard to the common welth of his realme, considered how for the space of fiftie yeares past and more, the nobles and gentlemen of England, being giuen to grasur of cattell, and keeping of sheepe, had inuented a meane how to increase their yearelie reuenues, to the great decaye and vnderdoing of husbandmen of the land. For the said nobles and gentlemen, after the manner of the Spaniards, more studing how to increase their pastures, than to mainteine tillage, began to decaye husband tacks & tenements, and to convert arable ground into pasture, furnishing the same with beastes and sheepe, and also deere, so inclosing the field with hedges, ditches, and pales, which they held in their owne hands, ingrossing twelues, and selling the same, and also sheepe and beastes at their owne prices, and as might stand most with their owne private commodity.

Whereof a threefold euill chanced to the common wealth, as Polydor noteth. One, for that there by the number of husbandmen was sore diminished the which the prince bleth chieflie in his seruice for the warres: an other, for that manie townes and villages were left desolate, and became ruinous: the third, for that both wolle and cloth made thereof, and the flesh of all maner beastes used to be eaten, was sold at far higher prices than was accustomed. These enormities at the first beginning being not redressed, grew in short space to such force and vigour by euill custome, that afterwards they gathered to such vnlimited force, that hardly they could be remedied. Such like a disease, which in the beginning with litle paine to the patient, and lesse labour to the surgeon maie be cured; whereas the same by delaye and negligence being suffered to putrifie, becommeth a desperate soze, and then are medicines nothing available, and not to be applied, according to his opinion that said:

The king therefore causing such good statutes as had bene deuised and established for reformation in this behalfe, to be reuised and called vpon, took order by directing forth his commissions vnto the iustices of peace, and other such magistrats, that presentment should be had and made of all such inclosures and decaye of husbandrie, as had chanced within the space of fiftie yeares before that present time. The iustices and other magistrats, according to their commission executed the same. And so commandment was giuen, that the decayed houses should be built by againe, that the husbandmen should be placed effconies in the same, and that inclosed grounds should be laid open, and soze punishment appointed against them that disobeyed.

These so good and wholesome ordinances shoulde after were defeated by meanes of bybes giuen vnto the cardinal: for when the nobles and gentlemen, which had for their pleasures inclosed the common fields, were loth to haue the same againe disparted, they redeemed their veyation with good summes of monie; and so had licence to keepe their parks and grounds inclosed as before. Thus the great expectation which men had conceiued of a generall redresse, proued void: holobrit, some part of the husbandmen in some parts of the realme got by the means of this matter, where inclosures were already laid open, yer mistresse monie could preuent them; and so they intoid these commons, which before had bene taken from them.

After that this matter for inclosures was thus dispatched, the cardinal boiling in hatred against the duke of Buckingham, & thirsting for his blood, deuised to make Charles Kneuet, that had bene the dukes surueior, and put from him (as ye haue heard) an instrument to bring the duke to destruction. This Kneuet being had in examination before the cardinal, disclosed all the dukes life. And first he bittered, that the duke was accustomed by waie of talke, to saie, how he meant so to vse the matter, that he would attaine to the crowne, if king Henrie chanced to die without issue: & that he had talke and conference of that matter on a time with George Nevill, lord of Abergauennie, vnto whom he had giuen his daughter in marriage; and also that he threatened to punish the cardinal for his manifold misdoings, being without cause his mortall enimie.

The cardinal hauing gotten that which he sought for, encouraged, comforted, and procured Kneuet, with manie comfortable words and great promises, that he should with a bold spirit and countenance obiect and laie these things to the dukes charge, with more if he knew it when time requires. Then Kneuet partie prouoked with desire to be reuenged, and partlie moued with hope of reward, openlie confessed, that the duke had once fullie determined to deuise meanes how to make the king away, being brought into a full hope that he should be king, by a vaine prophesie which one Nicholas Hopkins, a monke of an house of the Chartreux order beside Wistow, called Henton, sometime his confessor, had opened vnto him.

The cardinall hauing thus taken the examinatio<sup>10</sup> on of kinener, went vnto the king, and declared vnto him, that his person was in danger by such traitorous purpose, as the duke of Buckingham had conceived in his heart, and shewed how that now there is manifest tokens of his wicked pretence: wherefore, he exhorted the king to prouide for his owne safetie with speed. The king hearing the accusation, enforced to the bittermost by the cardinall, made this answer: If the duke haue deserved to be punished, let him haue according to his deserts. The duke her<sup>20</sup> vpon was sent for by to London, & at his coming thither, was straightwaies attached, and brought to the Tower by sir Henrie Martie, capteine of the gard, the sixteenth of Aprill. There was also attached the foresaid Chartreux monke, maister John de la Car alias de la Court, the dukes confessor, and sir Gilbert Perke priest, the dukes chancellor.

After the apprehension of the duke, inquisitions were taken in diuerse shires of England of him; so that by the knights and gentlemen, he was indicted of high treason, for certeine words spoken (as before he haue heard) by the same duke at Blesingtie, to the lord of Burgaunne: and therewith was the same lord attached for concelement, and so likewise was the lord Pontacute, and both led to the Tower. Sir Edward Penill, brother to the said lord of Burgaunne, was forbidden the kings presence. Moreouer, in the Guildhall, within the citie of London, before John Bugge knight, then lord maior of the same citie, by an inquest whereof one Miles Gerrard was foreman, the said duke was indicted of diuerse points of high treason, as by the same indictment it appeareth.

Panelie, that the said duke intending to exalt himselfe, and to surpe the crowne, the totall power, and dignitie of the realme of England, and to depriue the kings maiestie thereof, that he the said duke might take vpon him the same; against his allegiance, had the tenth daie of March, in the second yeere of the kings maiesties reigne, and at diuerse other times before and after, imagined and compassed the kings death and destruction at London, & at Thorneburie, in the countie of Gloucester. And for the accomplishment of his wicked intent and purpose (as in the indictment is alledged) the twentieth and fourth daie of Aprill, in the fourth yeere of the kings reigne he sent one of his chapleins called John de la Court, to the priorie of Henton in Summerfethshire, which was an house of the Chartreux monks. The effect or substance of whose message was, to vnderstand of one Nicholas Hopkins, a monke of the same house (who was vaineleie reputed by waie of reuelation to haue foreknowledge of things to come) what should happen concerning the matters which he had imagined. Which monke, causing the said de la Court first to sweare vnto him, not to disclose his words to a<sup>30</sup> nie manner of person, but onlie to the duke his maister: therewith declared, that his maister the said duke should haue all, willing him for the accomplishment of his purpose, to seeke to win the fauour of the people. De la Court came backe with this answer, and told it to the duke at Thorneburie the morrow after, being the twentieth fift of Aprill.

Also the two and twentieth of Iulie in the same fourth yeare, the duke sent the same de la Court with letters vnto the said monke, to vnderstand of him further of such matters: and the monke told him againe for answer, that the duke should haue all. And being asked as well now, as before at the first time, how he knew this to be true: he said, By the grace of God. And with this answer de la Court now also returning, declared the same vnto the duke, the twentieth fourth of Iulie at Thorneburie aforesaid. Moreouer, the said duke sent the same de la Court againe to the said monke with his letters, the six and twentieth of Aprill, in the fift yeare of the kings reigne, when the king was to take his iourne into France; requiring to vnderstand what should become of these warres: and whether the Scottish king should in the kings absence invade the realme or not. The monke (among other things) for answer of these letters, sent the duke word, that the king should haue no issue male.

Again, the said duke the twentieth daie of February, in the first yeare of the kings reigne, being at Thorneburie, spake these words vnto Kase earle of Westmerland; Well, there are two new dukes created here in England, but if ought but good come to the king, the duke of Buckingham should be next in blood to succeed to the crowne. After this, the said duke on the sixteenth daie of Aprill, in the said first yeare of the kings reigne, went in person vnto the priorie of Henton, and there had conference with the foresaid monke, Nicholas Hopkins, who told him, that he should be king. Wherevnto the duke said, that if it so chanced, he would shew himselfe a just and a righteous prince. The monke also told the duke, that he knew this by reuelation, and willed him in anie wise to procure the lone of the commons, the better to attaine his purposed intention.

The duke at the same time gaue, and promised to giue yearelie vnto the said priorie, six pounds, therewith to buie a tun of wine. And further he promised to giue vnto the same priorie, in readie monie twentieth pounds, whereof ten pounds he gaue in hand, towards the conueieng of water vnto the house by a conduit. And to the said monke Nicholas Hopkins he gaue at that present in reward thre pounds, and at an other time fortie shillings, at an other time a marke, and at an other time six shillings eight pence. After this, the twentieth daie of March, in the tenth yeare of the kings reigne, he came to the same priorie, & with him had conference with the said monke, to be more fullie informed by him in the matters aboue specified. At what time the monke also told him, that he should be king. The duke in talke told the monke, that he had done verie well, to bind his chapleine John de la Court, vnder the scale of confession, to keepe secret such matter: for if the king should come to the knowledge thereof, it would be his destruction.

Likewise, the twentieth daie of October, in the seventh yeare of the kings reigne, and at diuerse other times, as well before as after, the said duke had sent his chancellor Robert Gilbert chapleine, vnto London, there to buie certeine cloathes of gold, silver, and beluets, euerie time so much as amounted to the worth of thre hundred pounds; to the intent the said duke might bestow the same, as well vpon knights, esquires, gentlemen of the kings house, and yeomen of his gard, as vpon other the kings subiects, to win their fauours and friendships to adde him in his euill purpose. Which cloathes the said Gilbert did buie, and brought the same vnto the said duke, who the twentieth daie of Januarie, in the said seventh yeare, & diuerse other daies and yeeres before and after, did distribute and giue the same vnto certeine of the kings subiects for the purpose aforesaid.

The monke reuelation was preiemptorie to the duke.

But herein the monke lied.

The duke & the monke haue conference such the indictment.

rected, as by the indictment it was inferred.

Furthermore, the said duke, the tenth of Julie, in the tenth yeare of the kings reigne, and diuerse other daies and times, as well before as after, did constitute more severall and particular officers in his castles, honours, lordships, and lands than he was accustomed to haue, to the end they might be assistant to him, under colour of such offices, to bring his euill purpose to passe. Moreover, the same duke sent vnto the king the tenth of Maie, in the ninth yeare of his reigne, for licence to reteine anie of the kings subiects, whome it should please him, dwelling within the shires of Beresford, Gloucester, and Summersetshire; and also, that he might at his pleasure conueie diuerse armors, and habillements for warre into Wales, to the intent to vse the same against the king as the indictment imported, for the accomplishing of his naughtie purpose, which was to deströie the king and to vsurpe the roiall gouernement and potuer to himselfe.

Which sute for licence to haue reteiners, and to conueie such armors and habillements of warre, the said Gilbert, the twentieth daie of Maie, in the said ninth yeare, and diuerse other daies before and after, at London, and east Greenwich did followe, labouring earnestlie, both to the king and counsell, for obtaininge the same. On the twentieth daie of Julie in the said ninth yeare, the said duke sent the said Gilbert vnto Henton aforesaid, to vnderstand of the said monke Nicholas Hopkins, what he heard of him: and the monke sent him word, that before Christmas next there should be a change, & that the duke should haue the rule and gouernement of all England. And moreover, the twentieth of februarye, in the eleuenth yeare of the kings reigne, at Blechingie in the countie of Surrie, the said duke said vnto the said Robert Gilbert his chancelor, that he did expect and tarie for a time more conuenient to atchieue his purpose, and that it might easilie be done, if the nobles of this realme would declare their minds together: but some of them mistrusted, and feared to shew their minds together: and that marred all.

He said further at the same time to the said Gilbert, that what so euer was done by the kings father, was done by wrong. And still he murmured against all that the king then presentlie reigning did. And further he said, that he knew himselfe to be so wicked a sinner, that he wanted Gods fauour: and therefore he knew, that what so euer he took in hand against the king had the worst successe. And furthermore, the said duke (to alienate the minds of the kings subiects from their dutifull obedience towards the said king and his heires) on the twentieth daie of September, in the first yeare of his reigne, being then at London, reported vnto the said Robert Gilbert, that he had a certeine writing sealed with the kings great seale, comprehending a certeine act of parlement, in the which it was enacted, that the duke of Summerset one of the kings progenitors was made legitimate: and further, that the said duke meant to haue deliuered the same writing vnto king Henrie the seuenth, but (said he) I would not that I had so done for ten thousand pounds.

And furthermore, the same duke on the fourth of September, in the eleuenth yeare of the kings reigne, at east Greenwich in the countie of Kent, said vnto one Charles Kneuet esquier, after that the king had reposed the duke for reteining William Bulmer knight into his seruice, that if he had perceived that he should haue bene committed to the Towre (as he doubted he should haue bene) he would haue so wrought, that the principall doers therein should not haue had cause of great reioysing: for he would haue played the part which his father intended to haue put in practise against king Richard the third at Southburie, who made earnest sute to haue come vnto the presence of the same king Richard: which sute if he might haue obtained, he hauing a knife secretlie about him, would haue thrust it into the bodie of king Richard, as he had made semblance to kinde before him. And in speaking these words, he maliciouslie laid his hand vpon his dagger, and said, that if he were so euill vsed, he would doe his best to accomplish his pretended purpose, swearing to confirme his word by the blood of our Lord.

Beside all this, the same duke the tenth of Maie, in the twelfth yeare of the kings reigne, at London in a place called the Rose, within the parish of saint Laurence Poultie in Cantuarie street ward, demanded of the said Charles Kneuet esquier, what was the talke amongst the Londoners concerning the kings iourneie beyond the seas? And the said Charles told him, that manie stood in doubt of that iourneie, least the Frenchmen meant some deceit towards the king. Whereto the duke answered, that it was to be feared, least it would come to passe, according to the words of a certeine holie monke. For there is (saith he) a Chartreux monke, that diuerse times hath sent to me, willing me to send vnto him my chancelor: and I did send vnto him John de la Court my chapleine, vnto whome he would not declare anie thing, till de la Court had sworn vnto him to keepe all things secret, and to tell no creature living what he should heare of him, except it were to me.

And then the said monke told de la Court, that neither the king nor his heires should prosper, and that I should inducure my selfe to purchase the good wils of the communitie of England: for I the same duke and my blood should prosper, and haue the rule of the realme of England. Then said Charles Kneuet: The monke maie be deceived though the diuels illusion: and that it was euill to meddle with such matters. Well (said the duke) it cannot hurt me, and so (saith the indictment) the duke seemed to reioise in the monks words. And further, at the same time, the duke told the said Charles, that if the king had miscaried now in his last sicknesse, he would haue chopped off the heads of the cardinal, of sir Thomas Louell knight, and of others; and also said, that he had rather die for it, than to be vsed as he had bene.

Moreover, on the tenth daie of September, in the said eleuenth yeare of this kings reigne, at Blechingie, in the countie of Surrie, walking in the gallerie there with George Penill knight, lord Aburgauennie, the duke murmuring against the kings counsellors, and there gouernement, said vnto the said George: that if the king died, he would haue the rule of the realme in spite of who so euer said the contrarie; and withall said, that if the said lord Aburgauennie would say, that the duke had spoken such words, he would fight with him, and lay his sword vpon his pate: & this he bound vpon with manie great othes. These were the speciall articles & points comprised in the indictment, and laid to his charge: but how true, or in what sort proved, I haue not further to say, either in accusing or excusing him, other than as I find in Hall and Polydor, whose words in effect, I haue thought to impart to the reader, and without anie partiall weighing of the same either to or fro.

Having that (I trust) I maie without offense saie, that (as the rumour then went) the cardinal chiefe procured the death of this noble man, no lesse favoured and beloued of the people of this realme in that season, than the cardinal himselfe was hated and enuied. Which thing caused the dukes fall the more to be pitied and lamented, sith he was the men of all ether, that chiefe lie went about to crosse the cardinall in his lordlie demeanors, & he adie proceedings. But to the purpose. Shortly after that the duke had bene indicted (as before ye haue heard) he was arreigned in Westminster hall, before the duke of Norfolk, being made by the kings letters patents high steward of England, to accomplish the high cause of appeale of the pères or pères of the realme, and to discerne and iudge the cause of the pères.

There were also appointed to sit as pères and iudges upon the said duke of Buckingham, the duke of Suffolke, the marques Dorset, the earls of Worcester, Devonshire, Essex, Salisburie, Kent, Derby, and Derby, the lord of saint Johns, the lord de la Mare, the lord Fitz Warren, the lord Willoughby, the lord Brooke, the lord Cobham, the lord Herbert, and the lord Howse. There was made within the hall at Westminster a scaffold for these lords, and a pience for a iudge, raised and counterrailed about, and barred with degrees. When the lords had taken their place, the duke was brought to the barre, and upon his arreignment pleaded not guiltie, and put himselfe upon his pères. Then was his indictment read, which the duke denied to be true, and (as he was an eloquent man) alleged reasons to falsifie the indictment; pleading the matter for his owne justification verie pithilie and earnestlie. The kings attourneie against the dukes reasons alleged the examinations, confessions, and pofes of witnesses.

The duke desired that the witnesses might be brought forth. And then came before him Charles Inceuet, Perke, de la Court, & Hopkins the monke of the priorie of the Charterhouse beside Bath, which like a false hypocrite had induced the duke to the treason with his false forged prophesies. Diuerse presumptions and accusations were laid vnto him by Charles Inceuet, which he would faine haue couered. The depositions were read, & the deponents deliuered as prisoners to the officers of the Tower. Then spake the duke of Norfolk, and said: My lord, the king our soveraigne lord hath commanded that you shall haue his lawes ministered with fauour and right to you. Therefore if you haue anie other thing to say for your selfe, you shall be heard. Then he was commanded to withdraue him, and so was led into Paradise, a house so named. The lords went to counsell a great while, and after toke their places.

Then said the duke of Norfolk to the duke of Suffolke: What say you of sir Edward duke of Buckingham touching the high treasons? The duke of Suffolke answered: He is guiltie: & so said the marques and all the other earls and lords. Thus was this prince duke of Buckingham found guiltie of high treason, by a duke, a marques, seuen earls, & twelue barons. The duke was brought to the barre soe charging, and sweet marnellouslie; & after he had made his reuerence, he paused a while. The duke of Norfolk as iudge said: Sir Edward, you haue heard how you be indicted of high treason, you pleaded thereto not guiltie, putting your selfe to the pères of the realme, which haue found you guiltie. Then the duke of Norfolk wept and said: You shall be led to the kings prison, and there laid on a hardle, and so draue to the place of execution, and there be hanged, cut downe alive, your members cut off and cast into the fire, your bowels burnt before you, your head smitten off, and your bodie quartered and diuided at the kings will, and God haue mercie on your soule, Amen.

The duke of Buckingham said, My lord of Norfolk, you haue said as a traitor should be said vnto, but I was neuer anie: but my lords I nothing maligne for that you haue done to me, but the eternall God forgive you my death, and I do: I shall neuer sue to the king for life, howbeit he is a gracious prince, and more grace may come from him than I desire. I desire you my lords and all my fellowes to pray for me. Then was the edge of the axe turned towards him, and he led into a barge. Sir Thomas Louell desired him to sit on the cushions and carpet ordeined for him. He said nay; for when I went to Westminster I was duke of Buckingham, now I am but Edward Bohune the most cattife of the world. Thus they landed at the Temple, where received him sir Nicholas Watse & sir William Sands baronets, and led him through the citie, & desired euer the people to pray for him, of whom some wept and lamented, and said: This is the end of euill life, God forgive him, he was a proud prince, it is pitie that he behaued him so against his king and liege lord, whom God preferue. Thus about foure of the clocke he was brought as a cast man to the Tower.

On fridaie the seuenteenth daie of Maie, about eleven of the clocke, this duke of Buckingham, earle of Hereford, Stafford, and Northampton, with a great power was deliuered to John Keime & John Sherington shirffes, who led him to the scaffold on Tower hill, where he said he had offended the kings grace through negligence and lacke of grace, and desired all noble men to beware by him, and all men to pray for him, and that he trusted to die the kings true man. Thus makelie with an axe he toke his death. When the Augustine friers toke his bodie, and head, and buried them. Alas that euer the grace of truth was withdraue from so noble a man, that he was not to his king in allegiance as he ought to haue bene! Such is the end of ambition, the end of false prophesies, the end of euill life, and euill counsell; but speciallie the end of malice, which grew to so huge and monstrous a fire in the hautie hart of the proud cardinal, that nothing could alluage it, but the blood of this noble duke, against whom he had procured this procees in iudgement ended with the execution of death: the torments thereof were (as it seemeth by the sentence of the iudge) much diminished through the mercie of the king.

For though his offense was traitorous, and therefore deserued as law had prouided, and the iudge defined; yet in respect of the offenders person, the kings fauor dispensed with the rigour of iudgement, so that he was beheaded onlie, and his bodie not dismembred. This duke had begun a great and sumptuous building at his manor of Thornburie, but left the same unfinished. He made a faire parke hard by the same building, for the which he toke in much and fruitfull ground. Also another parke at Eastwood, one mile off, he enlarged at two times to the compasse of six miles, for the which deed, and such like, he had manie a curse of the poore tenants. At the time of his death (no doubt) his conscience (giving in greater euidence than 10000 witnesses) told him whether he was iustlie condemned or no. For a mans dieng day is as a bill of information, putting him in mind of his life well or ill spent, as one saith:

Quomodo vita tibi sit prius acta fuit.*

Gloceſter.

Walter conſtable of England in the time of William the Conquerour, and of William Ruſus ſucceeded Alfgarus. Here (before I ſaie anie more) I thinke it not amiſſe to ſet downe ſomewhat touching William Fitz Osberne, or Osbert earle of Hereford, whome manie will haue to be conſtable in the time of the Conquerour: which truelie I can not as yet be led to believe. For although that this William was the onelie man, who both perſuaded, encouraged, and procured aid of others to aſſiſt William Conquerour for the obtaining of England; and that this man was (as we commonlie ſaie) the onelie right hand, cheſe compeller, and diſpoſer of the kingdome, after that William the Conquerour had obtained the ſame, being alſo Tribunus militum of all the armie that William Conquerour led into England, and the man that perſuaded the biſhop of Samborow to compound for the title of the king of Denmark made vnto England: yet I ſuppoſe him not to be conſtable, but onelie marſhall of England; or at the leaſt if he were, it could not be verie long. For that this earle was extreme old, departed the realme, and diſpoſed all the affaires of the Norman baſſard beyond the ſeas, and died about the yeare of our redemption 1072, being about the eight yeare of the reigne of William Conquerour.

Oslo of Hereford.

Oslo the ſonne of the ſaid Walter, an enimie to king Stephen (who yet confirmed him in his fathers inheritance) was aduanced firſt to great honors by Henrie the firſt: who meeting Mauid the emperreſſe at Wiſtow, and taking hir for lawfull queene, did continually follow hir faction: for which ſhe, in the firſt yeare of king Stephen, to honour him for his good ſeruiſe (as appeareth by the charter thereof) gaue him the earldome of Hereford, conſtableſhip of England, the caſtell of Wironell, & the forreſt of Deane. He was lord alſo of Breckenocke. He tranſlated the chanons of the monaſterie of ſaint Iohns of Lanthonie, in the yeare of our redemption 1103, being the fourth yeare of king Henrie the firſt, to a place nere Gloceſter, then called Wyde, and ſince Lanthonie; as Iohn Stow hath well noted out of other authors.

10 He married Sibilla the daughter of Bernard Newmarch, a nobleman of Normandie, who obtained by conqueſt the lordſhip of Breckenocke: by whome he had ſiue ſonnes and three daughters. The ſonnes were Roger, Walter, Henrie, William and Osbaell. His three daughters were, Margarete, married to Humfreie Bohune; Bertha the ſecond was married to Philip Buiſe, created by king Stephen lord of Buiſe, Colwer, Wauld, & Wymbles, and in his wiues right lord of Breckenocke; Lucia married to Herbert the ſonne of Herbert, baſe ſonne to Henrie the firſt, who was (in hir right) lord of the forreſt of Deane: he died in the eight or (as others haue) the ninth yeare of king Stephen, being the yeare of our redemption 1143.

William (the ſonne of Walter Beauchampe) <sup>William Beauchampe</sup> thirſt of Gloceſter, was made high conſtable of England by king Stephen, in the firſt yeare of his reigne, being in the yeare of our redemption 1139, when the king was at Gloceſter: which honour he toke from Osiles of Gloceſter; as ſaith that painefull antiquarie Iohn Stow in his chronicle printed in the yeare of our Lord 1580, fol. 191.

Roger the ſonne of Oslo ſucceeded his father in all his inheritance, as well of the earldome, as otherwiſe: whereby he was in time following alſo conſtable of England, and (as it is moſt probable) reſtoꝛed to that office by Henrie the ſecond: for that he was a great enimie to king Stephen. He went amongſt others with Henrie Fitz Emperreſſe to Dauid king of Scots, who knighted the ſaid Henrie in the foureteenth yeare of king Stephen: he married Cecilie the daughter of Iohn Fitz Paine, and died without iſſue.

Walter ſecond ſonne to Oslo, after the death of his brother Roger was earle of Hereford, conſtable of England, and lord ouer Wenthie or Wenthie: he builded in the time of Henrie the firſt the caſtels of Gloceſter, Wiſtow, and Rochefter, with the Tower of London: he held the land of Wenthie by long time, who hauing no heire of his bodie gaue the ſame land to Henrie of Hereford, and for ſaking the world toke monaſtical habit on him at Lanthonie, where he was buried, dieng without iſſue.

Henrie of Hereford the ſonne of Oslo, after the enterance of Walter his brother into religion, was earle of Hereford, conſtable of England, and lord of Breckenocke and Deane; who was in Wenthie at a conflict ſlaine by his owne men, and buried at Lanthonie with Walter the conſtable: after whoſe death Henrie the ſecond deputed Jago ap Seiffell to the cuſtodie of the land of Wenthie.

William the ſonne of Oslo, and brother to Henrie of Hereford, was conſtable of England, after the death of his brother, and died without iſſue.

Osbaell the yongest ſonne of Oslo, after the death of William, was conſtable of England, who died without iſſue: whome I ſcare not to place as conſtable, ſince all hiſtoꝛies agree that all the ſons of Oslo did ſucceſſiuelie inioie that office, after whome the inheritance coming to their ſiſter, whereof the eldeſt called Margaret (or Margerie) was married to Humfreie Bohune, which line of the Bohunes became afterwards conſtables of England by inheritance.

Henrie

Humfrie de Bohune, steward to Henrie the first, (the sonne of Humfrie de Bohune, steward in house to William Rufus, sonne to Humfrie de Bohune that came in with the Conquerour) was (in the right of his wife Margerie one of the daughters and heire of the foresaid Apulo) constable of England, he had issue Humfrie de Bohune.

Humfrie de Bohune, constable of England, married Margaret sister to William king of Scots and daughter to the earle of Huntingdon, mother to Canon earle of Britaine: he had issue Henrie. This Margaret died the third of king John, being the yeare of Christ 1201. And this Humfrie also died in the time of king John, as some haue: or rather (as others haue) in the time of king Richard the first.

Henrie de Bohune, the sonne of the said Humfrie and Margaret, was the first earle of Hereford of that name of the Bohunes, contrarie to that received error, which hitherto hath made the other Bohunes earle of Hereford: and contrarie to the printed pedigree of the deceased father of the earle of Essex now living. For this man, being the first erle of the Bohunes, was made earle of Hereford in the first yeare of king John, as the charter doth witness. He was also constable of England, and married Matow, the daughter and heire of Cessie lord of Logarfall sometime earle of Essex, in whose right his husband was intituled to that honoz of the earldome of Essex, by whom he had issue Humfrie his heire. He died about the fourth yeare of Henrie the third, being the yeare of our redemption 1220, in his journey as he went to Jerusalem with other noble men.

Humfrie de Bohune sonne of Henrie, being the second of that name that was erle of Hereford, was also earle of Essex and constable of England, being by all men termed La bone counte de Hereford. He married Matow the daughter of the earle of Erie in Normandis, he had issue Humfrie de Bohune that was taken in the yeare of Christ 1265, being the fourth and ninth of king Henrie the third at the battell of Cuesham, and died in the life of his father, leaving behind him a sonne called Humfrie, heire to him and to his father, which Humfrie the father died in the yeare of our redemption 1275, being the third yeare of king Edward the first.

Humfrie de Bohune the third earle of Hereford of that name, the sonne of Humfrie Bohune slaine at the battell of Cuesham, was after the death of his grandfather erle of Hereford and Essex, and constable of England, he married Matow de Fferens, or Fferens, and had issue Humfrie, this earle died in the yeare of our redemption 1298, being the twentieth first of Edward the first, & was buried at Walden with his wife Matow.

Humfrie de Bohune the fourth erle of Hereford of that name, was earle of Hereford, Essex, and constable of England, he married Elizabeth the daughter to king Edward the first, and widow to John earle of Holland, he had issue John erle of Hereford, Humfrie earle of Hereford, and William earle of Northampton. This Humfrie taking part with Thomas earle of Lancaster was slaine at Worwode by a Welshman standing under a bridge that thrust him thorough with a spear, in the fourteenth yeare of the reigne of king Edward the second, being the yeare of our redemption 1321.

John de Bohune the eldest sonne of this Humfrie, being the first earle of Hereford, was after the death of his father earle of Hereford, Essex, and constable of England, he married the daughter of Edmund Fitz Alen earle of Arundell, and died without issue in the yeare of Christ 1335, being the ninth yeare of king Edward the third. He was buried in the abbeie of Stratford besides London.

Humfrie de Bohune first earle of Hereford, being brother to John de Bohune, whom he succeeded, was after the death of his brother earle of Hereford and Essex, and constable of England, he died without issue in the yeare of our Lord 1361, being the thirtieth first of king Edward the third, and was buried at the Augustine friers in London.

William de Bohune seventh erle of Hereford of that surname, being the sonne of the other Humfrie and brother to the last Humfrie, was at a parlement holden in the tenth yeare of the reigne of king Edward the third, being in the yeare of our Lord 1336, created earle of Northampton, and after the death of his brother Humfrie, he was earle of Hereford and Essex, and constable of England. He was in the eighteenth yeare of Edward the third, being the yeare of Christ 1344, sent into Britaine as generall ouer the English armie, to restore John de Montford to the dukedome of Britaine: which he did, putting Charles de Blois to flight. He married Elizabeth some laie Cleano, one of the daughters and heires of Bartholomew Blafincure baron of Bedes in Kent, by whom he had issue Humfrie.

Humfrie de Bohune, the eighth last erle of Hereford of that surname of Bohune, was after the death of William his father earle of Hereford, Essex and Northampton, and constable of England. He augmented the castell of Brecknocke, first built by Bernard Selwmarck. He in the eight and twentieth yeare of Edward the third (as Iohn Stow noteth) being the yeare of Christ 1354, reedified the frier Augustines church in London, in which he was buried. He married Jone the daughter of Richard Fitz Alen erle of Arundell, by whom he had issue two daughters and heires, Cleano, the eldest, married to Thomas of Woodstocke; and Marie the second, married to Henrie of Bolingbroke, after king of England, by the name of king Henrie the fourth.

Thomas of Woodstocke the first sonne to king Edward the third, was created earle of Buckingham, in the first yeare of Richard the second at his coronation, being the yeare of our Lord 1377, and after duke of Gloucester, in the eighth yeare of Richard the second 1385. He married Cleano, eldest daughter of Humfrie Bohune (as before) in whose right he was earle of Essex, Northampton, and constable of England, besides which he was also lord of Brecknocke. He had issue one son & foure daughters: his sonne was Humfrie erle of Buckingham, whom R. Richard (after the murdering of his father at Calis) sent into Ireland, where he remained as prisoner untill the time of king Henrie the fourth; which called him home: who returning into England, died of the plague without issue at Chester: after whom his mother lived not long. Of whose death thus writeth that worthy poet sir Iohn Gower knight, living at that time, in his booke of the historie of Richard the second, and Henrie the fourth, commonlie taken as part of his worke intituled & named, Vox clamantis:

Defuncto nato cito post de sine beato.

Matrem transiit dum nati funera sinit.

*Primo decessit * Cignus, dolor unde represit*

Matrem cum pullo sibi mors nec paruit in villo.

The foure daughters, heires to Thomas of Woodstocke & their brother Humfrie, were Anne the eldest, married to Edmund Stafford erle of Stafford, who had issue Humfrie erle of Stafford, Hereford, & Northampton, lord of Brecknocke, &c: which Anne after the death of erle Stafford was the second time maried William vicont Southham created erle of Ewe in France: the second daughter was Philip, which died without issue: the third Ione, was married to Gilbert lord Talbot: the fourth Isabell, was a religious person at the Monasties in London. His duke of Gloucester was murdered at Calis about the yeare of Christ 1398, being the 22 yeare of Richard the second, touching whose life and death, with the manner thereof, thus writeth the said sir Iohn Gower, in the same booke intituled Vox clamantis:

O quam fortuna stabili non permanet una, Exemplum cuius fiat in ordine carminis huius, Rex agit: Cygnus patitur de corde benignus, Ille prostratus non est de rege leuitus, Ad Phesye captus tunc est velut hostia raptus, Rex iubet arma geri nec eo voluit misereri, Cum sponsa nati lugent quasi morte gravati, Phisga lupo secuit rex dummodo famina steruit, Nil pietas munit quem tunc manus inuida puniit, Rex sterit obliquus nec erat tunc vnus amicus, O regale genus, princeps quasi pauper egenus, Iupiter attractus iacet & sine iure subactus, Sunt ibi sanctores regis de sorte priores, Qui Cygnum pendunt, ubi captum ducere tendent, Sic ducendo ducem, perdit sine lumine lucem, Anglia quae tota tendebat luce remota, Trans mare natauit, regnum qui semper amauit, Fleunt centum mille, quia Cygnus praeterit ille, Calisy portum petit unde dolus latet ortus, Error quem regis genuit putredine legis, Carcere conclusus subito fuit ille reclusus, Nescit quo sine sit vita sine ruina, Tunc rex elatum sumpsit quasi falco volutum, Unde suas gentes perdit custode carentes.

A little after which followeth these verses, touching the deniall of buriall to be granted unto him among the rest of his honourable and roiall ancestors:

Sic nece deuictum sic corpus ab hoste relictum, Clam de conclauis, susceperat Anglia nati, Per mare regreditur, corpus nec adhuc sepelitur, Nunc spulcrum defendit rex sibi puram, Desuper a latere patris loca insula tenere, Dummodo quassuit, vix bassa sepulchra subiuit.

Of the manner also of whose death the said sir Iohn Gower hath set downe these three following verses:

Hec quam tectorum quidam de sorte malorum, Sic ducis electi plumariam pendere lecti, Corpus quassatum ingulunt, necans ingulatum.

His wife Elenor died the third of October, in the yeare of our redemption 1399, being the first yeare of king Henrie the fourth, and was buried at Westminister on the south side of king Edward the third with this epitaph:

*Icy gist Elenor de Bohune aysne fille & vn des phrey de Bohune; countie de Hereford, & de Essex; & de Northampton, & constable d'Angleterre, fem-cester; que moult tierce ioure de Octobre lan du

Edward Plantagenet sonne to Edmund of Langley, was by Richard the second created earle of Rutland, and duke of Albemarle, who being constable of England arrived in the three and twentieth yeare of Richard the second, and in the yeare of our Lord 1399 in Ireland, to bring aid to the king being there in warre. Of this man is more liberall discourse in my following treatise of the dukes of England.

Henrie Percie

Henrie Percie lord Percie, the first lord, and the first earle of Northumberland of that name, was advanced to that honourable title of earle at the coronation of king Richard the second, in the yeare of our redemption 1377. He was made high constable of England by Henrie the fourth, then elected but not crowned king of England, because the cardinals did give that ring to the king whereby he was crowned to the kingdom of England, to be one also the king gave the Ile of man to beare the sword with which he entered the realme. He in the fourth yeare of king Henrie the fourth, being the yeare of Christ 1403, rebelled against the king: but after coming to the king upon sending for, he was pardoned his life, but committed to safe custodie. After which, in the fifth yeare of that king, he was at a parlement held at London restored to his estate and dignitie, who the yeare following, being the first of Henrie the fourth, and the yeare of Christ 1405, againe rebelled, and after fled into Scotland, to David lord of Scotland, who receiued him, and in the seventh yeare of Henrie the fourth, being the yeare of our redemption 1506, as saith Iohn Stow.

This David persuaded the erle to flee into Wales, for which cause the Scots slue the said David. After this, in the ninth yeare of Henrie the fourth, he came into England, raised the people, and was slaine at Barnham near to Haleswood, in a conflict had with him by Thomas Kockleie shiriffe of Yorkshire. He married two wiues, the first was Margaret daughter to Rafe lord Penill, by whom he had issue Henrie Percie, surnamed Hotspurre (slaine at the battell of Shrewesburie in the fourth yeare of Henrie the fourth in his fathers life) Thomas and Rafe. His second wife was Ipatud, daughter to Thomas lord Lucie, and sister and hetroe to Anthonie lord Lucie baron of Cokermonth, being before the widow of Gilbert Humfreuill called the earle of Angus. This ladie Ipatud gaue to hir husband the lordship and castell of Cokermonth, whereby the earles of Northumberland are bound still to beare the armes of Lucie.

John duke of Bedford the sonne and brother of king Henry the fifth, so he callith himselfe in the precept to summon Reginald lord Greie, & sir Edward Hastings knight, to determine the controuersie for bearing of the armes of Hastings earle of Penbroke in the marshals court) was earle of Richmond and Kendall, and constable of England, being advanced to that office about the eight yeare of Henrie the fourth his father, being the yeare of our redemption 1406, of whom there is more mention in the following discourse of the protectors of England.

Humfrie earle of Stafford, Hereford, and Northampton, lord of Beconock, Holdernesse, and of Cambridge, and constable of England, and of Dover castell, in the eight yeare of king Henrie the first, being the yeare of Christ 1430, went into France with Henrie the first to attend his coronation at Paris. He was created duke of Buckingham in the two and twentieth yeare of Henrie the first, being the yeare of Christ 1444. He was slaine at the battell of Northampton in the eight and thirtieth yeare of king Henrie the first, being the yeare of our Lord 1460. He married Anne daughter to Rafe Penill erle of Warwicke: he had amongst manie other of his children Humfrie his eldest sonne earle of Stafford, but (as hath Iohn Stow) with an arrow in the right hand at the battell of saint Albons in the three and thirtieth yeare of Henrie the first, being the yeare of our Lord 1455, of which battell of saint Albons thus writeth Iohn Whethamsted a learned abbat of that house:

John Tiptoth or Tiptoth knight, the son of John lord Tiptoth, and of Joyce his wife, second daughter to Edmund Charlton lord Poole, was treasurer of the realme in Spichacmalles tearme in the tenth yere of Henrie the fourth, after which he was againe admitted to that office in the one and thirtieth and two and thirtieth yere of Henrie the first, from which place being once more remoued, he was the third time aduanced to the honoz of lord treasurer of England in the second of Edward the fourth, and continued the same in the third of the said king. He was created earle of Worcester in the time of king Henrie the first. This man in the yere 1470, being the tenth of king Edward the fourth, took his part against the duke of Clarence, and Richard Beuill earle of Warwicke, at what time the said duke and earle being discomfited, fled to the sea side, and thence sailed to Southhampton, where they thought to haue had the Countie a great ship of the earle of Warwikes; but the lord Seales the quenes brother fought with them, and enforced them to flee into France.

Whereupon king Edward the fourth came to Southhampton and caused Tiptoth earle of Worcester to sit in iudgement upon certeine gentlemen, as Clapham and others, taken at the same skirmish of Southhampton, where the earle caused the bodies of certeine condemned men, after that they were harged to be thrust thorough the fundament by to the head with stakes, for the which crueltie he and others fell into indignation of the common people. Before which in the eight yere of king Edward, he was with John Duple made constable of the Tower, during their lines, and the longer liner of them two.

After this in the said yere 1470, being the tenth of Edward the fourth, in which Henrie the first readepted the crowne of England, which yere of Henrie the first is called in the late booke, the fourth & ninth yere of the reigne of B. Henrie the first. This earle of Worcester was taken in the top of an high tree in the forest of Weibridge in Huntingdonshire, brought to London, and at a parlement arrested and condemned to death, by sir John Here earle of Ar-ford. Whereupon he was beheaded at Tower hill, and buried in the blacke friers of London. He had thre wiues, wherof the first was called Cicilie the daughter of Richard earle of Salisburie: the second Elzabeth the daughter of Robert Creindoure: the third was Elizabeth, after married to sir William Stan-leiz, which John had by his third wife Edward lord Tiptoth who died without issue, & so the inheritance went to the sisters of the said earle John Tiptoth.

10 Lord Beaumont.

And here I thinke it not amisse to say somewhat of the lord Beaumont, who bring in our chronicles named constable of England (as may appeare in the five and twentieth yere of Henrie the first, in which yere he arrested Humfric duke of Gloucester) that for any thing that I can yet see or learne, this Beaumont was not constable by patent during his life, but for the present time to execute the princes pleasure, and therefore not meet in this discourse to haue any speciall place amongst such as were constables of England, either by descent or patent.

Sir Richard Woodville knight, earle Rivers, was high constable of England in the fourth yere of king Edward the fourth, of whom is more large mention in the following discourse of the treasures of England in the historie of the reigne of quene Elizabeth.

Richard
 Woodville.

George Plantagenet, second sonne to Richard duke of Yorke, was created amongst other estates duke of Clarence, in the yere of our redemption 1461, being the first yere of king Edward the fourth immediately upon his coronation, and was made constable of England in the time of Edward the fourth. He in the eight of Edward the fourth, about the yere of Christ 1468, married Isabel the eldest daughter of Richard Beuill earle of Warwicke and Salisburie, by whom he had issue Edward earle of Warwicke and Salisburie, borne upon the sea in the haven of Calis, who was in the time of Richard the third a continuall prisoner, and so having borne a prisoner, and thereto borne by a certeine fatall desti-nie, was in the yere of our redemption 1485, being the first of king Henrie the seventh committed to custodie in the Tower, where he continued all the rest of his life, & was beheaded at Tower hill in the fiftieth yere of king Henrie the seventh, being the yere of Christ 1499, & was buried at Wirham nere to his ancestors. Besides this Edward, this George duke of Clarence had issue a daughter called Paragaret, created by king Henrie the eight countesse of Salisburie, who married sir Richard Pole knight of the garter, descended of the ancient familie of the Poles in Wales.

 Plantagenet;

Richard Plantagenet, the third sonne to Richard duke of Yorke, was aduanced to the title and honoz of the dukedome of Gloucester, in the yere of our redemption 1461, being the first yere of king Edward the fourth, soon after his coronation. He was high constable of England: he married Anne second daughter to Richard Beuill earle of Warwicke and Salisburie. Which Richard after the death of his brother king Edward the fourth, did by the murder of his nephues ascend to the highest gouernement of England, and was crowned king by the name of Richard the third.

Henrie Stafford, whome our chronicles doe in-manie places corruptlie terme Edward, was sonne to Humfric earle Stafford, & was high constable of England, and duke of Buckingham. This man raising warre against Richard the third usurping the crowne, was in the first yere of the reigne of the said Richard, being the yere of Christ 1483, betrayed by his man Humfric Banasser (to whome being in distresse he fled for succour) and brought to Richard the third then lieng at Salisburie, where the

Henrie Staf-
 ford.

said duke confessing all the conspiracie, was beheaded without arraignment or iudgement, vpon the second of Nouember, in the said yere of our redemption 1483, he married Katharine the daughter of Richard Woodville, sister to quene Elizabeth wife to Edward the fourth; & had issue, Edward duke of Buckingham, and Henrie earle of Wiltshire, with two daughters, which were, Anne married to George lord Hastings of whom is descended the erle of Huntingdon now liuing, and Elizabeth married to Richard Katcliffe lord Fitz Waters, of whome is issued sir Henrie Katcliffe knight, now earle of Sussex.

Edward
Stafford.

Edward Stafford sonne to Henrie duke of Buckingham, being also duke of Buckingham after the death of his father was constable of England, earle of Hereford, Stafford, and Southhampton, being in the first yere of Henrie the seventh, in the yere of our redemption 1485, restored to his fathers dignities and possessions. He is learned in the books of the law in the said thirtieth yere of Henrie the eighth (where his arraignment is liberallie set downe) to be the floure & mirror of all courtlesie. This man (as before is touched) was by Henrie the seventh restored to his fathers inheritance, in recompence of the losse of his fathers life, taken awaie (as before is said) by the usurping king Richard the third. He married Elianor the daughter of Henrie earle of Northumberland, and had issue Henrie lord Stafford (father to Henrie lord Stafford now liuing) and three daughters, Elizabeth married to Thomas Howard earle of Surrie, Katharine married to Rafe Penill earle of Westmerland, and Marie married to George Penill lord of Abergauennie. And thus much by Francis Thim touching the succession of the constables of England.]

Cardinal
woolfe sent ouer to Calis.

Edw. Hall in
H. 8. fol. lxxxv.

In this meane while, were the emperor and the French king fallen at variance, so that the warre was renewed betwixt them; for the pacifying wherof, the cardinal of Porke was sent ouer to Calis, where the ambassadours of both those princes were appointed to come to him. He arrived there the second of August. There went ouer with him the erle of Worcester, then lord chamberleine, the lord of St. Johns, the lord Ferrers, the lord Herbert, the bishop of Durham, the bishop of Elic, the primate of Armacane, sir Thomas Bullen, sir John Beddie, sir John Hulse, sir Richard Wingfield, sir Henrie Gullford, and manie other knights, esquires, gentlemen, doctors, and learned men. Thus honourable accompanied he rode thorough London the twentieth last date of Iulie, and at Thomas Becketts house the maior and aldermen toke leaue of him, praiesing God to send him good speed. Thus passed he to Canturburie, where the archbishop of Canturburie and others receiued him in his stateliness, and brought him vnto his lodging vnder a canopie to the bishops palace. On the eighth date of Iulie he came to Douer. On the twentieth he & the other lords with their retinues toke passage, and arrived at Calis in safetie, where the lord depute and the counsell receiued them with much honour and lodged the cardinal in the Staple hall.

The emperor
king their ambassadours met at Calis, to treat of a peace.

Shortlie after his arrivall at Calis, thither came the chancelor of France, and the countie de Palice, with foure hundred horses, as ambassadours from the French king; and likewise from the emperor came great ambassadours, either partie being furnished with sufficient commissions to treat and conclude of peace as should appeare. But yet when it came to the point, as the one partie seemed conformable to reasonable offers, so the other would not incline that waie; insomuch that they were neuer at one time agreeable to anie indifferent motion that could be made. There were also the popes ambassadours, wherupon the cardinal would haue set the red league betwixt the emperor, the king of England, the king of France, and the pope: but the popes ambassadours wanted commission thereto, and therefore were letters sent to Rome in all haste, and the Frenchmen tarried still in Calis, till answer came from thence. The cardinal rode into Flanders to speake with the emperor, which as then late in Bruges. A mile without Bruges the emperor receiued him, and did to him as much honour as could be deuised. There chere was great which was made to the Englishmen, and of euerie thing there was such plenty, that there was no want of things necessarie, insomuch that of the fare, both for plentifulnesse, delicatnesse, and stateliness of seruice, a man might haue said:

The cardinal after he had sojourned in Bruges the space of thirtene daies, and concluded diuerse matters with the emperor, and accomplished his commission, he toke leaue of his maiestie, and by conuenient tomes returned to Calis, where the ambassadours of France tarried his coming; and immediately after his returne to Calis, he treated with them of peace, but not so earnestlie as he did before. In fine, nothing was concluded, but onlie that signemen of both the princes might steele fish on the seas without disturbance, till the second of Februarie next. When no conclusion of agreement could be accorded, the cardinal sent to the emperor the lord of St. Johns, and sir Thomas Bullen knight, to aduertise his maiestie what had bene done, and likewise to the French king, as then lieng in campe with a mightie armie in the marches about Cambrie. The earle of Worcester and the bishop of Elic were sent to informe him of all things that had bene negotiated, exhorting him to incline to peace, but he gaue little care thereto: and then after they had bene a nineteene or twentie daies in his host they returned. During the continuance of the cardinal in Calis, all writs and patents were there by him sealed, and no shiriffes chosen for lacke of his presence, having there with him the great seals, & full power in things, as if the king had bene there in person. Ambassadours coming from the king of Hungarie towards the king of England, were receiued honourable of the Cardinal during his abode in Calis.

receiued the cardinal
with great honour at Bruges.

Cardinal
woolfe carried the great seals with him to Calis, where several writs
and patents

After the returne of the English ambassadours, which the cardinal had sent to the emperor, and to the French king, he returned into England, having (as some write) concluded a new league with the emperor, and signified by waie of intendment to the French king in the treatie with his ambassadours, that the king of England meant him not so much friendship as of late he had done, for diuerse causes. But speciallie this was bittered, that where it was concluded that the king of Scots should be included within the league (as before yee haue heard) contrary to that agreement, the said king refused to enter as a confederate into the same league: and this no doubt proceeded thorough counsell of the French king, by whom he was wholly guided. This quarrell was laid as an occasion, whie to moue the king of England (perceiuing himselfe to be dissembled with) to withdraw his good will from the French king.

Who when he vnderstood the drifts of the cardinal, and conclusion of the new league confirmed betwixt the king of England and the emperor, he condemned the cardinal of vntruth, accused him of dissimulation, abhorred his practices, as by the which he lost the fruition of the king of England his friendship, and might no longer inioy it. And herewith he determined with himselfe neuer to put confidence in anie Englishman after, nor to be slow anie gifts or pensions vpon them. For he bled pœrelie to send to diuerse of the kings counsell after the manner of the predecessors fundat gifts and summes of monie: because he had imployed more on the cardinals than on the residue, he was the more offended toward him as the head of all this intencion doing. Yet he found not himselfe so much grieved, as to utter any bitter words toward the king: but contrarie within a while after, directed his letters unto him, signifying that he meant to continue the league as his friend: but it maie be he did this after a dissembling sort, because he would not be at warres with two so mightie princes at one time.

15. Reg. 13.

In this meane while, the warre was pursued between the emperor & the French king, as well on the confines towardes flanders, as beyond the mountains in the parties of Lombardie. Lomane was besieged by the lord Hugh de Spincada, a Spaniard, the which coming upon the sudden, took manie abroad in the fields, yet they knew of his approach, and after this, coming before the citie, he inuironed it with a hope, to keepe the citizens from stirring forth, and sent part of his armie with the light horsemen to for-lose the streets and passages, that no succour should come to them within. The French king assembled an armie in hope to aid the in of Lomane with men, inuentions, and vittells, the which armie assailed twice or thrice with all endeuor, to haue approached the citie: but in vaine, for with no small losse the French were repelled by the imperials, which neuertheless felt their part of slaughter, losing sundrie of their captains, as basterd Emorie, and the captaine of Saint. J. mallic, the French armie brake vp, & was dispersed into fortreasses. Whereupon they of Lomane perceiving the succours which they hoped for, to faile them thus at need, rendered the citie to the emperor the last of No-uember, in this 13. yeare of king Henries reigne.

Pope Leo died this yeare suddentlie, on the first of December, as he laie at the village of Spagliana whither he went oftentimes for his recreation. He had heard the first reasport of the taking of Spillan, which stirred in him such an extreame passion of ioy, that the same night he entered into a small feauer: and for his better remedie he caused himselfe the next day to be removed to Rome: where he died within a verie few daies after, notwithstanding the physicians in the beginning made no great reckoning of his disease. There was great suspicion that he was poisoned by Barnabie Spalestina his chamberleine, whose office was alwaies to giue him drinke. And yet though he was made prisoner through the suspicion of the fact & the vehement reasons of the same, yet the matter was dashed and the examination thereof: for that the cardinal de Medecis as soone as he came to Rome, set him at libertie, fearing to fall further in disgrace of the French king, by whose practise it was supposed that Barnabie gaue him the fatall drinke.
This was but whispered secretlie, the author being no lesse doubtfulfull than the coniectures vncertaine.

Spoken (if we consider the common opinion of men) in verie great glorie and felicitie, not so much for that by the surprizing of Spillan he saw himselfe delivered of dangers & expences intollerable, which hauing drained him of all store of monie and treasure, he was constrained to aduance all meanes and maners for his supplie and relieuing: but also that a verie few daies afore his death he received aduertisement of the taking of Malisauca, and the verie daie he died, newes came to him of the winning of Parma: a matter so greatlie desired by him, that at such time as he debated to moue warre against the Frenchmen, it is verie well remembred that he said unto the cardinal de Medecis labouring to dissuade him, that as he was in nothing more caried to the desire of that warre, than to recouer to the church those two cities; so when so euer God should blesse him with the effect of that desire, it would not grieve him to die. He was a prince in whom were manie things worthy to be commended & blamed, and in the estate & discourse of his life he deceiued greatlie the expectation that was had of him, when he was created pope, for that in his gouernement was great discretion, but farre lesse bountie than was looked for.]

After the death of the pope, doctor Richard Pace was sent to Rome, to make friends in the behalfe of the cardinal of Poike, who was brought into a vaine hope thorough the kings fauour and furtherance, to be elected pope. But Adrian the first of that name was chosen before doctor Pace could come to Rome; and so that sute was dashed. This Adrian bishop of Derchuso (after great contention in the college of cardinals touching the election of a new pope) was preferred to the custome of lotting of voices in the conclauie, without any affection or parcialitie of voice: he was of nation a Fleming, & in his youth hauing bene scholemaster to Cesar, and by his meane made cardinall vnder pope Leo, did at that time gouerne Spaine in the absence of Cesar. And as there began some voices to publish for him, so cardinall Rizzo one of that election, began vnder an oration speciall, to recount and amplifie his vertues and knowledge, by whose example certein other cardinals yielded, and the residue from hand to hand followed, though more by constraint than counsell.

Thus was he chosen with the voices of all the cardinals, and had his creation perfected the same moning. Wherein this was to be wondered at, that euen those that had elected him could giue no reason, why amid so manie troubles & dangers in the estate ecclesiastike, they had raised to the soueraigne (see a stranger, a forrener, and of long absence out of the countrie, & wherein were helping no respects of fauor, no consideration of former merits, nor any conuersation had with any of the other cardinals: yea they scarcelie knew his name, he had neuer bene in Ita-lie, and had no hope nor cogitation to see it: of which stranagant manner of dealing, being not able to excuse themselves, they attributed all to the working of the holie-ghost, who is wont for so they alleged) to inspire the hearts of the cardinals in the electing of popes: he receiued newes of his election in the towne of Medozia in Biskate, and would not haue imposed vpon him any other name than his owne, which he caused to be published vnder Adrian the first.

Now he made his entrie into Rome the nine and twentieth of August, with a great concourse of the commons and the whole court: of whome albeit his coming was desired with an brinnerfall gladnesse (for that without the presence forth of the popes, Rome beareth more a resemblance of a sauage desert than of a citie) yet that spectacle wrought sundrie impressions and diuersities of thoughts in the minds of all men, when they considered that they had a pope for nation and language a stranger, and for the affaires of Italie and the court altogether vner-perienched: and also for that he was not of those regions and countries, who by long conuersation were alreadie made familiar with the customes of Italie.
The enuie that stirred vp in men this consideration was redoubled by the accident of the plague, which beginning in Rome at his arrivall, afflicted the citie during the whole season of Autumne, to the great calamitie and losse of the people: a matter which in the fancies of men was construed to an enill prognostication of his pontificacie.]

fastfull aduise. I learned he was also, and indued with many excellent god gifts of nature, courteous, pleasant, and delighting in musike, highlie in the kings fauour, and well heard in matters of weight. But the more the prince fauoured him, the more was he mistlike of the cardinall, who sought onelic to beare all the rule himselfe, and to haue no partener; so that he procured that this doctor Pace vnder color of ambassage, should be sent forth of the realme, that his presence about the king should not twin him too much authoritie and fauour at the kings hands.

Edw. Hall.
Doctor Edmund Hall made bishop of London.

1523

This yere was a great death in London and other places of the realme. Many men of honour and great worship died, and amongst other, the bishop of London, doctor Fitz James, in whose place was doctor Tunstall elected. The earle of Surrie returned out of Ireland, and came to the court the five and twentieth of Ianuarie. Many complaints were made by the merchants to the king and his counsell of the Frenchmen, which spoiled them by sea of their goods. For by reason that the wars were open betwixt the emperor, and the French king, many ships of warre were abroad on both parts, and now and then the Englishmen fell into their hands, and were used as enemies; namely by the Frenchmen, which naturally hated the Englishmen. The French kings ambassadours promised restitution of euery thing, but little was restored. In this moneth of Ianuarie therefore, the king commanded all his ships to be rigged, and made readie, which was done with all diligence.

The title of Defendor of the faith given to the king. Henry VIII. and his successors for ever.
I. S. pag. 930.
Abt. Flex. ad. A. G. ad. Ang. & Scot. ex. c. Gen. 1558. in fol. 69.

On the second daie of February, the king as then being at Grænewich, received a bull from the pope, whereby he was declared Defendor of the Christian faith, & likewise his successors for ever. The cardinall of Poike sang the high masse that daie with all the pompous solemnitie that might be, and gaue cleane remission of finnes to all that heard it. This title was ascribed vnto the king, because he had written a booke against Luther in Germanie; wherevnto the said Luther answered verie sharpelie, nothing sparing his authoritie nor maiestie. ¶ Of which booke published by the king, I will not (for reuerence of his roialtie) though I durst, report what I haue read; because we are to iudge honourable of our rulers, and to forsake nothing but good of the princes of the people. Onelic this breife clause or fragment I will adde (least I might seeme to tell a tale of the man in the mone) that king Henric in his said booke is reported to rage against the diuell and antichrist, to cast out his name against Luther, to vexe out the name of the pope, and yet to allow his law, &c. I suppress the rest for shame, and returne to our historie.]

The king of England and the king of France at variance.

In this meane time, grudges and displeasures still grew and increased betwixt the king of England and the French king, so that their græfs rankled daillie more and more, till at length the duke of Albanie returned into Scotland, contrarie to that which was couenanted by the league. The French king in deed alleaged, that he was not primum to his going thither; and wrote to the king, that the said duke was entered Scotland without his assent; but it was otherwise iudged & knowne, that he had commission of the French king to go thither. Whereupon, the king was sore offended, and prepared for wars. Mustres were made of able men, and a note taken of what substance men were. The king also sent six ships to the sea, well trimmed, manned, and victualled. The admerall was one Christopher Columbus, a expert sea man. His commission was, to seeke out the merchants, and other the kings subjects, that were greivously spoiled and robbed on the sea, by Frenchmen, Scots, and other rousers.

Christopher Columbus admerall.

The eight of February, the lord Dacres, warden of the marches fore against Scotland, entered into Scotland with five hundred men, by the kings commandement, & there proclaimed, that the Scots should come in to the kings peace, by the first of March following, or else to stand at their perils; the duke of Albanie being then within five miles with a mightie power of Scots. The eleuenth of February, the lord of Aburgauennie was brought from the Tower to Westminster, and there in the kings bench confessed his indictment of mispicion. The lord Montacute was about the same time restored vnto the kings fauour. ¶ On the second of March, certaine noble men of the empire, arrived in England, to passe into Spaine, who were honourable received; and in honour of them, great iusts and triumphs were made, which being finished and done, they took their leaue and departed on their iourne.

Duncan Campbell, a Scottish rouser, after long fight, was taken on the sea by John Arundell an equier of Cornewall, who presented him to the king. He was committed to the Tower, & there remained prisoner a long season. All the kings ships were put in a readinesse, so that by the beginning of April, they were rigged and trimmed readie to make saile. ¶ This yere died the lord Wroke, sir Edward Poynings, knight of the garter, sir John Peckie, and sir Edward Welknep, valiant capteins, which were suspected to be poisoned at a banquet made at Ard, when the two kings met last. Wheat was sold this yere in the cite of London, for twentie shillings a quarter, in other places for twentie six shillings eight pence.

In this yere Caluan Douglas, bishop of Dun-kell fled out of Scotland into England, because the duke of Albanie being come thither, had taken vpon him the whole gouernement of the king and realme there, the sequels of whose doings the bishop fore mistrusted. The king assigned vnto this bishop an honest pension to liue on. And shortly after, was Clarenceour the herald sent into Scotland, vnto the duke of Albanie, to command him to auoid that realme for diuerse considerations; & if he would not, then to desie him, with contrarie to the articles of the league concluded betwixt France & England, he was entered Scotland without his licence. The duke refused to accomplish the kings commandement, and was therefore desied by the said Clarenceour. The first of March, the French king commanded all Englishmens goods being in Burdeaur, to be attached, and put vnder arrest, and retained not onelic the monie due to be paid for the restitution of Tonnage, but also withheld the French quenes dowry.

The cardinall vnderstanding that he was euill spoken of, for vsing his power legantine to such advantage as he did, in selling graces & dispensations, he thought to bestow some part thereof amongst the people freelic, without taking any thing for the same. Whereupon, when Lent drew nere, he appointed the preachers at Paules crosse, to declare, that it should be lawfull to all persons for that Lent, to eat milke, butter, chese, & eggs. And to the end that none should haue any scrupulousnesse of conscience in so doing, he by his authoritie granted remission of sins to all those that did at white meats: knowing as it were afore hand, that the people giuen to the obseruance of their religious fast, would not easilie be brought to breake the same, contrarie to the ancient custome vsed in their countrie. Neither was he deceived therein, for so farre were the people from receiving or accounting this as a benefit, that they took it rather for a wicked & cursed deed in those that received it, & few or almost none could be indue to breake their order and scrupulous trade in that behalf.

The king, vnderstanding how his subjects were handled at Burdeaur by the French kings commandement, in aduocement in breach of the league, the French ambassadour was called before the counsell, and the cardinall laid fore to his charge, that contrarie to his promise at all times on the French king his masters behalfe, affirming that he meant nothing but peace and amitie to be observed in all points with the king of England: yet now the English merchants had not onlie their goods staid at Burdeaur, but also they and their factors were laid in prison, in full breach of all peace and amitie afore time concluded. The ambassadour in words so well as he could excused his master, but in the end he was commanded to keepe his house: and the French hostages that were appointed here to remaine for the monie to be paid for the deliuerie of Tonaie, were committed unto the safe keeping of the lord of Saint Johns, sir Thomas Louell, sir Andrew Woodfor, and sir Thomas Beuill, euerie of them to haue one.

Herewith also, all the Frenchmen in London were arrested, committed to prison, and put to their fines: but they were more courteously used than the Englishmen were in France. For after they had bene in durance ten daies, they were set at libertie, upon finding sureties to appeare before the maior, or else before the counsell at a certaine daie, and to paie the fine upon them assessed, which fine the king pardoned to diuerse of the poorest sort. But in comparison of the Scottish nation, you would haue said, the Frenchmen were in small displeasure: for not onlie those that were borne in Scotland, but also diuers northermen borne, within English ground, for envious spite called Scots, were apprehended, imprisoned, and grievously fined, although some of them by strict inquirie tried to be Englishmen, escaped without paying the fine.

There were sent to the sea, vnder conduct of sir William Fitz Williams viceadmirall, twentie & eight goodlie ships well manned and trunimed for the warres, & fenen other ships were sent toward Scotland, which entered the Forth, and proffered to enter the Scottish ships that laie in the hauens: but the Scots ran their ships aland, and the Englishmen followed with boats, landed, and set the ships on fire, & at last took certaine prisoners, which they brought into England; and still the kings great nauie kept the narrow seas: for then was neither peace betwixt England and France, nor open warres. The king understanding that the emperor would come to Calis, so to passe into England, as he went towards Spaine, appointed the lord marquisse Dorset to go to Calis, there to receiue him, and likewise the lord cardinall was appointed to receiue him at Douer.

The cardinall taking his iourneie forward on the twentieth of Maie, rode through London, accompanied with two caries, six and thirtie knights, and an hundred gentlemen, eight bishops, ten abbats, thirtie chaplains, all in veluet and sattin, and peomen seven hundred. The marquisse Dorset was gone ouer before vnto Calis: and the five and twentieth of Maie being sundae, the said marquisse, with the bishop of Exchester, the lord de la Ware, and diuerse other at the water of Graueling, receiued the emperor in the name of the king of England, and with all honour brought him to Calis, where he was receiued with procession, by the lord Bernes lieutenant of the towne, with the maior and merchants of the Staple, in the best manner that might be deuised.

On the mondaie he took ship at Calis, and landed at Douer, where the cardinall with three hundred lords, knights, and gentlemen of England was ready to receiue him, and with all honour that might be, brought him to the castell, where he was lodged. On wednesdaie, being the Ascension euen, the king came to Douer, and there with great ioy and gladnesse, the emperor and he met. On the fridaie in the after none they departed from Douer, & came that night to Canturburie, so from thence by easie iourneies to Craneuich, where the queene receiued her nephew with all the ioy that might be. Here the emperor taried certaine daies in great solace and pleasure, and the more to hono: his presence, rotall iustices and iourneies were appointed, the which were furnished in most triumphant manner: the king, and the earle of Deuonshire, and ten aids with them, keeping the place against the duke of Suffolke: the marquisse Dorset, and other ten aids vpon their part.

On fridaie being the first of June, the king and the emperor with all their companies, marched toward London, where the citie was prepared for their entrie, after the manner as is used at a coronation, so that nothing was forgotten that might set forth the citie. For the rich citizens well appareled stood within railles set on the left side of the streetes, and the cleargie on the right side in rich copes, which censured the princes as they passed, and all the streetes were richlie hanged with clothes of gold, siluer, veluet, and arras, and in euerie house almost minstrelsie: and in euerie street were these two verses written in letters of gold, both Latine and English:

Henricus fidei, Carolus ecclesie. That is, Long prosperitie, The one of the faith,

To Charles and Henrie, The other of the church, Princes most puissant: Chosen defendant.

Sundrie pageants were deuised, and stages verie faire and excellent to behold, with such melodie of instruments, and other tokens of ioy and gladnesse, that wonder it was to consider the manner thereof. The emperor was lodged at the Blache friers, and all his nobles in the new palace of Whitehall. On Whitfundaie being the eight of June, the emperor and the king rode to the cathedrall church of saint Paule, and there heard masse, which was song by the cardinall that had his traucter, and cupbord. Before masse, two barons gave him water, and after the gospell two earles; and at the last lauatorie, two dukes: which psoe the Spaniards sore disdaind. The emperor thus remained with the king certaine daies and rode to diuerse places with him, being still feasted & banketted, and had all the pleasure shewed to him that might be imagined. At Windsor they taried a whole weeke and more, where on Corpus Christi daie, the emperor wore his mantell of the garter, and sate in his owne stall. On the same daie both the princes receiued the sacrament, and after that seruice was ended, they took their corporall othes to keepe and obserue the league, which was concluded betwixt them. On the morrow after, they departed from Windsor, and by soft and easie iourneies they came to Winchester, on the two & twentieth of June.

Now before the emperor was thus come to Winchester, the earle of Surrie being high admirall of England, was come to Hampton with all the kings nauie, & with him the lord Fitz Walter, the baron Curslon, sir Nicholas Carew, sir Richard Wingfield, sir Richard Jerningham, Francis Brian, sir William Barentine, sir Adrian Folskew, sir Edward Donne, sir Edward Chamberleine, sir Richard Coynwall, sir Anthony Poinces, sir Henrie Shirborne, and the viceadmirall sir William Fitz Williams, sir Edmund Baie, sir Giles Capell, sir William Pirton, John Coynwallis, sir John Mallop, sir Edward Echingham, sir William Sidneie, Anthonie Brovone, Giles Husse, Thomas More, John Kussel, Edward Bay, Henrie Owen, George Godham, Thomas Oldhall, Thomas Louell, Robert

departeth out of England towards Spain.

On the first of Iulie, the emperours naue came before Hampton, containing an hundred and foure score goodlie ships. Then the emperour toke leaue of the king, of whome he had manie great gifts, and notable summes of monie by waite of lone; & so the first of Iulie he toke his ship, and made saile to Spaine, where he arriued in safetie the tenth daie after. The king borrowed of the citie of London twentie thousand pounds, and deliuered priuie seales for warrant of the repayment. None were charged but men of god wealth. The like lone was practised through all the realme, not without grudge of manie persons that were called vpon for the same. The earle of Surrie hauing waisted the emperour ouer to the coast of Biscaye, vpon his returne finding the wind fauourable, according to his instructions, made to the coast of Britaine, and landing with his people in number seuen thousand, about fise miles from Pooleis, marched thither, and assaulling the towne, wan it.

the winning of Pooleis in Britaine by
Surrie.

For the maister gunner Christopher Porreis hauing there certeine falcons, with the shot of one of them, stroke the Locke of the wicket in the gate, so that it flew open: and then the same Christopher and other gentlemen, with their soldiers, in the smoke of the gunnes pressed to the gates, and finding the wicket open, entered, and so finallye was the towne of Pooleis wone, and put to sacke. The soldiers gained much by the pillage, for the towne was exceeding rich, and speciallie of linnen cloth. When they had rifled the towne thoroughlie, and taken their pleasure of all things therein, the earle caused them by sound of trumpet to resort to their standards, and after they had set fire in the towne, and burned a great part thereof, the earle retreated with his armie towards his ships, burning the villages by the waite, and all that night lay on land. On the morrow after they toke their ships, and when they were bestowed on board, the earle commanded fiftene or senentene ships small and great, lieng there in the haue, to be burnt.

Diuers gent-

of Surrie vpon the winning of Pooleis.

When the lord admerall had thus wone the towne of Pooleis, he called to him certeine esquiers, and made them knights, as sir Francis Brian, sir Anthoine Wolstone, sir Richard Cornwell, sir Thomas Hore, sir Giles Huseie, sir John Kullell, sir John Keinsford, sir George Cobham, sir John Cornwellis, sir Edward Kingleie, and diuerse other. After this they continued a while on the coast of Britaine, and disquieted the Britains by entering their haue, and sometimes landing and doing diuerse displeasures to the inhabitants about the coast. After that the earle had lien a while thus on the coast of Britaine, he was countermanded by the kings letters, who thereupon brought backe his whole fleet vnto a place called the Coto, vnder the Ile of Wight, and then went on land himselfe, discharging the more part of his people, and leauing the residue with certeine ships vnder the gouernance of the viceadmerall sir William Fitz Williams, to keepe the seas against the French.

Polydor.

In this meane while, diuerse exploits were achieved betwixt them of the garrisons in the marches of Calis, & the Frenchmen of Bullongne and Bullongnois: but still the losseran for the most part on the French side. For the English frontiers were well and stronglie furnished with good numbers of men of warre, and gouerned by right sage and valiant captaines, which dailye made inuasions vpon the French confines, and namelie sir William Sands Gilford marshall, were two that did the Frenchmen most displeasure. On the third of Iulie, three hundred French horsemen comming nere to the castell of Guisnes, kept themselves in court, appointing eight or ten of their companie to shew themselves in sight to the Englishmen within. Whereupon there went forth eight archers, and fell in skirmish with those horsemen, till there came thither other to the rescue of the Frenchmen, and skirmished with the archers on foot.

Her eloth issued out of Guisnes twelue demilances all Welshmen, in rescue of the footmen, and then all the troope of the French horsemen brake forth and set on the Welshmen. The footmen, so long as they had anye arrowes to bestow, shot busilie, and in the end were driuen to defend themselves with their swords. The Welshmen keeping together, entered into the band of the Frenchmen, brake their speares, and after fought and laid about them with their swords, so that they made a waite, and escaped from those three hundred French horsemen. Of the French side were slaine three men and fise horses, the English archers on foot selling their liues dearely, were all slaine, for the Frenchmen would not take anye of them prisoners, they were so angrie for losse of their fellows.

On the fise and twentieth of Iulie, the treasurer and marshall of Calis, with fourtene hundred footmen, entered the French pale: and finding not monsieur de Fotat for whome they sought, they went to Whiffand baie, set the towne on fire, and assaulling the church, into which the people were withdrawing, wan it, and afterwards set fire on the temple, because that diuerse, hauing thut by themselves therein, through counsell of a priest that was with them, refused to yeld, till the fire caused them to leape downe and so manie of them perished, and the rest were taken prisoners, and led to Calis. About two daies before this, to wit, the three and twentieth daie of Iulie, one Thwaites a capteine of an English ship, with sir scoze men, archers and others, toke land beside Bullongne, and passing by into the cuntry three miles to a towne called Jhebecassell, forraied all the parts as he went, and in his returne set fire on that towne, and burnt a great part thereof, and came againe to his ship in safetie, notwithstanding fourscore baggubters, and three hundred other men of warre of the cuntry came forth, and pursued the Englishmen verie fiercely: but the Englishmen putting them backe, got to their ship, and lost not a man.

Moreover, whilst the warres were thus followed in France, the lord Rosse, and the lord Dacres of the north, which were appointed to keepe the borders against Scotland, burnt the towne of Belfie, and fourescore villages, & fourtieweightene towres of stone, with all their barnelimes. Also the king appointed the earle of Shrewesburie to be his lieutenant generall of the north parts, against the inuasion which was intended by the duke of Albanie, which earle directed his letters to all the shires lieng from Trent northward, that all men should be in a readinesse. Order was taken by the cardinall, that the true balne of all mens substance might be knowen, and he would haue had euery man sworne to haue vttered the true valuation of that they were worth, and required a tenth part thereof to be granted towards the kings charges now in his warres, in like case as the spirituallie had granted a fourth part, and were content to liue on the other three parts.

His

This demand was thought gréuous to them of the cite of London, where the cardinall first moued it; so that manie reasons were alleaged by them why they iudged themselves fore dealt with. In the end they brought in their billes, which were receiued vpon their honesties. The king in this meane time, being now entered into wars with France, thought not to suffer his enemies to rest in quiet: and there fore leaued an armie which he sent ouer to Calis, appointing the earle of Surrie to be generall of the same. When the earle was come to Calis, and had taken order in his businesse for that iournie, he set forward with his armie, being diuided into three battels or wards, of the which, the first was led by sir Robert Kitchiffe, lord Fitz Water, the middle ward or battell the earle himselfe guided, and with him his brother the lord Edmund Howard. The reereward was gouerned by sir William Sands, and sir Richard Wingfield, both being knights of the garter. Capteine of the horsemen was sir Edward Cusford.

They entered into the French ground the second of September, being tuesday, and toke their iournie toward Hedding. By the way there came to them a great poluer of Burgognians from the ladie Margaret, as then regent of Flanders, according to the articles of the league. All the towncs, villages, and castles in the countrie thorough the which they marched, were burned, wasted, and destroyed on euerie side of their waie: as the towne and castell of Se-lois, the towncs of Wyne bridge, Senekerke, Botingham, & Mansfield, the towne and castell of Perbins, the towne of Dauerne, the castles of Columberge, and Aeto, the towne and church fortified of Boards, saint Marie de Bois, the towne of Claus, the towne and castell of Fringes. On the fiftenth daie of September, the earle of Surrie with his armie of Englishmen and Burgognians, came before the castell of Hedding, and planted his siege before it. The towne was entered, and part thereof burned 40 by the Burgognians.

Within the castell was capteine monsieur de Biez, hauing provided for defense of the place all things necessarie; so that the earle of Surrie, and other the captains of the host, perceiving they could not within anie short time win it, after they had bin before it eleven daies, they raised their siege, because they had no great battering peeces to ouerthrow the walles. For the weather was such, and the waies wared so deepe towards the latter end of that summer, that they could not conueie with them anie great ordinance. From Hedding they passed forward, and coming to Dorelens, burned the towne, and raised the castell. From thence they came vnto the towne of Darter, which they burnt also and spoiled. Thus they burned and spoiled all the waie as they passed. But the weather still wared worse and worse, so that manie fell sicke through intemperance there of, and the Burgognians and Spaniards which were in the armie returned into Flanders.

When the earle of Surrie, perceiving that he could no longer keepe the field in that season of the yeare, turned backe towards Calis in good order of battell, and came thither the sixteenth of October. He would gladlie in deed (before the departure of the Burgognians and Spaniards) haue passed the water of Somme: but other captains considering the time of the yeare to be past, and that the whole armie contained not aboue eightene thousand men, iudged it more wisdom to retorne, and so in the end their opinions were followed. After that the English armie was returned to Calis, the earle of Surrie sent forth sir William Sands, sir Maurice Berkeleie, sir William Fitz Williams, and with them three thousand men, which burned Marguison, the towne of saint Jehans rode, and also Temple towne, with manie villages.

They also brought a marvellous great bootie of goods out of the countrie, which they got at this rode, as foureteene thousand sheepe, a thousand foure hundred orin and kine, and other great cattell, a thousand three hundred hogs, and eight hundred mares and horses, besides prisoners. When the earle of Surrie had set things in order, and appointed forth such as he would haue remaine in the garrisons, on that side the sea; he returned, and all the residue of the armie (sauing those that were commanded to tarie) came ouer also with the nauie, and arrived in the Thames; and so euerie man into his countrie at his pleasure. There remained also behind a compa-
nie of men of warre called aduenturers, which serued without wages, liuing onlie on that which they could catch & win of the enemies. There were foure hundred of them that went with the armie now this last time into France, and did much hurt vnto the Frenchmen: for they were by practise become expert and skilfull in the points of warre, and daily ex-20
ploited one enterprise or other, to their owne aduantage, and hinderance of the enemy.

The duke of Albanie being in this meane while established gouernour of Scotland, raised an armie of fourefcore thousand men and aboue, with the which he approached to the English borders: but made no in-30
uasion. The mistrust that he had in the Scots caused him to staie, and therefore he sent to the French king for sir thousand Almans, the which he bailie looking for (that in vaine) vpon off time till the end of summer was now at hand, and then requiring a truce for certeine moneths, obtained it at the kings hand. The earle of Shrewesburie had in a readinesse eight and twentie thousand men to haue resisted him, if he had entered vpon the English confines. After that an ab-40 stinence of warre was taken betwixt England and Scotland, then in October following there came into England three personages of small behauiour (as it seemed) ambassadoes out of Scotland: they were smallie regarded, and shortly departed.

Their commission was onlie to vnderstand, whether the king had assented to the truce or not. Where-vpon it was thought that they were sent rather for a countenance onlie of fulfilling the promise made by the duke of Albanie at that present, when the truce was granted, than for anie true meaning to accomplish that which was promised; that is to saie, to agree vnto some vnfeined and perfect conclusion of peace. The king here vpon doubting their old pranks, ordeined the earle of Northumberland and Henrie Percie the sixt of that name, warden of the whole marches, who thankesfullie receiued the honoz thereof, and so he departed. But whatsoeuer matter it was that moued him, shortly after he began to make sute to the king, and ceased not, till he was of that office discharged: and then the earle of Surrie lord admirall of England was made generall warden, and the lord Marquesse Dorset was made warden of the east and middle marches, and the lord Dacres of the west marches.

The earle of Northumberland was for this refusal of exercising the office of lord warden, greatlie blamed of his owne tenants, and accounted of all men to be bold of the loue and desire that noblemen ought to haue to honoz and chualrie. The lord Marquesse Dorset accompanied with sir William Bulmer, and sir Arthur Darcie, with manie other of the nobilitie, the second of Aprill then being thursdaie before Easter, entered into Luidale, and so passing forward ten miles into Gallowaie, burnt on euerie side the towncs and villages. The parliament holden at the Blackefriers in London. Idw. Hall. in H. 8. fol. Cvj.

On the fifteenth daie of Aprill began the parliament, which was holden as then at the Blackefriers, and that daie the masse of the whole ghost was sung, all the lords being present in their parliament robes. ¶ Now when masse was finished, the k. came to the parliament chamber, and there sat downe in the seat of roll of throne, and at his feet on the right side sat the cardinall of Yorke and the archbishop of Canturburie, and at the rails behind stood doctor Tunstall bishop of London, which made to the whole parliament an eloquent oration, declaring to the people the office of a king. First he must be a man of judgement, according to the saying of the prophet David, Deus iudicium tuum regi da, &c. Also he must be a man of great learning, according to the saying of the prophet, Erudimini qui iudicatis terram. According to which sayings he said, that God had sent vs a prince of great judgement, of great learning, and great experience: which according to his princelie dutie, forgot not to studie to set forward all things which might be profitable to his people and realme, least might be laid to his charge the saying of Seneca; Es rex & non habes tempus esse rex. Art thou a king and hast no time to be a king: Which is as much to saie, as; Art thou a king, and dost nothing profitable to thy people: Art thou a king, and seest the people haue an insufficient law: Art thou a king, and wilt not provide remedie for the mischance of thy people?

The oration of doctor Tunstall bishop of London.

These things haue moued the kings most excellent maiestie to call this his high court of parliament, both for the remedie of mischances which be in the common law, as recoveries, foreyn vouchers & corrupt trials, and for making and ordering of new statutes, which maie be to the high advancement of the common-wealth. Wherefore he willet his commons to repaire to the common house, and there to elect them a speaker, or their common mouth, and to certifie the lord chancelor of the same, who should thereof make report to the kings most noble grace, and should declare his pleasure when he would haue him presented to his person. This was the cause of the parliament, as he said. But suerlie of these things no word was spoken in the whole parliament, and in effect no good act made, except the grant of a great subsidie were one. But according to this instruction the commons departed to the common house, & chose for their speaker sir Thomas Spore knight, & presented him on the saturday after in the parliament chamber, where he (according to the old vsage) disabled himselfe both in wit, learning, & discretion, to speake before the king, and brought in for his purpose how one Thormio desired Hannibal to come to his reading, which thereto assented, and when Hannibal was come he began to read De re militari, that is, of chenaltrie. When Hannibal perceived him, he called him arrogant sole: because he would presume to teach him which was maister of chenaltrie, in the feats of warre. So the speaker said, if he should speake before the king, of learning and ordering of a common-wealth and such other like, the king so well learned and of such prudence and experience might saie to him as Hannibal said to Thormio. Wherefore he desired his grace that the commons might chose an other speaker.

The oration of sir Thomas Spore speaker for commons.

The cardinall answered, that the king kneto his wit, learning, and discretion by long experience in his seruice: wherefore he thought that the commons had chosen him as the most merest of all; and so he did admit him. Then sir Thomas Spore gaue to the king his most humble thanks, and desired of him two petitions: the one, if he should be sent from the commons to the king on message and mislike their intent, that he might with the kings pleasure resort againe vnto the commons for the knowledge of their true meaning. The other was, if in communication and reasoning, any man in the common house should speake more largelie than of dutie he ought to doe, that all such offenses should be pardoned, and that to be entered of record. Which two petitions were granted; and so thus began the parliament and continued as you shall heare.]

This yeare was the citie and the whole Ile of the Rhodes conquered by the Turke, and all the christians displaced: whereof Guicciardin hath discoursed as followeth. ¶ The end of this yeare (saith he) was made no lesse wretched and unhappie, than dangerous to all christian princes for the losse of the Ile of Rhodes: which Soliman Ottoman toke by violence, notwithstanding it was defended by the knights of Rhodes, called in other times more ancient the knights of saint John of Jerusalem. And abiding in that place since they were chased out of Jerusalem, notwithstanding they laie betwixt two so mightie princes as the Turke & the Soldan; yet their valour had preferred it of long time, and to the right worthie glorie of their order, they had remained as an assured rampie christian religion in those seas: & yet they were not without their imputations & notes of infamie, for that hauing a continuall custome for the better defending of those shores, to spoile the vessels of the infidels, they were thought sometimes to make pillage of christian ships.

The Turke sent into the Island a wonderfull great armie, which remaining there manie months with no lesse horrour to good men for their cruelties, than terrour to all men for their huge numbers, at last he came thither in person. And drawing to his desire of conquest and glorie, the respect of profit and riches which the victorie would yield, he lost not one minute of time to ver them. Wherein his industrie was nothing inferiour to his valour, for sometimes he cast monstrous mines and trenches, sometimes he raised platformes of earth and wood, whose height overtopped the walls of the towne, and sometimes he afflicted them with most furious and bloudie assaults: insomuch that as these works and engines were not performed without a wonderfull butcherie & slaughter of his souldiours; so also the defense of them was so dangerous to the liues of them within, that manie numbers were diminished, manie bodies maimed and made vnseruicable, & the residue sore terrified by the calamitie of their companions and friends, to whom they could giue no other propertie of compassion, than to mourne with them in their common miserie.

Their aduersitie was so much the more intollerable, by how much their trauels were without fruit, their words without comfort, and their valour disfauoured of fortune, & lastlie their store of gunpowder was consumed, which is not the least necessitie for the defense of a place. They saw before their eyes huge breaches made into their walles with the artilleries of their enemies, they discerned severall mines wrought into manie parts of the towne, and they found by lamentable experience, that the lesse they did, the more painfullie they laboured, for that their fortune had reduced them to these termes of extremitie, that in abandoning one place to relieue another, they put both in danger, not hauing numbers sufficient to furnish the seruice, and lesse expectation expectation of rescue and perils so raging and desperate: so that, what for that their necessities were greater than their hopes, & their offense lesse able by the continuall diminution of their numbers, & lastly holding it no breach of honour to preserve by wisdom and composition, that they could no longer defend by their valour and prowes, they gave place to their destinie, and capitulated with the Turke as followeth. That the great maister of their order should leane the towne to him: that as well he as all his knights should depart in safetie, with libertie to carie with them as much of their goods as they could. And for assurance of this capitulation, the Turke should withdraw out of those seas, his fleet or naue, and retire his armie by land five miles from Rhodes. By vertue of which capitulation Rhodes remained to the Turkes, and the christians passed into Sicillie, and so into Italie, keeping their faith and profession unviolated. They found in Sicillie an armie by sea compounded of a certeine number of vessels, with great relafe of vittels and munitions, and readie to hoist saile at the next wind to reuente Rhodes. The stoutnesse of this rescue was laud to the popes fault.

After they were departed, Soliman for a more contempt of christian religion, made his entrie into the citie upon the daie of the birth of the sonne of God: which daie being celebrated in the churches of christians with noise of musike & holie inuocations, he converted all the churches of Rhodes dedicated to the seruire of Iesus Christ, into Mosques (so they call their temples) which after all the christian rites and ceremonies were abolished, they made dedicate to Mahomet. Gods cause had the christians hereupon with heauie hearts to make their complaint to God by the president of the psalmist, lamenting the libertie of the enemies exercising the vehemencie of his rage against Gods people; & full well with swolneries testifying the sorrow of their soules might (saying) he forming the vapours of their threnomina saie:

perde funditus Hostes potentes, qui tuum sacrum Mauis infanda polluant, Clangunt sonora buccina, non que tuas Ludes canat, ludibrio Sed festa acervo qua profanet; in tuis Voxilla segunt turribus, &c.

To vnderstand more of this historie touching the taking of Rhodes, what moued the Turke to couet the same, his letter comminatorie to Philip de Villiers who took part against him, with other accidents and circumstances belonging to this martiall action: read the report of Edward Hall, which is verie copious and plentifull in this behalfe. And now will we returne to our owne affaires here in England. About this time the bishop of Durham departed this life, & the king gaue that bishopricke to the cardinall, who resigned the bishopricke of Bath to doctor John Clerke maister of the rolles, and sir Henrie Parre that was vicechamberleine, was made lord priue seale, and shortly after was created lord Warwicke. In the end of this yeare, doctor Blith bishop of Chester was attached for treason, but he acquitted himselfe. About this time the cardinall exercised his authoritie (which he pretended by his power legantine) verie largelie, not onelie in prouiding of testaments in his court, calling the executors and administrators before him, of what diocesse soeuer they were, but also by prouisions he gaue all benefices belonging to spirituall persons, and ran thereby with in danger of the preeminence, as after ward was laid to his charge.

But after that he perceived his owne follie and rash doing herein, contrarie to the lawes, which would not permit that anie such things as were now used within the prouince of Cantuarbie, might be concluded without the authoritie of the archbishop, he sent them againe to Poules, and sate himselfe at Westminster with his cleargie of the prouince of Yorke. And euen as there was much adoe amongst them of the common house about their agreement to the subsidie, so was there as hard hold for a while amongst them of the clergie in the conuocation house. Pamelie Richard bishop of Winchester, & John bishop of Rochester held fore against it, but most of all sir Roland Philips beare of Croidon, and one of the canons of Poules, being reputed a notable preacher in those daies, spake most against that payment.

But the cardinall taking him aside, so handled the matter with him, that he came no more into the house, willinglie absenting himselfe to his great infamie, and losse of that estimation which men had of his innocencie. Thus the beluedder giuing ouer his hold, the other yielded, and so was granted the halfe of all their spirituall reuenues for one yeare, to be paid in five yerres following, that the burthen might the more easilie be borne. The parlement being begun (as ye haue heard) the cardinall on the nine and twentieth day of Appill came into the common house, and there shewing the great charges that the king necessarilie was at, and daile must be at in maintenance of his warres against the french and Scots, demanded the summes of eight hundred thousand pounds to be raised of the first part of euerie mans goods and lands, that is to wit, foure shillings of euerie pound.

This demand was enforced on the morrow after, by sir Thomas More then speaker of the parlement: but he spake not so much in perswading the house to grant it, but other spake as earnestlie against it, so that the matter was argued to and fro, and handled to the vttermost. There were that proued how it was not possible to haue it leuied in monie, for men of lands and great substance had not the first part of the same in coine. And sith the king by the lawe had received two shillings of the pound, which by this rate amounted to 400000 pounds: and now to haue foure shillings of the pound, it would amount in the whole vnto twelue hundred thousand pounds, which is first and last six shillings of the pound, being almost a third part of euerie mans goods, which in coine might not be had within this realme.

For the profe whereof was alledged, that if there were in England but twentie thousand parishes, and euerie parish should giue an hundred markes, that were but fiftene hundred thousand markes, which is but an hundred thousand pounds; and there be not verie manie parishes in England one with another, able to spare an hundred markes, out of cities and townes. And where it is written, that in England there be fortie thousand parish churches, it was proued that there were not thirtene thousand at this daie. Hard hold there was about this demand, and certeine wise and discret persons were sent to the cardinall, to moue him to be a meane to the king, that a lesse summe might be accepted: but he answered that he would rather haue his tounge plucked out of his head with a paire of pinners, than to moue the king to take anie lesse summe: and so with that answer they departed, reporting to the house the cardinals words. Then euerie daie was reasoning, but nothing concluded.

Whereupon the cardinall came againe into the lower house, and desired that he might reason with them that were against the demand: but he was answered that the order of that house was to heare, and not to reason, except amongst themselves. Where he began to shew arguments of the great wealth of the realme, realme, so that it might be thought, that he repined and disdained that anie man should be wealthie but himselfe. After he was gone, the commons debated the matter according to their former maner, and so in the end concluded of two shillings in the pound, from twentie pounds upwards, and from foure shillings to twentie pounds, of euery twentie shillings twelue pence, and vnder foure shillings of euery head of sixtene pences and vnder foure pence to be paid in two yeares. When this was notified to the cardinall, he was much therewith offended, so that to please him, at length, the gentlemen of fiftie pounds land and vnder, by the liberrall motion of sir John Huske, a knight of Lincolnshire, were burdened with twelue pence more of the pound of the same lands, to be paid in three yeares.

The cardinall to moue them thereto, bare them in hand that the lords had agreed to foure shillings of the pound, which was untrue: for they had granted nothing, but said till they might vnderstand what the commons would doe. The king therefore hauing knowledge of this, and such other notable lies uttered by the cardinall, repproued him therefore verie sharpe, and said that per it were long he woulde looke to things himselfe without anie substitute. A maruelous matter to consider how much the cardinall was cooled herewith, and how lowlie for a while he bare himselfe, so that thereby it well appeared how the maisters shapenesse now and then, doth much to reframe the euill nature of the servant. But the cardinall within a few daies after, pacifying the kings displeasure toward him, became nothing the better.

After that the foresaid grant was passed and accorded, the parliament was prorogued till the tenth of June. During which prorogation, the common people said to the burgeses, Sirs, we heare say you will grant foure shillings of the pound, we aduise you to doe so that you may go home with manie euill words and threatenings. In this season the cardinall by his power legatane dissolued the conuocation at Doules called by the archbishop of Cantuarburie, calling him and all the cleergie to his conuocation at Westminster, which was neuer bene before in England (saith Hall) thereof maister Whelton a merrie poet wrote:

Gentle Paule lay downe thy swerd,

For Peter of Westminster hath shauen thy beard.

Then the parliament was begun againe, the gentlemen that saue themselves charged with twelue pence more of the pound for their lands, did so much, that it was granted, that men of fiftie pounds and vnder in goods, should also pay twelue pence of euery pound in the fourth yeare: which could not be brought about but with great adoe, and much grudging of the burgeses and commons. The one and thirtieth of Iulie, the parliament was adiourned to Westminster, & there continuing till the thirteenth of August, was that day at nine of the clock at night dissolued. During the time of this parliament, the seven and twentieth of Aprill, was sir Arthur Plaine tagenet, bassard sonne to king Edward the fourth, at Wyndesore created viscount Lille, in right of his wife, which was wife to Edmund Dubreie beheaded.

In this yeare the fifteenth of June, Christerne king of Denmarke, with his wife, and a small traine with them, landed at Dover, where he was noblely received by the earle of Deuonshire, the bishops of Exeter and Rochester, and diuerse knights and esquires which brought them to Greenwich, where the king and queene received them with all honor. Now after he had remained at the court certaine daies, he was brought to London, & lodged at Bath place. He saue the watch on saint Peters euen, being brought vnto the kings head in Cheape, accompanied with the duke of Suffolke, the earles of Orford, Essex, and Kent, and diuerse other lords and ladies. The citie made to him and to his wife a collic banquet that night, and after he had passed the time a while in London, he resorted againe to the king, and had of him great gifts, and so likewise had his wife of the queene his aunt, & then taking their leave they departed, and were conueied to Dover. And thus after this king had bene in England two and twentie daies, he toke shipping, and sailed againe into Flanders, where he remained as a banished man out of his owne countrie.

About the same time, the earle of Hilbare being restored to the cardinals fauour, and taking to wife the ladie Elizabeth Graie, was sent ouer againe into Ireland to occupie his former office, where by the assistance of his faithfull friend Hugh Hynde archbishop of Dublin, and chancellour of that land, he brought the countrie into reasonable good order, so far as the rebellious doings of the wild Irish would permit. In this meane while, the warre was earnestly pursued betwene England & France, & England and Scotland, in such sort that each part did what in them lay to hurt other. On the borders toward Scotland lay the earle of Surrie high admerall of England, and the marques Dorset, with his brethren, sir William Compton, & sir William Kingston, with diuerse other knights and esquires sent to them by the king, which daile invaded the realme of Scotland, and threw downe the castell of Wedderburne, the castell of west Pelgate, the castell of Blackwater, the tower of Backwalles, the tower of east Pelgate, & manie other, and burnt to the number of thirte and seven villages, and haried the countrie from the cast marches to the west, and neuer had skirmish.

For the Scots, albeit they shewed themselves in plumps, waiting some aduantage, they durst not yet approach to the maine battell of the Englishmen, so that in all this iourne there were but few Englishmen lost. When the lords perceived that the Scots ment not to make anie inuasion into England this yeare, they toke order for the fortifying of the frontiers, and so returned. It was thought that the cardinall perceiving in what fauour sir William Compton was with the king, and doubting least the same might diminish his authoritie, desired to send him thus into the warres against the Scots. For the said sir William could not well brooke the cardinals presumption, in taking vpon him so highlie, to the derogation of the kings supreme gouernment, and therefore the cardinall in his absence thought to waite him out of fauour: but it would not be. For shortly after was sir William Compton called home to the court againe.

The Frenchmen burned a ship fraught with stone in the haven of Calis, vpon hope to haue destroyed the haven; but they missed the chanell in bringing in the ship, and so after that the ship was consumed with fire, the stones were recovered out of the water, and brought into Calis, which serued the Englishmen to good vse. Diuerse enterprises were atchieued betwixt them of the garrisons French and English in those marches. In Iulie the lord Sands treasurer of Calis, with other capteins & souldiours, to the number of twelue hundred, entered into the confines of their enemies, and came before Bullongne, where they had a great skirmish, & put their enemies to the waske; and after marching into the countrie, toke diuerse churches and other places which the Frenchmen had fortified, as the church of Wierfall, the temple of Dingham, and the castell of Harboringham, and so after they had bene within the enemies countrie almost two nights and two daies, they came backe to Calis, hauing not lost past a dozen of their men.

duke of Albanie would returne shortly into Scotland by sea, and bring with him a power of Frenchmen, prepared a fleet of tall and strong ships meet to encounter with the same duke and his power, and appointed for admerall, sir William Fitz Williams, & with him sir Francis Wlian, sir Anthonie Poinces, sargeant Kot, John Hopton, William Gansfon, Anthonie Kneuet, Thomas West, and other, which used great diligence to have met with the said duke of Albanie. And as they laie on the French coast, the foure and twentieth of August being sundaie, at season of the clocke in the morning, they landed in the haven of Trepoist, and assaulted the Frenchmen that were in certeine bulwarks on the shore, and did what they could to impeach the Englishmens landing.

But the Englishmen encouraged by their captains, did so valiantlie (although they were but an hundred men in comparison of their enemies, as seven hundred to sir thousand) that in the end they repelled the Frenchmen, and wan their bulwarks of them, and in the same found diuerse peeces of ordinance, which they seized. And perceiuing that the Frenchmen fled to the towne of Trepoist, they followed, and shot at them right egerlie, so that manie of the Frenchmen were slaine and wounded, yet they could get to the towne. The Englishmen assaulted the gates but could not breake them open: yet they set fire on the suburbs, & also burnt seven ships which laie in the haven. The English captains perceiuing how the people of the countrie came downe in great numbers to the rescue of the towne, caused their men to get together such spoiles as they might bring awaie in that sudden: and then after they had bene on land five houres, with like speed as they came, they retired backe againe to their ships, not without some losse and damage of men both hurt & slaine; as it often hapneth, when those be not found unprouided which a man vnadvisedlie assaulteth.

In this season the king hauing put an armie of men in a readinesse, caused the same to be transported ouer to Calis, & appointed the duke of Suffolke to haue the leading thereof, and to make a iourneie into France. The duke (according to his commission) came to Calis the foure and twentieth of August, and there abiding the armie, caused all things to be prepared necessarie for the same, as vittels, munition, and such like. There were appointed to attend him in this iourneie, the lord Montacute, and his brother sir Arthur Pole, the lord Herbert sonne to the earle of Worcester, the lord Ferrers, the lord Harneie, the lord Sandes, the lord Barkleie, the lord Polvers, and the baron Curson: of knights sir Richard Wingfield chancellour of the duchie of Lancaster, sir John Ular, sir Edward Penill, sir William Kingston, sir Richard Weston, sir Andrew Winton, sir Robert Wingfield, sir Anthonie Wingfield, sir Edward Guilford, sir Edward Greulle, sir Edward Chamberleine, sir Thomas Lucie, sir Cueraud Digbie, sir Adrian Folcelw, sir Richard Cornetwall, sir William Courtneie, sir William Sidneie, sir Henrie Owen, and manie others.

The whole armie (as appeared by the musters taken thereof) consisted in sir hundred demilances, two hundred archers on horsebacke, three thousand archers on foot, and five thousand bill men. To these also were adioined seuentene hundred, which were taken out of the garisons and crewes of Hammes, Guines, & Calis, so that in all they were ten thousand and five hundred, well armed and appointed for the warre. Beside them, there were also two thousand six hundred labourers and pioners. When this armie was come ouer to Calis, and all things readie for the iourneie, they issued out of Calis and toke the fields. The vant-gard was led by the lord Sandes. Capteine of the right wing was sir William Kingston, & on the left sir Cueraud Digbie. The marshall of Calis sir Edward Guilford was capteine of all the horsemen. The duke himselfe governed the battell, and sir Richard Wingfield was capteine of the rere-ward.

While the armie laie without Calis, they dalleie came into the towne. And so it happened that a simple felow cut a pursle, as he made to buie apples, which incontinent was taken, and brought to the maiors house to ward. Which thing diuerse Welshmen perceiuing, and not knowing what appertained to iustice, ran in great companies to the maiors house, & would haue broken the house. The officers of the towne intreated, but the Welshmen more & more approached. The number of the Welshmen was so great, that the watch of Calis strake alarm. Then the lord deputie and the lord Sandes did all that in them laie, to bring them to conformitie. But they were so rude, that they nothing them regarded: the priests brought forth the sacrament, which also was not regarded. Wherefore the lord Ferrers was straightlie commanded to appease their rage, for with him they came thither, which with great paine and intreatie them appeased. And then all the Welshmen were commanded to the field, and to depart the towne, and so were all other captains: and after wards diuerse of the head rioters were apprehended and soe punished for example.

The first enterprize that the duke attempted, was the winning of a castell called Bell castell, to which the lord Sandes, and the lord Ferrers being sent, did so much by the power of battrie, that after the walls were beaten, those that were appointed to giue the assault, prepared them thereto. Which when the Frenchmen within perceiued, they yielded the place into the Englishmens hands, and themselves to the mercie of the duke, which receiued them as prisoners, and deliuered the castell to sir William Skeuington, the which he caused to be rased downe to the ground the seauen and twentieth of September. In this season was the duke of Bourbon high constable of France reuoluted from seruice of the French king to the seruice of the emperor and the king of England. For after it was knowne that this duke had his mind alienated from the French king, sir John Russell (that was after ward created erle of Bedford) was sent into France vnto the said duke.

This gentleman being verie faire spoken, & well languaged, in disguised apparell, ordered himselfe so wiselie and fortunatlie in his iourneie, that in covert manner he came to the duke, and so persuaded him, that he continued in his former determination, and avoided the realme of France, as in the French historye ye maie more at large perceiue. The more to encourage the English soldiers, there was a proclamation made in the host the eight and twentieth of September, how the said duke of Bourbon was become enemy to the French king, and friend to the king of England; so that hauing in his wages ten thousand Almans, he was readie to invade France in another part, the more to let & disturb the French kings purposes. For the accomplishing whereof there was sent to him monie in no small summes. After this proclamation the nine and twentieth of September, the duke of Suffolke remoued to Ard, and so forward into Picardie. At Coydes betwene Teruine and saint Omers, there came to him the lord of Hilslein, and with him of Spaniards, Almans, Cleueners, and others, three thousand footmen, and five hundred horsemen.

The duke being thus furnished with new aid, marched forward in wet weather, and made bridges, and and mended the waies where he passed as well as he might, sending out diuerse companies of his men of warre, to take towne, and fetch in boties on eneric side. The frenchmen were so afraid of the Englishmen, that they fled out of their houses, and left the towne and villages void, conueying such goods as they could auaile with them, but oftentimes they left good store behind them, so that the Englishmen gained greatlie, and namely at Anchor, which was a rich towne, and upon the Englishmens approach the inhabitants fled out of it, and then the Englishmen entred. They took also the castell of Bounegard, and put therein a garison, whereof was captaine the lord Leonard Greie, brother to the marquisse Dorset, to conduct victuals to the armie, which now was farre from any succours of the English part.

The castell of Bounegard manned by the English-
men.

The towne of Bzate besieged.

The duke passed forward till he came to the towne of Bzate, in the which were sixtine hundred men of warre, under the gouernance of captaine Adrian, and beside his retinue, there came to the succours of the towne, monsieur Pontdormie, the vicount Lauerdam, the vicount Courraime, monsieur Applincourt, and monsieur Dampneie, with five hundred horsemen, so that in the towne beside the inhabitants were two thousand good men of warre. This towne standeth on the river of Some fourre and twentie English miles from Arras, and fouretene of the same miles above Amiens. On the twentieth of October, the duke caused his ordinance to be brought afore it by foure of the clocke in the morning, the which was so well applied in making bat-terie to the walles of the towne, that by nine of the clocke the towne was made assailable; and then the Englishmen, Flemings & Burgognians made forward, and by the good comfort of the lord Sandes and other captaine, they got the ditches, and after entered upon the walles. The frenchmen stood at defense with pikes, crossbowes, handguns, and halberds, but they were too weakie, for on all parts entered the Englishmen, and suddenly the frenchmen fled, and the Englishmen followed.

Bzate won by assault.

On the further side of the towne there was a bulworke fortified with ordinance verie stronglie to defend the passage ouer the water of Some, which is there diuided into diuerse branches. The french horsemen being withdraue to the passage, defended it till the footmen were got ouer the bridge, and then they plucked auaile the planks of the bridge, so that no man should follow; but the Englishmen cast planks on the bridge and got ouer, in which passing diuerse were drowned: but such diligence and inforcement was used, that they all passed both hor-men and footmen. Then was the bulworke fiercelie assaulted, and finally taken by the Englishmen, with all the ordinance. There was also taken captaine Adriaen and captaine Utterlieu. The English horsemen followed the frenchmen, and slew & took manie of them. Sir Robert Ferringham brake a spear on the lord Pontdormie. The lord Leonard Greie did valiantlie that day, which was come from the castell of Bounegard, and was here at the winning of Bzate, which was taken in maner aboue rehearsed the twentieth of October.

A traine of gunpowder laid.

The frenchmen when they perceived that they should not be able to defend, had laid a traine of gunpowder to set it on fire, in hope to haue destroyed manie of the Englishmen as they should be occupied in gathering the spoile; but by reason that they followed their entrees, and got ouer the passage, the fire took and set the towne on fire per the Englishmen returned. Yet much wine was saved which lay in cellars, and stood the Englishmen in good stead.
The one and twentieth day of October the armie and all the ordinance passed ouer the river, and came to a towne called Bappe. All the inhabitants were fled, but they had left good plentie of wine & other riches behind them. The garison that lay at anchor knowing that the duke was passed the water of Some, raised the towne and castell there called Bounegard, and came to the armie now being lodged at Bappe.

The duke sent to them of Roie, requiring to haue the towne deliuered to him, which they granted to do, because they had no garison of soldiers within to defend the towne. Thither was sent sir Richard Cornelwall, with foure hundred men, which received the towne and kept it in good quiet, till the duke came thither with his whole armie. On the five and twentith daie of October, the duke remoued to a village called Lihome where the soldiers had great pillage.
The next daie they went to Daenker, and the fol-lowen and twentieth daie they came before the towne of Pontdormie, in the which were a thousand footmen, and five hundred horsemen under the gouernance of monsieur de Roch baron, purposing to defend the towne to the bittermost. But after that sir William Skeuington had made batterie from foure of the clocke in the next morning till eight in the same forenoon, with such force that the walls were ouerthrowne and made assailable, they within yeldded the towne into the dukes hands, with condition they might go with bag and baggage.

The frenchmen made such hast, and were so glad to be gone, that they left much household stuffe behind them, and great plentie of wine. The Englishmen also would not suffer them to beare their standards vnspred, but rent the same in peeces: wherewith the lord Roch baron was highlie displeased, but he could not amend it. The duke remained in Pont-dormie till the last of October, and then remoued to Roie, where he rested a while with all his armie. On Allhallowes daie, the duke of Suffolke in the chiefe church of Roie made knights, the lord Herbert, the lord Holmes, Oliver Denerre, Arthur Pale, William Sandes, Robert Ferringham, Robert Dabie, Richard Sandes, Robert Ferringham, Robert Dabie, burie, Edmund Weningale, Richard Corbet, Thomas Wentworth, William Storton, Walter Spangell, George Warram, Edward Scimo, that was after duke of Summerset. The morow after the armie remoued to a place called Fetele.

The soldiers being thus led from place to place, began to murmur among themselves & to grudge, because of the winter season, being nothing meete their purpose to keepe the fields: it grieved them that the Burgognians being provided of wagons, made shift to send the spoile and pillage home into their countrie being at hand, & they to want such meanes to make the best of those thyngs which they got, so that (as they took it) they beat the bush: others had the birds. This grudge was yet by gentle words ceased for a time. On the first daie of Nouember the whole armie came to a village called Cleane, and there rested for that night, and on the morow after they returned againe ouer the water of Some, and came to a place called Beauford. At this passage the duke made John Dabie and Robert Alreight knights.

On the eight of Nouember the duke remoued to a place called Pont saint Martine, and from thence was sent the lord Sandes to the king in post, to aduertise him in what case the armie stood, and the armie remoued to Permont, and there rested for a time. The Welshmen still murmured that they might not returne home now that the winter was thus farre entered. But there were a sort of men of warre, to the number of a thousand persons vnder the leading of sir John Mallop, which had little wages or none, liuing only on their adventures, & were therefore called aduenturers, and of some they were called

called Brakers, which had as good will to be still abroad, as the Welshmen had desire to returne home. For these brakers by spoiling of townes, taking of prisoners, & other such practises of warlike exploits, made their haunts, and daile brought to the campe, horses, mares, bittels, cloth, coine, and other necessaries, which might not haue bene missed.

After great raines and winds which had chanced in that season, there followed a soze frost, which was so extreame, that manie died for cold, and some lost fingers, some lost toes, and manie lost nailes betwixt their fingers, so extreame was the rigour of that frost. The thirteenth daie of November the duke remoued to a place within two miles of Bogan castle, and still it froze. The Welshmen in the morning set out a shout, and cried; Home, home. The Brakers hearing that, cried; Hang, hang. Hereof businesse was like to haue ensued, but by policie it was ceased. Sir Edward Guilford capitaine of the horsemen viewing the castell of Bogan, perceiued that the marishes (wherewith it was inuironed) were so hard frozen, that great oddiance might passe ouer the same. Which he signified to the duke, & therewith the duke was contented that he should trie what successe would come of giuing the attempt to win it. So was the oddiance brought ouer the marshy ground, where they within being aduertised, immediatlie after three shots of canon discharged against them, they yielded the castell, and all the artillerie within it, of the which there was good store, as three score & sixtene peeces great and small. The keeping of this castell was deliuered to the seneschall of Henegow.

In this meane while the lord Sands was come to the court, and informed the king of the state of the armie. The king had before his comming heard that his people in the said armie were in great miserie, both by reason of the intemperat weather, & unreasonable time of the yeare, the lacke of bittels, & such other discommodities: wherefore he caused a new power of six thousand men to be prepared and sent into the duke of Suffolke for a reliefe, vnder the leading of the lord Pontfote. But per this power could be put in order to passe the sea, and before the duke could haue knowledge againe from the king of his further pleasure, he was constrained to breake vp his armie, and returned by Valencennes, and so through Flanders into Calis. He left at Valencennes all the great artillerie. The king was somewhat displeased with the breaking vp of the armie thus contrarie to his mind, but hearing the reasonable excuses which the duke & the capitaine had to alleage, he was shortly after pacified. And so after they had remained in Calis a certaine time, vntill their friends had alluaged the kings displeasure, they returned, and all things were well taken, and they receiued into as much fauour as before.

But now to returne to the doings in other parts, as betwixt the Englishmen and Scots, which chanced in this meane while that the duke of Suffolke was thus in France. We shall vnderstand, that the Scots hearing that the warre was thus turned into France, thought that nothing should be attempted against them, and therefore wared more bold, and began to rob and spoile on the marches of England. Wherefore the king sent againe thither the earle of Surrie treasurer and high admerall of England, the which with all speed comming to the west borders, sent for an armie of six thousand men, with the which entering Scotland by the drie marishes, he ouerthrew certaine castles, piles, and small holds, till he came through the dales to Jedworth, wherein laie a great garrison of Scots, which skirmished with the Englishmen right sharpelie at their first comming, but yet at length the towne, abbey, and castell were wone, spoiled, and burned.

After this the earle incamped within the Scottish ground from the two and twentieth of September till the five and twentieth of the same moneth, & then returned backe againe into England. During which time the lord Dacres was the castell of Fernherst. The French king perceiuing that the Scots did not worke anie notable trouble to the Englishmen to staie them from the inuading of France (& the cause was (as he took it) for that they lacked the duke of Albanie, whome they named their gouernour) he therefore prouided a nauie of ships to haue transported him ouer into Scotland; so that all things were redie for his iourne. But the Englishmen were redie on the sea vnder the conduct of Sir William Fitz Williams to stop his passage if he had set forward; wherefore he caused his ships to be brought into West haue, and byted it abroad, that he would not go into Scotland that yeare.

The king of England being certified that the duke meant not to depart out of France of all that yeare, about the middell of September, commanded that his ships should be laid by in hauens till the next spring. The duke of Albanie being thereof aduertised, boldie then took his ships, and sailed into Scotland with all conuenient speed, as in the Scottish histories ye maie read more at large. Shortly after his arriual there, he brought so with the Scots, that an armie was leauied, with the which he approached to the borders of England, & lodged at Calwedream, readie to enter into England. The king of England hauing aduertisement giuen to him from time to time of the proceedings of his aduersaries, with all diligence caused to be assembled the people of the North parts beyond Trent, in such numbers that there were three thousand gentlemen bearing coats of armes with their powers and strength, which were all commanded to repaire to the erle of Surrie with speed. The noble marquesse Dorset was appointed with six thousand men to keepe Berwicke, least the Scots should laie siege thereto.

The duke of Albanie hearing of the preparation which the earle of Surrie made against him, sent to him an herald, promising him of his honour to giue him battell; and if he took him prisoner, he would put him to courteous ransom, & his bodie to be safe. To whome the earle answered, that much he thanked the duke of his offer, promising him to abide battell if he durst giue it; & that if the said duke chanced to be taken by him or his, he would strike off his head, and send it for a present to his maister the king of England, and bade him that he should trust to none other. At this answer the duke and the Scots took great despite. The earle of Surrie being at Alnewicke, there came to him the earles of Northumberland and Westmerland, the lords Clifford, Dacres, Lumley, Dgle, & Darcie, with manie knights, esquires, gentlemen, and other soldiers and men of warre, to the number of fourte thousand. And from the court there came the maister of the horse, Sir Nicholas Carew, Sir Francis Brian, Sir Edward Maitton, and others.

The last of October being saturday, in the night before the same daie, the duke of Albanie sent two or three thousand men ouer the water to besiege the castell of Marke, which comming thither with their great ordinance, beat the castell drie soze, and won the uttermost ward called the Barnekins. On Sunday and monday being the first and second of November, they continued their batterie, and then thinking that the place was assailable, courageously set on the castell, and by strength entered the second ward. Sir William Lisle that was capitaine of this castell, perceiuing the enemies to haue wone the false prizes, and that nothing remained but onlie the inner ward or dungeon, encouraged his men to the best of his power, with words of great comfort and manhood, and therewith issued forth with those few that he had left about him (for he had left manie at other assaults) and what with courageous shooting, and manfull fighting, the enemies were driven out of the place, and of them were slaine, and namedlic of those Frenchmen which the duke had brought forth of France, to the number of thre hundred, which laie there dead in sight when the earle of Surrie came thither, besides such as died of wounds, and were drowned.

Then the Scots and Frenchmen removed their ordinance ouer the water in all hast, and by that time that they were got ouer, the earle of Surrie was come with five thousand horsemen, and all his great armie followed. He was sozie that his enemies were gone, and much praised sir William Lisle for his valiance. The earle would gladlie haue followed his enemies into their owne borders, but his commission was onelic to defend the realme, and not to invade Scotland; and therefore he said, not onelic vnto the great displeasure of himselfe, but also of manie a lustie gentleman, that would gladlie haue seene further proofe of the Scottish mens manhood. Shortly after, the quene of Scots, mother to the king, sent to hir brother the king of England, for an abstinence of warre, vntill further communication might be had about the conclusion of some good agreement betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland, which request to hir was granted; and so the English armie brake vp, and the earle of Surrie returned to the court.

Edw. Hall in H. 8. fol. Cxv. A present sent by the emperor to the king.

In this season the emperor Charles sent to the king of England two mules trapped in crimson velvet curiously embroidered, all the buckles, stirrups and all such other garnishings were silver and gilt of marvellous cunning worke. He sent also eleuen gennets full gobble to behold trapped with russet velvet richlie wrought, and foure speares, and two iavelins of strange timber & worke richlie garnished, and five brace of greihounds: and to the quene he sent two mules with rich trappers, and high chaires after the Spanish fashion. All these presents were thankesfullie receiued both of the king and quene.]

An anticipa- tion.

Whilste the earle of Surrie was in the marches of Scotland, and the duke of Suffolke in France (as before ye haue heard) the cardinall sent out commissions in the moneth of October, that euerie man being worth fortie pounds, should paie the whole subsidie before granted, out of hand, not tarieng till the dates of payment limited. This was called an anticipation, that is to meane, a thing taken before the time appointed, and was a new tearme not knowne before those dates: but they paid swetelie for their learning. In December were taken certeine traitors in Couentrie, one called Francis Philip, scholemaster to the kings benchmen, and one Christopher Pickering cleerke of the larder, and one Anthonie Spainville gentleman, which by the perswasion of the said Francis Philip, intended to haue taken the kings treasure of his subsidie, as the collectors of the same came towards London, and then to haue raised men and taken the castell of Killingworth, and to haue arreared warre against the king. The said Francis, Christopher, and Anthonie, were hanged, beheaded, and quartered at Wborne the eleuenth of Februarie, and the other were sent to Couentrie, and there executed.

The archduke of Austria made knight of the garter.

In this yeare the king sent the lord Dorsie, sir William Dorsie knight, & doctor Le his almoner to don Ferdinando the archduke of Austria, with the order of the garter, which in the towe of Au-remberge receiued the same, where all the princes of Germanie were then assembled at a diet or council. In this meane while, diuerse enterprises and feats of warre were practiced and atchieved by them of the garrisons in the marches of Calis, and the Frenchmen of Bullogne; and the borders thereabouts: but the Frenchmen commonlie were put to the waste. Amongest other exploits, it chanced that one Breerton a gentleman, and capteine of a number of the aduenturers, as he went about to spoile the towne of Wall, was taken by the French horsemen, and sold vnto the pezants of the countie, the which vnnmercifullie slue him and sirteene more that were taken with him; after that the men of warre had deliuered them, and were departed. But this murder was reuenged shortly by other of the aduenturers, which comming vnto the same towne of Wall, took thirtie eight prisoners of the inhabitants, & slue of them thirtie & six, & burned the towne.

In this yeare thorough books of chimerides, and prognostications, forshelwing much hurt to come by waters & floods, many persons bittelled themselves, and went to high grounds for feare of drowning. Speciallie one Bolton prior of saint Bartholomewes in Smithfield, builded him an house vpon Harol on the hill, onelic for feare of this flood, and thither he went and made prouision of all things necessarie for the space of two moneths. This great raine and waters should haue fallen in Februarie, but no such thing happened, whereby the follie of men was shewed. The astronomers for their excuse did saie, that in their computation they had miscounted in their number an hundred yeares. A legat was sent from the pope to the king to moue him to peace: but the king declared to him the whole circumstance of his title, for the which he made wars against the Frenchmen, and thereof deliuered notes to the said legat, the which departed with the same backe to Rome in post. He had bene first with the French king, and with the emperor, but could not bring them to arie good conspirmite, as his desire was to haue done; so that his trauell was without frute in maner, as it appeared.

Manie enterprises, skirmishes, forreins, and other feats of warre were attempted and put in we betwixt the Englishmen of Calis, Guisnes, and other fortresses there in those marches, and the Frenchmen of Bullogne, and other of the garrisons in the frontiers of Picardie, and still sir William Fitz Williams as then capteine of Guisnes, sir Robert Feringham capteine of Peirwan bridge, sir John Mallop, and sir John Cage were those that did to the Frenchmen most damage. Also monsieur de Brees being capteine of Bullogne, did for his part what he could to defend the frontiers there, and to annoy his enemies. Yet one daie in Maie, sir William Fitz Williams, and sir Robert Feringham, with seven hundred men (accounting in that number the Brekers) went to Bullogne, and there skirmished with the Frenchmen, whilste Christopher Co a rayteine of foure English ships took land, and fought with them of base Bullogne on the one side, as the Brekers assailed them on an other.

There was a sharpe bickering, and in the end the Frenchmen were driven backe, and diuerse of them slaine & taken, speciallie by the Brekers, that took the barriers of them, & so when the tide was turned, Christopher Co with his men withdrew to his ships, the Brekers returned to sir William Fitz Williams, who said for them, and then gathering his men together by sound of a trumpet, sent forth such as might fetch the dykes of beasls and cattell in the countie nere adioning, & with the same returned backe in safetie. On the eight of August monsieur de Brees accompanied accompanied with diuerse French lords and men of war, to the number of eight hundred footmen, and as manie horsemen, came verie earlie in a morning to a village called Wonnings, within the English pale, and leauing there three hundred horsemen in ambush, road to Balkerwell, and there appointed to tarrie with other three hundred men, and the residue of the horsemen and footmen with banner displayed went forth and forraied all the countrie.

Sir Robert Feringham also with foure score horsemen issued forth of Calis, to vnderstand the demeanour of the Frenchmen: but being not able to resist the great number of the Frenchmen, he was chased, and saued himselfe by flight. But this displeasure was shortly after reuenged by the said Robert, the which comming to Margulson the twelue of August with three hundred footmen, and three score horsemen, he skirmished with the Frenchmen that stood at defence, chased them into the church, and fired them out of the same, so that the Frenchmen leapt out of the church to their destruction, for of three hundred there were saued but three score aloue. On the one and twentieth of Maie being Trinitie sondaie, five hundred Scottishmen in the morning verie earlie, entred by seuerall fords into England, and laie conuertie by the high waies, in purpose to haue surprised such market men as came to the faire that day kept at Berwikke. They took diuerse, but finally being espied, the alarme rose, and they were fought with right sharple, who defended themselves with such manhood in bialwing backe to their aduantage, that if the young lord of Shulerie had not come to the succours of the Englishmen, the Scots had gone a waie with their bootie. Notwithstanding in the end they were glad to seeke refuge by flight, losing 200 of their number, which were taken in the chase.

On the fift of Iulie next ensuing, sir John a Frenwikke, Leonard Pulgrau, and bassard Heron, with diuerse other English captiains, hauing with them nine hundred men of war, entred the Herts, minding to fetch out of the same some bootie, and encountering with the Scots being in number two thousand, after long and long fight, caused them to leaue their ground and to flie, so that in the chase were taken two hundred Scots, and manie saine, & amongst them were diuerse gentlemen. But sir Rafe a Frenwikke, Leonard Pulgrau, and the bassard Heron, with thirtie other Englishmen well horsed, followed so faere in the chase, that they were past rescues of their companie, whereof the Scots being aduised, suddenly returned, and set on the Englishmen, which oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, were some overcome, and there was taken sir Rafe a Frenwikke, Leonard Pulgrau, and sir other: and bassard Heron, with seauen other were saine. The residue by chance escaped. The other Englishmen with their 200 prisoners returned safelie into England.

On the seuenth of Iulie, the Englishmen fought with like fortune against the Scots that were entered England at the west marches, for in the beginning they put the Scots to the worse, and took three hundred of them prisoners: but afterwards, because the Englishmen that had taken those prisoners, withdrew out of the field with the same prisoners, the Scots perceiving the number of the Englishmen to be diminished, gaue a new onset on the Englishmen, and then distressed. After this, the Scots sued for a truce, and had it granted to indure till the feast of saint Andrew. This yeare the first of September was doctor Thomas Hamball maister of the rolles receiued into London with earles, and bishops, and diuerse other nobles and gentlemen, as ambassadors from pope Clement, which brought with him a rose of gold for a token to the king. And on the daie of the natiuitie of our ladie, after a solemne masse song by the cardinall of Borke, the said present was deliuered to the king: which was a tree forged of fine gold, wrought with branches, leaues, and floures resembling roses. This tree was set in a pot of gold which had three set of antique fashion. The pot was of measure halfe a pint, in the vpper most rose was a faire saphire loupes perced, the bignesse of an acorne, the tree was of heighth halfe an English yard, and a fot in bredth.

This yeare in Iulie the lord Archembald Douglas earle of Angus, which had married the queene of Scots sister to the king of England, escaped out of France (where he had remained for a season, in manner as a banished man) and came into England to the king, as then being at Crēnelwich, and was of him courteously receiued. Sir Anthonie Fitz Herbert one of the Iustices of the common ples, sir Rafe Egerton knight, and doctor Denton deane of Lichfield, being sent in the beginning of this yeare into Ireland as commissioners, behaueed themselves so sagelie, that they reformed diuers wrongs, brought sundrie of the wild Irish by faire means vnto obedience, and made (by the kings authoritie) the earle of Kildare deputie of the land; before whome the great Onele bare the sword. And the lord Piers Butler earle of Ormond, which before was deputie, was now made high treasurer of Ireland. In September the said commissioners returned.

During all this season, there were daillie attempts made and practised by the Englishmen in the lobe countries, namely the English horsemen; & the aduenturers rested not, but daillie made inuasions vpon the French confines. But the aduenturers about the beginning of winter made an enterprise to fetch some bootie from a village lieng towards Spurrell. They were not fullie two hundred men, and of those there were five and twentie horsemen. The Frenchmen by chance the same time were abroad vnder the conduct of the earle of Dammartine, which was going to S. Omers with fiftene hundred horsemen, and eight hundred footmen, and perceiuing where the aduenturers were comming, made towards them, and after long & cruell fight overcame them, and slue most part of them, for that in defending themselves most stoutlie, they had saine and wounded a great number of the Frenchmen per they could be overcome, keeping themselves close together, and might not be broken so long as they had anie arrowes to shot. This was the end of the aduenturers otherwise called Breckers, being as hardie men as euer serued prince.

In December there came to London diuerse ambassadors out of Scotland, about a peace to be had, and a marriage concluded betwene the king of Scots, and the ladie Marie daughter to the king of England, as in the Scottish historie yee shall find more at large expressed. Before the feast of Christmasse, the lord Leonard Craie, and the lord John Craie, brethren to the marquesse Dorset, sir George Cobham, sonne to the lord Cobham, William Carie, sir John Dupleie, Thomas Wiat, Francis Pointz, Francis Sidonie, sir Anthonie Browne, sir Edward Selmor, Oliuer Hanners, Perciuall Hart, Sebastian Rudigate, and Thomas Calen, esquires of the kings houshold, enterprised a challenge of seats of armes against the feast of Christmas, which was proclaimed by Winfroe the herald, and performed at the time appointed after the best manner, both at tilt, tourneie, barriers, and assault of a castell erected for that purpose in the tiltyard at Crēnelwich, where the king held a roiall Christmasse that yeare, with great mirth and princelie pastime.

of one doctor Larke, aprehendarie of S. Stephans, and oftentimes talked with the cardinall about the affaires betwixt the kings of England and France, motioning waies for a peace to be concluded. When this was knowne abroad, as at the length it was, monseigneur de Prate the emperours ambassado: mis-liked such covert doings, and soze grudged thereat.
The foure and twentieth of Januarie, the president of Rome called monseigneur Binton, came to London as ambassado: from the French king, and was lodged with the said John Jokin.

from the em-perour and their request.

On sundae the fift of March were receiued into London monseigneur de Beuer lord of Campher, ad-mirall of Flanders, and maister John de la Cose, president of Walins, & maister John de la Cache, as ambassadors from the ladie Margarete in the name of the emperour. These ambassadors required thre things in their suit. First they demanded the ladie Marie the kings onelic daughter to be deliuered out of hand, and she to be named emperesse, and to take possession of all the loue countries, and to be gouer-nour of the same. Also that all such sums of monie as the king should giue with hir in mariage for a dower to be made to hir, should be paid incontinentlie.
Thirdlie, that the king of England himselfe should passe the sea, and make warre in France the next summer. The two first demands were not agreed to for certeine causes, and as to this last, the king said he would take aduise.

News of the siege of Pavia & the taking of the French king prisoner.

On thursdaie the ninth of March, at seauen of the clocke in the morning, there came a gentleman in post from the ladie Margarete gouernesse of Flanders, which brought letters containing how that the four and twentieth of february, the siege of Pavia (where the French king had lien long) was raised by force of battell, and the French king himselfe taken prisoner. The same day the president of Rome, & John Jokin were going to the court (for they had not yet spoken with the king) and in Holburne in their waie heard these tidings, whereupon they returned to their lodging right sorrowfull, and within short space after returned to the regent of France. It was thought the king would haue agreed with the French king, if this chance had not hapned, for all the people of England grudged against Flanders, for the euill demean-our of the Flemings in time of the warre. Also the king was displeased with them for enhancing his come there, which caused much monie to be conueied out of this realme dailie ouer into that countrie.
Boundfires and great triumph was made in London for the taking of the French king, on saturday the eleuenth of March; and on the morow after being sunday the twelfth of March, the king came to Pauls, and there heard a solemne masse, and after the same was ended, the quere sang Te Deum, and the minstrels plaied on euerie side.

The battell of Pavia, wherein the French king
is taken prisoner.

Here it is convenient to adde the battell of Pa-uia, wherein the French king was taken prisoner, most notable discoursed by Guicciardine, in the fifteenth booke of his historie: the principall matter whereof, to make the report of Pavia and the French king more perspicuous, it were good to inferre. On the night (saith mine author) before the five and thwen-tith of february, a daie dedicated by the christians to the apostle saint Matthias, and also the daie of the institution of the emperour, the imperiales determined to march to Spirabell, where late incamped cer-teine companies of horsemen and footmen. In this march they stood vpon this intention, that if the French men moued, then they had set at libertie the siege of Pavia: and if they moued not, then to aduenture the fortune of the battell. Therefore the better to aduance this determination, all the beginning of the night they gaue manie alarmes, the more to keepe trauelled and wearie the French men, making semblance as though they would charge them on that side towards Pato, Melin, and saint Lazarus.

About midnight enerie souldior, by the commandement of the capitaine, put on a white cassakin ouer his armoz, to be knowne from the Frenchmen. They were cast into two squadrons of horsemen, & foure of footmen. In the first were six thousand footmen equallie compounded of lanceknights, Spaniards, and Italians: this squadron was led by the mar-quesse of Guast: the second stood onelic vpon cer-teine bands of Spanissh footmen under the charge of the marquesse of Bisquairo: the third and fourth squadron were of lanceknights, commanded by the viceroi and the duke of Wurbon. They arrived at the parke walles certeine houres before daie, and by the working of their masons, and readie willes of their souldiers, they cast downe to the earth thre score sadome of wall: by which breach, being entred within the parke, the first squadron drew towards Spirabell, and the residue of the armie toke the waie to the campe.

As soone as the king understood that they were entred into the parke, thinking they would draw to Spirabell, he issued out of his lodging to fight in plaine and open field, desiring to draw the battell rather to that place than to anie other, for the aduantages which it gaue to the horsemen: he commanded to turne the artilleries toward the enemies, which beating them in flanke, brought great damage to the reregard. But in the meane while, the battell of the imperiales gaue a furious charge vpon the kings squadron, which ordinarilie was the battell: but as the Spaniards went, it was the reregard. The king fought valiantlie, & abode with great courage the violence of his enemies, who with the furie of their harquebuziers forced his men to giue ground, till the rescue of the Switzers came, when the Spaniards were repelled, as well by them as by the horsemen that charged them in flanke.
But the viceroi being called in by the marquesse of Bisquairo, who brought to the fight his lanceknights, they were easilie broken, not without great slaughter of the Switzers, who that daie did nothing answer the opinion of Ballo: which as yet sometimes they had woont so honozable to expresse in battelles.

The king kept alwaies the middle of the battell, being instructed with a great gard of men at armes.
And albeit he did what he could to containe and con-firme his people: yet after he had fought long with his owne hands, his horse being slaine vnder him, him selfe lightlie hurt in the face and in the hand, he was stricken downe to the earth, and taken prisoner by foue souldiers that knew not what he was. In which misfortune the viceroi pressing into the throng his maiestie disclosed him selfe to him, who with great reuerence kissed his hand, and receiued him prisoner in the emperours name. At the same time the marquesse of Guast with the first squadron had defeated the horsemen that were at Spirabell.
And Anthoine de Leua, who as was said) had to that end cast downe to the earth so great a quantitie and space of wall, as an hundred and fiftie horsemen might sallie forth in front, issued out of Pavia, & so charged the French behind, that he put them whole to flight. And in that feare they were almost all stripped.

ped and trusted, except the reregard of the horsemen, which being led by monsieur de Alanfon from the beginning of the battell, retired almost whole.

It is holden for certaine, that in this battell wereaine more than eight thousand men of the French campe, part by sword, and part of bodies drowned in the river of Theſſin, seeking their safetie by swimming. Of this generall number were about twentie of the most noble and apparant lords of France, as the admirall, the lord James Chebanes, the lord Palissa, and Crimouille, the master of the horse, monsieur de Aubignie, monsieur de Boille, and monsieur de la Escud, who being taken greivoudie wounded by his enimies, gave to them his life in stead of a ranſome. The prisoners that were taken were the king of Navarre, the bastard of Savoie, the lord Montmerancie, Saint Paule, Bizon, Anall, monsieur de Chandon, monsieur de Ambercourt, Galeas Alconte, Frederike Bosſolo, Barnabie Alconte, Guidanes, with manie gentlemen, and almost all the capteins that escaped the slaughter of the sword. There was also taken prisoner Jerome Landzo bishop of Brundulo the popes nunzio, but by commandement of the viceroy, he was estimes set at libertie: as also monsieur Saint Paule and Frederike Bosſolo committed to the castle of Paula, yake prison a little after, by the corruption of the Spaniards that had them in charge.

Of the Imperialles side the vntersall slaughter created not leaſen hundred bodies; and not one captein of name except Ferrand Castriot marquisse of Angos, the marquesse of Pilquairo was wounded in two places, & Anthonie de Luca lightlie hurt in the leg. The preie and spoile of this battell was so great, as there had not bene scene in Italie more rich souldiours.

Of so great an armie there was preserved but the reregard of foure hundred lances, commanded by monsieur de Alanfon, they neuer came to the fight, neuer suffered charge, nor neuer were followed, but leaving behind them their baggage, they retired whole to Piemont, their feare making them more hasty to flee, than carefull of their honoz. And as one calamitie followeth another, so the losse of the battell was no soner reappozed at Millaine, than Theodor Triulce, who laie there in garrison with foure hundred lances, departed and toke his waie to Musocquo, all the souldiours following him by troops: insomuch as the same daie that the king lost the battell, all the dutchie of Millaine was made free from the iurisdiction of the French. The daie after the victorie, the king was led prisoner to the rocke of Pilqueton, for that the duke of Millaine, in regard of his proper suretie, consented hardlie that the person of the king should be kept within the castell of Millaine: he was garded with great gelousie and watch; but in all other things (except his libertie) he was used and honozed as appertained to the state and maiestie of a king.

Now saith mine author, speaking to the readers of his historie you haue scene set downe the overthrow of the French armie in the battell of Paula: a wretched successe, where was so great expectation of victorie. You haue scene a mightie king delivered by prisoner into the hands of him, with whom he contended for glorie and emperie: a spectacle most tragicall amongst all the calamities that fortune bringeth upon mans mortalitie. You haue scene the most part of the nobilitie, and honozable capteins of France, slaine in the seruice and presence of their king: a matter that made more lamentable his owne condition and aduersitie. You haue scene the residue of that armie, so vniuersallie perplexed with feare and confusion, that the same thing that should haue retained them in so great affliction, made them the lesse assured, and further off from confidence.

When word came to the emperour of all the former accidents, the eyes of euerie man were set to behold with what propriete of affection he would receiue his gladſome newes, and to what ends his thoughts were disposed: who so farre as exterior demonstrations made shew, exprested great tokens of a mind much moderated, and verie apt to resist easilie the prosperitie of fortune: yea the signes and inclinations appering so much the more incredible, by how much he was a prince mightie & yong, and as yet had neuer tasted but of felicitie. For after he was informed truelie of so great a victorie, whereof he had the reappoz the tenth of March, together with letters of the French kings owne hand, written rather in the spirit and condition of a prisoner, than with the courage of a king, he went forthwith to the church to make his holie oblations to God with manie solemnities. And the morning following he receiued with signes of right great deuotion the sacrament of the eucharist, and so went in procession to our ladies church out of Madrid, where was his court at that time.

His temperance and moderation was about the expectation of his estate, and farre contrarie to the course of the time in matters of that nature: for he would not suffer ante bels to be rung, nor boundfires to be made, nor anie other manner of publike demonstrations, such as are used for glorie or gladnesse, alledging with a mind more vertuous than insolent, that such propriete of feasting and reioicing was due to victories obtained against infidels, but ought to haue no shew where one christian ouercame another. Neither were the actions and gestures of his person and speeches differing from so great a temperance and continencie of mind, which he well exprested in the answers he made to the congratulations of the ambassadours and great men that were about him: to whom he said he was not glad of the accident according to the glorious operation of flesh and blond, but his reioicing was in that God had so manifestlie aided him: which he interpreted to be an assured signe that he stood in his grace and fauour, though not through his owne merit, yet by his celestial election. The French king being in the custodie of the viceroy of Naples (who much comforted him, and praised his valiantnesse, and praised him to be content, for he should haue a gentle end) desired to write to his mother, which was to him granted. His verie words were these.

Adauertise you of my infortunat chance: nothing is left but the honour and the life that is saued. And seeing some other newes shall recomfort you, I haue desired to write to you this letter, the which liberallie hath bene granted to me: beseeching you to regard the extremitie of your selfe, in insuring your accustomed wisdom. For I hope that at length God will not forget me, to you recommending your little infants and mine, supplieng you to giue safe conduct, to passe and returne from Spaine, to this braver that goeth toward the emperour, to know in what wise I shall be intreated. And thus right humbly to your good grace I haue me recommended. This subscribed

passions of perplexities
of the people in generall.

In this estate of aduerſitie the people ſet before their eyes all that feare and deſpaire could imagine: they doubted leaſt ſo great a calamitie were not the beginning of a further ruine & ſubuerſion: they ſaw their king priſoner, and with him either taken or ſlaine in the battell the chieftains of the kingdome, which in the imagination of their ſorrowes they held a loſſe irreparable: they beheld their captiues diſ-comfited, and their ſouldiers diſcouraged: a calamitie which ſtopped in them all hope to be readdreſſed or re-affured: they ſaw the realme made naked of mo-nie and treaſure, and inuironed with moſt mightie enemies: an affliction which moſt of all caried their thoughts into the laſt cogitation of deſperat ruine: for the king of England, notwithstanding that he had holben manie parties and treaties, and ſhewed in manie things a variation of mind, yet not manie daies before the battell, he had cut off all the negociations which he had intertaine with the king, and had publiſhed that he would deſcend into France, if the things of Italie took anie good ſucceſſe.

So that the Frenchmen feared leaſt in ſo great an oportunitie, the emperor and he would not leaue warre againſt France, either for that there was no other head or gouernour than a woman, and the little children of the king, of whom the eldeſt had not yet run eight yeares accompliſhed: or elſe becauſe the enemies had with them the duke of Burbon, for his ſtone particular a puiſſant prince, and for his authoritie in the realme of France verie popular and ſtrong in opinion, a mightie inſtrument to ſtirre by moſt dangerous emotions. Beſides, the ladie regent, as well for the loue ſhe bare to the king, as for the dangers of the realme was not without hir paſſions both proper and particular: for being full of ambition, and moſt greedy of the government, ſhe feared that if the kings deliuerie drew any long tract of time, or if anie new difficultie hapned in France, ſhe ſhould be conſtrained to yeeld by the adminiſtration of the crowne to ſuch as ſhould be delegate and aſſigned by the voices of the kingdome. Neuerthe-leſſe amid ſo manie aſtoniſhments and confuſions, ſhe drew hir ſpirits to hir, and by hir example were recomforted the nobles that were of counſell with hir, who took ſpedie order to man the frontiers of the realme, and with diligence to leaue a good prouiſion of monie.

The ladie regent, in whoſe name all expeditions and diſpatches went out, wrote to the emperor letters full of humilitie and compaſſion, wherein ſhe for-gat not by degrees vehement and inducing to ſolicit a negotiation of accord: by vertue whereof, hauing a little after deliuered don Hugo de Boncado, ſhe ſent him to the emperor, to offer him that hir ſonne ſhould renounce and diſclaime from all rights of the kingdome of Naples, and the eſtate of Milane, with conſentment to refer to the cenſure and arbitration of the law, the titles and rights of Burgundie, which if it appertained to the emperor, he ſhould acknowledge it for the dowrie of his ſiſter: that he ſhould render to monſieur Burbon his eſtate together with his manors, and ſuch which were of great valour, and alſo the rents and revenues which had bene lenied by the commissioners. And out of the regall chamber, that he ſhould give to him his ſiſter in ma-riage, and deliuer vp to him Provence, if iudgement of the intereſt and right were made of his ſide.

And for the more facilitie and ſpedie paſſage of this negotiation, rather than for anie deſire ſhe had to nourish hir inclination to the warre, ſhe diſpatched immediatlie ambadaſſours into Italie, to recommend to the pope and the Venetians the ſafetie of hir ſonne. To whom ſhe offered, that if for their proper ſecuritie, they would contract with hir, and raife armes againſt the emperor, ſhe would for her particular aduance ſue hundred lances, together with a great contribution of monie. But amid theſe trauels and aſtoniſhments, the principall deſire, as well of hir, as of the whole realme of France, was, to appeaſe and aſſure the mind of the king of England, iudging trulie that if they could reduce him to amitie and reconcilement, the crowne of France ſhould re-maine without quarrell or moleſtation. Where, if he on the one ſide, and the emperor on the other, ſhould riſe in one ioint force, hauing concurrent with them the perſon of the duke of Burbon, and manie other oportunities and occasions, it could not be but all things would be full of difficulties and dangers.

Of this the ladie regent began to diſcerne manie tokens and apparances of good hope: for notwithſtanding the king of England immediatlie after the firſt reports of the victorie, had not onlie expreſſed great tokens of gladneſſe and reioicing, but alſo publiſhed that he would in perſon paſſe into France: and withall had ſent ambadaſſours to the emperor to ſolicit and treat of the moving of warre iointlie together: yet proceeding in deed with more mildneſſe than was expected of ſo furious ſelves and tokens, he diſpatched a meſſenger to the ladie regent, to ſend to him an expreſſe ambadaſſour: which accompliſhed, and that with fulneſſe of authori-tie and commiſſion, ſuch as brought with it alſo all ſorts of ſubmiſſions & implozations which the thought apt to reduce to appeaſement the mind of that king ſo highlie diſpleaſed. He repoſed himſelfe altogether upon the will and counſell of the cardinall of Poſie, who ſeemed to reſtreine the king and his thoughts to this principall end, that bearing ſuch a hand upon the controuerſies and quarrels that ran betwene other princes, all the world might acknowledge to depend upon him and his authoritie the reſolution and expectation of all affaires.

And for this cauſe he offered to the emperor at the ſame time to deſcend into France with a puiſſant armie, both to giue perfection vnto the alliance concluded betwene them before, and alſo to remove all ſcruple and gelouſie, he offered preſentlie to conſigne vnto him his daughter, who was not as yet in an age and diſpoſition able for marriage. But in theſe matters were very great difficulties, partlie depending upon himſelfe, and partlie deriving from the emperor, who now ſhewed nothing of that readineſſe to contract with him which he had ſhewed before: for the king of England demanded almoſt all the rewards of the victorie, as Normandie, Cuiſen, and Calcoigne, with the title of king of France. And that the emperor, notwithstanding the inequalitye of the conditions ſhould paſſe likewiſe into France, and communicate equalie in the expenſes and dangers. The inequalitye of theſe demands troubled not a little the emperor, to whom they were by ſo much the more grievous, by how much he remembered that in the yeares next before, he had alwaies deferred to make warre euen in the greateſt dangers of the French king. So that he perſuaded him-ſelfe that he ſhould not be able to make anie foundation vpon that confederation.

And ſtanding in a ſtate no leſſe impouerished for monie and treaſure, than made wearie with labours and perils, he hoped to draw more commodities from the French king by the meane of peace, than by the violence of armes and warres, ſpectallie for ning with the king of England. Beſides, he made not that accompt which he was wont to doe of the marriage of his daughter, both for hir minority in age,

age, and also for the dowrie for the which he should stand accountable for so much as the emperor had received by waite of loane of the king of England: he seemed by manie tokens in nature to nourish a wonderfull desire to haue children, and by the necessity of his condition he was caried with great concupiscence of monie: vpon which two reasons he took a great desire to marie the sister of the house of Portugal, which was both in an age able for marriage, and with whome he hoped to receiue a plentiful portion in gold and treasure, besides the liberalities of his owne people offered by waite of beneuolence in case the marriage went forward: such was their desire to haue a queene of the same nation and language, and of hope to procreate children.

For these causes the negociation became euerie daie more hard and desperat betwene both those princes, wherein was also concurrent the ordinarie inclination of the cardinall of Porke towards the French king, together with the open complaints he made of the emperor, as well for the interests and respects of his king, as for the small reputation the emperor began to hold of him. He considered that afore the battell of Pavia, the emperor neuer sent letters vnto him which were not written with his owne hand, and subscribed, your sonne and cousin Charles: but after the battell, he vsed the seruice of secretaries in all the letters he wrote to him, insiring nothing of his owne hand but the subscription, not with titles of so great reuerence and submission, but onelie with this bare word Charles. In this alteration of affection in the emperor, the king of England took occasion to receiue with gracious words and demonstrations, the ambassadour sent by the ladie regent, to whome he gaue comfort to hope well in things to come. And a little afterward, estranging his mind wholie from the affaires which were in negociation betwene him and the emperor, he made a confederation with the ladie regent, contracting in the name of hir sonne, wherein he would haue inserted this expresse condition, that for the kings ransom and deliuerie, should not be deliuered to the emperor anie thing that at that time should be vnder the power or possession of the crowne of France.

Shortlie after, the viceroy & the other capitaine imperiall were induced vpon vrgent reasons to transport the person of the French king into a surer hold, than where presentlie he was kept, iudging that for the ill disposition of others, they could not without perill keepe him garded in the duchie of Spillan: in which feare ioined to their continuall desire so to doe, they resolved to conuie him to Genes, and from thence by sea to Naples, where his lodging was prepared within the new castell. This determination brought no little grieue to the king, who from the beginning of his captinitie, had vehementlie desired to be carried into Spaine: perhaps he had opinion (measuring hazillie an other man by his owne nature, or else running with the common error of mortall men being easlie beguiled in things they desire) that if once he were brought to the presence of the emperor, he doubted not of some easie passage for his libertie, either through the emperours benigntie, or by the conditions he meant to offer. The viceroy was of the same desire for the augmentation of his owne glorie.

But being retained for feare of the French at mie by sea, they dispatched by common consent monsieur Pontmerancie to the ladie regent: who granted to him six light gallies of those that late in the port of Barcelles vpon promise to haue them restored as soon as the king was arrived in Spaine. With these gallies, he returned to Portofino, where the kings person was alreadie arrived, and ioined them to six tene gallies of the emperor, which was the manie appointed at first to conduct him to Naples, he reduced them all into one fleet, and armed them all with solmen of the Spanish. The capitaine imperiall and the duke of Bourbon were persuaded, that the kings person should be led to Naples: but of the contrarie, setting by sail the seventh of June, they took such course, that the eight daie they arrived with a happie voyage at Rosas a haven of Catalogna: there coming brought no small ioy to the emperor, who vntill that daie had vnderstood nothing at all of that resolution.

Now as soon as he was made assaured of the kings being there, he dispatched commandments vnto all places where he should passe, to receiue him with great honours: onelie till it should be otherwise determined, he gaue order to keepe him in the castell of Societua nere to Valence, a castell ancientlie bled by the kings of Aragon for the garding of great personages; and wherein had bene kept prisoner for manie yeares the duke of Calabria. But the deliberation to keepe him in that place, seeming farre too rigorous to the viceroy, and nothing agreeable to the promises he had made to the king in Italie, he toome so much of the emperor, that till he had taken an other counsell, the kings person might remaine nere Valence in a place apt for hunting and other delights of the field. There he left him lodged with sufficient gard vnder the charge of capitaine Alarcon, in whose custodie he had alwaies remained since his unfortunate daie.

From thence the viceroy, together with Pontmerancie, went to the emperor to make reappoynt of the state of Italie, and the discourse of things which till that daie had bene debated with the king, with whome he persuaded the emperor with manie reasons to draw to accord, for that he could not haue a faithfull amitie and coniunction with the Italians. The emperor after he had heard the viceroy and Pontmerancie, determined to conuie the king into Castilla to the castell of Madrid, a place farre removed from the sea and the confines of France, where being honored with ceremonies & reuerences agreeable to so great a prince, he should neuertheless be kept vnder carefull and strait gard, with libertie to take the aire abroad certeine times of the daie, mounted onelie vpon a mule. The emperor could neuer be brought to admit the king to his presence, if first the accord were not either established, or at least in an assured hope of resolution.

And to the end there might be interposed in the negociation a personage honorable, & almost equall with the king, Pontmerancie was sent in great diligence into France, to bring the duchesse of Alanson the kings sister and a widow, with fullnesse of authoritie to debate and contract. And to the end this negociation of accord were not hindered by new difficulties, there was made a little afterwards a truce vntill the end of December, betwene the emperor and such as administered the government of France. Whereover the emperor gaue order that one part of those gallies which were come with the viceroy, should returne into Italie to bring the duke of Bourbon into Spaine, without whose presence and priuatie he gaue out that he would make no conuention: and yet the gallies what for want of monie, and other impediments, were prepared but with slow diligence.

Whiles the case of the French king was in demand, but not yet determined, by means of sundrie ouerthwart that ouerthrew the foundation of euerie purpose tending to his deliuerance: it fortuned that the French king falling sicke in the castell of Madrid, and having in vaine desired the presence of the emperor, was caried by his discontentment and melancholie into such extremitie and danger of his life, that the physicians appointed for his cure, told the emperor that they stood desperate of his recovery, if himselfe in person came not to comfort him with some hope of his deliuerie. The emperor obteyneng more compassion than the reason of things, was not curious to condescend to perforce so good an office, and as he prepared to visit him accordinglie, his high chancelloz seeking to turne him from the issue, told him with manie strong reasons, that he could not go to him in honour, but with intention to deliuer him presentlie and without anie covenant: otherwise as it would be a humanitie not roiall but mercenarie, so it would disclose a desire to recouer him, not moued of charitie, but pushed on by his proper interest, as not to lose by his death the occasion of the profit hoped for by the victorie.

The emperor
visith the
in durance.

This counsell assuredlie was graue and honourable touching the man that gaue it, and no lesse worthy to be followed by so great a prince as the emperor: and yet being more caried by the reasons of others, he took post to go to him. But for the danger of the king being almost at the extremitie, the visitation was short, and yet for the time accompanied with gracious words full of hope that he would deliuer him immediatlie upon his returning to health: in so much that whether it was by the comfort that he breathed into him (in the sickness of captiuitie the promise of libertie creaddeth all medicines) or by the benefit of his youth, which with the fauour of nature was stronger than the maladie, he began after this visitation to resume so good disposition, that within few daies he was out of danger, notwithstanding he could not recouer his former health but with verie slowe time.

And now neither the difficulties that were throwed on the emperours side, nor the hopes which were giuen by the Italians, nor anie other nature of impediments whatsoever, could staie the volage of the ladie Alanson into Spaine. For that as nothing was more hard or heauie to the Frenchmen than to leaue off the practises and negotiations of accord, begun with those that had power to restore their king: so nothing was more easie to the emperor, than feeding the French with hopes, to draw their minds from taking armes; and by that meane so to keepe the Italians in suspence, as not to dare to enter into new deliberations. And in that cunning manner, sometimes vsing delays, and sometimes pressing forward the affaires, he thought to keepe the minds of all men confused and intangled. The ladie Alanson was receiued by the emperor with verie gracious demonstrations and hopes: but the effects fell out both hard and heauie. For when she ministred speech to him for the marriage of his sister the widowe with the king: he made answer; that it was a matter which could not be done without the consent of the duke of Bourbon.

The other particularities were debated by deputies of both parts, wherein, as the emperor insisted obstinatlie to haue the dutchie of Burgognie restored as appertaining to him: so the French refused to consent, vntill he would accept it for dowrie; or else to referre it to the sentence of the law and iustice to decide the true title. And albeit they could easilie haue condescended to the residue, yet for that they were so farre off for the demand of Burgognie, the ladie Alanson returned at last into France, without winning anie other grace, than a fauour to see the king his brother; who growing more and more into distrust of his deliuerie, desired him at his departing to admonish his mother, and all the counsell from him, to take carefullie to the profit of the crowne of France, without hauing anie consideration of him, as if he liued not. But notwithstanding the departure of the ladie Alanson, the solicitations for the kings deliuerie did not cease, for that there remained behind the president of Paris, and the bishops of Ambrun and Tarbe, who had till then followed the negotiation but with verie little hope, with the emperor would not harken to anie condition, if first Burgognie were not rendred, which the king would not be brought to restore, but in a last necessitie.

After this unfortunate accident of the French king ensued manie troublesome and intricate matters, among which the case of the French king was descanted vpon, and a solicitation of peace resolved, which contained these covenants following. That betwene the emperor and the French king should be a peace perpetuall, in which should be comprehended all such as should be named by their common consent. That the French king by the first daie of the next moneth of March, should be set at libertie vpon the marches in the coast of Fontarabie. That within six weeks after he should consign to the emperor the dutchie of Burgognie, the countie of Charrolois, the iurisdiction of Poiers, the castell Chaintre, dependancies of the said dutchie, the countie of Fladonna, the resort of St. Laurence de la Roche, a dependant of French countie, together with all the appurtenances as well of the said dutchie as vicountie, all which for hereafter should be separate and exempted from the souereigntie of the realme of France. That at the same and verie instant that the king should be deliuered, there should be put into the emperours hands the Dolphin of France, and with him either the duke of Orleans the kings second sonne, or else twelue principall lords of France, whom the emperor did name.

It was left to the election of the ladie regent, whether to deliuer the kings second sonne, or the twelue barons, and they to remaine as hostages vntill restitution were made of the lands and places aforesaid, and the peace swoorne and ratified, together with all the articles by the estates generall of France, and intregistred in all the courts of parlement of the kingdome with forme and solemnities necessarie. For the accomplishing wherof, there was set downe a terme of foure moneths: at which time returning the hostages, there should be put into the emperours hands the duke de Angouleme the kings third son, to the end to traine him by with the emperor, the better to intertaine and assure the peace. That the French king should renounce and giue vp to the emperor all his rights to the realme of Naples, together with all such titles and preeminences as were to come to him by the inheritance of the church. That he should doe the like touching his interest in the state of Millaine, of Genes, of Als, and likewise of Arras, Tourneie, of the Ile, and of Douvle. That he should render by the towne and castell of Hedin as a member of the countie of Artois, with all the munitions, artilleries, and moveables that were in it when it was last taken. That he should disclaime and yield vp all souereigntie in Flanders and Artois, and all other places or peeces which the emperor possessed.

That on the other side, the emperor should resign and giue vp to him all the right, title, and quarrell which he pretended to anie place possessed by the Frenchmen, and especiallie the townes and castell-domes of Perone, Montdidier, Roie, the counties of Bullongne, Guines, & Donstie, with other townes standing vpon the one and other shore of the river of Some. That there should be betwene them a league and confederation perpetuall for the defense of their estates, with obligation to aid one another when

when need required, with 500 men at armes, and ten thousand footmen: that the emperor should promise to giue in marriage to the king the ladie Cleano: his sister, whom, as soon as the dispensation should be obtained from the pope, he should contract or handfast with words obligatorie for the present, and afterwards she should be led into France, to consummate the marriage at the same time that according to the capitulations the hostages were to be deliuered: that she should haue for hir portion two hundred thousand crowns, with iewels according to hir estate, the one moiety of the monie to be paid within sixtene moneths, and the other halfe in one yeare after.

Furthermore, that a marriage should be made betweene the Dolphin & the daughter of the k. of Portugal, daughter to the ladie Cleano, at such time as their age will suffer: that the French king should doe all that he could to induce the ancient k. of Nauarre to giue up to the emperor the rights of that kingdom, which in case he would not performe, then the king not to aid him with any succours. That the duke of Guelders, and the countie of Zulle, and the principall townes of those estates, should promise with sufficient securitie, to giue themselves to the emperor, after his death. That the king should giue no succour to the duke of Wittenberge, nor likewise to Robert de la March. That he should furnish and rigge for the emperor, both when he should passe into Italie, and two moneths after being so required, twelve gallies, foure ships, & foure gallions, all well munitioned and appointed, except men of war, & the said vessels to be rendred three moneths after accompting from the daie of his imbarcking: that in place of the armie by land which the king offered for Italie, he should paie him two hundred thousand crownes in monie, the one halfe within sixtene moneths, and the other halfe within a yeare after.

Again, that at the time when the hostages should be deliuered, he should be bound to giue bills of exchange for the paie of six thousand footmen for six moneths immediatly after the emperours arrivall in Italie: that he should also furnish for his seruice five hundred lances paid, with a band of artillerie. That he should haue harmlesse the emperor of his promise made to the king of England by pensions, which the French king should paie to him, the arerages whereof amounted to five hundred thousand crownes, or else to deliuer so much in ready monie to the emperor. That they should both ioine to beseech the pope to call a generall councill with all speed, to the end to consult vpon an vniuersall peace amongst christians, to aduance an enterprise against the infidels and heretikes, and to grant to all the crowade for thre yeares. That within six weeks the king should restore the duke of Burbon in most ample forme, into all his estates, goods mouable and immouable, and fruits and reuenues receiued: nor to molest him for any thing past, nor constrain him to dwell or go to the realme of France. That it should be lawfull to the said duke of Burbon, to demand by the waie of law and iustice, the carle dome of Bourgne. That in like sort all those that had followed him, should reenter in safetie into their goods and estates, and namelie the bishop of Autun, and monseigneur de saint Chalier.

Moreover, that the prisoners taken in the warre should be deliuered on both parts within sixtens daies. That there should be restitution made to the ladie Margaret of Austria of all that she possessed afore the warre. That the prince of Orange should be set at libertie with restitution to the principalltie of Orange, and all that he possessed by the death of his father, which had bene taken from him for following the faction of the emperor. That the like should be done to other barons. That there should be made restitution to the marquesse of Salusse of his estate. That the king as soon as he arrived in the first towne of his realme, should ratifie this capitulation, and be bound to procure the Dolphin to ratifie it when he should come to the age of fouretene yeares. Some were named by common consent, and cheslie the Switzers. Whelie there was not one of the potentates of Italie, except the pope, whom they named as conseruator of the accord, and that more for maner sake and ceremonie, than in effect and true meaning. Lastlie, it was expressed in the said capitulation, that in case the king for any occasion, would not accomplish these matters promised; he should returne true prisoner.

This accord for the parts it contained, brought no small astonishment to all Christendome. For when it was understood, that the first execution thereof consisted in the deliuerie of the king, all mens opinions were, that being in his libertie, he would not deliuer up Burgongnie, as being a member of too great importance for the realme of France. And except a few, who had counselled the emperor to it, all his court had the same iudgement, and namelie the Chancelor, who reprehended and detested the matter with so great vehemencie, that notwithstanding he was commanded to signe the capitulation (according to the office of chiefe chancellors) yet he refused to doe it, alledging; that in such matters, dangerous and hurtfull as that was, he ought not to vse the authoritie that was giuen him: neither could he be altered from this opinion, notwithstanding the emperor was angrie with him: who seeing him so resolute in his opinion, signed it himselfe, and within few daies after went to Spayill, to confirme the alliance, and make a foundation of amitie and good will with the king, whom he interteined in familiar and priuat sort.

Great were the ceremonies and demonstrations of amitie betweene them: oftentimes they shewed themselves together in places publike: and as often did they passe in secret familiar discourses. They went together in one coach vnto a castell not halfe a daies iourne from thence, where was queene Cleano, whom the king married. And yet in all these great signes of peace and amitie, he was observed with as carefull and strict gard as before, without any aduantage of libertie. So that he was embraced as a brother, and garded as a prisoner. A matter which made manifest to the world, that it was an accord full of discord, an alliance without amitie, and that vpon euerie occasion their ancient jealousies and passions would be stronger in them, than the regard of that alliance, made more by force than friendship. Some daies were spent in these offices and ceremonies of amitie, when was brought from the ladie regent the ratification, together with the declaration, that with the Dolphin of France they would rather giue in hostage the kings second son, than the twelve barons.

Then the king departed from Spayill, taking his waie to the frontier of his realme, where was to be exchanged his person for his sonnes, who bare vertie small age. Where was sent to accompanie him the viceroie the worker and author of his deliuerie, to whome the emperor had giuen the title of Adm. with other estates in Flanders and in the Kingdom of Castles. The king of England hearing that the French king should now be deliuered, sent to him a knight of his chamber, called sir Thomas Chente, to signify to him the great ioy and gladnesse, which he conceived for his restitution to libertie, and the conclusion of the generall peace. For which kindnesse & courtesie

After much a doo and manie remouings, the French king was come on the confines of Fontarabie, a towne appertaining to the emperor, standing upon the Ocean sea, and is a frontier betwene Biskaye and the duchie of Guien. And on the other side, the ladie regent was arrived with the children of France, at Baion, not manie leagues from Fontarabie. The torments of the govt took him by the waite, which was the cause that he had lingered some time longer than the daie appointed of permutation. But at last, the eighteenth daie of March, the French king accompanied with the viceroy and capteine Alarcon with fiftie horse, was presented upon the shore of the river that divideth the realme of France from the kingdome of Spaine. And on the other side, upon the shore opposite appeared monsieur Lawtrech with the kings children and like number of horse. There was in the middell of the river a great barke made fast with anchors, in which was no person. The king was rowed nere to this barke in a little boat, wherein he was accompanied with the viceroy, capteine Alarcon, and eight others, all armed with short weapons: and on the other side of the barke were likewise brought in a little boat, monsieur Lawtrech with the offages & eight others, weaponed according to the others.

After this the viceroy went into the barke with the king, and all his companie: and also monsieur Lawtrech with his eight that accompanied him, so that they were within the barke a like number of both parts, Alarcon and his eight being with the viceroy, and Lawtrech and the others with the person of the king. And when they were all thus within the barke, the Dolphin, who being giuen to the viceroy and by him committed to capteine Alarcon, was forthwith bestowed in their boate, and after him followed the little duke of Orleans, who was no sooner entred the barke, than the French king leaped out of the barke into his boate, which he did with such quicknesse and celeritie, that the exchange or permutation was thought to be done at one selfe instant: so welcome to him was libertie, without the which nothing is sweet, nothing is comfortable, as the poet saith:

king is not a little glad of his libertie.

As soon as the king was on the other side of the shore, his new libertie making him fearefull of ambush, he mounted upon a Turkish horse of a wonderful swiftnesse, which was prepared for the purpose: and running betwene feare and gladnesse by on the spurre, he never staid till he came to St. John de Lus, a towne of his obedience, foure leagues from the place. And being there readilie relieved with a fresh horse, he ran with the same swiftnesse to Baion, where, after he had passed ouer the offices of court done to him by his people, he dispatched with great diligence a gentleman to the king of England, to whom he wrote with his owne hand letters of his deliuerie, charging the messenger under verie iquing commission, to tell the king of England, that as he acknowledged the effect of his libertie to be wrought whole by him and his operations, so in recompense, he offered to remaine to him a perpetuall and assured friend, and to be guided in all his affaires by his counsell. And afterwards he sent an other solemn ambassage into England, to ratifie the peace which his mother had made with him, as one that reapposed a verie great foundation in the amitie of that king.

Guic. pag. 968.

When the French king was gotten into Baion, being required by a gentleman of the vicerey, to ratifie the accord according to the obligation of his word, being come into a place free and assured, he deferred it from one daie to another, interposing reasons and excuses general: wherein, to the end to hold still the emperor in hope, he sent to advertise him by a man especiall, that he forbore for the present to accomplish the ratification, not by omission or wilful negligence, but upon this necessitie, that before he proceeded reallie to such an act, he was to labour to reapease and reduce the minds of his subjects contented with the obligations he had made, tending to the diminution of the crowne of France. Neuertheless, he would in his time resolve all difficulties, and obserue with fidelitie all that he had promised to him, both in substance and circumstance. By this dealing, no lesse doubtfull for the manner, than dangerous in meaning, might easilie be comprehended what were his intentions, the same being more manifestlie detected at the arrivall of the messengers sent to him not manie daies after, by the pope and Venetians, in whom was no great need of industrie or labour, to found out the plaine course of his inclination.

For, after he had receiued them with manie demonstrations and offices of court, he intertained them severallie and apart with sundrie speeches of compassion, such as tended to manifest complaints against the inhumanitie of the emperor: who he said did neuer administer to him during his captivitie, anie office appertaining to the ranks of a prince, nor at anie time shewed himselfe touched with that affection and consideration which one prince ought to expresse in the calamities of another: and much lesse would be anie course of common comfort, either to relieue the heauinesse of his condition with anie propriety of apt consolation, or once to enter into consideration, that the same accident that had fallen upon him, might also be as heauilie heaped upon his owne head. In this complaint, he alleaged the example of Edward king of England called of some Edward Long-Shanks. To whom when was presented as prisoner John king of the Frenchmen, taken by the prince of Wales his son in the battell of Poitiers, he did not onelie receive him with great comfort and compassion of his afflicted case, but also, all the time of his imprisonment within the realme of England, he let him go at libertie under a free gard.

Furthermore he had daillie familiar conuersation with him, he would oftentimes haue him to accompany him on hunting, to communicate in the open aire and solace of the field, and was not curious to call him to eat with him at his table. And by these humanities much lesse that he lost his prisoner, or ranged him to an accord lesse fauourable; but of the contrarie, by the operation of those graces and good offices, there grew betwene them such a familiaritie and confidence, that the French king, after he had continued manie yeares in France, made a voluntarie voiage into England, to honour and gratifie under that propriety of office, the liberalitie and frankenesse of the king. He alleged that as there was onelie remembrance of two kings of France that had bene taken prisoners in battell, king John and himselfe, so the diuersitie of the examples was also worthie of singular memorie, seeing upon the one was exercised all facilitie and mildnesse of the victor, and to the other were ministered all those rigours and severities, which tyrants in the height and pride of their fortune are wont to be. Whereunto he added manie circumstances discovering the discontentment of his mind, whereupon ensued practices wherewith the emperor was not well pleased.

Done shortly after that this peace was accorded, and the French king delivered the emperor's daughter the lady Isabel daughter to Emanuel king of Portugal, and had with her eleven hundred thousand crowns. Thus farre the French affaires intermitted (as you heard) without owne and bene needfull to be ended, and then we will end, and returne to England.

Cardinal Wolsey being still most highlie in the king's favour, outmeat licence to erect a college at Oxford, and another at Salisbury, his townes where he was borne, the which foundations he began rather of a vain desire of glorie and worldly wealth, than of the instructione in true religion and advancement of doctrine, and therefore his labours were not rewarded by the success of true godlinesse and bountifull increase, he went about to enrich priores and religious houses, to give licence to the king to suppress certain small monasteries, and after great confirmation of the pope, that no might move the good ladies and reuerendes belonging to those houses, to the maintenance of those two colleges, whereof no one lady, but also the pope were still workers, through his whole realm. In March the king sent Cuthbert Tunstall bishop of London, and Sir Thomas Walsingham chancellor of the duchie of Lancaster, and knight of the garter into Spain, to confer with the emperor for great causes, concerning the taking of the French king, and to warre to be made into France on euery side.

The king being determined thus to make warre in France, & to passe too far himselfe in person, his counsell considered that about all things great treasure and plenty of monie must needs be provided. Wherefore by the cardinal there was devised strange commissions, and sent in the city of Madrid into euery house, and commissioners appointed, and private instructions sent to them, how they should proceed in their fittings, and order the people to bring them to their purpose, which was, that the first part of euery mans substance should be paid in monie, or part of the king without delay, for the redemption of his war. Hereof followed much cursing, weeping, and cruelties not against oon king & cardinal, but with it was to beate, and to be beate, notwithstanding all that could be said or done, & forged, & caused by the commissioners to persuade the people to this contriuaunce, the same would not be granted, and in excuse of their denial it was alledged, that wrong was offered, and the ancient customs & lawes of the realm broken, which would not any man to be charged with such payment, except it were granted by the estates of the realm in parliament assembled. The like answer was made by them of the spiritualtie, of whome was demanded the fourth part of their goods.

Don Hieronimo de Separe the emperor's ambassador, whether offended by admitting of John Jorke into the realm (as before we haue heard) or for some other cause, the ninth of April departed out of England, not taking leave of the king, nor of the cardinal, and so much did by late comers. Upon the passage through France in post, and came to the emperor's persons the ambassadors of England came thither, and together it was by his report, or other wise, the accustomed language that the emperor showed to the Englishmen began then to decay, as was well perceived, what the matter was. This yeare at Whitsonie died Thomas duke of Suffolk, and was honourable buried at Egham. The cardinal travelled earnestly with the mayors and aldermen of London, about the aid of monie to be granted, and likewise the commissioners appointed in the shires of the realm, set upon the same; but the burthen was so grievous, that it was generally denied, and the commons in euery place it moued, that it was like to grow to rebellion.

In Essex the people would not assemble before the commissioners in the houses, but in open places, and in Huntingtonshire ouerly resisted the commissioners, and would not suffer themselves to be apprehended and sent to the Fleet. The duke of Suffolk sitting in commission about the rebelle in Suffolk, persuaded by courteous means the rich citizens to assent therto, but when they came home, and went about to discharge and purchase their own spinners, carvers, silvers, weavers, and other artificers, when they went to worke about tyme, the people began to assemble in companies. Whereof when the duke was aduertised, he commanded the constables that euery man's houses should be taken from him. But when that was known, the herbage of the woods increased, calling ouer to the duke, and his brother, and his treasure, some with death, and the cardinal also. And herewith they assembled together after the manner of rebels four hundred men of Lanark, Shrewsbury, Wyndesore, and other townes thereabouts, which put themselves in battell, and rang for rebellion, and began still to assemble in great numbers.

The duke of Suffolk perceiving this, began to gather much power as he could, but that was verie slender, for the gentlemen that were with the duke, bid to him that all the bridges were broken, so that the assembly of those rebels was somewhat letted. The duke of Suffolk being therof aduertised, gathered a great power in Suffolk, and came towards the commons, & sending to them to know their intent, receiued answer, that they would live and die in the king's cause, and be to him obedient. Whereupon he came himselfe to talke with them, and willing to know who was their captain, that he might answer for them all, it was told him by one John Greene a man of fifty yeares of age, that Bourtie was their captain, the which with his confine sacerdotie, had brought them to that doing. For whereas they and a great number of other in that countie, lived not not upon themselves, but upon the substantiall occupiers, now that they through such payments as were demanded of them, were not able to maintaine them in worke, they must be necessitate perill for want of sustenance.

The duke hearing this matter, was sore for their sake, and promised them, that if they would depart home to their dwellings, he would be a meane for their pardon to the king. Whereupon they were contented to depart. After this, the duke of Suffolk, and the duke of Suffolk came to Burie, and thither recruited much people of the countie in their shirts, with halters about their neckes, meekely desiring pardon for their offences. The dukes so wisely demeaned themselves, that the commons were appeased, and the demands of monie ceased in all the realm, for well it was perceived that the commons would pay none. Then went the two dukes to London, and brought with them the chiefe captains of the rebellion, which were put in the Fleet. The king then came to Westminster to the cardinal's palace, and assembled there a great council, in the which he opened the protest, that his mind was neuer to allow any thing of his commons which might sound to the breach of his lawes, therefore he willed to know by whome means the commissions were so fireaile given forth, to demand the first part of euery mans goods.

The cardinal excused himselfe, and said, that when it was moved in counsell how to raise monie to the king's use, the king's counsell, and namely the indige-

The king indeed was much offended that his commons were thus intreated, & thought it touched his honor, that his councell should attempt such a doubtfull matter in his name, and to be denied both of the spirituallie and temporallie. Therefore he would no more of that trouble, but caused letters to be sent into all shires, that the matter should no further be talked of: & he pardoned all them that had denied the demand openlie or secretlie. The cardinall, to deliuer himselfe of the enill will of the commons, purchased by procuring & aduancing of this demand, affirmed, and caused it to be bzuted abroad, that through his intercession the king had pardoned and released all things.

Those that were in the Towre and Fleet for the rebellion in Suffolke, and resisting the commissioners aswell there as in Huntington shire and Kent, were brought before the lords in the Star chamber, and there had their offences opened and shewed to them: and finally the kings pardon declared, and thereon they were deliuered. In this season a great number of men of warre laie at Bullongne, and in other places thereabout, which diuerse times attempted to indamage the Englishmen, and to spoile the English pale: but they could neuer spoile the marshes where the greatest part of the cattell belonging to the inhabitants was kept. Indale men with aid of the Scots, did much hurt in England by robberies, which they exercised: and therefore were sent thither, sir Richard Balmere, and sir Christopher Dacres, to restraine their doings. Diuerse came to them, and submitted themselves: but the greatest theues kept them in the mountains of Cheuiot, and did much hurt, yet at length they seuered, and manie of them were taken.

Indale men great robbers

The cardinall by his power legantine sent one of his chapleins called doctor John Allen, to visite the religious houses of this realme about this season, which doctor practised amongst them greatlie to his profit, but moze to the slander both of himselfe and of his maister. On the eighteenth daie of June, at the manor place of Widelwell, the kings sonne (which he had begot of Elisabeth Blunt, daughter to sir John Blunt knight) called Henrie Fitzroie, was created first earle of Nottingham, and after on the selfe same daie he was created duke of Richmond and Sumnerket. Also the same daie the lord Henrie Courtenie earle of Denonshire, and cosine germane to the king, was created marquisse of Excester: and the lord Henrie Brandon sonne to the duke of Suffolke and the french quene, a child of two yeares old, was created earle of Lincolne: and sir Thomas Hanners lord Wms was created earle of Rutland, and sir Henrie Clifford earle of Cumberland, and the lord Fitzwater sir Robert Kitchiffe was created vicount Fitzwater, and sir Thomas Bullen treasurer of the kings household was created vicount Rochefort.

R. Henries daie sonne created earle and duke in one daie.

The french kings mother as then regent of France, procured a safe conduct for an ambassador to be sent into England to treat of peace, and there with sent John Jokin called monsieur de Clair, which (as we haue heard) in the last yeare was kept secret in maister Larks house. By his procurement a truce was granted to endure from the thirtieth of Iulie for fortie daies betwixen England and France both by sea and land. In the later end of Iulie came into England the cheefe president of Rome with sufficient authoritie to conclude anie agrement that should be granted. At his suite the king was contented that a truce should be taken, to endure from the fourteenth of August, till the first of December. This yeare the king sent doctor Henrie Standish bishop of saint Asse, and sir John Baker knight into Denmarke, to intreat with the nobles of that countrie for the reduction of their king Chulstierne to his realme and former dignitie: but the Danes hated him so much for his crueltie, that they could not abide to heare of anie such matter, and so these ambassadors returned without spending of their purpose for the which they were sent.

But the french ambassadors did so much both by offers and intreaties, that the king condescended to a peace, which being concluded, was proclaimed in London with a trumpet the eight of September. By the covenants of this peace the king of England should receiue at certaine daies twentie hundred thousand crownes, which then amounted in sterling monie to the summe of foure hundred thousand pounds sterling, of which one payment of fiftie thousand pounds was paid in hand. In October were sent into France, sir William Fitzwilliam treasurer of the kings house, and doctor Willor, as ambassadors from the king of England to the labie regent, whome they found at the cite of Lion, where, of hir they were honorable receiued: and in their presence the said labie regent took a corporal oath in solemne wise, and according to the custome in such cases used, to performe all the articles and covenants passed and concluded in the league and treatie of peace by hir commissioners.

The emperor was nothing pleased, in that the king of England had thus concluded peace with the frenchmen, and therefore the English merchants were not so courtcoultie dealt with, as they had bene afore time. In this winter was great death in London, so that the terme was adourned: and the king kept his Chylmasse at Eltham, with a small number, and therefore it was called the still Chylmasse. In Januarie was a peace concluded betwixt the realmes of England and Scotland for thre yeares and sir moneths. The cardinall about this time coming to the court, which then late (as before we haue heard) at Eltham, took order for altering the state of the kings house. Sparie officers and other seruants were discharged, and put to their pensions and annuities. In which number were fourescore and foure yeomen of the gard, which before hauing twelue pence the daie with checke, were now allowed sir pence the daie without checke, and commanded to go home into their countries. Diuers ordinaunces were made at that season by the cardinall, touching the gouernance of the kings house, moze profitable than honorable, as some said, and were called long after, The statutes of Eltham.

On Shrouetuedaie there was a solemne iusts held at the manor of Grenewich, the king & cleuent other on the one part, and the marquisse of Excester with cleuen other on the contrarie part. At those iusts by chance of shiuring of a speare sir Francis Brian lost one of his eyes. The eleuenth of february being fundaie, the cardinall with great pompe came to the cathedrall church of Wauls, where he sat in pontificalibus under his cloth of estate of rich cloth of gold, and there doctor Barnes an Augustine frier bare a sagot for certaine points of heresie alleged against him: and two merchants of the stillard bare sagots for eating of flesh on a fridaie: and there the bishop of Rochester doctor Fisher made a sermon against Martine Luther, which certaine yeares before, that is to wit, about the yeare a thousand five hundred and eightene, had begun to preach and write against the authoritie of the pope.

We must here note, that the emperour being at Anno 17, in the fourteenth yere of the kings reigne covenanted, amongst other things, to take to wife the ladie Marie daughter to the king of England: but now upon considerations his mind changed, for the which the Englishmen sore murmured against him. On the nine and twentieth of Aprill being sun-daie, the cardinall song a solemne masse in the kings chappell at Greenwich, and after the same was ended, the king swore in presence of the ambassado-10 of France, and of the ambassadoof the emperour of Venice, and of Florence, to observe and keepe the peace and league concluded betwixt him and his loving brother, and perpetuall alie the French king, during his life and one yere after.

In this meane while, there was a secret league concluded betwixt the pope, the Venetians, the Florentines, and Francis Sforza duke of Milan: into the which league the French king also entered, after he was returned into France. There was also place left to the king of England to enter into the same league, and likewise to all other kings and princes: and if the king of England would, he should be admitted as protector of the same. But the emperour might not be admitted, till he had delivered the French kings children (having a reasonable summe of monie for the same) and had restored the duke of Milan to his whole duchie. It was thought indeed, that the emperour being wrongfullie informed against this duke, rather through envie of some of the emperours capteins, than for anie cause ministered by the duke, dealt verie streightlie with him, & meant to defeat him of his duchie. For redress therof, and also to provide that the emperor should not grow too strong in Italie to the danger of other estates, this league was devised: by force whereof he might be brought to reason, if he would refuse convenient offers and indifferent waies of agreement.

This league was concluded the two and twentieth of Maie in this yere. What followed thereof, ye may read more at large in the histories of Italie and France, where the warres are more at large touched, which chanced in that season betwixt the em-perour, and the confederats, and how the imperiall armie toke the citie of Rome, and besieging the pope in castell Saint Angelo, constrained him to yeld, and agree to certeine propositions put unto him. ¶ Who being by his adversitie made naked of all helpe present, and lesse expectation to be rescued where was so great want of valour and order, was driven to run the race of his fortune, compounding the first date of June with the imperials almost vnder the same conditions with the which he might have accorded before. That the pope should paie to the armie four hundred thousand buckets in this order: one hundred thousand presentlie to be defraited of the gold, monie, and treasure reserved in the castell: fiftie thousand within twentie daies, and two hundred and fiftie thousand within two moneths: assigning to him for these defraiments, an impoiss of monie to be charged upon the whole church state. That he should deliver into the power of the emperour, to retaine them so long as he thought good, the castell of Saint Angelo, the rockes of Ostia, of Civita Vecchia, of Civita Castellana, together with the cities of Parma, Plaisance, and Modena.

Furthermore, that the pope together with all those cardinals that were with him, which were thirtene in number, should remaine prisoners within the castell, until the first payment of an hundred and fiftie thousand buckets were satisfied. That afterwards they should go to Naples or to Caietta, to expect what the emperour would determine of them. That for assurance of the payments, wherof the third part appertained to the Spaniards, he should deliver in for hostages, the archbishops of Siponto and Viterbo, the bishops of Viterbo, and Verona, together with James Salviatio, Simon de Ricafola, and Laurence brother to cardinall Rodolfo. That Hans de Cero, Albert Pio, Matteo Bailon, the knight Casalo, the am-bassadour of England, with all others that were saved within the castell, except the pope and the cardinals, should depart in suertie. That the pope should give abolution to the Colonnois of the censures they had incurred. And that when he should be led out of Rome, a legat should remaine there for him with authoritie to dispose and administer iustice.

During the popes captivitie, Rome was sore afflicted with the plague, in somuch that the rage thereof so greatlie increased, that the castell of Saint Angelo was visited, to the great danger of the life of the pope; about whome died certeine speciall men that did service to his person: who amid so manie afflict-20 ons and adversities, and no other hope remaining to him than in the clemencie of the emperour, appointed for legat with the consent of the capteins, cardinall Alexander of Farnese, who notwithstanding being issued out of the castell, and Rome, refused vnder that occasion to go in the said legation. The capteins desired to carie the person of the pope with the thirtene cardinals that were with him, to Caietta: but he laboured against that resolution with great diligence, petitions, and art.]

¶ In the month of Maie was a proclamation made against all vnlawfull games, according to the statutes made in this behalfe, and commissions awarded into euerie shire for the execution of the same: so that in all places, tables, dice, cards, and boules were taken and burnt. Wherfore the people murmured against the cardinall, saying: that he grudged at eue-rie mans pleasure, saving his owne. But this proclamation small time indured. For when yong men were forbidden boules and such other games: some fell to drinking, some to setting of other mens co-nies, some to stealing of deer in parks, and other vithistinesse.]

This yere in the citie of London a great grudge was conceived against merchants strangers, for that they by vertue of licences, which they had purchased to bring woad into the realme, contrarie to a statute thereof provided, brought over such plentie thereof, and vntered it aswell in the citie, as abroad in the countrie, so franklie, that Englishmens woad laie vnbound. At length the maior called a common councell in the moneth of August, and there were manie billes laied against the strangers, and at last it was enacted, that no citizen nor freman shuld buy nor sell in no place, nor exchange nor meddle with certeine strangers, called Anthonie Bonuice, Laurence Bonuice, Anthonie Auald, Anthonie Caweler, Francis de Ward, Thomas Calneccat, and a great sort more, whose names I let passe. And if anie person did meddle or occupie with them contrarie to this act, he should lose his freedom and libertie in the citie of London. By which act the strangers were so hydeled, that they came to a reasonable point and conclusion.

In this season the angell noble was tuff the first part of an ounce Trote, so that six angells were tuff an ounce, which was fourtie shillings sterling; & the angell was worth two ounces of siluer: so that six angells were worth twelue ounces, which was but fourtie shillings in siluer. By reason of the good weight and low valuation of the English coine, merchants daillie carried over great store, because the same was much inhauced there. So that, to meet with this inconuenience, in September proclamation was made through all England, that the angell should

The king kept a solemne Christmasse at Grenewich with reuelles, maskes, disguisings, & bankets: and the thirtieth daie of December, was an enterpryse of iusts made at the tilt by sir gentlemen, against all comers, which ballantlie furnished the same, both with speare and sword: and like iusts were kept the thirde daie of Januarie, where were three hundred speares broken. That same night, the king and manie young gentlemen with him, came to Bidewell, and there put him and fiftene other, all in masking apparell, and then took his barge, and rowed to the cardinals place, where were at supper a great compaignie of lords and ladies, and then the maskers danced, and made goodlie pastime: and when they had well danced, the ladies plucked awaie their visors, and so they were all knowen, and to the king was made a great banket.

An ambassadour from the emperour.

On the fourteenth of Januarie came to the court don Hugo de Mendoza, a man of a noble familie in Spaine: he came as ambassadour from the emperour to the king, with large commission, for the emperour put it to the kings determination, whether his demands which he required of the French king were reasonable or not. This noble man carried here two peres. This Christmasse was a goodlie disguising plaied at Graies In, which was compiled for the most part by maister John Woe, sergeant at the law manie yeares past, and long before the cardinall had any authoritie. The effect of the play was, that lord gouernance was ruled by dissipation and negligence, by whose misgouernance and euill order ladie publike weale was put from gouernance: which caused rumor popul, inward grudge and disdain of wanton souerignitie, to rise with a great multitude, to expell negligence and dissipation, and to restore publike welth againe to hir estate, which was so done.

A plaie at Graies In.

The argument of the plaie

This plaie was so set forth with rich and costlie apparell, with strange deuises of maskes & morities, that it was highlie praised of all men, sauing of the cardinall, which imagined that the play had bene deuised of him, and in a great furie sent for the said maister Woe, and took from him his coise, and sent him to the flect: and after he sent for the young gentlemen, that plaied in the plaie, and them highlie rebuked and threatened, and sent one of them called Thomas Poile of Kent to the flect, but by means of friends maister Woe and he were deliuered at last. This plaie so displeased the cardinall, and yet it was neuer meant to him, as you haue heard. Therefore manie wisemen grudged to see him take it so hartlie, and euer the cardinall said that the king was highlie displeased with it, and spake nothing of himselfe. But what will you haue of a guiltie conscience but to suspect all things to be said of him (as if all the world knew his wickednesse) according to the old verse:

Ambassadors
fro the French king.

Edw. Hall
pag. Clij.
A iusts.

The second of March were receiued into London the bishop of Tarbe, Francis vicount of Thurane, and maister Anthoine Vescie second president of Paris, as ambassadours from the French king. They were lodged in Tailors hall. On Shrouetuedaie the king himselfe in a new harness all gilt, of a strange fashion that had not bene seene, and with him eight gentlemen all in cloth of gold of one sute, embroidered with knots of silver, and the marques of Excester, and eight with him in blew beluet and white sattin, like the waues of the sea, these men of armes came to the tilt, and there ran manie fresh courses, till two hundred fouretioze and six speares were broken, and then they disarmed and went to the quenes chamber, where for them was provided a costlie banket.

The French ambassadours sued (as was said) to haue the ladie Marie daughter to the k. of England, giuen in mariage to the duke of Oyleance, second sonne to their master the French king: but that matter was put in suspence for diuerse considerations. And one was, for that the president of Paris doubted whether the mariage betwene the king and hir mother (she being his brother's wife) was lawfull or not. While the French ambassadours late thus in London, it happened one euening as they were coming from the Blacke friers, from supper to the Tailors hall, two boies were in a gutter casting downe rubbish, which the raine had driuen there, and vniwares hit a lackie belonging to the vicount of Thurane, and hurt him nothing, for scantlie touched it his cote. But the French lords took the matter highlie, as a thing done in despite, & sent word to the cardinall. Who being too hasty of credence, sent for sir Thomas Seimor knight, lord maior of the citie, and in all hast commanded him upon his allegiance, to take the husband, wife, children, and seruants of the house, and them to imprison, till he knew further of the kings pleasure, and that the two boies apprentices should be sent to the Towler: which commandement was accomplished without anie fauor. For the man, and his wife, and seruants, were kept in the counter till the first daie of Maie, which was sir tookes full, and their neighbours of gentleness kept their house in the meane time, and one of the apprentices died in the Towler, and the other was almost lame. Of the crueltie of the cardinall, and of the pride of the Frenchmen, much people spake, & would haue bene reuenged on the Frenchmen, if wise men in the citie had not appeased it with faire words.

On the fouretenth daie of March were conueied from London to Grenewich by the earle of Rutland and others, the lord Gabriel de Salamanca earle of Ottonburgh, John Burgraue of Silberberge, and John Faber a famous cleerke, after bishop of Euen, as ambassadours from don Ferdinand, brother to the emperour, newlie elect king of Hungarie and Beaine, after the death of his brother in law king Lewes, which was slaine by the Turke the last summer, as you haue heard before. This compaignie was welcommed of the high officers, and after brought into the kings presence, all the nobilitie being present, and there after great reuerence made, maister Faber made a notable oration, taking his ground of the gospell, Exijt seminator seminare semen suum, and of that he declared how Christ and his disciples went forth to sow, and how their seed was good that fell into the good ground, and brought forth good fruit, which was the christian faith: and then he declared how contrarie to that sowing, Mahomet had sowne seed, which brought forth euill fruit. He also shewed from the beginning, how the Turkes haue increased in power, what realmes they had conquered, what people they had subdued euen to that daie.

He declared further what acts the great Turke then liuing had done, and in especial he noted the getting of Belgrad, and of the Rhodes, and the slaying of the king of Hungarie, to the great rebuke (as he said) of all the kings christened. He set forth also what power the Turke had, what diuertities of compaignies, what armoz, what captains he had, so that he thought, that without a marvellous great number of people he could not be ouerthrowne. Wherefore he most humbly besought the king, as S. Georges knight, knights, and defendoꝝ of the faith, to assist the king his maister in that godlie warre and vertuous purpose.

To this oration the k. by the mouth of sir Thomas More answered, that much he lamented the losse that happened in Hungarie, and if it were not for the warre which were betwene the two great princes, he thought that the Turke would not haue enterprised that act. Wherefore he with all his studie would take paine, first, to set an vnitie and peace throughout all christendome; and after that, both with monie and men, he wold be redie to helpe toward that glorious warre, as much as any other prince in christendome.
After this done, the ambassadours were well theri-fied, and diuerse times resorted to the court, and had great cheare and good rewards, and so the thirde daie of Maie next ensuing, they toke their leaue and departed homeward.

There was a great long time by counsellors

In the winter season of this yeate fell great abundance of raine, and namelie in September, October, and December. And on the sixteenth of Januarie it rained so abundantly, that great flouds thereby ensuing, destroyed coyne fields, pastures, and drowned manie sheepe and beastes. Then was it dize till the twelue of Aprill, and from thence it rained euerie day or night till the third of June, & in Maie it rained thirtie hours continuallie without ceasing, which caused great flouds, & did much harme, namelie in coyne, so that the next yeate it failed within this realme, and great dearth ensued.

Ano. Reg. 19.
How Hall was taken, Cliv was sent to the cardinall in shill for John A. Goun.

This time a bill was set vp in London, much contrarie to the honour of the cardinall, in the which the cardinall was warned that he should not counsell the king to marrie his daughter into France: for if he did, he should shew himselfe enimie to the king and the realme, with manie theaunting words. This bill was deliuered to the cardinall by sir Thomas Set-temore, of the citie, which thanked him for the same, & made much search for the authoꝝ of that bill, but he could not be found, which fore displeased the cardinall. And vpon this occasion the last daie of Aprill at night he caused a great watch to be kept at Westminster, and had there cart guns readie charged, & caused diuerse watchmen to be kept about London, in Newington, S. Johns street, Westminster, saint Giles, Killington, and other places nere London: which watchmen were kept by gentlemen & their seruants, with householders, and all for feare of the Londoners because of this bill. When the citizens knew of this, they said that they marvelled why the cardinall hated them so, for they said that if he mis-trusted them, he loued them not: and where loue is not, there is hatred: and they affirmed that they neuer intended any harme toward him, and misused of this chance. For if true: if true: if true: if true: if true: in the citie, then had entred all these watchmen with their traine, which might haue spoiled the citie without cause. Wherefore they much murmured against the cardinall and his vndiscreet doings.]

The French
ambassadors in the name of their maister came to obs serve the league.

The French ambassadours at Greenwich on Sunday the first of Maie, swore in the name of their maister the French king to obserue the peace and league concluded betwene them, for feare of two princes lines. These ambassadours had great cheare, and lives were enterprised for the honour and pleasure of them at the kings commandement by sir Nicholas Carew, sir Robert Jerningham, sir Anthoine Boulne, and Nicholas Harue esquier challengers.
Against whome ran the marques of Orcester, and thirteen with him as defendants. When these ambafsadours should returne, they had great rewards gi-uen them of the king, and so toke their leaue and departed. Shortly after the king sent sir Thomas Bullocke bicount Rochford, and sir Anthoine Boulne knight, as ambassadours from him into France, which came to Paris to the bishop of Bath that late there for the king as legier.

Ambassadours into France.

Then the se they went to the court, and saw the French king in person swaue to keepe the league & amitie concluded betwene him & the king of England. Also the king sent sir Francis Poynt knight ambassadour from him to Charles the emperour, and with him went Clarenceaux king of armes, to demand the one halfe of the treasure and ordnance which was taken at Paula, so much as that warre was made as well at the kings charge as at the emperours. Also they were commanded to demand one of the French kings sonnes, which lay in hostage with the emperour, that is to wit, the duke of Ale-ance to be deliuered to the king of England; and further that he shuld call backe his armie out of Italie.
And if it were so that he refused these reasonable requests, then should they in the kings name denounce open warre against him: The English merchants liked the matter nothing at all, that there should be any warres betwixt the emperour and the king of England. And where they were desired by the cardinall to keepe their marts at Calis, they would not assent thereto.

whom the duke of Burbon (of whom you haue heard great power, led the same towards Rome, and in-camped within the medow nere to the citie, from whence with the insolencie of a souldier he sent a trumpet to demand passage of the pope through the citie of Rome, to go with his armie to the realme of Naples. The morning following vpon the point of the daie, by the consideration of his case and the aduersities thereof, he found there remained no other hope for his affaires, than to be resolute to releue the afflictions of his armie, and according to the opportunitie that was offered by the citie of Rome, either to die or to vanquish. In which resolution pushed on more and more by the murmurs and exclamations of his souldiers, in whom he could not discerne which was greater, either their insolencies or their necessities, he drew nere the suburbs by the waie of the mounteine and Santo Spirito, where he began to giue a furious assault. Wherein he seemed to haue the fauour of fortune, who made him present his armie in more suertie by the benefit of a thicke mist, which being risen before daie, and increased with degrees of fog and thicknesse, became such a couer to his whole campe, that his souldiers were not discerned till they were nere the place where they began to giue the assault.

The duke of Burbon incampeth nere
Rome.

The duke of Burbon through a last despaire of his estate advanced before all his companies, either for that he had no other expectation of refuge, in case he returned not victorious, or else by his owne example he thought to call on with a greater courage the lanceknights, who it seemed went not resolutely to the seruice. But such was his destinie to determine his life & his glorie together, or rather such the reward of his wilfull forwardnes, which for the most part beareth wreched effects vpon such as take not to accompanye their valour with counsell and discretion.
In the beginning of the assault he was stricken with a bullet of an harquebuz, of which wound he fell downe dead to the earth, receiuing iustlie vpon his bodie and life the price of the action, which contrarie to all iustice and pietie he went about to execute. But much lesse that his death did abate or diminish, seeing it did inflame and redouble the courage of his soun-diers, who fighting with a wonderfull constancie the space of two houres, made waie at last by their hands and weapons to enter the suburbs, wherein they were

were not onelic holpen by the weaknesse of the rampires which were great and generall, but also they found helpe in the slender resistance which the defendants made.

The moztall of the force laid action worth the noting.

An experience of right good doctrine to such as haue not as yet gotten by the benefit of examples past, the knowledge of things present, who in that action maie discern what propertie of difference is betwene the vertue of souldiours exercised and trained in war, and armies newlie and hastily leuied, and compounded of the multitude of a people more wilfull than skillfull; and by so much lesse apt to be drawn vnder discipline, by how much more by their nature and custome they are seldome conformable to anie good order. For there was at the defense of the suburbs one part of the youth of Rome, vnder the ensignes of the people; notwithstanding that manie of the Gobelins & faction of Colunno desired, or at least did not feare the victorie of the imperials. They hoped in regard of their faction, to receiue no harme or offense by the victors: the same being the cause whie they proceeded to coldie in the defense. Neuertheless, for that according to the rules of warre, it is a hard matter to take towne without artilleries, there died of the assailants, partly by that want, and partly through their wilfull forwardnesse, about a thousand footmen; who hauing once by their valor made the waie open to enter in, all the defendants fled before them as men whose feare was far aboue anie other sense or passion in them.

Rome taken and sacked.

In which disorder, some took the waie which his fortune and not his wit laid out for him: some in the assaultment seeking to flie, who durst no more fight, were slaine by the enimic afore he could resolve vpon the waie of his safetie; some either better prepared, or more hapilie preferred, found that safetie in running away, which they could not but doubt if they had longer endured the fight: and some with that resolution which their present calamitie would suffer, ran by heapes towards the castell, where in place of rescue they found a feare conformable to their otone: in somuch as all things being reduced to confusion and manifest flight, the suburbs were entierlie abandoned & left a preie to the victors. And the person of the pope, who expected with great deuotion in the palace of Vatican what would be the issue of the assault, hearing that the enimies were entred, had also (with the others) his passions of feare & frailtie, and in that timorous contemplation of his owne perill, he fled with certeine cardinales to the castell.

The pope with certeine cardinales fle to the castell of saint Angelo.

His feare kept him from being resolute in a perill that was so desperate, neither did he thinke, that with the presence and maiestie of his person, though it was couered with the haile of the highest dignitie on earth, he was able to put by the danger, which the valor and fidelitie of his souldiours could not defend with their weapons. There he consulted with the cardinales, whether it were more for his safetie to remaine there, or during the furie of the assaultment, to retire with the light horsemen of his guard into some place of more suertie by the waie of Rome. But he, who was appointed by destinie, to be an example of the calamities that maie thunder vpon popes, and how fraile is the authoritie and maiestie of that see, being certified by the relation of Berard de Padoa, who was fled from the armie imperiall, that the duke of Bourbon was dead, and that the whole armie standing abated in courage for the death of their capitaine, desired to come to accord with him. In which matter they sent out men to parlee with the principallies there, he wretchedlie left there all his councelles to go awaie, both he and his captains remaining no lesse irresolute in the provisions for defense, than they had bene slow in the expeditions.

So that the daie following, the Spaniards neither seeking order nor counsell to defend the quarter beyond Tiber, entred the place without anie resistance. And from thence, not finding anie impediments to stop their victorie, the same evening they entred the citie of Rome by the bridge Nisio, where, except such as reposed in the confidence of their faction, and certeine cardinales, who for that they bare a name to embrace the emperours quarrell, beleued to find more suertie than the others, all the residue of the court and citie (as happeneth in accidents so furious) was conuerted into fleeing and confusion. But the souldiours being within the citie, which they knew wanted nothing to make them right glorious, and well satisfied of all things appertaining to their desires, they began to omit no time to execute the thing they had so dearely bought. Currie one ran to pillage with the same vnbidde libertie, which in such cases maketh souldiours both insolent and impious.

There was small care or regard borne either to the name of friends, factions, or fauourers; and much lesse was respected the authoritie of cardinales and prelates, or dignitie of temples and monasteries; and lastlie, not reserved from violation, the holie relikes brought thither from all parts of the world; yea euen things sacred, and speciallie dedicated, were profaned from their thrones and holie places, and made subiect to the furious wills and discretion of the souldiours. It is not onelic impossible to reaccount, but also to imagine the calamities of that citie raised to a wonderfull greatnesse, and appointed by Gods ordinance to suffer manie fortunes and directions, hauing bene sacked by the Goths within ix. C. and lxxx. yeares. It is hard to particulate the greatnesse of the preie, both for the generall wealth and riches which the greedy hands of the souldiours had made vp in heapes, and for other things more rare and pretious drawn out of the store-houses of merchants and courtiers. But the matter which made the spoile infinite in value, was the qualitie and great number of prisoners redeemed with most rich and huge ransomes.

And to make by a full tragedie of miserie and infamie, the lanceknights being so much the more insolent and cruell, by how much they bare hatred to the name of the church of Rome, took prisoners certeine prelates, whom with great contempt and indignitie they set vpon asses and leane mules, and with their faces reuered to the crowd of the beastes, they led them thorough the citie of Rome, apparelled with the habits and markes of their dignitie: yea they passed manie of them to cruell torments, who either died in the furie of the action, or at least with the painefulnesse thereof they lined not long after, first yielding a rancome, and afterwards rendering their liues. The generall slaughter as well at the assault as in the rage of sacking, was about foure thousand bodies. All the palaces of the cardinales were sacked, except some particulars, who to saue the merchants that were retired thither with their goods, together with the persons and gods of manie others referred of the generall calamitie, made promise of great summes of monie. To whom notwithstanding was bled this iniquitie, that some of them that had compounded with the Spaniards, were afterwards sacked by the lanceknights, or at least constrained to a second rancome.

The ladie marquesse of Spantua compounded for hir palace for the summe of fiftie thousand ducats, which were paid by the merchants and others retired thither: of which summe the rumour ran, that Ferrand hir sonne had ten thousand for his share.

The Spaniards came to Rome by the bridge Nisio.

The reason to tolerate the report of this histoye through fauouring of superstition.

This spectacle could not but afford plentie of hart-griefe.

Compounding with the Spaniards to save certeine places vnbuilt.

The cardinall of Sienita dedicated in a perpetuall deuotion to the name of the emperour, after he had agreed with the Spaniards, as well for him selfe as for his palace, was afterwards made prisoner by the lanceknights, who made boote and preie of his palace; and afterwards leading him all naked with buffets and bastanadoes into the bozough, he was giuen to redeme his life out of their hands, with a promise of five thousand ducats. The cardinales Smerua and Donero passed under almost the like calamitie, who being prisoners to the lanceknights, were rated at a ransom which they paid, after they had bene in a vile spectacle caried in procession thorough the towne of Rome.

This furie of souldiours executed in a place of so great riches and profit, could endure no dispensation of anie sort of qualitie of men, seeing the prelates and cardinales, Spaniards and Germans, who made themselves assured that the souldiours of their nation would spare them from oppression and taxation, were taken and passed by the same measure of miserie and calamitie as others did. Right pittifull were the criengs and lamentations of the women of Rome: and no lesse worthy of compassion, the calamitie of nunnies and virgins professed, whom the souldiours rauished by troopes out of their houses to satiffie their lust, no age, no sex, no dignitie or calling was free from the violation of souldiours, in whom it was doubtfull whether bare more rule, the humour of crueltie to kill, or the appetite of lust to despoile, or lastlie, the rage of couetousnesse to rob and spoile: yea in the violation of these women might be discerned a confirmation of the iudgements of God hid den from mortall men, for that he suffered to be deliuered by to the violence of men, barbarous and bloody, the renowned chastitie of women professed and virgins.

To this compassion was ioined the infinite clamours of men forced against all law of humanitie, partlie to wrest from them unreasonable ransomes, and partlie to disclose their goods which had hid den from the raine of the souldiours. All these things, sacraments and reliks of saints, whereof the churches were full, being despoiled of their ornaments, were pulled doونه, and laid vpon the earth, suffering no small profanations, by the vile hands of the lanceknights. And whatsoever remained vpon the preies and spoilings of the imperiales, which were things but base and vile, were raked and caried away by the pezants and tenants of the lands of the Colonniois, whose insolencie caried them into Rome during the generall furie. Onelie the cardinall of Colomno arriuing the daie after, preferred in his compassion the honoz of manie women that happilie were fled for rescue into his house. The rumoz went that the valuation and price of this sacke in gold, silver, and iewels, amounted to more than a million of ducats, but the matter of ransomes contained a greater quantitie. ]

When Rome was thus taken by the imperiales, and the pope brought into captiuitie, therewith the king was so incensed against the emperour by the instigation of the cardinall, that he had determined not to spare anie treasure for the popes deliuerance. There rose a secret brute in London that the kings confessor, doctor Longland, and diuerse other great clerks had told the king that the marriage betwene him and the ladie Katharine, late wife to his brother prince Arthur was not lawfull: whereupon the king should sue a diuorfe, and marrie the duchesse of Alansons sister to the French king at the towne of Calis this summer: and that the viscount Rochford had brought with him the picture of the said ladie. The king was offended with those tales, and sent for sir

Thomas Seimozimaz of the citie of London, secretly charging him to see that the people ceased from such talke.

But what so euer the commons talked, it was determined that the cardinall should go ouer into France as high ambassadour for the king, and to take with him twelue score thousand pounds, to be employed on the warres to be made by the confederats against the emperour, if he would not condescend to such demands as the English ambassadours on the kings behalfe should exhibit vnto him. The third of Iulie this triumphant cardinall passed thorough London with twelue hundred horse towards the sea side, and comming vnto Canturburie rested there, and there declared to the people what had chaunced vnto the pope, and caused the monks of Chiffes church to sing their Letanie after this maner: Santa Maria ora pro Clemente papa, &c. When he exhorted the people to fast and praie for the popes deliuerance, accordinglie as he had already sent commissions vnto all the bishops within the realme to follow that order, which was to fast three daies in the weeke, and to vse in euery parish solemnne processions. The eleuenth of Iulie the cardinall toke shipping at Dover, and landed the same daie at Calis, from whence he departed the two and twentieth of Iulie, and with him was the bishop of London Cuthbert Tunstall, the lord Sands chamberleine to the king, the earle of Derby, sir Henrie Guilford, sir Thomas Pope, with manie other knights and esquiers, in all to the number of twelue hundred horse, and of cariages there were foure score wagons, and three score mules and sumpter horses.

He that is desirous to vnderstand with what honour this triumphant cardinall was receiued in all places as he passed thorough Picardie by order giuen by the French king, maie read thereof at large in the chronicles of maister Edward Hall. At Amiens he was receiued by the French king himselfe, and by his mother with all other chiefe peres of France. There was nothing forgot that might do him honour or pleasure. But to the effect of his businesse. After he had shewed his commission, they fell in counsell, and in the end grew to a full conclusion of a league to be accorded and established betwixt the kings of England and France: the covenants and articles whereof were drawne and written vp in a faire charter, which was sealed in solemnne wise, and deliuered vnto the cardinals by the kings owne hand.

After this, it was agreed, that Mout de Foix, countie called monsieur de Lawtrech, should go into Italie with a puissant armie to procure the popes deliuerance, & repell the emperours power out of all the partie of Italie, if he refused such reasonable offers & articles of agreement as were drawen, & should be exhibited to him. In this armie went sir Robert Ferringham, John Carew of Hakam, & 80 other English gentlemen, which were sent by the cardinall from Amiens. When the armie was assembled, the cardinall deliuered the monie which he had brought out of England with him in barrels, with the which the armie was paid two moneths before hand, & the surplussage was deliuered to sir Robert Ferringham, which was called treasure of the wars. This armie was called in Latine, Exercitus Angliae & Gallorum regum pro pontifice Romano liberando congregatus, that is to saie, The armie of the kings of England and France, gathered for the deliuerance of the bishop of Rome: and so was it reputed.

In this meane time the English ambassadours, sir Francis Poins and Clarenceaux the herald, were come into Spaine, and there to the emperour in the towne of Vale Delisse the sixt of Iulie deliuered the kings letters, and further declared their messages as they had in commandement. The emperor made to them a courteous answer for that time, and said he would take counsell in the matter, and then should they receive further answer, and in the meane time they might repose them. Within a daie or two after he called to him doctor Lee that was the kings ambassadour legier there with him, & the said sir Francis Poins, and said to them; My lords we haue perceived the king your masters demands, which are weightie and of great importance. Wherefore we intend with all speed to write to the king our uncle, and when we haue received answer from him, we shall deliuer you of such things as you require, praising you in the meane time to take patience.

The emperor protracted time of purpose, because he was loth to answer directlie to such grievous and most irkesome complaints, because he gessed by the course of things that the French king would shortly be constrained to agree to those conditions of peace, which he at the first had offered. But the French king & the cardinall being together at Amiens, amongst other things determined there betwixt them in counsell, devised further what articles of offer should be sent to the emperor, which if he refused, then open defiance to be made unto him in name of both the kings. The articles were these in effect.

Articles proposed to the emperor being in number sixtene.

1 First that the French king should paie for his ransom 25000 crownes: one writter calleth it two millions. 2 Also that he should release all the pension that he had in Naples, with all the right of the same. 3 Also that he should neuer claime title to the dutchie of Spillane. 4 Also he should release the superiortie of Flanders for ever, and the right which he had to the citie of Tornele. 5 Also he should release all the homages of all persons within those countries. 6 Also to withdraw his armie out of Italie. 7 Also to forsake the aid of the Switzers against the emperor. 8 Also to take no more part with Robert de la Marck against the emperor. 9 Also neuer to aid the king of Navarre against him, although he had married the kings sister. 10 Also neuer to aid the duke of Gelderland, nor to challenge the same dutchie. 11 Also to aid the emperor with ships and men to his coronation. 12 Also to marie the ladie Elenor queene of Portugall sister to the emperor. 13 Also that the Dolphine should marie the said queens daughter. 14 Also that if the French king had any children male by the said queene, then the dutchie of Burgognie to remaine to the said child being male. 15 Also that the French king should be friend to the emperor & his friends, and enemie to his enemies.

Ambassadours from the French king.

These with manie other articles, which were not openlie knowne, were sent to the bishop of Tarbe, and to the vicount of Thuraine ambassadours with the emperor from the French king. Other articles were also sent to the English ambassadours being in Spaine, as to moue the emperor to some reasonable end with the French king: and that the king of England would release unto him all the summes of monie due to him, as well by the emperor as by his grandfather as himselfe, and take the French king as debtor for the same. If he would not agree to these offers, then was it accorded, that the French king should marie the ladie Marie daughter to the king of England, and they both to be enemies to the emperor. When all these things were concluded, the cardinall took his leave of the French king & his mother, and with great rewards returned, comming to Richmond, where the king then laie, the last of September.

In October, there came ambassadours from the French king into England, the lord Annas de Spont-merancie, great master of the said French kings house, the bishop of Baion chiefe president of Rone, and monsieur de Humiers accompanied with sixtie gentlemen well appointed. These ambassadours were received with all honour that might be devised. On Allhalloves daie the king comming to the cathedrall church of saint Paule, where the cardinall sang masse, swore before the high altar in the presence of the French ambassadours to keepe and performe the league. On fundaie the tenth of November, the king being elected knight of the order of St. Michael, received at Greenwich the said order by the hands of the great master of France, and monsieur Humiers that were companions of the same order: in like case as the French king the same daie at Paris received the order of the garter by the hands of the lord Lisle, doctor Tailor, master of the rolles, sir Nicholas Carew knight master of the kings horses, sir Anthoine Wotton knight, and sir Thomas Wriothesle knight, otherwise called Cartier king of armes, the which were sent thither with the whole habit, collar, and other habillements of the order as appertained.

After that the French ambassadours had bene highlie feasted, banketed, and intertained, with all honor and pastime convenient, the great master and all his companie took leave of the king, and with great rewards returned into France, leaving the bishop of Baion behind them, who abode ambassadour legier in England. In this month of November, Arthur Wilneie, Gesteire Rone, and one Carret that spoke against the popes authoritie, were abtured by the cardinall. By reason of the great wet that fell in the sowing time of the corne, and in the beginning of the last yeare, now in the beginning of this, corne so failed, that in the citie of London for a while bread was scant, by reason that commissioners appointed to see order taken in threes about, devised that none should be conveyed out of one shire into another.

Which order had like to haue bred disorder, for that every countie and place was not provided alike, and namelie London, that maketh his provision out of other places, felt great inconvenience hereby, till the merchants of the Stiliard, and others out of the Dutch countries, brought such plenty, that it was better cheape in London than in any other part of England, for the king also relieved the citizens in time of their need with a thousand quarters by waie of lone of his owne provision. The scarcitie at the first was more than the dearth. For in the beginning of their want, wheat was onelie at sixtene shillings a quarter, & from thence it rose to twentie shillings, and after to six and twentie shillings eight pence the quarter, till remedie by outward provision was procured and had. In this meane while the lord Lautrech with his armie was entred into Italie, where how he sped, and what came of that expedition, we shall find in the histories of France and Italie, and there fore in this place I passe it over. Sir Francis Poins knight, in the end of December, returned out of Spaine into England, leaving Clarenceux behind him to bring further answer.

The emperor at the request of this sir Francis Poins, who made the same in name of his master the king of England, was contented to release twelve articles, which were reputed most prejudiciall to the French king, onelie to gratifie the king of England: but the cardinall kept the king still in displeasure toward the emperor, for the favour which he bare to the French king, whose onelie purposes he sought to advance. The articles which were devised at Amiens when the cardinall was there, were exhibited to the emperor by the French ambassadours, because because he refused the same, word was sent to Clarence king of armes, to make defiance to the emperor. Whereupon on the wednesdaie the two and twentieth of Januarie, Guien king of armes to the French king, and Clarence king of armes to the king of England, being in the cite of Burges in Spaine, came to the court of Charles the elect emperor, about nine of the clocke in the morning, and there did request of his maiestie, that it would please him to appoint them an houre of audience.

The lord de Chaour by ordinance from his maiestie gaue them answer, that it should be about ten of the clocke before none the same daie. And at the same houre his maiestie came into the great hall of his court accompanied with diuerse prelates, dukes, marquesses, earles, barons, and other great lords and good personages, of diuerse nations of his kingdomes and seignories in great number. The emperor sitting in a chaire prepared according to his dignitie, the two kings of armes of France & England being in the nether end of the hall, holding vpon their left arms each one his coat of armes, did make there solemn reuerences accustomed, with knee to the ground. And when they were at the lowest staire before his imperiall maiestie, Clarence king of armes of England, hauing the words in both their names, spake as followeth.

Sir, following the thre edicts inuolablie kept and obserued by your predecessors emperours of Rome, kings, princes, and capitains, Guien king of armes of the most christened king; and also Clarence king of armes to the king of England our soveraigne & naturall lords: we presenting our selues before your sacred maiestie, for to declare certeine things from the said kings our maisters: beseech your maiestie, that having regard to the said lawes according to your benignitie and mercie, that it would please you to giue vs sure access and good treating in your countries, lands, and seignories, attending your answer, with sure conduct to returne vnto the countries, lands, and seignories of our said soveraigne lords. The emperor then bad them saie on what former the kings your maisters haue giuen you in charge: your priuileges shall be kept, none shall do you any displeasure within my kingdomes or territories. After this, Guien read a writing signed with the hand of the said Guien king of armes.

A copie of the said writing read as followeth.

Sir, the most christened king my soveraigne and naturall lord hath commanded me to saie to you, that he hath conceived a marvellous greife and displeasure of that, that in place of amitie, which he so much desired to haue with you, the former enmitie in full force still remaineth. By the which he seeth and perceiueth, that the evils and inconveniences long since begun, shall continue and augment, not onelie vnto you, and vnto him, with your vassals and subjects, but also vnto all christendome: and that the forces and youths which the one and the other ought to employe against the enemies of the faith, shall be spent to the effusion of christian blood, and in offence vnto God: and that you and he endowed with so manie gracions gifts, shall not introy the benefits, which it pleased the son of God to leane to vs, by his testament, which is peace, thereof all godnesse proceedeth; and in place of the same shall haue war, wherof foloweth all calamities, dangers, inconveniences, poverties, and miseries. Wherewith you shall submit your selfe vnto them whome ye may command, and shall hazard the blood and substance of your subjects in the pursues of strangers. Euerie one as for himselfe ought to haue regard thereto, and for the short time that we haue here to liue, not to go about to depriue himselfe of that tranquillitie, ioy, god regard and pastime, that the princes may haue by peace: and by following the warre, to be in povertie, heauinesse, and hazard of losse of goods, honours, and liues: and that worst is, after they haue had euill daies in this world, to be in danger of eternall paine in the world to come, thorough them that haue bene the cause thereof, and that would not yeld vnto reason.

The king my soveraigne lord is ready to put himselfe for his part in all deuoir, and more than so, to haue peace and amitie with you: and by this means peace shall be procured throughout all christendome, whereby men might do God good seruice, in making warre on the Infidels, which will be so thankfull to him, that it will put off the punishment of faults, which haue bene committed heretofore by reason of the warres, which haue too long indured betwene you two, and not yet like to cease, considering the termes which you hold and seeke to mainteine, sith on the one part, certeine aduoluing themselves on you, haue assailed and taken by force the cite of Rome, which is the place of the holie and apostolike see, where they haue committed and done all the mischief that might be deuised.

The churches and reliques were profaned, the pope holding saint Peters seat, as vicar of God on earth, taken and put out of his libertie. By means wherof, they that haue committed and executed the said execrable deeds and wickednesse, with their authors and fautors, be fallen and run in paines of right; and they that hold them captiues, beare themselves on you; and he that doth keepe them, hath bene and is of the principall captains, of whome you haue bene serued in your warres in Italie and other parts. And on the other side, the difference which at this time resteth betwene you and the king my soveraigne and naturall lord, is principallie vpon the ransom and recouerie of the princes his sonnes, which you hold for hostages of the same. He hath oftentimes offered, and yet doth offer to paie to you, and giue to you, not onelie that which may be said to be reasonable, and in such cases accustomed, but also more largelie.

You ought not to stand vpon things which by force and constraint he hath promised, the which iustlie and honestlie he maie not performe nor accomplish: you had a great deale more gained, to haue taken the said ransom which was offered vnto you, than to continue the warre, and to giue occasion of all the evils and inconveniences that dallie happen thereby thorough christendome. You see the king of England, with whome he hath brotherlie amitie for euer, and also the Venetians, Florentines, and duke of War, and other princes and potentats, following and holding the partie of the said christian king, for that they see he yeldeth to reason, and by reason you will not thereto incline, the vniuersall peace can not be concluded in christendome. The enemies of the faith gaine countries: all Italie is in armes, blood and rapine, and the apostolike see in trouble: so that if on your part you seeke not reuerdie, and that things do thus continue as they haue begun, it is to be feared that God will be angrie.

And for as much (sir) as to the declarations which the aboue said princes haue offered vnto you, and the presentations which the said christian king hath made vnto you, you haue refused to giue eare, thereby to come to some accord with him, and to content your selfe with a ransom more than reasonable: also for that you will not render unto his good brother, perpetuall alie and confederat, the king of England, that which is his, let the pope at libertie, and leaue Italy in peace and tranquillitie, he hath commanded me to declare, signifie, and notifie unto you, his great græfe and displeasure, with his said good brother the king of England, that they will hold and take you for their enimie, declaring all maner of treaties and couenants heretofore passed betwene them and you, in all that concerneth your profit & utilitie to be nothing, and that for his part he will not obserue nor keepe the same.

The herald moueth the emperor with the king of Englands example.

The herald commeth to the better diff of his message.

What the king of England desireth of the emperor in the French kings behalf.

Naie he hath resolved by all meanes that he may imagine with his good friends, alies, & confederats, & with all his forces to indamage you, your countries, lands, and bassals by warre, or otherwise, in such sort as he maie deuise, untill the time that you haue restored unto him his children, with honest meanes and couenants touching his ransom, delivered the pope, rendered unto the king of England that you hold of him, and acquitted the summe which you owe him, and suffer his alies and confederats to liue in peace, rest, and tranquillitie, and protesteth before God and all the world, that he doth not wish nor desire the warre, but that it wholie displeaseth him, and is not therefore the cause of the euill that is or maie come thereof, considering that he hath put, and will put himselfe vnto all reason, as he hath offered and signified vnto you and to all other christian princes, and yet doth.

The king of England meaning and the French kings for the returne of the emperours subiects out of their countries, and contrariwise.

And of all this he calleth God (who knoweth all things) to witnesse. And for that vnder colour of the publication of the pretended trette of Madrid made, he being yet prisoner in Spaine, diuerse of your subiects, and of them of the king of England, and of his haue carried their merchandizes and other goods into the kingdomes, streits, and seignories the one of the other, whereby maie insue great damages, if of them no mention should be made in this present declaration and signification: my soueraine lord and the said king of England be contented that libertie be giuen vnto all subiects being in the said kingdomes, countries, streits, and seignories, to retire and depart from thence with all their goods and merchandizes within fortie daies after this intimati-on made. Prouided that you shall do the like vnto their subiects in all & euerie their merchandizes. Given the eleuenth daie of Nouember 1527, & signed Guien king of armes.

The emperours words to Guien the French kings herald.

The emperor after the defiance giuen by Guien, spake in this sort: I do vnderstand that which you haue read from the king your maister, & I do much maruell why he doth desie me, for he being my prisoner by right warre, and I hauing his faith by reason he can not do it. It is vnto me a noueltie to be defied of him, seeing it is fir or seuen yeares that he hath warred against me, and yet giuen me no defiance. And sith that by the grace of God I haue defended my selfe from him (as he hath seene, and euerie one else) without that he hath giuen me anie warning, or considering the reason and iustification whereon I do rest my selfe, for the which I thinke I haue not otherwise deserved towards God: I hope that at this time now you aduertise me of it, being aduertised I shall defend my selfe the better, in such sort that the king your maister shall do me no hurt: for sith he doth desie me, I am halfe assured.

How the emperor was affected for the pope in his captiuitie.

And touching that which you spake of the pope, none hath bene more sorrowfull than I of that which was done, and it was without my knowledge or commandement: and that which hath bene done, was done by vniuersal people, without obedience to anie of my captains. And yet I aduertise you, that the pope long since is set at libertie, and yesterday I had certeine newes of it. And touching the sonnes of your maister, he knoweth that I haue them for pledges; and also my lords his ambassadoys know well, that the fault hath not lien in me that they haue not bene deliuered. And as for that of the king of England my good brother and vncle, I beleue if it be so as you do say, that he is not well informed of things passed: and if he were, yet could I not saie as your writing containeth. I desire to send him my reasons for to aduertise him of all the truth. And I beleue when he shall know it, that he will be vnto me as he hath bene.

The emperor somewhat to comfort the king of England's displeasure.

I neuer denied the monie which I borrowed of him, and I am ready to paie it as by reason & right I am bound: and thanked be God I haue enough to do it. Neuertheless, if he will make warre against me, it will be to my great displeasure, & I cannot but defend my selfe. I paie to God that he giue me no more occasion than I thinke I haue giuen vnto him. And to the rest, for that your writing is great, and the paper sheweth it selfe to be gentle, seeing that they haue written what they would, you shall giue me the writing, whereby more particularlie I maie answer in another paper, wherein shall be nothing but truth. This answer being made by his maiestie with his owne mouth vnto Guien king of armes, the said Guien took his cote of armes that he had on his left arme (as before is said) and put it on, and then Clarenceur king of armes of England said vnto his maiestie, not by writing, but by mouth, as followeth.

The English heralds message delivered by word of mouth.

Sir, the king my soueraine lord hath commanded me to say vnto you, that seeing the necessitie of peace in the christian religion, as well by reason of the inforcements manie yers past, begun by the great Turke enimie vnto our faith, which by force of armes hath taken awaie from the christians the cite and Ile of Rhodes, one of the principall bulwarks of christendome, and in Hungarie the fortress of Belgrad, and part of the countrie there, as also by heresies and new sects, of late risen in diuerse places of christendome; and likewise knowing the great warres being kindled in all parts, by meanes of which all christendome is in trouble, confusion, and marvellous diuision, and not long since by your people and ministers and souldiers in your armie, and vnder your captains the holie cite of Rome hath bene sacked and robbed, the person of our holie father the pope taken prisoner, and kept by your people, the cardinals likewise taken and put to ransom, the churches robbed, bishops, priests, and people of religion put to the sword, and so manie other euils, cruelties, and inhumane facts committed by your people, that the aire and the land are infected therewith.

The report of the heralds faithfull and profitable by Guen's answer, lib. 18.

And it is verie like, that God is verie greatly stirred and prouoked vnto ire. And to speake after the maner of men, if by amendment it be not pacified, innumerable euils and inconueniences shall happen vnto all christendome. And for that the rot and increase of the said warre, proceedeth of the contentions and debates betwene you, and the most christened king his good brother and perpetuall alie: to make an end of which debates, the king my soueraine lord hath sent his ambassadoys and others, vnto the most christened king his good brother, with whom he hath done so much, that for the loue that he hath borne him; he hath made vnto you so great offers, and so reasonable, that you cannot, nor ought reasonable to refuse them, as conditions and offers for his ranfome exceeding the ranfome accustomed of all kings. And if in this, the consideration of peace had not bene, an euill example might thereof grow for other kings and christened princes subiect vnto the like fortune.

The king of England is moved by French's reasonable

The herald which an argument vpon some heralds to make the emperor.

Of which offers and conditions he hath likewise aduertised you by his ambassadours, praised and be- sought you for the honour of God, and the wealth of all christendome, for the benefits and pleasures that he hath done vnto you diuerse waies; and that in time of your great need, that it would please you to accept the said offers, and make an end of the said warres, that haue so long endured. Likewise as a christened prince bound to the protection of the pope, and so apostolike, and consequently to the deliuerance of his holinesse (whom you cannot, nor ought to keepe prisoner without great offense) that you would restore his holinesse vnto a full and entier libertie. Also he hath oftentimes shewed by diuerse obligations, and other meanes, how you are indebted vnto him in diuerse great summes of monie, that he hath giuen and lent you in your necessitie, requiring you to make payment.

Of all which things you haue made no account from time to time, but deferred it, and held in suspence the ambassadours of the king my soueraigne, without hauing regard to Gods honour, and the necessitie of all christendome, and the reuerence that ye ought to haue vnto the holie seate and person of our holie father the pope, the vicar of God on earth, or vnto the pleasures that you haue receiued of him, or vnto your faith and promise that you so oftentimes haue made. And for this cause the king my said soueraigne, by honest reason and iustice constrained, by great and ripe deliberation of his counsell, hoping for a small conclusion, hath caused againe to be presented offers more large and to greater advantage than the others before, to put you in deuote, and to auoid and take awaie all occasion to deferre and dissimble to come to reason.

England
sheweth the emperor
how the king of England is pious in his offer of the offers made.

Which offers, and the augmenting of the same, haue bene made and made againe, with all demonstrations and honest reasons that haue bene possible. And in the end there hath bene made vnto you instance for the deliuerie of our holie father, whom you haue restrained: or caused to be restrained in place of deliuerie, which is very strange, & against the true estate & dutie of a christian prince. So that the king my soueraigne, & the most christian king his brother and perpetuall alie, can no longer indure it with their honours and dutie towards God and the church. And seeing you will not condescend to reason, nor accept the said offers being more than reasonable, nor satisfie the king my said soueraigne of the debts by you due, as you are bound, he hath concluded with the said most christened king his god brother & perpetuall alie, & other of his confederats, to doo his endeavour to constrain you by force & might of armes to deliuer our holie father, & likewise the children of France, whom you hold, in pateng you a reasonable ranfome, and to satisfie him of that you owe him.

tion of the king of England to the pope and the franch king.

Therefore the king my soueraigne lord, as a true and constant prince, willing to keepe inuolable his faith, which he hath promised vnto the said christian prince, and other his alies, and not willing to leaue the person of our said holie father the pope in captiuitie, as also will not the said christian king: they two doo summon you at this time for all, to accept these last offers, for the deliuerance of the said children of France, and for the wealth of an vniuersall peace, & to deliuer the person of our said holie father, & also to paie speedilie and without anie more delaie, the debts by you due vnto the king my soueraigne.

And if you refuse these small offers, and also to deliuer the person of our said holie father, and paie the said debts, as a good christian prince and lover of peace is bound to doo; the king my soueraigne, and the said christian king his god brother, not without great sorrow and displeasure, doo declare to be your enemies, and so hereafter doo hold and repute you for such one, denouncing vnto you warre by sea and land, and desiring you with all their forces.

intimated to the emperor
by the herald
of England.

10 Nevertheless, considering that there be diuerse of your subiects, and great quantitie of their goods in the realmes of England and France, and other lands & lordships of the said princes: likewise there be diuerse of the subiects of the kings of England and France; and of their goods in your kingdomes, countries, lands, and lordships, the which may re- 15 scue aswell of the one part as of the other, great and unrecoverable hurts and damages, if without aduertisements and monition they should be taken and deteined, the kings maiestie my soueraigne, and the most christian king of France his god brother be willing that libertie be giuen vnto your subiects being in their kingdomes, countries, and lordships, 20 for to retire and depart with all their goods and merchandize, within fourtie daies after this intimation, so that the like libertie and permission be in like sort granted to their subiects. To this defiance of the king at armes of England and the emperours maiestie did answer in these words.

The emperours answer to the English heralds oration.

I Doo vnderstand that which you haue declared, and I cannot thinke that if the king of England were thoughtlie aduertised of things as they haue passed, and of the reason to which I haue yielded, he would not saie that which you haue said, and therefore mine intention is to aduertise him. As to that which you spake of the pope, I was neuer consenting to his destruction, which was neuer done by my commandement: & I giue you to vnderstand, that he is deliuered, and I am sorie for the harmes that were done at the time when he was taken, of the which I take my selfe not to be in fault, as I haue told the king at armes of France, And as to the deliuerance of the French kings sons, where means haue bene made for their deliuerance, I haue bene readie to giue eare thereto, and the fault resteth not in me, for that the peace hath not bene concluded.

But now that you tell me that the king your mai- 50 ster will force me to deliuer them, I will answer thereto in other sort than hitherto I haue done, and I trust to keepe them in such wise, that by force I shall not need to deliuer them: for I am not accustomed to be forced in things which I doo. As to the debt which the king of England hath lent me, I haue neuer denied it, neither doo I denie it, but am readie to 60 paie it as right requireth, as I haue caused it to be declared vnto him, and I my selfe haue shewed no lesse to his ambassadours, and deliuered my saying by writing, and I cannot beleue, that for such things (which I refuse not to accomplish) he will make war against me, and if he will so doo it will grieue me, but yet I must defend my selfe: and I praise God that the king your maiester giue me not greater occasion to make him war, than I haue giuen him. You shall deliuer me in writing, that which you haue said, to the which I will answer by writing particularlie.

arme (as before is said) and put it upon him. The emperour herewith commanded him to deliver by writing into the hands of the lord of Buclans all that he had uttered by word of mouth, as is above expressed. Which Clarenceaur promised to do, so he did afterwards, signed with his owne hand, word for word. Clarenceaur having thus done his dutie, incontinentlie withdrew: but before his departure, the lord of Buclans said to him, and also to Guien, these words ensuing. Behold here this writing in my hand, containing the articles of the composition betwene the emperour and the pope.

Accord be-twene the pope & the emperours agents.

¶ That the pope should be no partie against the emperour, neither in the affaires of Millaine, nor in the kingdome of Naples. That he should accord unto the emperour the croisade in Spaine, and a tenth of the reuenues ecclesiastike through all his dominions. That to assure the obseruation of these things, Ostia should remaine in the hands of the emperour, and Civita Vecchia which Andrea Dore had left to him before. That he should assigne over to him Civita Castellana, a towne which had refused to receiue the imperials. Partio Perusquo procuror of the silke being entred within the rocke by secret commission from the pope, notwithstanding he made semblance of the contrarie. That he should also deliver over to him the rocke of Furlie, and to put into his hands for hostages Hypolito and Alexander his nephues, and till they were come from Parma the emperour to be possessed of the cardinals Pisani, Trivulco, and Caddi, whome they led to the realme of Naples.

Heauie payments for the pope to discharge.

Furthermore, that he should make present payment to the lanchknights of three score thousand ducates, and to the Spaniards thirtie & five thousand. That in so doing they should let him come out at libertie with all the cardinals, and they to go out of Rome and out of the castell, alwaies interpreting to libertie when soeuer they should be conueied in safetie to Vmbetio, Spoletto, or Peroufa. That within fiftene daies after his going out of Rome he should paie the like quantitie of monie to the lanceknights, and afterwards the residue within thre moneths to the Spaniards & lanceknights sountlie, according to their shares and portions. Which residue together with the summes paid, amounted to more than three hundred and fiftie thousand ducats.

the popes going out of prison.

This is the true copie (said the lord of Buclans) of the capitulation, made touching the deliuerance of the pope, and how he is deliuered, and departed from castell saint Angelo, the tenth of December last past: put it in your relation. The said king of armes answered; We will so do: and so for that time they parted. ¶ Here, because mention is made of the popes deliuerance out of prison, it shall not be amisse to set downe the manner thereof as it is reported by Guicciardine. All things hauing their orderlie expedition, & the resolution set downe, that the tenth of December the Spaniards should accompanie him into a place of libertie, he fearing some variation either for the ill mind which he kinedon Hugo bare to him, or for anie other accident that might happen, the night before he stole secretly out of the castell in the closing of the euening, disguised in the attire of a merchant. Lewis de Consaguo who was in the paie of the emperour, taried for him in the meadows with a strong companie of harquebuziers, and with that gard did accompanie him to Montfalcon, where dismissing almost all his bands of footmen, he was led by the same Lewis euen to Vmbetio, into which citie he entred by night without the companie of anie one cardinal. An example worthy of consideration, and perhaps neuer happened since the church was great, that a pope should in that sort fall from so great a puissance and reuerence, his eyes to behold the losse and sacke of Rome, his person to be turned over into captiuitie, and his whole estate reduced to the disposing of an other, and within few months after, to be restored & established in his former greatnesse. So great towards princes christian is the authoritie of the pope, and the respect which mortal men doe beare to him.

At the same instant that the heralds were at the emperours court, the emperour called before him the said Guien king of armes of France, and said to him as followeth. It is reason that you enjoy your priuileges, you ought also to do your dutie; and therefore I praye you to beare to your master, you euen to his owne person the which I shall tell you, which is this: that since the estate of Spayn, contrarie to the same, diuells of my subjects haue bene taken going about the ite bishoppes, and other also going to serue me in Italie; which haue bene detained prisoners, euill intreated, and by force thrust into the gallies; and because I haue of his subjects the which I might likewise take, ye shall aduertise him, that if he deliuer unto me mine, I will deliuer his; if not, as he shall intreat mine, I will intreat his; and that he send me answer hereof within fortie daies: if not, I will take the refusal for an answer.

herald.

The king of armes Guien asked if his maiestie ment this concerning the merchants: wherunto the emperour answered; This is beside that which is contained in your writing, touching the merchants, to which point (said he) I will answer by writing. And herewith Guien making thre obeisances, said; Sir, I will gladly do it. Thewas the emperour. Tell the king your master further, that I beleue that he hath not bene aduertised of that which I told to his ambassador in Granada; which toucheth him nere. For I told him in such a case so noble a prince, that if he had vnderstood the same, he would haue made me an answer. He shall do well to know it of his ambassador, for by that he shall vnderstand, that I haue kept better faith to him in that I haue promised at Madrid than he to me, and I praye you so tell him, and saile not hereof. Guien answered, Without doubt sir I will do it: and so making his obeisance he departed.

his owne

word of compensation

The emperour appointed John le Alemant the baron of Buclans to see that no displeasure nor will speech were vsed to the said kings of armes, but that they should be well vsed: which was done to their good contentation. After this, the seauen and twentieth of Januarie, the said kings of armes came to the said lord of Buclans, who by the emperours appointment deliuered an answer vnto either of them in writing, accordingly as the emperour had promised, the copies whereof are set forth at large in the annales of Aquitaine, and for breuenesse here omitted. To conclude, the French king took such displeasure with the emperours answers made vnto his king of armes Guien, whereby he was charged to do otherwise than by his faith giuen he ought to haue done, that the eight and twentieth daie of March being in the citie of Paris, accompanied with a great number of the princes of his blood, cardinals and other prelates and nobles of his realme, and also the ambassadors of diuerse princes and potentates, he called before him Nicholas Perenot lord of Granuelle, vnto whom he said in effect as followeth.

The French kings oration before an honourable assemblée at Paris.

¶ Lords ambassadors, it hath græued me, and doth græue me, that I haue bene constrained to handle you not so courteously and grationously as for the god and honourable behaviour, which you haue shewed in doing your dutie being here with me, you haue deserved at my hands, sith I must needs saie, ye haue acquit your selfe in euerie behalfe, as well to the honor of your maister, as good contentation of each man else, so that I am assured the fault resteth not in you, whiche things haue not come to better end and purpose than they haue done, for the good zeale and affection, which I haue euer proued in you to the advancement of peace and quieting of things, wherein I doubt not but you haue done your dutie to the full.

But being informed that your maister the elect emperor, against all right and law, as well diuine as humane, had commanded to be done vnto my ambassadors, and likewise to the other of the league remaining with him, for the furtherance of things toward a peace, and contrarie to all good customs, which hitherto haue bene obserued betwixt princes, not onelie christians, but also infidels, me thought I could not otherwise do, for the behoofe of mine owne ambassadors, arrested and against reason kept in ward, but to do the same to you, although I had no mind to vse you euill, for the reasons aboue said, for the which, and for the dutie you haue shewed in doing that appertained, I assure you my lord ambassador, that beside that I doubt not but your maister will recompense you for the same, ye may be assured that where particularlie in anie thing I may please you, I will do it with as good a will as you can require me.

And to make answer to that which your maister by word of mouth hath said vnto Guien and Clarenceur kings of armes of the king my good brother and perpetuall and best alie, and of me vpon the intimation of the warre which hath bene made by vs, consisting in eight points, I will that each one vnderstand it. First, as to the which he saith he maruelleth that he hauing me a prisoner by iust warre, and hauing also my faith, I should desie him, and that in reason I neither may nor ought to do it: I answer thereto, that if I were his prisoner here, and that he had my faith, he had spoken true: but I know not that the emperor hath euer at anie time had my faith, that may in anie wise auail him. For first in that warre so euer I haue bene, I know not that I haue either scene him or encountered with him.

When I was prisoner, garded with foure or five hundred harquebuzers, sick in my bed, and in danger of death, it was an easie matter to constrain me, but not verie honorable to him that should do it: and after that I returned into France, I know not anie that hath had power to compell me to it: and to do it willingly without constraint, it is a thing which I waie more, than so lightlie to bind my selfe thereto. And because I will not that my honor come in disputation, although I know well that euerie man of warre knoweth sufficientlie, that a prisoner garded is not bound to anie faith, nor can bind himselfe thereto in anie thing: I do neuertheless send to your maister this writing signed with mine owne hand, the which my lord ambassador I praise you read, and afterwards promise me to deliuer it vnto your maister, and not to anie other. And herewith the king caused it to be deliuered to the said ambassador by master John Robertet, one of the secretaries of the estate, and of his chamber.

The ambassador toke the writing in his hand, and after excused himselfe to the king, saieing: That as to him, by the letter which his maister & soueraigne lord had written vnto him now lastlie, his commission was already expired, and that he had no farther commendement nor instructions from his maiestie, but to take leaue of the king with as much speed as he might, and to returne home. Which he most humblie besought him to permit him to do, without further charge or commission, although he knew that he was at his pleasure constrain him, as seemed to him good. Herevnto the king answered; My lord ambassador, sith you will not take vpon you to read this writing, I will cause it to be read in this companie, to the end that euerie one may vnderstand and know that I am cleared in that, whereof against truth he goeth about to accuse me.

Beside that, if you afterwards will not beare it, & deliuer it to him, I will send one of my heralds here present to go in companie with you: for whom you shall procure a good & available safe conduct, that he may passe vnto your maister, protesting & demanding, that an act maie be registred before this companie, that if he will not it should come to his knowledge, that I am discharged, in that I do my best to cause him to vnderstand it accordinglie as I ought to do, and in such sort as he can not pretend cause of ignorance. After the king had ended these words, he called to him the said Robertet, and commanded him to reade the said writing with a loud voice, which was done word for word.

The copie of the said writing directed to the emperor.

MC Francis, by the grace of God, king of France, lord of Genes, &c. To you Charles, by the same grace, chosen emperour of Rome, and king of Spaine. We do you to wit, that being aduertised, that in all the answers that you haue made to our ambassadors and heralds, sent to you for the establishing of peace, in excusing your selfe, without all reason you haue accused vs, saieing, that we haue plight you our faith, and that thereupon (besides our promise) we departed out of your hands and power. In defense of our honour, which hereby might be burthened too much against all truth, we thought good to send you this writing; by which we giue you to vnderstand, that notwithstanding that no man being in ward is bound to keepe faith, and that the same might be a sufficient excuse for vs: yet for the satisfieng of all men, and our said honor (which we mind to keepe, and will keepe, if it please God, vnto the death) that if ye haue charged, or will charge vs, not onelie with our said faith, and deliuerance, but that euer we did anie thing that became not a gentleman that had respect to his honor; that ye lie fallie in your throat: and as oft as ye saie it, ye lie: and we determine to defend our honor to the uttermost drop of our blood. Wherefore, seeing ye haue charged vs against all truth, write no more to vs hereafter: but appoint vs the field, and we will bring you the weapons. Protesting, that if after this declaration ye write into anie place, or vse anie words against our honor, that the shame of the delaie of the combat shall light on you, seeing that the offering of combat is the end of all writing. Made at our good towne and citie of Paris, the eight and twentieth daie of March.

The French king deliuereth his mind with a courage, as better enemy to the emperor.

March. In the yere of our Lord, one thousand five hundred twentie and eight, before Easter. Thus signed. Francis.

This Robertet was one of the secretaries to the estate.

After that Robertet had read this writing there in presence of the emperours ambassadors, the king made further replie unto the points contained in the emperours answers to the defiance: and withall to conclude, told the said ambassador, that his master the emperor had constrained him by such mesage as he had sent to him, to make the answer in truth, which he had made: and further willed him to deliver unto the emperor the writing which he had signed with his hand, and to saie to him, that he took him for so honorable a prince, that considering the matter wherewith he charged him, and the answer that he made, he would not faile but to answer him like a gentleman, and not by writing like an advocate. For if he otherwise do (said the king) I will answer his chancelor by an advocate, and a man of his estate, and a more honest man than he.

Shortlie after, the emperours ambassadors returned home into Spaine in safetie, and well intreated. And upon their returne, the ambassadors of France were set at libertie, and delivered beyond Frontierie, & so came safelie home into France. Then a French herald, appointed to accompanie the ambassador Crandeuill, brought the writing of the combat unto the emperor, because Crandeuill refused to medle with it. To the which the emperor five months after, or thereabouts, sent an answer by one of his heralds; who being arrived at Paris, meant upon the sudden to present his letters unto the French king. But the king getting intelligence thereof, the tenth of September, sitting within his great hall of his palace at Paris aforesaid, before the table of marble in a roiall seat, adressed and set up for him sixtene steps in height, appointed to give audience to the said herald.

What states both native and foreign were present in the French kings hall.

On his right hand sate in chaires the king of Navarre, the duke of Alanson and Berry, the earle of Foix and Arminacke. And on the same side sate also upon a bench, the duke of Vandosme a pere of France, lieutenant generall, and gouernor of Picardie, don Hercules de Est, eldest sonne to the duke of Ferrar, duke of Chartres and Montargues, who latelie before had married the ladie Kener, a daughter of France, the duke of Albanie regent and gouernor of Scotland, the duke of Longueuille, great chamberleine of France. And nere to them upon another bench sate the presidents and counsellors of the court of parlement, and behind them manie gentlemen, doctors, and learned men. On the left hand were set in chaires prepared for them, the cardinall Saluarie the popes legat, the cardinall of Bourbon, and duke of Laon, a pere of France, the cardinall of Sens chancelor of France, the cardinall of Lorain, the archbishop of Parbon, the ambassadors of the kings of England and Scotland, of the segniorie of Venice, of Spillan, of the Cantons, of the Swisses, and of Florence.

On an other bench sate the bishop of Transilvania, ambassador for the king of Hungarie, the bishop and duke of Angres, one of the peres of France, the bishop & earle of Poion, an other of the peres of France, the archbishop of Lion, primate of all France, the archbishop of Bourges primate of Aquitaine, the archbishops of Aux and Rouen, the bishops of Paris, Meaur, Lizeur, Pascon, Limoges, Abbees, Conferans and Cerbe. And behind them sate the masters of the requests, and the counsellors of the great councill. On either side the kings seate stood the earle of Beaumont great master and marshall of France, the lord de Biron admirall of France lieutenant generall, and gouernor of Burgognie. And behind the same seat were manie knights of the order, that is to wit, the earle of Lauall, lieutenant generall and gouernor of Britaine, the lord of Pontmerancie, the lord Daubignie capteine of an hundred lances, and of the Scottish garr, the earle of Biennie, Lignie, and Rouille, the lord of Fleurang, ges marshall of France, the lord of Kuffoie, the lord of Genouillac great esquier and master of the artillerie of France, Lois monsieur de Clenes, the lord of Humiers, and the earle of Carpie.

Behind them was the earle of Estamps prouost of Paris, and with him manie gentlemen of the kings chamber: among the which was the earle of Lancaruil, the lord of Cuien, the son of the earle of Rouille, the son of the lord of Fleurang, the lord de la Rochepot, the lord Donartie great master of the waters and forrests, the lord of Lude, the lord of Janlis, the lord de Villebon, bailie of Rouen, the baron of Chateau Potant, the lord de la Loue, the viscount de la Potheaugroing, and the lord of Cleres. And besides these, the masters and officers of the household & gentlemen waiters, with the more part of the two hundred gentlemen or pensioners, as we terme them. At the entrie into the said thron or tribunall seat, were the capteins of the gards, and the prouost of the household. And before the king kneled the others of the chamber upon the one knee: and at the foot of the step that went up to the kings seate were the prouosts of the merchants and eschewins of the towne of Paris. Beneath in the hall (the gates wherof were still open) there was an infinite number of people of all nations: and in presence of them all, the king made this declaration.

The cause wherefore I haue made this assemblee, is, for that the emperor elect hath sent to me an herald of armes, who (as I coniecture, and as the same herald hath said, and as his face conduct importeth) hath brought me letters, patents and autentike, concerning the suertie of the field for the combat that should be betwixt the said elected emperor and me. And forasmuch as the said herald, under colour to bring the suertie of the field, may vse certaine fictions, dissimulations, or hypocrites, to thift off the matter, whereas I desire expedition, and to haue it dispatched out of hand; so that by the same an end of the warres, which haue so long continued, may be had, to the ease and comfort of all christendome, to auoid the effusion of blood, and other mischeces which come thereof: I haue wished it knowne to all christendome, to the end that euerie one may vnderstand the truth, from whence procedeth the mischefe and the long continuance thereof.

I haue also caused this assemblee to be made, to shew that I haue not without great cause enterprised such an act; for the right is on my side: and if I should otherwise haue done, mine honor had bene greatlie blemished. A thing which my lords that are of my blood, and other my subiects would haue taken in euill part. And knowing the cause of the combat, and my right, they will beare with it, as god and loiall subiects ought to do, trusting by Gods helpe to proceed in such sort therein, that it shall plainlie appere if the right be on my side or not: and how, against truth, I haue bene accused for a breaker of my faith, which I would be loth to do, nor at anie time haue meant so to do. The kings my predecessors and ancestors, whose pictures are ingrauen and set here in order within this hall, which in their daies haue successinellie adjoined glorious acts, and greatlie augmented the realme of France, would thinke me unworthie, and not capable to be their successor, if against mine honor I should suffer my selfe to be charged with such a note by the emperor, and should not defend my person and hono<sup>r</sup> in the manner and forme accustomed.

And herewith he declared the whole case as it stood. First, how being taken at Pavia by fortune of war, he neuer gaue his faith to anie of his enemies, & consenting to be led into Spaine, caused his owne galleies to be made readie to conueie him thither, where at his arrivall, he was committed to ward within the castell of Madrid, guarded with a great number of barquebuziers & others. Which uncourteous dealing found in the emperor, so much grieved him, that he fell sicke, and laie in danger of death. Whereupon the emperor comming to visit him after his recovery of health, an accord was made betwixt the deputies of the emperor and the ambassadours of the ladie his mother then regent of France: which accord was so unreasonable, that no prince being in libertie would haue consented thereto, nor so; his deliverance haue promised so great a rancome. Which trettie yet they constrained him (as he said) to sweare to performe, being prisoner, against the protestation which he diuerse times had made, yea as yet being sicke, and in danger of reciduation; and so consentie of death.

After this, he was conueied forth on his iourneie homewards, still guarded & not set at libertie. And it was told him, that after he came into France, it was convenient that he should giue his faith; for that it was knowne well enough, that what he did or promised in Spaine, it nothing availed. And further he remembred not that the emperor had told him at anie time, that if he performed not the contents of the treatie, he would hold him for a breaker of his faith, & though he had, he was not in his libertie to make anie answer. Two things therefore said he, in this case are to be considered. One, that the treatie was violentlie w<sup>o</sup>ng out from them that could not bind his person, and the which (as to the residue) had bene accomplished by his mother, deliuering his sonnes in hollage. The other thing was his pretended faith, on which they can make no ground, sith he was not set at libertie. And herewith he shewed manie reasons, to proue that his enemies could not pretend in right that they had his faith.

Further he said, that in matter of combat there was the assailant, which ought to giue suertie of the field, and the defendant the weapons. Herewith also he caused a letter to be read, which the emperor had written to master John de Caluimont president of Bourdeaux, the said kings ambassadour in the court of the said emperor: the tenor of which letter imposed, that the emperor put the said ambassadour in remembrance of speech which he had uttered to the said ambassadour in Granada, repeating the same in substance as followeth. That the king his master had done naughtie in not keeping his faith which he had of him, according to the treatie of Madrid: and if the king would saie the contrarie, I will (said the emperor) mainteine the quarrell with my bodie against his. And these be the same words that I spake to the king your master in Madrid, that I would hold him for a lewd and naughtie man, if he brake the faith which I had of him, &c.

Then after the said letter had bene read, he caused also his answer made by way of a cartell to be read, the tenor whereof ye haue heard before. That done, he continued his tale, in declaring what order he had obserued to procure the emperor to the combat, without all shifting delays: so as if the herald now come from the emperor would vse anie talke, other than to deliuer him an authentike writing for suertie of the field, and not obserue the contents of his safe conduct, he meant not to giue him audience. And herewith was the herald called to come in, and declare his message. Who apparelled in his cote of armes, made his appearance before the king there sitting, accompanied (as ye haue heard.) Unto whom the king said,

Herald, dost thou bring the suertie of the field, such one as thy master, being the assailant, ought to deliuer unto the defendant, being such a personage as I am? The herald herewith said: Sir, make it please you to giue me licence to doe mine office. Then said the king: Giue me the p<sup>a</sup>tent of the field, and saie what thou wilt. The herald beginning his tale, The sacred. Tush (said the king) shew me the p<sup>a</sup>tent of the field, for I hold thy master for so noble a prince, that he hath not sent thee without the suertie of the field, sith I haue demanded it; and thou knowest that thy safe conduct containeth no lesse but that thou shouldst bring it. The herald answered, that he trusted he had brought that which might content his maiestie.

The king replied & said: Herald, giue me the p<sup>a</sup>tent of the field, giue it me: and if it be sufficient, I will receiue it, and after saie what thou wilt. The herald said he had in commandement not to deliuer it, except he might declare that which he had first to saie. The king said: Thy master can not giue lawes to vs in France. To conclude he told the herald, that he peradventure might speake things that his master would not anouch, and that he had not to deale with him, but with his master. The herald then required that he might haue licence to depart: which the king granted. And withall the king commanded that it might be registred what had passed in this behalfe, for a testimonie that the fault rested not in him in that he receiued not the p<sup>a</sup>tent. The herald likewise for his discharge, required a copie in writing of that which had passed, and the same was granted.

Thus far haue I ouerpast the common bounds of my purpose, in speaking so largelie of this matter of combat, because of the raretie thereof, changing betwixt two so mightie princes, although it came not to the effect of trial. And now to returne to that which followed further vpon the defiance, denounced to the emperor by the two kings of armes, G<sup>o</sup>uten and Clarenceaur. Ye shall vnderstand, that the lords and nobilitie, to the number of seuen hundred in whose presence it was giuen, toke it so offensive, that drawing forth their swords, they swore that the same should be reuenged: for other wise they protested, that the infamie would rebound to them and their heires for ever. Herewith the warre was proclaimed through all Spaine with banners displayed, in which were painted a red sword, with a burning crescent against the French king and his partakers, but not mentioning the king of England by expresse name. But it was recited in the proclamation, that the king of England had menaced and defied the emperor in the French kings quarrell.

Then were the English merchants in Spaine attached, and their goods put in safetie, till it might be knowne how the emperours subiects were ordered in England. Then likewise were all the ships of the emperours subiects here arrested: and in semblable maner all the Englishmen and their goods and ships were arrested by the ladie regent in the low countries. The common people in England much lamented, that warre should arise betwene the emperor and the king of England, speciallie because the emperours dominions had holpen and releued them with graine in time of their necessitie & want. But cheselie this matter touched merchants which hanted the emperours dominions. Yet at length were those of the low countries set at libertie, and their goods to them deliuered, in fauour of intercou<sup>r</sup>se of merchandize. But so much as the Spaniards were still detained, the ladie regent also detained the ships and goods of the English merchants though she let their persons at libertie.

The incōmoditie rising of lacke of interest course for transicke.

By this meanes the trade of merchandize was in manner fore-let here in England, and namelie the clothes laie on their hands, whereby the common-wealth suffered great decaye, and great numbers of spinners, carders, tuckers, and such other that lived by clothworking, remained idle, to their great impoverishment. And as this warre was displeasing to the Englishmen, so was it as much or more displeasing to the townes and people of the low countries, & in especiall to the townes of Antuerpe & Barrolo, where the marts are kept. So that at length there came ambassadours from the ladie regent, the which associating themselves with don Hugo de Mendoza ambassadour for the emperour, came to the king at Richmond the twentieth and ninth of March, and there moued their sute so effectualle, that an abstinence of warre was granted, till time that a further communication might be had: and vpon this point letters were sent into Spaine, France, and Flanders, and so this matter continued untill answers were brought from thence againe.

An abstinence of warre granted vpon sute made to the king of England.

The emperours ambassadours intreated not so earnestlie to moue the king to haue peace with their maister, but the French ambassadours solicited the king as earnestlie to enter into the warre against him, and suerlie they had the cardinall on their side. But yet the king wiselie considering with other of his counsell, what damage should inue therby vnto his subiects, and speciallie to the merchants and clothiers, would not consent so easilie to the purpose of the Frenchmen, though he had twentie thousand pounds sterling out of France, of pearlie pension, to continue friend & alie to the French king. But he protested euer that he would see the reline of France defended to his power, and studie no lesse to haue a peace concluded, which might be as honourable to the French king as to himselfe, and beneficiall vnto their people, of whose by warres, might be made both slaughter and bloodshed, which are companions vnseparable of battell; as the poet well saith:

Creation of the earle of Muerie.

Sir Edmund Wallingham.

A truce and the benefits ensuing from the same.

The sweating sicknesse, whereof died both courtiers and others.

On the two and twentieth of Februarie the king created at Windsor sir Piers Butler of Ireland; erle of Muerie. Also a Dutch craite of Armev chased a French craite vpon the Thames from Margate to the Tower wharfe, and there as they fought sir Edmund Wallingham lieutenant of the Tower persequing them, called his men together, and entering the ships took both the captiues. The kings counsell took vpon the matter betwixt them, for the Fleming challenged the Frenchman as a lawfull prize. An abstinence of the warre was taken in the beginning of this yeare betwixt Flanders, and the countries of Picardie on this side the riuer of Some to begin the first of Maie & indure till the last of Februarie. By means of this truce all the Englishmen might lawfullie passe into the low countries, but not into Spaine: which soe græued the merchants that haunted those parties. It was further agreed, that if no generall peace could be had, during the time of this truce: then all the merchants should haue respite two moneths after to passe into their owne countries with their wares and merchandizes in safetie.

In the end of Maie began in the citie of London the disease called the sweating sicknesse, which afterwards infected all places of the realme, and durie manie within five or six houres after they sickened. This sicknesse, for the maner of the taking of the patients, was an occasion of remembering that great sweat which raged in the reign of this kings grandfather; and happilie men caused the same remedie then used to be renewed. By reason of this sicknesse, the tearme was adourned, and the circuit of the assises also. There died diuerse in the court of this sicknesse, as sir Francis Poins, which had bene ambassadour in Spaine, and diuerse others. The king for a space remoued almost euerie daie till he came to Tintinhargar, a place of the abbat of saint Albons, and there he with the quene, and a small compaignie about them, remained till the sicknesse was past. In this great mortalitie died sir William Compton knight, and William Carew clquier, which were of the kings private chamber.

A prisoner brake from the sessions hall at Newgate when the sessions was done, which prisoner was brought downe out of Newgate in a basket, he seemed so weake: but now in the end of the sessions he brake through the people vnto the Greie friers church, and there was kept sir or seauen daies per the thiriffes could speake with him, and then because he would not abjure and aske a crowner, with violence they took him thence, and cast him againe in prison, but the law serued not to hang him.]

He heane heard how the people talked a little before the cardinals going ouer into France the last yeare, that the king was told by doctor Longland bishop of Lincolne and others, that his marriage with quene Katharine could not be good nor lawfull. The truth is, that whether this doubt was first moued by the cardinall, or by the said Longland, being the kings confessor, the king was not onelie brought in doubt, whether it was a lawfull marriage or no; but also determined to haue the case examined, cleared, and adiudged by learning, law, and sufficient authoritie. The cardinall berelie was put in most blame for this scruple now cast into the kings conscience, for the hate he bare to the emperour, because he would not grant to him the archbishoppe of Toledo, for the which he was a suitor. And therefore he did not onlie procure the king of England to loine in friendship with the French king, but also sought a diuorfe betwixt the king and the quene, that the king might haue had in marriage the duchesse of Alanson, sister vnto the French king: and (as some haue thought) he trauelled in that matter with the French king at Antiens, but the duchesse would not giue eare thereto.

But howsoeuer it came about, that the king was thus troubled in conscience concerning his marriage, this followed, that like a wise & sage prince, to haue the doubt cleared, he called together the best learned of the realme, which were of seuerall opinions. Wherefore he thought to know the truth by indifferent iudges, least peradventure the Spaniards, and other also in fauour of the quene would saie, that his owne subiects were not indifferent iudges in this behalfe. And therefore he wrote his cause to Rome, and also sent to all the vniuersities in Italie and France, and to the great clearkes of all Christendome, to know their opinions, and desired the court of Rome to send into his realme a legat, which should be indifferent, and of a great and profound iudgement, to heare the cause debated. At whose request the whole consistorie of the college of Rome sent thither Laurence Campeius, a priest cardinall, a man of great wit and experience, which was sent hither before in the tenth yeare of this king, as ye haue heard, and with him was ioined in commission the cardinall of Porke and legat of England.

This cardinall came to London in October, and did intimate both to the king & quene the cause of his coming: which being knowne, great talke was had thereof. The archbishop of Cantuarie sent for the famous doctors of both the vniuersities to Lambeth, both, and there were euerie daie disputations and conuinings of this matter. And because the king meant nothing but vprightlie therein, and knew well that the quene was somewhat wedded to his owne opinion, and wished that she should do nothing without counsell, he had hir chose the best clearks of his realme to be of hir counsell, and licenced them to do the best on hir part that they could, according to the truth. Then the elected William Warham archbishop of Canturburie, and Nicholas West bishop of Ely, doctors of the lawes; and John Fisher bishop of Rochester, and Henrie Standish bishop of saint Asaph, doctors of diuinitie, and manie other doctors and well learned men, which for suertie like men of great learning defended hir cause, as farre as learning might mainteine and hold it vp.

This yeare was sir James Spenser maior of London, in whose time the watch in London on the summer night was laid downe. About this time the king receiued into fauour doctor Stephan Gardiner, whose seruice he used in matters of great secretie and weight, admitting him in the roome of doctor Pace, the which being continuallie abroad in ambassages, and the same oftentimes not much necessary, by the cardinals appointment, at length he took such græfe therewith, that he fell out of his right wits. The place where the cardinals should sit to heare the cause of matrimonie betwixt the king and the quene, was ordeined to be at the Blacke friers in London, where in the great hall was preparation made of seats, tables, and other furniture, according to such a solemne session and totall apparance. The court was platted in tables and benches in manner of a consistorie, one seat raised higher for the iudges to sit in. When as it were in the midst of the said iudges aloft above them three degrees high, was a cloth of estate hanged, with a chaire roiall vnder the same, wherein sat the king; and besides him, some distance from him sat the quene, and vnder the iudges sat the scribes and other officers: the chiefe scribe was doctor Stæuens, and the caller of the court was one Cooke of Winchester.

Then before the king and the iudges within the court sat the archbishop of Canturburie Warham, and all the other bishops. Then stood at both ends within the counsellors learned in the spirituall lawes, as well the kings as the quenes. The doctors of law for the king (whose names yee haue heard before) had their conuenient rowes. Thus was the court furnished. The iudges commanded silence whilst their commission was read, both to the court and to the people assembled. That done the scribes commanded the crier to call the king by the name of king Henrie of England, come into the court, &c. With that the king answered and said, Here. Then called he the quene by the name of Katharine quene of England come into the court, &c. Who made no answer, but rose out of hir chaire.

And because she could not come to the king directly, for the distance leuened betwixt them, she went about by the court, and came to the king, kneeling downe at his feet, to whom she said in effect as followeth: Sir (quoth she) I desire you to doe me iustice and right, and take some pittie vpon me, for I am a poore woman, and a stranger, borne out of your dominion, hauing here no indifferent counsell, & lesse assurance of friendship. Alas sir, what haue I offended you, or what occasion of displeasure haue I shewed you, intending thus to put me from you after this sort: I take God to my iudge, I haue bene to you a true & humble wife, euer conformable to your will and pleasure, that neuer contraried or gaine said any thing thereof, and being alwaies contented with all things wherein you had any delight, whether little or much, without grudge or displeasure, I toued for your sake all them whom you loued, whether they were my friends or enimies.

I haue bene your wife these thentie yeares and more, & you haue had by me diuerse children. If there be anie iust cause that you can alleage against me, either of dishonestie, or matter lawfull to put me from you: I am content to depart to my shame and rebuke; and if there be none, then I praye you to let me haue iustice at your hand. The king your father was in his time of excellent wit, and the king of Spaine my father Ferdinando was reckoned one of the wisest princes that reigned in Spaine manie yeares before. It is not to be doubted, but that they had gathered as wise counsellors vnto them of euerie realme, as to their wisdoms they thought meet, who deemed the marriage betwixt you and me good and lawfull, &c. Therefore, I humbly desire you to spare me, vntill I may know what counsell my friends in Spaine will aduertise me to take, and if you will not, then your pleasure be fulfilled. With that she arose vp, making a lowe curtisie to the king, and departed from thence.

The king being aduertised that she was ready to go out of the house, commanded the crier to call hir againe, who called hir by these words: Katharine quene of England, come into the court. With that (quoth maister Grifith) Madame, you be called againe. On on (quoth she) it maketh no matter, I will not tarrie, go on your waies. And thus she departed, without anie further answer at that time, or anie other, and neuer would appeare after in anie court. The king perceluting she was departed, said these words in effect: For as much (quoth he) as the quene is gone, I will in hir absence declare to you all, that she hath bene to me as true, as obedient, and as conformable a wife, as I would wish or desire. She hath all the vertuous qualities that ought to be in a woman of hir dignitie, or in anie other of a baser estate, she is also surelie a noble woman boyme, hir conditions will well declare the same.

With that quoth Wolsey the cardinall: Sir, I most humbly require your highnesse, to declare before all this audience, whether I haue bene the chiefe and first mouer of this matter vnto your maiestie or no, for I am greatlie suspected herein. My lord cardinall (quoth the king) I can well excuse you in this matter, marrie (quoth he) you haue bene rather against me in the tempting hereof, than a setter forward or mouer of the same. The speciall cause that moued me vnto this matter, was a certaine scrupulousitie that picked my conscience, vpon certeine words spoken at a time when it was, by the bishop of Baion the French ambassador, who had bene hither sent, vpon the debating of a marriage to be concluded betwixt our daughter the ladie Marie, and the duke of Orleans, second son to the king of France.

Vpon the resolution and determination thereof, he desired respite to aduertise the king his maister thereof, whether our daughter Marie should be legitimate in respect of this my marriage with this woman, being sometimes my brothers wife. Which words once concluded within the secret bottome of my conscience, ingendered such a scrupulous doubt, that my conscience was incontinentlie accombered, bered, and disquieted; whereby I thought my selfe to be greatlie in danger of Gods indignation. Which appeared to be (as me seemed) the rather, for that he sent vs no issue male: and all such issues male as my said wife had by me, died incontinent after they came into the world, so that I doubted the great displeasure of God in that behalfe.

Thus my conscience being tossed in the waues of a scrupulous mind, and partlie in despair to haue anie other issue than I had alredie by this ladie now my wife, it becomed me further to consider the state of this realme, and the danger it stood in for lacke of a prince to succeed me, I thought it good in release of the weightie burthen of my weake conscience, & also the quiet estate of this worthe realme, to attempt the law therein, whether I may lawfullie take another wife more lawfullie, by whome God may send me more issue, in case this my first copulation was not good, without anie carnall concupiscence, and not for anie displeasure or mistaking of the queenes person and age, with whome I would be as well contented to continue, if our marriage may stand with the lawes of God, as with anie woman alivie.

In this point consisteth all this doubt that we go about now to trie, by the learning, wisdome, and iudgement of you our prelates and pastors of all this our realme and dominions now here assembled for that purpose; to whose conscience & learning I haue committed the charge and iudgement: according to the which I will (God willing) be right well content to submit my selfe, and for my part obeie the same. Wherein, after that I perceiued my conscience so doubtful, I moued it in confession to you my lord of Lincoln then ghostlie father. And for so much as then you your selfe were in some doubt, you moued me to aske the counsell of all these my lords: whereupon I moued you my lord of Canturburie, first to haue your licence, in as much as you were metropolitane, to put this matter in question, and so I did of all you my lords: to which you granted vnder your seales, here to be shewed. That is truth, quoth the archbishop of Canturburie. After that the king rose vp, and the court was adioyned untill another daie.

Here is to be noted, that the queene in presence of the whole court most graue and iustly accused the cardinal of vntruth, deceit, wickednesse, & malice, which had sowne dissention betwixt hir and the king hir husband; and therefore openlie protested, that she did bitterlie abhorre, refuse, and forsaue such a iudge, as was not onelie a most malicious enemy to hir, but also a manifest aduersarie to all right and iustice, and therewith did she appeale vnto the pope, committing hir whole cause to be iudged of him. But notwithstanding this appeale, the legats sat weekelie, and euerie daie were arguments brought in on both parts, and proses alleged for the vnderstanding of the case, and still they assaied if they could by anie means procure the queene to call backe hir appeale, which she bitterlie refused to do. The king would gladly haue had an end in the matter, but when the legats draue time, and determined vpon no certeine point, he conceiued a suspicion, that this was done of purpose, that their doings might draue to none effect or conclusion.

The next court daie, the cardinals sat againe, at which time the counsell on both sides were there ready to answer. The kings counsell alleged the matrimontie not to be lawfull at the beginning, because of the carnall copulation had betwixt prince Arthur and the queene. This matter was verie vehementlie touched on that side, and to proue it, they alleged manie reasons and similitudes of truth: and being answered negatiuelie againe on the other side, it seemed that all their former allegations were doubtful to be tried, and that no man knew the truth. And thus this court passed from sessions to sessions, and daie to daie, till at certeine of their sessions the king sent the two cardinals to the queene (who was then in Windsor) to perswade with hir by their wisdoms, and to aduise hir to surrender the whole matter into the kings hands by hir owne consent & will, which should be much better to hir honour, than to stand to the trial of law, and thereby to be condemned, which should seeme much to hir dishonour.

The cardinals being in the queenes chamber of presence, the gentleman vther aduertised the queene that the cardinals were come to speake with hir. With that she rose vp, & with a skene of white thred about hir necke, came into hir chamber of presence, where the cardinals were attending. At whose coming, quoth she, What is your pleasure with me? I sit please your grace (quoth cardinal Wolsey) to go in to your private chamber, we will shew you the cause of our coming. My lord (quoth she) if ye haue anie thing to saie, speake it openlie before all these folke, for I feare nothing that ye can saie against me, but that I would all the world should heare and see it, and therefore speake your mind. Then began the cardinal to speake to hir in Latine. Praise god my lord (quoth she) speake to me in English.

Forsooth (quoth the cardinal) god madame, if it please you, we come both to know your mind how you are disposed to do in this matter betwixt the king and you, and also to declare secretly our opinions and counsell vnto you: which we do onelie for verie zeale and obedience we beare vnto your grace. My lord (quoth she) I thanke you for your good will, but to make you answer in your request I cannot so suddenlie, for I was set among my maids at worke, thinking full litle of anie such matter, wherein there needeth a longer deliberation, and a better head than mine to make answer: for I need counsell in this case which toucheth me so nere, & for anie counsell or frendship that I can find in England, they are not for my profit. What thinke you my lords, will anie Englishman counsell me, or be friend to me against the kings pleasure that is his subiect? Praise forsooth. And as for my counsell in whom I will put my trust, they be not here, they be in Spaine in my owne countrie.

And my lords, I am a poore woman, lacking wit, to answer to anie such noble persons of wisdome as you be, in so weightie a matter, therefore I praise you be good to me poore woman, destitute of frends here in a forren region, and your counsell also I will be glad to heare. And therewith she toke the cardinal by the hand, and led him into hir private chamber with the other cardinal, where they tarried a season talking with the queene. Which communication ended, they departed to the king, making to him relation of hir talke. Thus this case went forward from court to court, till it came to iudgement, so that euerie man expected that iudgment would be giuen the next day. At which daie the king came thither, and set him downe in a chaire within a doore, in the end of the gallerie (which opened directlie against the iudgement seat) to heare the iudgement giuen, at which time all their proceedings were red in Latine.

That done, the kings counsell at the barre called for iudgement. With that (quoth cardinal Campeius) I will not giue iudgement till I haue made relation to the pope of all our proceedings, whose counsell and commandement in this case I will obserue: the case is verie doubtful, and also the partie defendant will make no answer here, but doth rather appeale from vs, supposing that we be not indifferent. Wherefore I will adioyne this court for this time, according to the order of the court of Rome. And with that the court was dissolved, and no more done. This protracting of the conclusion of the matter, king Henrie toke verie displeasinglie. Then cardinal Campeius took his leaue of the king and nobilitie, and returned towards Rome.

Whilist these things were thus in hand, the cardinal of Booke was aduised that the king had set his affection vpon a young gentlewoman named Anne, the daughter of sir Thomas Bullen, viscount Rochford, which did wait vpon the queene. This was a great great griefe into the cardinall, as he that perceiued aforehand, that the king would marie the said gen-tlewoman, if the diuorſe took place. Wherefore he began with all diligence to diſappoint that match, which by reaſon of the miſtaking that he had to the woman, he iudged ought to be avoided more than preſent death. While the matter ſtood in this ſtate, and that the cauſe of the queene was to be heard and iudged at Rome, by reaſon of the appeale which by hir was put in: the cardinall required the pope by letters and ſecret meſſengers, that in anie wiſe he ſhould defer the iudgement of the diuorſe, till he might frame the kings mind to his purpoſe.

Howbeit he went about nothing ſo ſecretlie, but that the ſame came to the kings knowledge, who tooke ſo high diſpleaſure with ſuch his cloaked diſſimulation, that he determined to abaſe his degree, ſith as an unthankfull perſon he forgot himſelfe and his dutie towards him that had ſo highlie aduanced him to all honoz and dignitie. When the nobles of the realme perceiued the cardinall to be in diſpleaſure, they began to accuſe him of ſuch offences as they knew might be proued againſt him, and thereof they made a booke containing certeine articles, to which diuerſe of the kings counsell ſet their hands. The king vnderſtanding moze plainlie by thoſe articles, the great pride, preſumption, and conſciouſneſſe of the cardinall, was ſoze moued againſt him; but yet kept his purpoſe ſecret for a while. Shortly after, a parlement was called to begin at Weſtmiſter the third of Nouember next ſuiuing.

In the meane time the king, being informed that all thoſe things that the cardinall had done by his pouer legantine within this realme, were in the caſe of the premure and prouiſion, cauſed his atturneie Chriſtopher Hales to ſue out a writ of premure againſt him, in the which he licenced him to make his attorneie. And further, the ſeuententh of Nouember the king ſent the two dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke to the cardinals place at Weſtmiſter, who went as they were commanded) and finiding the cardinall there, they declared that the kings pleaſure was that he ſhould ſurrender by the great ſcale into their hands, and to depart ſimplie vnto Aſher, which was an houſe ſituated nigh vnto Hampton court, belonging to the biſhoprike of Wincheſter. The cardinall demanded of them their commiſſion that gaue them ſuch authoritie, who anſwered againe, that they were ſufficient commiſſio-ners, and had authoritie to doe no leſſe by the kings mouth. Notwithſtanding, he would in no wiſe agree in that behalfe, without further knowledge of their authoritie, ſaying, that the great ſcale was deliue-red him by the kings perſon, to inioy the miniſtration thereof, with the rōme of the chancelor: for the terme of his life. Whereof for his ſuertie he had the kings letters patents.

This matter was greatlie debated betwene them with manie great words, in ſo much that the dukes were ſaine to depart againe without their purpoſe, and rode to Windſore to the king, and made report accordinglie; but the next daie they returned againe, bringing with them the kings letters. Then the cardinall deliuered vnto them the great ſcale, and was content to depart ſimplie, taking with him nothing but onelie certeine prouiſion for his houſe: and after long talke betwene him and the dukes, they departed with the great ſcale of England, and brought the ſame to the king. Then the cardinall called all his officers before him, and toke account of them for all ſuch ſtuffe, whereof they had charge. And in his galle-rie were ſet diuerſe tables, whereupon laie a great number of goodlie rich ſtuffe, as whole peces of ſilke of all colours, velvet, ſattin, damaske, taſſata, gro-graine, and other things. Alſo, there laie a thouſand peces of fine Holland cloth.

There was laid on euerie table, bookes reporting the contents of the ſame, and ſo was there inuenta-ries of all things in order againſt the kings com-ming. He cauſed to be hanged the walles of the gal-lerie on the one ſide with cloth of gold, cloth of tiſſue, cloth of ſiluer, and rich cloth of booken of diuerſe colours. On the other ſide were hanged the richeſt ſute of coapes of his owne prouiſion made for his colleges of Oxford and Ipſwich, that euer were ſene in England. Then had he two chambers adioining to the gallerie, the one moſt commonlie called the gilt chamber, and the other the counsell chamber, wherein were ſet by two broad and long tables vpon treſſels, whereupon was ſet ſuch a number of plate of all ſorts, as was almoſt incredible.

In the gilt chamber were ſet out vpon the table nothing but gilt plate, and vpon a cupbord and in a window was ſet no plate but gold, verie rich: and in the counsell chamber was all white and parcell gilt plate, and vnder the table in baſkets was all old broken ſiluer plate, and bookes ſet by them purpoſing e-uerie kind of plate, and euerie parcell, with the contents of the ounces thereof. Thus were all things prepared, giuing charge of all the ſaid ſtuffe, with all other remaining in euerie office, to be deliuered to the king, to make anſwer to their charge: for the order was ſuch, that euerie officer was charged with the receipt of the ſtuffe belonging to his office by indenture. So ſir William Caſcoigne, being his trea-ſuro, he gaue the charge of the deliuerie of the ſaid goods, and therewithall, with his traine of gentlemen and peomen, he toke his barge at the priue ſtaires, and ſo went by water vnto Putneie, where when he was arriued, he toke his mule, & euerie man toke their horſes, and rode ſtreight to Aſher, where he and his familie continued the ſpace of three or foure weekes, without either beds, ſheets, table cloths, or diſhes to eat their meat in, or wherewith to buie anie: the cardinall was forced to hoſtow of the biſhop of Carleill, plate and diſhes, &c.]

After this, in the kings bench his matter for the premure, being called vpon, two attorneis, which he had authoriſed by his warrant ſigned with his owne hand, confeſſed the action, and ſo had iudge-ment to forfeit all his lands, tenements, goods, and catells, and to be out of the kings proteccion: but the king of his clemencie ſent to him a ſufficient protection, and left to him the biſhoprikes of Poike and Wincheſter, with plate and ſtuffe conuenient for his degree. The biſhoprike of Dureſme was giuen to doctor Tunſhall biſhop of London, and the abbacie of ſaint Albons to the prior of Norwiche. Alſo the bi-ſhoprike of London being now void, was beſtowed on doctor Stokeſlie, then ambaffadour to the uni-uerſities beyond the ſea for the kings marriage.

The ladie Margarete duches of Hanoy aunt to the emperour, and the ladie Lois ducheſſe of Angoleſme mother to the French king, met at Cambreie in the beginning of the month of Iune, to treat of a peace, where were preſent doctor Tunſhall biſhop of London, and ſir Thomas More then chancelor of the duchie of Lancaſter, commiſſioners for the king of England. At length through diligence of the ſaid ladies a peace was concluded betwixt the emperour, the pope, and the kings of England and France. All theſe met there in the beginning of Iulie, accompanied with diuerſe great princes and counſellors, on euerie part. And after long debating on both ſides, there was a good concluſion taken the fiſt daie of Au-

In the emperours countries, when all things were written, sealed, and finished, there was a solemne masse song in the cathedrall church of Ambzete, the two ladies ambassadors of the king of England, sitting in great estate: and after masse the peace was proclaimed betwene the three princes, and Te Deum song, and monie call to the people, and great fires made through the citie. The same night the French king came into Ambzete, well and noble accompanied, and saluted the ladies, and to them made diuerse bankets: and then all persons departed into their countie, glad of this concord. This peace was called the womens peace, for because that notwithstanding this conclusion, yet neither the emperor trusted the French king, nor he neither trusted nor loved him, and their subiects were in the same case. This proclamation was proclaimed solemnelie by heralds with trumpets in the citie of London, which proclamation much reioiced the English merchants, repairing into Flanders, Brabant, Zealand, and other the emperours dominions. For during the wars, merchants were euill handled on both parties, which caused them to be desirous of peace. On the foure & twentieth of Nouember, was sir Thomas More made lord chancellor, & the next day led to the Chancery by the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolke, and there swoyne.

At the daie appointed the parlement began, on which daie the king came by water to his place of Bidelwell, and there he and his nobles put on their robes of parlement, and so came to the Blache friers church, where a masse of the Holie-ghost was solemnelie song by the kings chappell: and after the masse, the king with all the lords of parlement and commons, which were summoned to appeare at that daie, came into the parlement chamber, where the king sate in his throno or seat of roiall: and sir Thomas More his chancellor, standing on the right hand of the king behind the barre, made an eloquent oration.

In this oration he declared, that like as a god shepheard, which not alonelic keepeth and attendeth well his shepe, but also foreseeth and prouideth for all things which either may be hurtfull or noisome to his stocke, or maie preferue and defend the same against all perils that may chance to come: so the king which was the shepheard, ruler and gouernour of his realme, vigilantlie foreseeing things to come, considered how diuers lawes before this time were made, now by long continuance of time and mutation of things, verie insufficient and vnperfect: and also by the fraile condition of man, diuerse new enenities were spring amongst the people, for the which no law was yet made to refoyme the same. Which was the verie cause whye at that time the king had summoned his high court of parlement. And he resembled the king to a shepheard or herdman for this cause: for if a prince be compared to his riches, he is but a rich man; if a prince be compared to his honour, he is but an honourable man: but compare him to the multitude of his people, and the number of his stocke, then he is a ruler, a gouernour of might & puissance, so that his people maiketh him a prince, as of the multitude of shepe cometh the name of a shepheard. And as you see that amongst a great sort of shepe some be rotten & faultie, which the god shepheard sendeth from the god shepe: so the great worder which is of late fallen (as you all know) so craftie, so scabbedlie, yea and so vntrulie iugled with the king, that all men must needes ghesse and thinke, that he thought in himselfe that he had no twit to perceiue his craftie doing; or else that he presumed that the king would not see nor know his fraudulent iugling and attempts. But he was deceived: for his graces sight was so quicke and penetrable, that he saw him, yea and saw through him, both within and without, so that all things to him was open, and according to his desert he hath had a gentle correction.

Which small punishment the king will not to be an example to other offenders, but clearelie declareth, that whosoever hereafter shall make like attempt, or commit like offense, shall not escape with like punishment. And because you of the common house be a grosse multitude, and can not speake all at one time: therefore the kings pleasure is, that you shall resort to the nether house, & there amongst your selues, according to the old and ancient custome, to chouse an able person to be your common mouth and speaker: and after your election so made, to aduertise his grace thereof, which will declare to you his pleasure, what day he will haue him present in this place. After this done, the commons resorted to the nether house.

house, and they chose for their speaker Thomas Audlete speaker, and attourneie of the duchie of Lancaster: and the same daie was the parlement adioyned to Westminster.

On the first daie of the same moneth, the king came to the parlement chamber, and all the lords in their robes. And there the commons of the nether house presented their speaker, which there made an eloquent oration, which consisted in two points. The first point was, that he much praised the king for his equitie and iustice, mixed with mercie and pitie, so that none offense was forgotten and lest unpunished, nor in the punishment the extremitie: nor the rigor of the law cruellie extended: which should be a cause to bide all men from doing like offenses, & also a comfort to offenders to confesse their crime and offense, and an occasion of amendment and reformation. The second point was, that he disabled himselfe, both for lacke of wit, learning, and discretion to so high an office, beseeching the king to cause his commons to resort to their common house, and there to chose an other speaker for that parlement.

To this the king (by the mouth of the lord chancelor) answered, that where he disabled himselfe in wit and learning, his owne orate oration there made testified the contrarie. And as touching his discretion and other qualities, the king himselfe had well knowen him and his doings since he was in his service to be both wise and discret: and so for an able man he accepted him, and for the speaker he him admitted. When the commons were assembled in the nether house, they began to commune of their grieues, wherewith the spirituality had before time grievously oppressed them, both contrarie to the law of the realme, and contrarie to all right: and in speciallie they were sore moved with six great causes.

The first for the excessive fines, which the ordinaries take for probats of testaments, inasmuch that sir Henrie Guilford knight of the garter, and controller of the kings house, declared in the open parlement on his fidelitie, that he and others being executors to sir William Compton knight, pated for the probat of his will to the cardinall and the archbishop of Canturburie a thousand markes sterling. After this declaration were shewed so manie extorsions done by ordinaries for probats of willes, that it were too much to rehearse.

The second was the great polling and extream exaction, which the spirituall men used in taking of corps, presents, or mortuaries. For the children of the defunct should all die for hunger, and go a begging, rather than they would of charitie give to them the little cow which the dead man owgth, if he had but onlie one; such was the charitie then.

The third cause was, that priests being surcutors, stewards and officers to bishops, abbats, and other spirituall heads, had and occupied farmes, granges, and grazing in euerie countrie, so that the poore husbandmen could haue nothing but of them; and yet for that they should paie deerie.

The fourth cause was, that abbats, priors, and spirituall men kept tan-houses, and bought and sold wool, cloth, and all manner of merchandize, as other temporall merchants did.

The fifth cause was, because that spirituall persons promoted to great benefices, and hauing their livings of their benefices were lying in the court in lords houses, and toke all of the parishioners, and nothing spent on them at all: so that for lacke of residence both the poore of the parish lacked refreshing, and vniuersallie all the parishioners lacked preaching and true instruction of Gods word, to the great perill of their soules.

The first cause was, to see one priest little learned, to haue ten or twelue benefices, & to be resident upon none; and to know manie well learned scholars in the vniuersities, which were able to preach & teach, to haue neither benefice nor exhibition.

These things before this time might in no wise be touched, nor yet talked of by any man, except he would be made an heretike, or lese all that he had. For the bishops were chancellors, and had all the rule about the king, so that no man durst once presume to attempt any thing contrarie to their profit or commoditie. But now, when God had illuminated the eyes of the king, and that their subtilie doings were once espyed; then men began charitably to desire a reformation: and so at this parlement men began to shew their grudges. Whereupon the burgesies of the parlement appointed such as were learned in the law, being of the common house, to draw one bill of the probats of testaments, another for mortuaries, and the third for non residence, pluralities, and taking of farmes by spirituall men. The learned men toke much paines, and first set forth the bill of mortuaries, which passed the common house, and was sent by to the lords. To this bill the spirituall lords made a faire face, saying; that suchlike priests and curats toke more than they should, and therefore it were well done to take some reasonable order: thus they spake, because it touched them little.

But within two daies after was sent by the bill concerning probats of testaments; at the which the archbishop of Canturburie in especiall, and all other bishops in generall both frowned and grunted, for that touched their profit. Inasmuch as doctor John Fisher bishop of Rochester said openly in the parlement chamber these words: My lords, you see daily what billes come hither from the common house, and all is to the destruction of the church. For Gods sake see what a realme the kingdome of Boheme was; and when the church went downe, then fell the glorie of the kingdome: now with the commons is nothing but downe with the church; and all this me seemeth is for lacke of faith onlie. When these words were reported to the commons of the nether house, that the bishop should saie, that all their doings were for lacke of faith, they toke the matter grievously, for they imagined that the bishop esteemed them as heretikes, and so by his slanderous words would haue perswaded the temporall lords, to haue restrained their consent from the said two billes, which they before had passed, as you haue heard before.

Wherefore the commons, after long debate, determined to send the speaker of the parlement to the kings highnesse, with a grievous complaint against the bishop of Rochester. And so on a daie, when the king was at leisure, Thomas Audlete speaker for the commons, and thirtie of the chiefe of the common house, came to the kings presence in his palace at Westminster, which before was called Poike place; and there verie eloquentlie declared what a dishonor to the king and the realme it was, to saie, that they which were elected for the wisest men of all the shires, cities, and boroughs, within the realme of England, should be declared, in so noble and open presence, to lacke faith: which was equiualent to saie, that they were infidels, and no christians, as ill as Turkes, or Saracens, so that what paine or studie soeuer they toke for the common wealth, or what acts or lawes soeuer they made or stablished, should be taken as lawes made by Painims and heathen people, and not worthy to be kept by christan men. Wherefore he most humbly besought the kings highnesse to call the said bishop before him, and to cause him to speake more discretlie of such a number as was in the common house.

ker, that he would send for the bishop, and send them word what answer he made, and so they departed a-Canterburie and six other bishops, and for the bishop of Rochester also, and there declared to him the grudge of the commons; to the which the bishop answered, that he meant the doings of the Bohemians was for lacke of faith, and not the doings of them that were in the common house. Which saying was confirmed by the bishops being present, who had him in great reputation: and so by that onelie saying the king accepted his excuse, and thereof sent word to the commons by sir William Fitz Williams knight, treasurer of his household; which blind excuse pleased the commons nothing at all. After diuerse assemblies were kept betwene certeine of the lords, and certeine of the commons, for the billes of probats of testaments, and the mortuaries; the temporallie laid to the spiritualtie their owne lawes and constitutions; and the spiritualtie soze defended them by prescription & vsage, to whom this answer was made by a gentleman of Greies inne: The vs-age hath euer borne of theues to rob on Shoters bill, ergo is it lawfull?

With this answer the spiritual men were soze offended, because their doings were called robberies.
But the temporall men stood still by their sayings, inso much that the said gentleman said to the archbishop of Canterburie, that both the exaction of pro-bats of testaments, and the taking of mortuaries, as they were vsed, were open robberie and theft. After long disputation, the temporall lords began to leane to the commons: but for all that the billes remained unconcluded for a while. In the meane season, there was a bill assented to by the lords, and sent downe to the commons: the effect whereof was, that the whole realme by the said act did release to the king, all such summes of monie as he had borrowed of them at the loane, in the fiftenth yeare of his reigne (as you haue heard before.) This bill was soze argued in the common house, but the most part of the commons were the kings seruants, and the other were so laboured to by other, that the bill was assented into.

When this release of the loane was knowen to the commons of the realme, Lord so they grudged & spake ill of the whole parliament. For almost euerie man counted it his debt, and reckoned suerlie of the payment of the same. And therefore some made their willes of the same, and some other did set it ouer to other for debt, and so manie men had losse by it, which caused them soze to murmur, but there was no reme-die. The king like a god and discret pince, seeing that his commons in the parlement house had released the loane, intending somewhat to requite the same, granted to them a generall pardon of all offences; certeine great offenses and debts onelie excepted: also he aided them for the redress of their griefes against the spiritualtie, and caused two new billes to be made indifferentlie, both for the probats of testaments and mortuaries; which billes were so reasonable, that the spiritual lords assented to them all, though they were soze against there mindes, & in especiall the probats of testaments soze displeased the bishops, and the mortuaries soze displeased the pa-sons and vicars.

After these acts thus agreed, the commons made another act for pluralities of benefices, non residence, being selling and taking of farmes by spirituall persons. Which act so displeased the spiritualtie, that the priests railed on the commons of the common house, and called them heretikes and schisma-tikes, for the which diuerse priests were punished.

This act was soze debated above in the parlement chamber, and the lords spirituall would in no wise consent. Wherefore the king perceiving the grudge of his commons, caused eight lords and eight of his commons to meet in the Star chamber at an after-none, and there was soze debating of the cause, in so much that the temporall lords of the upper house, which were there, took part with the commons, against the spirituall lords; and by force of reason caused them to assent to the bill with a little qualific-ing. Which bill the next daie was wholie agreed to in the lords house, to the great reioicing of the late people, and to the great displeasure of the spiritual persons.
During this parlement was brought downe to the commons the booke of articles, which the lords had put to the king against the cardinall, the chiefe whereof were these.

1 First, that he without the kings assent had procured to be a legat, by reason whereof he took awaie the right of all bishops and spiritual persons.

2 Item, in all writings which he wrote to Rome, or anie other forren pince, he wrote Ego Rex meus, I and my king: as who would saie, that the king were his seruant.

3 Item, that he hath slandered the church of England in the court of Rome. For his suggestion to be legat was to refozme the church of England, which (as he wrote) was Falsa in reprobum sensum.

4 Item, he without the kings assent carried the kings great scale with him into Flanders, when he was sent ambassadoz to the emperour.

5 Item, he without the kings assent, sent a commission to sir Gregorie de Cassado, knight, to conclude a league betwene the king & the duke of Fer-rar, without the kings knowledge.

6 Item, that he hauing the French pockes presumed to come and breathe on the king.

7 Item, that he caused the cardinals hat to be put on the kings coine.

8 Item, that he would not suffer the kings clerke of the market to sit at saint Albons.

9 Item, that he had sent innumerable substance to Rome, for the obtaining of his dignities, to the great impouerishment of the realme.

These articles, with manie moze, read in the common house, and signed with the cardinals hand, was confessed by him. And also there was shewed a writ-ting sealed with his scale, by the which he gaue to the king all his moueables and immoueables. On the daie of the Conception of our labe, the king at Pocke place at Westminster, in the parlement time, created the vicount Rochford erle of Wilshire, and the vicount Fitz Water was created earle of Suffor, and the lord Hastings was created earle of Huntington. When all things were concluded in the parlement house, the king came to the parlement chamber the 17 daie of December, and there put his rosall assent to all things done by the lords and commons, and so proroged his court of parlement till the next yeare. After the parlement was thus ended, the king removed to Cræneke, and there kept his Christmalle with the queene in great triumph: with great plenty of viands, and diuerse disguisings and enterludes, to the great reioicing of his people.

The king, which all this while, since the doubt was moued touching his marriage, abstained from the queenes bed, was now aduertised by his ambassadoz, whom he had sent to diuerse vniuersities for the absoluing of his doubt, that the said vniuersities were agreed, and clerelie concluded, that the one brother might not by Gods law marrie the other brothers wife, carnallie knowen by the first marriage, & that neither the pope nor the court of Rome could in amie wise dispense with the same. For ye must understand, that amongst other things alleged for dispense of the marriage to be lawfull, euidence was giuen of certeine words, which prince Arthur spake the morrow after he was first married to the queene, whereby it was gathered, that he knew his carnallie the night then passed. The words were these, as we find them in the chronicle of master Edward Hall.

In the morning after he was risen from the bed, in which he had laine with his all night, he called for drinke, which he before time was not accustomed to do. At which thing, one of his chamberleines mar-10 nelling, required the cause of his drought. To whome he answered merilie, saying; I haue this night bene in the middest of Spaine, which is a hot region, and that Iournie maketh me so drie: and if thou haddest bene vnder that hot climat, thou wouldest haue bene drier than I. Again, it was alleged, that after the death of prince Arthur, the king was deferred from the title and creation of prince of Wales almost halfe a yere, which thing could not haue bene doubted, if he had not bene carnallie knowen. Also the hir selfe caused a bull to be purchased, in the 20 which were these words resoluitur cognitum, that is, and peraduenture carnallie knowen: which words were not in the first bull granted by pope Iulie at his second marriage to the king, which second bull with that clause was onelic purchased to dispense with the second matrimonie, although there were carnall copulation before, which bull needed not to haue bene purchased, if there had bene no carnall copulation, for 30 then the first bull had bene sufficient. To conclude, when these & other matters were laid forth to proue that which she denied, the carnall copulation betwixt hir and prince Arthur, hir counsellors left that matter, and fell to persuasions of naturall reason. And lastlie, when nothing else would serue, they stood stiff in the appeale to the pope, and in the dispensation purchased from the court of Rome, so that the matter was thus shifted off, and no end liklie to be had therein.

John abbas sent to Iulie out of England about this intricate matter of the marriage.

The king therefore understanding now that the emperor and the pope were appointed to meet at the citie of Bononie alias Bologna, where the emperor should be crowned, sent thither in ambassage from him the earle of Wilshire, doctor Stokesleie, elected bishop of London, and his almoner doctor Edward Lee, to declare both vnto the pope and emperor, the law of God, the determinations of vniuersities in the case of his marriage, and to require the pope to do iustice according to truth, and also to shew to the emperor, that the king did moue this matter onelic for discharge of his conscience, and not for 50 anie other respect of pleasure or displeasure carnallie. These ambassadors comming to Bononie were honorablie receiued, and first doing their message to the pope, had answer of him, that he would heare the matter disputed when he came to Rome, and according to right he would do iustice.

The emperor sent answer to the ambassadors.

The emperor answered, that he in no wise would be against the lawes of God, & if the court of Rome would iudge that the matrimonie was not good, he could be content: but he solicited both the pope and cardinals, to stand by the dispensation, which he thought to be of force inough to proue the marriage lawfull. With these answers the ambassadors departed and returned homeward, till they came on this side the mounteins, and then receiued letters from the king, which appointed the earle of Wilshire to go in ambassage to the french king which then laie at Bourdeaux, making shift for monie for redeeming of his children: and the bishop of London, was appointed to go to Padoa, and other vniuersities in Italy, to know their full resolutions and determinate opinions in the kings case of matrimonie: and the kings almoner was commanded to returne home into England, and so he did.

¶ You haue heard before how the cardinal was attainted in the premunire, and how he was put out of the office of the chancelor, & laie at Asher. In this Lent season the king by the aduise of his counsell licensed him to go into his diocesse of Dorke, & gaue him commandement to keepe him in his diocesse, and not to returne southward without the kings special licence in writting. So he made great provision to go northward, and a parelled his seruants newlie, and bought manie costlie things for his household: and so he might well inough, for he had of the kings gentleness the bishopricks of Dorke and Winchester, which were no small things. But at this time diuerse of his seruants departed from him to the kings seruice, and in especiall Thomas Crumwell one of his chiefe counsell, and chiefe doer for him in the suppression of abbeies. After that all things necessarie for his Iournie were prepared, he took his waie northward till he came to Southwell, which is in his diocesse, and there he continued this yere, euer grinding at his fall, as you shall heare hereafter. But the lands which he had giuen to his colleges in Oxford and Ipswich, were now come to the kings hands, by his atteindor in the premunire: and yet the king of his gentleness and for fauour that he bare to good learning, created againe the college in Oxford, and where it was named the cardinals college, he called it the kings college, & indowed it with faire possessions, and put in new statutes and ordinances. And for because the college of Ipswich was thought to be nothing profitable, therefore he left that dissolved.

In this yere the emperor gaue to the lord master of saint Iohnes of Ierusalem, and his brethren the Iland of Malta lieng betwene Sicill and Barbarie, there to imploye themselves vpon Christs enemies, which lord master had no place sure to inhabit there, since he was put fro the Rhodes by the Turke that besieged Vienna, but missed of his expectation. For the christians defended the same so valiantlie against the said Turke and his potver, that he lost manie of his men by slaughter; manie also miscarried by sicknesse and cold: so that there perished in all to the number of fourescore thousand men, as one of his bassatts did afterwarde confesse, which was to him a great displeasure; and in especialtie because he neuer besieged citie before, but either it was yielded or taken. In the time of this siege a metritian did make these two verses in memorie of the same:

The number of the Turke that died at the siege of Vienna.

In the beginning of this yere was the hauing and reading of the new testament in English translated by Tindall, Joye, and others, forbidden by the king with the aduise of his counsell, and namelie the bishops, which affirmed that the same was not trulie translated; and that therein were prelogs and pefaces sounding to heresie, with vcharitable railing against bishops and the cleargie. The king therefore commanded the bishops, that they calling to them the best learned men of the vniuersities, should cause a new translation to be made, that the people without danger might read the same for their better instruction in the lawes of God, and his holie word. Diuerse persons that were detected to vse reading of the new testament, and other booke in English set forth by Tindall, and such other as were tied the realme, were punished by order taken against them by sir Thomas More then lord chancelor, who held greatlie against such booke, but still the number daile increased.

caused all his new testaments which he had bought with manie other bookes, to be brought into Pauls churchyard in London, and there were openlie burned. In the end of this yeare, the wild Irishmen, knowing the earle of Kildare to be in England, entered his land, and spoiled and burnt his countie, with diuerse other countries. And the erle of Osserie being the kings deputie made little resistance, for lacke of power. Wherefore the king sent the earle of Kildare into Ireland, & with him sir William Skevington knight, master of the kings ordinance, and diuerse gunners with him, which so politike ordered themselves, that their enemies were glad to offer amends, and to treat for truce: & so sir William Skevington the next yeare returned into England, leaving there the earle of Kildare for the kings deputie.

Now I will returne to the execution of the treatie of Cambrie, in the which it was agreed, that the ladie Cleane, and the French kings children should be deliuered when the ranfome appointed was paid as you haue heard in the last yeare. Wherefore the French king gathered monie of his subjects with all speed, and when the monie was readie, he sent the great master of France called Annas de Demorancie and diuerse other nobles to Balon with the monie, and to receiue the ladie and the children. And thither came to them the great constable of Castile and monsieur Prat for the emperor, & there the crowns were weighed and touched: and what fault soeuer the Spaniards found in them they would not receiue a great number of them, and so they carried the children backe from Fontarbie into Spaine. Thus the great master of France and his companie late still at Balon, without hauing his purpose performed, from March till the end of June, and longer had lien if the king of England had not sent sir Francis Bryan to Balon to warrant the paiement: whereupon the daie of deliuerance was appointed to be on saint Peters daie in June.

At which daie the great master, with one and thirtie mulets laden with the crownes came to the one side of the riuer of Audate, which riuer departeth Spaine and France, and there taried till the first daie of Iulie: on which daie the ladie Cleane, and the children were put in two great boates, hauing onelie twelue gentlemen of Spaine with them: and in like maner the great master with two great boats, in the which the monie was, and twelue gentlemen with him. All these boats met at a bridge made in the middle of the riuer. The constable of Spaine and his twelue gentlemen met with the great master of France and his twelue gentlemen on the bridge: and after a little salutation, the Frenchmen entered into the two boats where the ladie and the two children were; and the Spaniards into the two boats where the monie was, and then each part hasted to land. Thus were the French kings wife and children deliuered into his hands, for which deliuerance was great ioy and triumph made in France: and also in Iulie were fiers made in London and diuerse other places for the same consideration and cause.

Now will we leaue France, and returne to England, renewing the remembrance of cardinal Wolfeie, who after great sute made to the king, was licenced to remoue from Ather to Richmond, which place he had a little before repared with great costs, for the king made an exchange thereof with him for Hampton court. The cardinal hauing licence of the king to repaire to Richmond, made hast thither, and lodged there in the lodge of the great parke, which was a verie pretie house, there he late untill the beginning of Lent. Then he remoued into the charterhouse of Richmond, where he laie in a lodging which doctor Collet made for himselfe, untill he remoued northward, which was in the Passon weeke after, and euerie daie he resorted to the charterhouse there, and would sit with one of the most ancient fathers, who perswaded him to despise the vaine glorie of the world.

Then prepared the cardinal for his iourne into the north, and sent to London for liuerie clothes for his seruants, and so rode from Richmond to Hendon, from thence to a place called the Kie, the next daie to Raifone, where he lodged in the priorie; the next daie to Huntingdon, and there lodged in the abbey; the next daie to Peterborough, and there lodged in the abbey, where he abode all the next weeke, & there he kept his Casser, his traine was in number an hundred and threescore persons. Upon Maundie thursdaie he made his maundie, there hauing nine and fiftie more men, whose feet he washed, and gaue euerie one twelue pence in monie, three els of good canvas, a paire of shoes, a cast of red herrings, and three white herrings, and one of them had two shillings.

On thursdaie next after Casser, he remoued to master Fitz Williams, sometime a merchant-tailor of London, and then of the kings counsell; the next weeke he remoued to Stamford, the next daie to Grantham, the next daie to Peterwarke, and lodged in the castell that night and the next daie also: from thence he rode to Southwell, where he continued most part of all that summer, untill the latter end of graffe time, and then he rode to Scrobie, where he continued untill Michaelmasse, and then to Calwood castell within seven miles of Poike, whereof we will speake more hereafter. On the firste of Maie, a man was hanged in chaires in Finsburie field, for murdering doctor Miles vicar of saint Giles. The fourth and fift of November was a great wind, that blew downe manie houses and trees, after which wind followed so high a tide, that it drowned the marshes on Essex side and Kent, with the Ile of Thanet, and other places, destroying much cattell. The nineteenth of September, in the citie of London, a proclamation was made for the restraining of the popes authoritie in England, as followeth.

A proclamation published in England in the behalfe of the kings prerogatiue roiall against the pope.

The kings highnes streictlie chargeth and commandeth, that no maner of person, of what estate, degree, or condition soeuer he or they be of, doe purchase or attempt to purchase from the court of Rome or elsewhere, nor vse & put in execution, diuulge, or publish anie thing hertofore within this yeare passed purchased, or to be purchased hereafter, conteining mater preiudiciall to the high authoritie, iurisdiction, and prerogatiue roiall of this his said realme, or to the let, hinderance, or impeachment of his graces noble & vertuous intended purposes in the premises, upon paine of incurring his highnesse indignation, and imprisonment, and further punishment of their bodies for their so doing at his graces pleasure, to the dreadfull example of all other.

Some iudged, that this proclamation was made, because the queene (as was said) had purchased a new bull for ratification of hir marriage. Others thought that it was made, because the cardinal had purchased purchased a bull to curse the king, if he would not restore him to his old dignities, and suffer him to correct the spiritualtie, the king not to meddle with the same. In deed manie conjectured, that the cardinall grudgng at his fall from so high dignities, liked not to write things sounding to the kings reproch, both to the pope, and other princes; for that manie opprobrious words were spoken to doctor Edward Baerne the kings orator at Rome, and that it was said to him, that for the cardinals sake the king should haue the worse speed in the sute of his matrimonie.

Cardinall Wolseie lieng at Catwode, held there an honourable and plentifull house for all comers, and also built & repaired the castell, which was greatlie in decaye, hauing artificers and labourers aboute thre hundred persons bailie in wages. At length being therunto perswaded by the doctors of the church of Poike, he determined to be installed there at Poike minster, the next mondaie after Alhalloves daie, against which time due preparation was made for the same, but not in such sumptuous wise, as his predecessors before him had vsed. For whereas the cardinall was not abashed to lend to the king, requiring him to lend him the mitre and pall which he was wont to weare when he sang masse in anie solemne assemblee: the king vpon sight of his letters, could not but maruell at the proud presumptuousnes of the man, saieing: What a thing is this, that pride should thus reigne in a person that is quite vnder foot.

The daie being once knowne vnto the worshipfull gentlemen of the countrie, and other, as abbats, and priors, and notice of his installation, they sent in such prouision of vittells, that it is almost incredible, all which was vnknewne to the cardinall, for as much as he was pzenented and disappointed of his purpose, by the reason that he was arrested of high treason, as yee shall hereafter heare. So that most part of this former prouision that I speake of, was sent vnto Poike the same daie of his arrest, and the next daie following: for his arrest was kept as close as could be. The order of his arrest was thus. It was appointed by the king & counsell, that sir Walter Walsh knight, one of the kings priue chamber, should be sent downe with a commission into the north vnto the earle of Northumberland (who was sometime brought vp in house with the cardinall) and they twaine being iointlie in commission to arrest the cardinall of high treason, maister Walsh toke his horse at the court gate, about none, vpon Alhalloves daie, toward the earle of Northumberland.

And now haue I occasion to declare what happened about the same time, which peraduenture signified the troubles following to the cardinall. The cardinall sitting at dinner vpon Alhalloves daie, hauing at his boords end diuerse chapleins sitting at dinner, yee shall vnderstand that the cardinals great crosse stood in a corner at the tables end, leaning against the hanging, and when the boords end was taken vp, and a conuenient time for the chapleins to arise, one doctor Augustine a Venecian, and physitian to the cardinall, rising from the table with the other, hauing vpon him a great golowne of boisterous velvet, ouerthrew the crosse, which trailing downe along the tappet, with the point of one of the crosses, brake doctor Bonars head that the blood ran downe, the companie there standing greatlie astonied with the chance.

The cardinall perceiving the same, demanded what the matter meant of their sudden amaze: And they shewed him of the fall of his crosse vpon doctor Bonars head. Hath it (quoth he) brake anie blood? Yea forsooth my lord (quoth they). With that he cast his eyes aside, & taking his head, said ad alium omen, & therewith saieing grace, rose from the table, & went to his chamber. Now marke the signification hoto the cardinall expounded this matter at Bomfret after his fall. First, yee shall vnderstand, that the crosse which he bare as archbishop of Poike, signified himselfe; and Augustine the physician who ouerthrew the crosse, was onelie he that accused the cardinall, whereby his enemies caught an occasion to ouerthrow him: it fell vpon doctor Bonars head, who was maister of the cardinals faculties and spirituall iurisdiccions, and was then damnified by the ouerthrow of the crosse: yea, and more ouer, drawing blood of him, betokened death, which shortly after did insue.

About the time of this mischance, the same verie daie and season, maister Walsh toke his horse at the court as nigh as could be iudged. Now the appointed time drew nere of his installation, and sitting at dinner vpon the fridaie next before the mondaie on the which daie he intended to be installed at Poike, the earle of Northumberland and maister Walsh, with a great companie of gentlemen of the earles house, & of the countrie, whome he had gathered together in the kings name, came to the hall at Catwode, the officers being at dinner, and the cardinall not fullie dined, being then in his fruits. The first thing that the earle did after he had set order in the hall, he commanded the porter at the gates to deliver him the keyes thereof. Who would in no wise obeie his commandement, though he were roughlie threatened, and straelie commanded in the kings name to make deliuerie of them to one of the earles seruants.

Sir (quoth he) seeing that yee do but intend to let one of your seruants in my place to keepe the gates, I know no seruant that yee haue but I am as able as he to do it, and keepe the gates to your purpose (what soener it be) also the keyes were deliuered me by my lord and maister, wherefore I praye you to pardon me, for whatsoever yee shall command me to do in the ministration of mine office, I shall do it with a good will. With that (quoth the earle) hold him a booke (& commanding him to laie his hand thereon) Thou shalt sweare (quoth he) that thou shalt well and trulie keepe the gates to the kings vse, and to do all such things as we shall command: and that yee shall let passe neither in nor out at these gates, but such as yee be commanded by vs. And with this oth he receiued the keyes at the earles hands.

Of all these doings knewe the cardinall nothing, for they stopped the staires, so that none went vp to the cardinals chamber, and they that came downe could no more go vp againe. At the last one escaped, who shewed the cardinall that the earle was in the hall. Whereat the cardinall marvelled, and would not beleue him, but commanded a gentleman to bring him the truth, who going downe the staires, saw the earle of Northumberland, and returned, and said it was verie he. Then (quoth the cardinall) I am sozie that we haue dined, for I feare our officers be not prouided of anie soze of god fish, to make him some honozable chere, let the table stand (quoth he). With that he rose vp, and going downe the staires, he encountered the earle coming vp with all his suite. And as sone as the cardinall espied the earle, he put off his cap, and said, my lord yee be most hartilie welcome, and so embraced each other.

When the cardinall toke the earle by the hand, and had him vp into the chamber, whome followed all the number of the earles seruants. From thence he led him into his bed-chamber, and they being there all alone, the earle said vnto the cardinall with a soft voice, laieing his hand vpon his arme: my lord I arrest you of high treason. With which words the cardinall being maruelouslie astonied, standing both

Will a good space. At last (quoth the cardinal) What authoritie haue you to arrest me? Forsooth my lord (quoth the erle) I haue a commission so to do. Where is your commission (quoth he) that I may see it? Praise sir that you may not (saide the erle). Well then (quoth the cardinal) I will not obeie your rest. But as they were debating this matter betwene them in the chamber, as busie was maister Walsly in arresting doctor Augustine at the doore of the palace, saieing vnto him, So in traitor: or I shall make thee.

The cardinal

the commission of the arres.

At the last maister Walsly being entred the cardinals chamber, began to plucke off his hood, and after kneeled downe to the cardinal. Vnto whom the cardinal said, Come hither gentleman & let me speake with you: Sir, here my lord of Northumberland hath arrested me, but by whose authoritie he sheweth not, if yee be ioined with him I praise you shew me. Indeed my lord (quoth maister Walsly) he sheweth you the truth. Well then (quoth the cardinal) I praise you let me see it. Sir I beseech you (quoth maister Walsly) hold vs excused: there is annexed to our commission certeine instructions, which you may not see. Well (quoth the cardinal) I trow yee are one of the kings priue chamber, your name is Walsly, I am content to yelde to you, but not to my lord of Northumberland without I see his commission: the worst in the kings priue chamber is sufficient to arrest the greatest pce of the realme by the kings commandement, without anie commission, therefore put your commission and authoritie in execution, spare not, I will obeie the kings will; I take God to iudge, I neuer offended the king in word nor deed.

Then the earle called into the chamber diuerse gentlemen of his owne seruants, and after they had taken the cardinals keies from him, they put him in custodie of the cardis gentlemen, and then they went about the house to set all things in an order. Then sent they doctor Augustine awaie to London with as much speed as they could, who was bound vnto the hollie like a traitor. But it was sundaie toward night per the cardinal was conueied from Calwood, who lodged that night in the abbey of Womfrist. The next daie he remoued toward Doncaster, and was there lodged at the Blakhe stiers. The next daie he was remoued to Shetisbury parke, where the earle of Shetisbury with his ladie, and a traine of gentlemen and gentlewomen receiued him with much honour. Then departed all the great number of gentlemen that conducted him thither.

The cardinal being thus with the earle of Shetisbury, continued there eightene daies after, vpon whome the earle appointed diuerse gentlemen to attend continuallie, to see that he should lacke nothing, being serued in his owne chamber as honorable as he had bene in his owne house, and once euerie daie the earle would repaie to him and commune with him. After the cardinal had thus remained with the earle of Shetisbury about a fortnight, it came to passe at a certeine time as he sat at dinner in his owne chamber, hauing at his boords end a messe of gentlemen and chapleins to keepe him companie, toward the end of his dinner, when he was come to eating his fruits, his colour was perceiued often to change, whereby he was iudged not to be in good health.

Wherevpon one of his gentlemen said, Sir, me seemes you are not well at ease. To whom he answered with lowd voice, Forsooth no more I am, for I am (quoth he) taken suddenlie with a thing about my stomach, that lieth there along as cold as a whetstone, which is no more but wind, I praise you go to the apothecarie, & inquire of him if he haue anie thing that will breake wind upward, Then went he to the earle and shewed him what estate the cardinal was in, and what he desired. With that, the earle caused the apothecarie to be called before him, & demanded of him if he had anie thing that would breake wind upward in a mans bodie. And he answered he had such gce. Then (quoth the earle) fetch me some. When the apothecarie fetched a white confesion in a saite paper, & shewed it to the earle, who commanded one to giue the assaie thereof before him, and then the same to be brought to the cardinal, who receiued it. Up all at once into his mouth.

But immediatlie after suerlie, he auoided much wind upward: So (quoth he) ye may see that it was but wind, and now I am well eased, I thanke God, and so rose from the table, and went to his prayers. And that done, there came on him such a losenselle, that it caused him to go to the stole. And not long after the earle of Shetisbury came into the gallery to him, with whom the cardinal met: and then sitting downe vpon a bench, the earle asked him how he did, and he most lamentable answered him, and thanked him for his good intertainment. Sir (quoth the earle) if ye remember, ye haue often wished to come before the king, to make your answer; and I haue written to the king in that behalfe, making him priue of your lamentation that yee inwardlie haue receiued for his displeasure, who accepteth all your doings therein, as friends be accustomed to do in such cases: wherefore I would aduise you to plucke by your hart, and be not agast of your enemies, I doubt not but this your iournie to his highnesse shall be much to your advancement.

The king hath sent for you that too; shipfall knight maister Kingston, and with him foure and twentie of your old seruants, now of the gard, to the intent yee may safelie come to his maiestie. Sir (quoth the cardinal) I trow maister Kingston is constable of the Tower. Yea, that of that (quoth the erle) I assure you he is elected by the king for one of your friends. Well (quoth the cardinal) as God will, so be it, I am subiect to fortune, being a true man, reddie to accept such chances as shall follow, and there an end; I praise you where is maister Kingston. Quoth the earle, I will send for him. I praise you so do (quoth the cardinal) at whose message he came. And as soon as the cardinal espied him, he made hast to encounter him, and at his coming he kneeled to him, and saluted him in the kings behalfe, whome the cardinal bare-headed offered to take vp, and said: I praise you stand by, kneele not to me, I am but a wretch replet with miserie, not esteeming my selfe but as a vile abject, bitterlie cast awaie, without desert, as God knoweth.

Then said maister Kingston with humble reuerence: Sir, the king hath him commended vnto you. I thanke his highnesse quoth the cardinal, I trust he be in health. Yea (quoth maister Kingston) and he commanded me to saie to you, that you should assure your selfe that he beareth you as much good will as euer he did, and willesh you to be of good chere. And where report hath bene made, that ye should commit against him certeine heinous crimes, which he thinks to be vntrue, yet he can do no lesse than send for you to your trial, & to take your iournie to him at your owne pleasure, commanding me to be attendant vpon you. Therefore sir I praise you, when it shall be your owne pleasure to take your iournie, I shall be reddie to giue attendance. After Kingston (quoth he) I thanke you for your newes, and sir, if I were as lustie as I haue bene but of late, I would ride with you in post, but I am diseased with a flur that maketh me verie weake, but I shall with all speed make me reddie to ride with you to morrow.

When night came, the cardinal wared verie sick with with the laske, the which caused him continuallie to go to the skale all that night, in so much that he had that night fittie skales: therefore in consideration of his infirmitie, they caused him to carrie all that day: and the next daie he took his iournie with master Kingston, and them of the gard, till he came to an house of the earle of Shrewesburies called Hardwicke hall, where he laie all night verie euill at ease. The next daie he rode to Nottingham, and there lodged that night moze sicke: and the next daie he rode to Leicester abbey, and by the waie waied so sicke that he was almost fallen from his mule; so that it was night before he came to the abbey of Leicester, where at his comming in at the gates, the abbat with all his conuent met him with diuerse torches light, whom they honozable receiued and welcomed.

To whom the cardinall said: Father abbat, I am come hither to lay my bones among you, riding so still buttill he came to the staires of the chamber, where he alighted from his mule, and master Kingston led him up the staires, and as soone as he was in his chamber he went to bed. This was on the saturday at night, and then increased he sicker and sicker, untill mondaie, that all men thought he would haue died: so on tuesday saint Andzwees euen, master Kingston came to him and bad him good morrow, for it was about six of the clocke, and asked him how he did: Sir (quoth he) I carrie but the pleasure of God, to render vp my poze soule into his hands. Not so sir (quoth master Kingston) with the grace of God, y<sup>e</sup> shall liue and doo verie well, if y<sup>e</sup> will be of good chere. Nay in good sooth master Kingston, my disease is such, that I can not liue: for I haue had some experience in physicke.

Thus it is, I haue a flux with a continuall feuer, the nature whereof is, that if there be no alteration of the same within eight daies, either must insue excoilation of the intrailles, or franisie, or else present death, and the best of them is death, and (as I suppose) this is the eight daie, & if y<sup>e</sup> see no alteration in me, there is no remedie, saue (though I may liue a daie or twaine after) but death must insue. Sir (quoth master Kingston) you be in much pensiuenes, doubting that thing, that in good faith y<sup>e</sup> need not. Well, well, master Kingston (quoth the cardinall) I see the matter how it is framed: but if I had serued God as diligentlie as I haue done the king, he would not haue giuen me ouer in my greie haire: but it is the full reward that I must receiue for the diligent paines and studie that I haue had to doo him seruice, not regarding my seruice to God, but onelie to satisfie his pleasure.

I praye you haue me most humble commended unto his most maiestie, & beseech him in my behalfe to call to his princelie remembrance all matters proceeding betwene him & me from the beginning of the world, and the progresse of the same, &c. Master Kingston fare well, I can no more saie, but I wish all things to haue good successe, my time draweth on fast. And euen with that he began to draw his speech at length, & his tong to faile, his eies being set, whose sight failed him. When they did put him in remembrance of Christ his passion, & caused the yeomen of the gard to stand by to see him die, and to witnesse of his words at his departure: & incontinent the clocke stroke eight, and then he gaue vp the ghost, and departed this present life: which caused some to call to remembrance how he said the daie before, that at eight of the clocke they should lose their master.

Here is the end and fall of pride and arrogancie of men exalted by fortune to dignitie: for in his time he was the haughtiest man in all his proceedings a line, hauing moze respect to the honoz of his person, than he had to his spirituall profession, wherin should be shewed all mekenes, humilitie, and charitie. [An example (saith Guicciardin, who hardlie this storie effectually, and sheweth the cause of this cardinals ruine) in our daies was this of memorie, touching the power which fortune and ennie hath in the courts of princes.] He died in Leicester abbey, & in the church of the same abbey was buried. Such is the furtie of mans brittle state, doubtfull in birth, & no lesse feeble in life, which is as vncertaine, as death most certaine, and the meanes thereof manifold, which as in number they exceed; so in strangenesse they passe: all degrees of ages & diuersities of seres being subiect to the same. In consideration whereof, it was notable said by one that wrote a whole volume of infirmities, diseases, and passions incident to children:

A prima vita diuersos flumine morbos Perpetuatur, diuis afflictaeque malis: Donec in occasum redeat qui vixit ab ortu, Antea quam discat vivere, vita cadit.

Sebast. Anthonius.

This cardinall (as Edmund Campian in his historie of Ireland describeth him) was a man undoubtedly borne to honoz: I thinke (saith he) some princes bastard, no butchers sonne, exceeding wise, faire spoken, high minded, full of reuenge, vitious of his bodie, lothie to his enemies, were they neuer so big, to those that accepted and sought his friendship wonderfull courteous, a ripe scholeman, thral to affections, brought a bed with flatterie, insatiable to get, and moze princelie in bestowing, as appeareth by his two colleges at Ipswich and Orenford, the one ouerthrowne with his fall, the other unfinished, and yet as it lieth for an house of students, considering all the appurtenances incomparable thorough Christendome, whereof Henrie the eight is now called founder, because he let it stand. He held and inioied at once the bishopricks of Exeter, Duresme, & Winchester, the dignities of lord cardinall, legat, & chancellor, the abbey of Saint Albons, diuerse priories, sundrie fat benefices in commendam, a great preferer of his seruants, an advancer of learning, stout in euerie quarell, neuer happie till this his ouerthrowne. Wherein he shewed such moderation, and ended so perfectlie, that the houre of his death did him moze honoz, than all the pompe of his life passed. Thus far Campian. Here it is necessarie to adde that notable discourse, which I find in John Stow, concerning the state of the cardinall, both in the yeares of his youth, and in his settled age: with his sudden comming vp from preferment to preferment; till he was aduanced to that step of honoz, which making him insolent, brought him to confusion.

This Thomas Wolsey was a poze mans sonne of Ipswich, in the countie of Suffolke, & there borne, and being but a child, verie apt to be learned, by the meanes of his parents he was conueied to the vniuersitie of Orenford, where he shortly prospered so in learning, as he was made bachelor of art, when he passed not fiftene yeares of age, and was called most commonlie thorough the vniuersitie the boie bachelor. Thus prospering in learning, he was made fellow of Magdeline college, and afterward appointed to be scholemaster of Magdeline schole, at which time the lord marquisse Dorset had thre of his sonnes there at schole, committing vnto him as well their education as their instruction. It pleased the said lord marquisse against a Christmas season to send as well for the scholemaster, as for his children home to his house for their recreation, in that pleasant and honozable feast.

When being there, the lord their father, perceiving them to be right well imployed in learning for their time, he hauing a benefice in his gift, being at that time void, gaue the same to the scholemaster in reward of his diligence at his departure after Christmas.

mas to the vniuersitie, and hauing the presentation thereof, repaired to the ordinarie for his induction, and being furnished of his instruments, made speed to the benefice to take possession, and being there for that intent, one sir James Paulet knight dwelling thereabouts, took occasion against him, and set the scholemaster by the heeles during his pleasure, which after was neither forgotten nor forgiven.

For when the scholemaster mounted to the dignitie to be chancellor of England, he sent for master Paulet, & after manie sharpe words, inioined him to attend untill he were dismissed, and not to depart out of London without licence obtained; so that he continued there within the middle Temple the space of five or six yeares, and late then in the Gate house next the street, which he redified verie sumptuouslie, garnishing the same all ouer the outside with the cardinals armes, with his hat, cognisances, and other deuises in so glorious a sort, that he thought thereby to haue appeased his old displeasure.

Now after the decesse of the lord marquisse, this same scholemaster considering himselfe to be but a simple beneficed man, and to haue lost his fellowship in the college, which was much to his reliefe, thought not long to be unprouided of some other helpe, and in his trauell thereabouts, he fell in acquaintance with one sir John Naphant, a vertie graue & ancient knight, who had a great roome in Calis vnder king Henrie the seventh: this knight he serued, and behaued himselfe so discretlie, that he obtained the especial fauor of his master, insomuch that he committed all the charge of his office vnto his chapleine, and (as I vnderstand) the office was the treasurership of Calis, who was in consideration of his great age discharged of his roome, and returned againe into England, and thorough his instant labor, his chapleine was promoted to be the kings chapleine, and when he had once cast anchor in the port of promotion, how he wrought, I shall somewhat declare.

He hauing there a iust occasion to be in the sight of the king daile, by reason he said masse before him in his closet, and that being done, he spent not the daie in idleness, but would attend vpon those whom he thought to beare most rule in the councell, the which at that time was doctor For, bishop of Winchester, secretarie, and lord of the priuie seale: and also sir Thomas Louell knight, a sage counsellor, master of the wards, and constable of the Tower: these graue counsellors in proceesse of time perceived this chapleine to haue a verie fine wit, and thought him a meet person to be preferred to wittie affaires. It chanced at a certeine season that the king had an urgent occasion to send an ambassado: vnto the emperoz Maximilian, who laie at that present in the low countrie of Flanders, not farre from Calis.

The bishop of Winchester, and sir Thomas Louell, whome the king counselled and debated with vpon this ambassage, saw they had a conuenient occasion to prefer the kings chapleine, whose wit, eloquence, and learning, they highly commended to the king. The king commanded them to bring his chapleine before his presence, with whome he fell in communication of great matters, and perceiving his wit to be verie fine, thought him sufficient, commanding him therevpon to prepare himselfe to his iourne: and hauing his depeach, he took his leaue of the king at Richmond about none; & so comming to London about foure of the clocke, where the barge of Graues end was readie to lanch forth, both with a prosperous tide and wind, without anie abode he entered the barge.

Hauing so done, he passed forth with such speed, that he arrived at Graues end within little more than thre houres, where he tarried no longer than his post horses were a prouiding, and then travelled so speedily that he came to Douer the next morning, whereas the passengers were readie vnder saile to Calis, into the which passenger, without tarrieng, he entered, and sailed forth with them, that long before none he arrived at Calis, and hauing post horses, departed from thence with such speed, that he was that night with the emperoz, and disclosed the whole summe of his ambassage to the emperoz, of whome he required speedie expedition, the which was granted him by the emperoz, so that the next daie he was clerlie dispatched with all the kings requests fullie accomplished.

At which time he made no longer delate, but took post horses that night, and rode toward Calis, conducted thither with such persons as the emperoz had appointed; and at the opening of the gates of Calis, he came thither, where the passengers were as readie to returne into England, as they were before at his iourne forthward, insomuch that he arrived at Douer by ten of the clocke before none, and hauing post horses, came to the court at Richmond the same night, where he taking some rest untill the morning, repaired to the king at his first comming from his bedchamber to his closet, whom when the king saw, he checked him, for that he was not on his iourne: Sir (quoth he) if it may please your highnesse, I haue already bene with the emperoz, and dispatched your affaires (I trust to your graces contentation) and with that presented vnto the king his letters of credence from the emperoz.

The king being in a great maze and wonder of his speedie returne and proceedings, dissembled all his wonder, and demanded of him whether he encountered not his pursuuant the which he sent vnto him, supposing him not to be out of London, with letters concerning a verie necessarie matter, neglected in their consultation: Pea so forth (quoth the chapleine) I met with him yesterday by the waie, and hauing no vnderstanding by your graces letters of your pleasure, haue notwithstanding bene so bold vpon mine owne discretion (perceiving that matter to be verie necessarie in that behalfe) to dispatch the same. And so much as I haue excused your graces commission, I most humble require your graces pardon. The king reioicing not a little, said: We do not onlie pardon you thereof, but also giue you our princelie thanks, both for the proceeding therein, and also for your good and speedie exploit, commanding him for that time to take his rest, and repaire againe after dinner for the further relation of his ambassage.

The ambassado: when he saw time, repaired before the king and councell, where he declared the effect of all his affaires so exactlie, with such grauitie and eloquence, that all the councell that heard him, commended him, esteeming his expedition to be almost beyond the capacite of man. The king gaue him at that time the deaerie of Lincolne. From thence forthward he grew more and more into estimation and authoritie, and after was promoted by the king to be his almoner. After the death of king Henrie the seventh, and in the flourishing youth of king Henrie the eight, this almoner handled himselfe so politike, that he soon found the means to be made one of the kings councell, and to grow in fauor with the king, to whome the king gaue an house at Whitehall in Fleetstreet, sometime sir Richard Empsons, where he kept house for his familie; and so daile attended vpon the king, and in his especial fauor, who had great sute made vnto him.

His sentences & wittie persuasions in the council chamber were alwaies so pitthe, that the councell (as occasion moued them) continualie assigned him to

to be the expositor to the king in all their proceedings, in whom the king received such a leaning fantasie, for that he was most earnest and readiest of all the counsell to advance the kings will and pleasure: the king therefore esteemed him so highly, that all the other counsellors were put from the great favor that they before were in, insomuch that the king committed all his will unto his disposition, which the almoner perceiving, took upon him therefore to discharge the king of the weightie and troublesome business, persuading the king that he should not need to spare any time of his pleasure for any business that should happen in the counsell.

And whereas the other counsellors would divers times persuade the king to have sometime recourse into the counsell chamber, there to heare what was done; the almoner would persuade him to the contrary, which delighted him much: and thus the almoner ruled all them that were before him, such did his policie and wit bring to passe. Who was now in high favor: but master almoner: And who ruled all under the king, but master almoner: Thus he persecuted in favor, untill at last in came presents, gifts, and rewards so plentifullie, that he lacked nothing that might either please his fantasie, or enrich his coffers.

And thus proceeding in fortunes blissfullnesse, it chanced the warres betwene the realmes of England and France to be open, insomuch as the king was fullie persuaded in his most roiall person to invade his forein enemies with a puissant armie; wherefore it was necessarie that this roiall enterprise should be speedilie provided and furnished, in every degree of things apt & convenient for the same, for the expedition wherof the king thought no mans wit so meet for policie and painefull travail, as was his almoner, to whom therefore he committed his whole trust therein, and he took upon him the whole charge of all the business, and brought all things to good passe in a decent order, as all manner of vittels, provisions, and other necessaries convenient for so noble a voiage and armie.

All things being by him perfected, the king advanced to his roiall enterprise, passed the seas, and marched forward in good order of battell, untill he came to the strong towne of Teruine, to the which he laid his siege, and assailed it verie strongly continually with such vehement assaults, that within short space it was yielded unto his maiestie, unto the which place the emperor Maximilian repaired unto the king with a great armie like a mightie prince, taking of the king his graces wages: which is a rare thing, and but seldom seen, an emperor to fight under a kings banner.

Thus after the king had obtained this puissant fort and taken the possession thereof, and set all things there in due order, for the defense and preservation thereof to his use, he departed thence, and marched toward the citie of Torneie, and there laid his siege in like manner, to the which he gave so fierce & sharpe assault, that they were constrained of fine force to render the towne unto his victorious maiestie: at which time the king gave the almoner the bishopricke of the same see, towards his paines and diligence furnished all things agreeable to his will and pleasure, and furnished the same with noble capteines & men of warre for the safeguard of the towne, he returned againe into England, taking with him divers noble personages of France being prisoners, as the duke of Longue, and vicount Clarimont, with others which were taken there in a skirmish.

After whose returne, immediatlie the see of Lincoln fell void, by the death of doctor Smith late bishop there, the which benefice his grace gave to his almoner, late bishop of Torneie elect, who was not negligent to take possession thereof, and made all the speed he could for his consecration: the solemnization wherof ended, he found means that he gat the possession of all his predecessors goods into his hands. It was not long after that doctor Benylike archbishop of York died at Rome, being there the kings ambassadoz, unto the which see the king immediatlie presented his late and new bishop of Lincoln; so that he had these bishoprics in his hands in one gave given him.

Then prepared he for his translation from the see of Lincoln, unto the see of York, after which solemnization done, he being then an archbishop Primas Anglia, thought himselfe sufficient to compare with Canturburie, and thereupon erected his crosse in the court, and everie other place, as well within the precinct and jurisdiction of Canturburie, as in any other place. And forsomuch as Canturburie claimeth a superiortie over York, as over all other bishoprics within England, and for that cause claimeth as a knowledge of an ancient obedience of York, to abate the advancing of his crosse, in presence of the crosse of Canturburie: notwithstanding, the archbishop of York nothing minding to desist from bearing thereof, in manner as I said before, caused his crosse to be advanced, as well in the presence of Canturburie as elsewhere. Wherefore Canturburie being moved therewith, gave unto York a certaine checke for his presumption, by reason wherof, there ingendered some grudge betwene York and Canturburie; York intending to provide some such means, that he would be rather superior in dignitie to Canturburie, than to be either obedient or equall to him. Wherefore he obtained to be made priest cardinal, and Legatus de latere: unto whom the pope sent a cardinals hat with certaine bulls for his authoritie in that behalf. Yet you shall understand, that the pope sent him this worthy hat of dignitie, as a reward of his honor and authoritie, the which was conveyed in a barlets budget, who seemed to all men to be but a person of small estimation.

Wherefore York being advertised of the basenes of this messenger, & of the peoples opinion, thought it mete for his honor, that this reward should not be conveyed by so simple a person, and therefore caused him to be stopped by the wale immediatlie after his arrival in England, where he was newlie furnished in all manner of apparell with all kind of costlie silks, which seemed decent for such an high ambassadoz, and that done, he was encountered upon Blackheath, and there received with a great assemblie of prelates, and lustie gallant gentlemen, and from thence conducted thorough London with great triumph. Then was great and speedie preparation made in Westminster abbey, for the confirmation and acceptance of this high order and dignitie, the which was executed by all the bishops and abbats about or nigh London, with their rich miters and copes, and other ornaments, which was done in so solemn wise, as had not bene seen the like, unlesse it had bene at the coronation of a mightie prince or king. Obtaining this dignitie, he thought himselfe meet to beare rule among the temporall power, & among the spirituall jurisdiction: wherfore, remembering as well the taunts sustained of Canturburie, as having respect to the advancement of his honorable honor & promotion, he found the means with the king, that he was made lord chancellor of England, and Canturburie which was chancellor dismissed, who had continued in that some long since before the decesse of Henrie the seventh. Now being in possession of the chancellorship, and induced with the promotions of the archbishop, & cardinal

dinall De Latere, hauing power to correct Canturburie, and all other bishops and spirituall persons, to assemble his conuocation when he would assigne, he took upon him the correction of matters in all their iurisdiccions, and visited all the spirituall houses, hauing in euerie diocesse all maner of spirituall ministers, as commissaries, scribes, apparatores, and all other officers to furnish his courts, and presented by pteuention whome he pleased vnto all benefices throughout all this realme.

Thomas wolfe bishop of Winchester, he had also these other bishopricks in his hands as it were in faine.

And to the aduancing further of his legantine iurisdiction and honor, he had masters of his faculties, masters Ceremoniarum, and such other, to the glorifying of his dignitie. Then had he his two great crosses of silver, the one of his archbishopricke, the other of his legacie, borne before him whither soeuer he went or rode, by two of the tallest priests that he could get within the realme. And to increase his gaines, he had also the bishopricke of Durham, and the abbete of saint Albons in commendation. And after, when doctor For bishop of Winchester died, he surrendered Durham into the kings hands, and took to him Winchester. Then had he in his hand (as it were in faine) the bishopricks of Bath, Worcester, & Hereford, for so much as the incumbents of them were strangers, and made their abode continually beyond the seas in their owne countreies, or else at Rome, from whence they were sent in legation to this realme vnto the king, and for their reward at their departure, king Henrie the seventh gaue them those bishopricks.

But they being strangers, thought it more meet for the assurance to suffer the cardinal to haue their benefices for a conuenient sum of monie paid them yearelie, where they remained, than either to be troubled with the charges of the same, or to be yearelie burthened with the conuenance of their reuenues vnto them: so that all the spirituall linings and presentations of these bishopricks were fullie in his disposition, to prefer whom he liked. He had also a great number dailie attending vpon him, both of noblemen & gentle men, with no small number of the tallest yeomen that he could get in all the realme, in so much that well was that nobleman and gentleman, that could preferre a tall yeoman to his service.

He shall vnderstand, that he had in his hall continually three bords kept with three severall principall officers, that is to saie, a steward which was alwaies a priest; a treasurer a knight; and a comptroller an esquier; also a cofferer being a doctor; three marshals; three yeomen officers in the hall, besides two gromes, and almoners. Then in the hall kitchen, two clerks of the kitchen; a clearkie comptroller; a suruetoer of the dore; a clearkie of the spicerie, the which together kept also a continuall messe in the hall. Also in his hall kitchen he had of master cooks two, and of other cooks, laborers and children of the kitchen, twelue persons; foure yeomen of the scullerie, and foure yeomen of the silver scullerie; two yeomen of the pastrie, with two other passellers vnder the yeomen.

Then in his priuite kitchen a master coke, who went dailie in velvet or in sattin, with a chaine of gold, with two other yeomen and a grome: in the scalding house, a yeoman and two gromes: in the pantrie two persons: in the butterie two yeomen, two gromes, and two pages: and in the pewrie likewise: in the cellar three yeomen, and three pages: in his chandrie two: in the wafarie two: in the wardrobe of beds, the master of the wardrobe, and ten other persons: in the laundrie, a yeoman, a grome, thirtie pages, two yeomen purueioers, & one grome: in the bake-house, a yeoman and two gromes: in the wood-yard a yeoman, and a grome: in the barne one: in the garden a yeoman and two gromes: porters at the gate, two yeomen, and two gromes: a yeoman of his barge: and a master of his horse: a clearkie of the stable, a yeoman of the same: the fadler: the ferrier: a yeoman of his chariot: a sumpter man: a yeoman of his stirrop: a muleter: firtene gromes of his stable, euerie of them kept foure geldings.

In the almozie a yeoman and a grome: in his chapel he had a deane, a great dinine, and a man of excellent learning: a subdoane: a repeater of the quire: a gospeller: a piffler: of singing priests ten: a master of the children: seculars of the chapel, singing men twelue: singing children ten, with one servant to await vpon the children: in the reuerberie a yeoman, and two gromes, ouer and besides diuerse retainers that came thither at principall feasts, for the furniture of his chapel, it passeth my capacitie to declare the number of costlie ornaments and rich jewels that were to be occupied in the same continually: there hath bene scene in procession, about the hall, foure and fortie verie rich coapes of one sute two: besides the rich crosses and candlesticks, and other ornaments to the furniture of the same.

He had two crossbearers, and two pillbearers in his great chamber: and in his priuite chamber these persons: first the chiefe chamberleine, and vicechamberleine: of gentlemen vshers, besides one in his priuite chamber, he had twelue dailie waiters; and of gentlemen waiters in his priuite chamber he had six, and of lords nine or ten, who had each of them two men allowed them to attend vpon them, except the earle of Darbie, who had allowed five men: then had he of gentlemen, of cupbearers, caruers, and sewers, both of the priuite chamber, and of the great chamber, with gentlemen dailie waiters there, fortie persons: of yeomen vshers six: of gromes in his chamber eight: of yeomen in his chamber five and fortie dailie: he had also almes men sometime more in number than other sometime.

There was attending on his bord of doctors and chapleins, besides them of his chapel, firtene dailie: a clearkie of his closet: secretaries two: and two clerks of his signet: and foure counsellors learned in the law. And for so much as it was necessarie to haue diuerse officers of the Chancerie to attend vpon him, that is to saie, the clerke of the crowne: a reading clearkie: a clearkie of the hamper: and a chafer of the war: then a clearkie of the cheke, aswell vpon the chapleins, as of the yeoman of his chamber: he had also foure footmen which were garnished in rich running coats, whensoever he rode in anie tourneie: then had he an herald of armes: and a sergeant of armes: a physician: an apothecarie: foure minstrels: a keeper of his tents: an armorier: an instructor of his wards: two yeomen of the wardrobe of his robes: and a keeper of his chamber continually in the court: he had also in his house the suruetoer of Dorke, and a clearkie of the greene cloth.

All these were dailie attending, doorne lieng and vprising, and at meales: he kept in his great chamber a continuall bord for the chamberers and gentlemen officers, hauing with them a messe of the pong lords, and another of gentlemen. Besides all these, there was neuer an officer, gentleman, or worthy person, but he was allowed in the house, some three, some two, and all other one at the least, which grew to a great number of persons. Thus farre out of the checker roll, besides other officers, seruants, retainers, and suters, that most commonlie dined in the hall. After that he was thus furnished, he was sent twice in ambassage to the emperor Charles the first, for diuerse urgent causes touching the kinges maiestie; maistie, it was thought, that so noble a prince (the cardinal) was most meet to be sent: wherefore being ready to take upon him the charge thereof, he was furnished in all degrees and purposes, most like a great prince.

For first he proceeded forth furnished like a cardinal: his gentlemen being verie manie in number, were clothed in luerie coats of crimlin beluet of the best, with chaines of gold about their necks, and his yeomen and meane officers in coats of fine scarlet, garded with blacke beluet an hand broad. Thus furnished, he was twise sent into Flanders to the emperor then lying in Bruges, whome he did most highlie intertaine, discharging all his charges and his mens. There was no house within the towne of Bruges, wherein anie gentleman of the cardinals was lodged, or had recourse, but that the owners were commanded by the emperours officers, that they, upon paine of their liues, should take no morie for anie thing that the cardinals seruants did take of anie kind of vittels, no although they were disposed to make anie costlie bankets.

Commanding furthermore their said hostes, to see that they lacked no such things as they honestlie required for their honestie and pleasure. Also the emperours officers euerie night went through the towne from house to house, whereas anie English gentlemen did repast or lodge, and serued their liueries for all night, which was done in this maner. First, the officers brought into the house a cart of fine manchot, and of siluer two great pots with white wine, and sugar to the weight of a pound: white lights and yello lights of wax: a boll of siluer with a goblet to drinke in, and euerie night a staffetoch: this was the order of the liueries euerie night. And in the morning, when the same officers came to fetch abate their stuffe, then would they account with the hostes for the gentlemen's costs spent in the daie before. Thus the emperor intertained the cardinal and all his traine for the time of his ambassage there. And that done, he returned into England with great triumph.

Now of his order in going to Westminster hall daile in the tearme. First per he came out of his private chamber, he heard seruice in his closet, and there said his seruice with his chapleine; then going againe to his private chamber, he would demand if his seruants were in a readinesse, and furnished his chamber of pefence, and waiting chamber. Being thereof then aduertised, he came out of his private chamber about eight of the clocke, apparelled all in red, that is to say, his upper garment either of fine scarlet, or else fine crimlin taffata, but most comonlie of fine crimlin sattin ingrained, his pillion of fine scarlet, with a necke set in the inner side with blacke beluet, and a tippet of fables about his necke, holding in his hand an orange, whereof the substance within was taken out, and filled up againe with the part of a sponge, wherein was vineger and other confections against the pestilent aires, the which he most commonlie held to his nose when he came among anie ptease, or else that he was pestered with manie sufers.

Before him was borne first the broad scale of England, and his cardinals hat, by a lord, or some gentleman of worship, right solemnelie: as some as he was once entered into his chamber of pefence, his two great crosses were there attending to be borne before him: then cried the gentlemen officers, going before him bare headed, and said: On before my lords and maisters, on before, make waie for my lords grace. Thus went he downe through the hall with a sergeant of armes before him, bearing a great mace of siluer, and two gentlemen carleng two great pillars of siluer. And when he came at the hall doze, there was his mule, being trapped all in crimlin beluet, with a saddle of the same stuffe, & gilt stirrups. Then was there attending upon him when he was mounted, his two crosse-bearers: & his pillar-bearers in like case upon great horses, trapped all in fine scarlet. Then marched he forward with a traine of noble men and gentlemen, hauing his footmen foure in number about him, bearing ech of them a gilt pollax in their hands.

Thus passed he forth untill he came to Westminister hall doze, and there lighted, and went by after this maner into the Chancerie, or into the Starre-chamber: howbeit, most commonlie he would go into the Chancerie, and stae a while at a barre made for him beneath the Chancerie on the right hand, and there commune sometime with the iudges, and some time with other persons: and that done, he would repaire into the Chancerie, and sitting there untill eleuen of the clocke, hearing of sutes, and determining of other matters, from thence he would diuers times go into the Starre-chamber, as occasion serued. There he neither spared high nor low, but iudged euerie state according to his merits and deserts.

He used also euerie fundaie to resort to the court, then being for the most part of all the yeare at Grenewich, with his former triumphs, taking his barge at his owne staires, furnished with yeomen standing upon the bails, and his gentlemen being within about him, and landed againe at the three cranes in the Wintrie: and from thence he rode upon his mule with his crosse, his pillars, his hat and broad scale carried afore him on horsebacke through Chames street, untill he came to Billingsgate, and there took his barge againe, and so was rowed to Grenewich, where he was receiued of the lords and chiefe officers of the kings house, as the treasurer, comptroller and others, and so conueied unto the kings chamber. Then the court was wonderfullie furnished with noblemen and gentlemen: and after dinner among the lords, hauing some consultation with the king or with the counsell, he would depart homeward with the like triumph.

Thus in great honour, triumph, and glorie, he reigned a long season, ruling all things within the realme appertaining unto the king. His house was resorted to with noblemen and gentlemen, feasting and banketting ambassadoys diuerse times, and all other right noblie. And when it pleased the king for his recreation to repaire to the cardinals house (as he did diuerse times in the yeare) there wanted no preparations or furniture: bankets were set forth with maskes and mummeries, in so gorgeous a sort and costlie maner, that it was an heauen to behold. There wanted no dames or damosels meet or apt to danse with the maskers, or to garnish the place for the time: then was there all kind of musike and harmonie, with fine voices both of men and children.

On a time the king came suddenlie thither in a maske with a dozen maskers all in garments like shepheards, made of fine cloth of gold, and crimosin sattin pained, & caps of the same, with visards of good phynomie, their haire & beards either of fine gold-wire silke, or blacke silke, hauing sixteen torch-bearers, besides their drums and other persons with visards, all clothed in sattin of the same color. And before his entring into the hall, he came by water to the water gate without anie noise, where were laid diuerse chambers and guns charged with shot, and at his landing they were shot off, which made such a rumble in the aire, that it was like thunder: it made all the noblemen, gentlemen, ladies, and gentlewomen, to muse what it should meane, comming so suddenly, they sitting quiet at a solemne banquet, after this sort.

First ye shall vnderstand, that the tables were set in the chamber of presence iust covered, & the lord cardinal sitting under the cloth of estate, there hauing all his seruice alone: and then was there set a table with a noble man, or a gentleman and a gentlewoman throughout all the tables in the chamber on the one side, which were made and ioined as it were but one table, all which order and deuise was done by the lord Sandes then lord chamberleine to the king and by sir Henrie Wilford comptrollo: of the kings maiesties house. Then immediatlie after the great chamberleine, and the said comptrollo, sent to looke what it shoulde meane (as though they knew nothing of the matter) who looking out of the windowes into the Thames, returned againe and shewed him, that it seemed they were noblemen and strangers that arrived at his bidge, comming as ambassadours from some forren prince.

knew not that the king was in the number.

With that (quoth the cardinal) I desire you, because you can speake French, to take the paines to go into the hall, there to receiue them according to their estates, and to conduct them into this chamber, where they shall see vs, and all these noble personages being met at our banquet, desiring them to sit downe with vs, and to take part of our fare. Then went he incontinent downe into the hall, whereas they receiued them with twentie new torches, and conueied them vp into the chamber, with such a noise of drums and flutes, as seldome had bene heard the like. At their entring into the chamber two and two together, they went directlie before the cardinal, where he sat and saluted him reuerentlie.

reuerentlie saluted
the maskers.

To whom the lord chamberleine for them said: Sir, for as much as they be strangers, and can not speake English, they haue desired me to declare vnto you, that they hauing vnderstanding of this your triumphant banquet, where was assembled such a number of excellent dames, they could doe no lesse vnder support of your grace, but to repaire hither, to view as well their incomparable beautie, as for to accompanie them at mum-chance, and then to danse with them: and sir, they require of your grace licence to accomplish the said cause of their coming. To whom the cardinal said he was verie well content they should so doe. Then went the maskers, and first saluted all the dames, and returned to the most worthie, and there opened their great cup of gold filled with crownes and other peeces of gold, to whome they set certeine peeces of gold to cast at.

playeth at dice.

Thus perusing all the ladies and gentlewomen, to some they lost, and of some they wone: and marking after this maner all the ladies, they returned to the cardinal with great reuerence, potwring downe all their gold so left in their cup, which was about two hundred crownes: At all (quoth the cardinal) and so cast the dice and wan them, whereat was made a great noise and ioy. Then quoth the cardinal to the lord chamberleine, I praye you (quoth he) that you would shew them, that me seemeth there should be a nobleman amongst them, who is more meet to occupie this seat and place than I am, to whome I would most gladlie surrender the same according to my dutie, if I knew him.

He suspecteth that the king is present and abatch his estate.

Then spake the lord chamberleine to them in French, and they rounding him in the eare, the lord chamberleine said to my lord cardinal: Sir (quoth he) they confesse, that among them there is such a noble personage, whome, if your grace can appoint him out from the rest, he is content to disclose himselfe, and to accept your place. With that the cardinal taking good aduicement among them, at the last (quoth he) me seemeth the gentleman with the blacke beard, should be even he: and with that he arose out of his chaire, and offered the same to the gentleman in the blacke beard with his cap in his hand. The person to whom he offered the chaire was sir Edward Penill, a comelie knight, that much more resembled the kings person in that maske than any other.

The king perceiuing the cardinal so deceived, could not forbear laughing, but pulled downe his visar and master Penellsaid, and dashed out such a pleasant countenance and there, that all the noble estates there assembled, perceiving the king to be there among them, reioiced verie much. The cardinal estons desired his highnesse to take the place of estate. To whom the king answered, that he would go first and thist his apparell, and so departed into my lord cardinals chamber, and there new apparelled him: in which time the dishes of the banquet were cleane taken vp, and the tables spred againe with new cleane perfumed cloths, euerie man and woman sitting still, vntill the king with all his maskers came among them againe all new apparelled.

Then the king toke his seat vnder the cloth of estate, commanding euerie person to sit still as they did before: in came a new banquet before the king, and to all the rest throughout all the tables, wherein were serued two hundred diuers dishes, of costlie deuises and subtilties. Thus passed they forth the night with banquetting, dancing, and other triumphs, to the great comfort of the king, and pleasant regard of the nobilitie there assembled. And thus spent this cardinal his time from daie to daie, and yeare to yeare, in such wealth, ioy, triumph, and glorie, hauing alwaies on his side the kings especiall fauour, vntill fortune cruicd his prosperitie, and ouerthrew all the foundations of his glorie, which as they were laid vpon sand, so they thwonne and slipt awaie, whereby ensued the ruine of his estate, euen to the verie losse of his life, which (as a man of a guiltie conscience, and fearing capitall punishment due by law for his vndutifull demeanour against his souereigne) Edward Hall saith (vpon report) he partly procured, willinglie taking so great a quantitie of a strong purgation, as nature was therewith oppressed, and vnable to digest the same; so that in fine he gaue vp the ghost, and was buried in Leicester abbete: of whome to late more I will surceale, concluding onelie with a description which I find of him not impertinent for this place, sith wholie concerning his person.

This cardinal (as you may perceiue in this storie) was of a great stomach, for he compted himselfe equall with princes, & by craftie suggestion gat into his hands innumerable treasure: he forced little on simonie, and was not pittifull, and stood affectionate in his owne opinion: in open presence he would lie and saie vntruth, and was double both in speech and meaning: he would promise much & performe little: he was vicious of his bodie, & gaue the clergie euill example: he hated soze the citie of London & feared it: it was told him that he should die in the waie toward London, wherefore he feared least the commons of the citie would arise in riotous maner and so slaie him, yet for all that he died in the waie toward London, carrieng more with him out of the world than he brought into it; namelie a winding sheete, besides other necessaries thought meet for a dead man, as chistian comelinesse required. This ruine of the cardinal was not so much as once dreamt vpon, when I. Leland the famous antiquarie wrote this welwishing oration vnto the said Wolfeie (being then in the flower of his glorie, and the pearle of his pride) as hereafter followeth.

After the cardinall was dead, the king remained from Hampton court to Greenwich, where he with quene Katharine kept a solemne Christmasse, and on the Twelſe night he sat in the hall at his estate, whereas were diuerſe enterludes, rich masks and diſports, and after that a great banquet. Now after Christmas he came to his manour of Westminster, which before was called Poike place: for after that the cardinall was atainted in the premunire, & was gone northward, he made a feoffment of the same place to the king, and the chapiter of the cathedrall church of Poike by their writing confirmed the same feoffment, & then the king changed the name and called it the kings manor of Westminster, and no more Poike place.

in danger of a communitie

The whole cleargie of England euer supported and maintained the power legantine of the cardinall, wherefore the kings learned counsell said plainly that they were all in the premunire: the spirituall lords were called by proceſſe into the kings Bench to answer, but before their date of appearance they in their comocacion concluded an humble ſubmiſſion in writing, and offered the king a hundred thousand pounds to be their god lord, & also to give them a pardon of all offences touching the premunire by act of parlement, the which offer with much labour was accepted, and their pardon promised. In this ſubmiſſion the cleargie called the king ſupream head of the church of England, which thing they neuer confessed before, whereupon manie things ſolowed after, as you ſhall heare.

1551

When the parlement was begun the first daie of January, the pardon of the spirituall persons was ſigned with the kings hand, and ſent to the lords, which in time conſentient aſſented to the bill, and ſent it to the commons in the lower house. Now when it was read, diuers ſtoward persons would in no wiſe aſſent to it except all men were pardoned, ſaieing that all men which had anie thing to do with the cardinall were in the same caſe. The wiſer ſort answered, that they would not compeſſe the king to give them his pardon, & beſide that it was uncharitable done of them to hurt the cleargie, and do themselves no good: wherefore they aduised them to conſent to the bill, and after to ſue to the king for their pardon, which counſell was not ſollowed, but they determined first to ſend the ſpeaker to the king: per they would aſſent to the bill.

Thom. Audleie ſpeaker for the commons.

Whereupon Thomas Audleie ſpeaker for the commons, with a conuenient number of the common house, came to the kings preſence, and there eloquentlie declared to the king, how the commons ſore lamented and bewailed their chance, to thinke or imagine themselves to be out of his gracious fauor, becauſe that he had grationlie given his pardon of the premunire to his spirituall ſubiects and not to them: wherefore they moſt humbly beſought his grace of his accuſtomed godneſſe and clemencie to include them in the same pardon. The king wiſelie answered that he was their prince and ſouereigne lord, and that they ought not to reſtraine him of his libertie, nor to compeſſe him to ſhew his mercie: for it was at his pleaſure to uſe the extremitie of his lawes or mitigate and pardon the same: wherefore ſith they denied to aſſent to the pardon of the spirituall persons, which pardon (he ſaid) he might give without their aſſent by his great ſeale, he would be well aduised yf he pardoned them, becauſe he would not be noted to be compeſſed to it.

The ſentence of the kings waſe answer.

With this answer the ſpeaker and the commons departed verie ſorrowfull and penſiue, and ſome light persons ſaid that Thomas Crumwell, which was newlie come to the fauour of the king, had diſcloſed the ſecrets of the commons, which thing cauſed the king to be ſo extreame. The king like a good prince conſidered how ſorrowfull his commons were of the answer that he made them, and thought that they were not quiet: wherefore of his owne motion he cauſed a pardon of the premunire to be drawne, and ſigned it with his hand, and ſent it to the common house by Chastmaffe Paſed his attorneie, which bill was ſone aſſented to. When the commons louinglie thanked the king, and much praieſed his wit, that he had denied it to them when they unwoorthilie demanded it, and had bountifullie granted it when he perceived that they ſorrowed and lamented.

voluntarie inclination to pardon the premunire.

While the parlement ſat, on the thirtiſth daie of March at aſſemorie, there came into the common house the lord chancelor, and diuerſe lords of the ſpiritualtie and ſemporaltie, to the number of twelue, and there the lord chancelor ſaid: You of this worſhipfull house (I am ſure) be not ſo ignorant, but you know well, that the king our ſouereigne lord hath married his brothers wiſe, for ſhe was both wedded and bedded with his brother prince Arthur, and therefore you may ſuerlie ſaie that he hath married his brothers wiſe. If this marriage be good or no manie clerkes do doubt. Wherefore the king like a vertuous prince willing to be ſatiſfied in his conſcience, & also for the ſueritie of his realme, hath with great deliberation conſulted with profound clerkes, & hath ſent my lord of London here preſent, to the chiefe vniuerſities of all chriſtendome, to know their opinion and iudgement in that behalfe. And although that the vniuerſities of Cambridge and Oxford had bene ſufficient to diſcuſſe the cauſe, yet becauſe they be in his realme, and to auoid all ſuſpicion of partialtie he hath ſent into the realme of France, Italie, the popes dominions and Venecians, to know their iudgement in that behalfe, which haue concluded, written, and ſealed their determinations according as you ſhall heare read: Then ſir Brian Tuke toke out of a box certeine writings ſealed, and read them word by word as after in ſuch tranſlated out of Latine into the Engliſh tong.

Determinations of diuerſe vniuerſities touching the vnlawfulneſſe of the kings marriage, and ſitt the determination of the vniuerſitie of Orleance.

At long ſince there were put forth to vs the college of doctors, regents of the vniuerſitie of Orleance, theſe two queſtions that ſollowe. The firſt, whether it be lawfull by the law of God for the brother to take to wiſe that woman whom his brother hath left: The ſecond, if this be forbidden by the law of God, whether this prohibition of the law of God may be remitted by the pope his diſpenſation: The ſecond college of doctors regents, according to our cuſtome and vſage came manie times together, and did ſit diuerſe times vpon the diſcuſſing of theſe ſeſaid doubts and queſtions, and did examine and weigh as much as we might diuerſe and manie places, both of the old teſtament and the new, and also the interpreters and declarers both of the law of God and the canon law.

After we had weighed & conſidered all things exactlie, with god leiſure and deliberation we haue all determined and concluded, that theſe ſeſaid marriages cannot be attempted, nor enterpriſed, except a man do wrong, and plaine contrarie to the law of God;

God: yea and that although it be done by pardon and sufferance of the pope. And in witnesse of this conclusion and determination, we haue caused this present publike wryting to be signed by the scribe of our said vniuersitie, and to be strengthened & fortified with the seale of the same. Enacted in the chapel of our ladie, the annuntiation, or the good tidings that she had of Christ comming in Orleans, the ycare of our Lord 1529, the 5. date of Aprill.

The determination of the facultie of decrees of the vniuersitie of Paris.

Lawiers of Paris.

In the name of the Lord so be it. There was put forth before vs the deane and college of the right counsellfull facultie of decrees of the vniuersitie of Paris, this question: Whether that the pope might dispense, that the brother might marrie the wife that his brother hath left, if mariage betwene his brother now dead and his wife were once consummate? The deane and college of the said facultie after manie disputations and reasons made of both sides vpon this matter, and after great and long turning and searching of booke, both of the law of God, and the popes law, and of the law ciuill, we counsell and saie that the pope hath no powler to dispense in this foresaid case. In witnesse whereof we haue caused this present wryting to be strengthened with the seale of our facultie and with the signe of our scribe or chiefe bedle. Given in the congregation or assemble at saint John Laterense in Paris the second date of Maie 1530.

The determination of ciuilians and canonists of the vniuersitie of Aniou.

Aniou.

Not long time since there were proposed vnto vs the rector and doctors regents in law canon and ciuill of the vniuersitie of Aniou, these two questions here following, that is to wit; Whether it is vnlawfull by the law of God & the law of nature for a man to marrie the wife of his brother, that is departed without children, so that the mariage was consummate? And againe, whether it is lawfull for the pope to dispense with such mariage? We the aforesaid rector and doctors haue according to our custome and vsage manie times communed together, and sitten to dispute these questions, and to find out the certentie of them. And after that we had discussed and examined manie and diuerse places, as well of the law of God as of the law of man, which seemed to pertain to the same purpose, and after we had brought reasons for both parties, and examined them: all things faithfullie and after good conscience considered, and vpon sufficient deliberation and aduise-ment taken, we define and determine that neither by the law of God nor of nature, it is permitted for any christian man, no not euen with the authoritie of the see apostolike, or with anie dispensation granted by the pope, to marrie the wife that his brother hath left, although his brother be departed without children, after that the mariage is once finished and consummate. And for witness of the aforesaid things, we haue commanded the scribe of our said vniuersitie to signe this present publike instrument, and it to be fortified with the great seale of our vniuersitie. Enacted in the church of saint Peter in Aniou, the ycare of our Lord 1530, the 7 date of Maie.

The determination of the facultie of diuinitie in the vniuersitie of Paris.

Paris.

The deane and the facultie of the holie diuinitie of the vniuersitie of Paris, to all them to whom this present wryting shall come, wissheth safetie in our sauour Iesu Christ, which is the verie true saviour. Where of late there is risen a great controuersie of great difficultie, vpon the marriage betwene the most noble Henrie the eight king of England defender of the faith, and lord of Ireland, &c. and the noble ladie Katharine queene of England, daughter to the catholike king Ferdinand, which mariage was not onelie contract betwene hir and hir former husband, but also consummate and finished by carnall intermeddling.

This question altho was proposed to vs to discusse and examine according to iustice and truth, that is to saie; Whether to marrie hir that one brother dead without children hath left, being so prohibited by the law of God and nature, that it can not be lawfull by the popes dispensation, that any christian man shuld marrie the wife that his brother hath left? We the foresaid deane and facultie calling to our remembrance, how vertuous, and how holie a thing, and how agreeable to our profession, vnto our dutie of loue and charitie it is for vs to shew the waie of iustice and right, of vertue and honestie, to them which desire to lead and passe ouer their life in the law of our Lord with sure and quiet conscience: could not but be readie to satisfie so honest and iust requests: wherevpon after our old wont, we came together vpon our oth in the church of S. Spaturine, and there for the same cause had a solemne masse with deuout prayer to the Holie-ghost.

And also we toke an oth, euerie man to deliuer and to studie vpon the foresaid question, as shoud be to the pleasure of God & according to conscience. And after diuerse & manie sessions or sittings, which were had and continued in the church of saint Spaturine, and also in the college called Sorbon, from the eight date of June to the second date of Iulie; when we had searched and examined through and through, with as much diligence as we could, and with such reuerence and religion or conscience as becometh in such a matter, both the booke of holie scripture, and also the most approued interpreters of the same: finally the generall and synodall counsels, decrees and constitutions of the sacre and holie church, which by long custome hath bene receiued and approbate.

We the foresaid deane and facultie, disputing vpon the foresaid question, and making answer to the same, and that after the iudgement and full consent of the most part of the said facultie, haue concluded and determined, that the foresaid mariage with the brothers wife, departing without children, be so forbidden both by the law of God & of nature, that the pope hath no powler to dispense with such mariages, whether they be contract or to be contract. And for credence, beliefe, and witnesse of this our assertion and determination, we haue caused the seale of our facultie, with our notaries signe, to be put vnto this present wryting. Dated in our generall congregation that we keepe by an oth at saint Spaturines, the ycare of our Lord 1530, the second date of Iulie.

The determination of the vniuersitie of Burges in Berrie or Biturs.

We the deane and facultie of diuinitie in the vniuersitie of Burges (because we will do according to the example of S. Paule doctor of the gentiles, which doth likewise) will begin our wryting with prayer for all the beloued of God, among whom you most deare readers, vnto whom we wryte, be called: grace, peace, and quietnesse of conscience come to you from God the father, and from our Lord Iesu Christ. While we were gathered together together all into one place (in the octaves of Whitsuntide) both in bodie and mind, and were sitting in the house of the said deane, there was a question put to vs againe, which had bene proposed to vs oftentimes before, being no small question, which was this: Whether the brother taking the wife of his brother now dead, and the marriage once consummate and perfect, doth a thing vnlawfull or no?

At the last when we had sought for the truth of the thing, and had perceiued and found it out by much labour and studie of euerie one of vs by himselfe, and by much and often turning of holie booke, euerie one of vs not corrupt, whereby we might the lesse o-brie the truth, began as the holie ghost did put in his mind, to giue euerie man one arbitrement and sentence, which was this. I haue well perceiued in ve-rie truth, without regard or respect of anie person, that those persons which be rehearsed in the 18 chapter of the Leuiticall law, be forbidden by the verie law of nature to contract matrimonie together, and that this law can in no wise be released by anie au-thoritie of anie man, by the which there is made an abominable discovering of his brothers foulenesse.
And this is the signe of our common bedell or notarie, and the seale of our foresaid facultie put vnto this present writing the 10 daie of June, in the yeare of our Lord 1530. And because the foot of our wi-ting shall be of one forme and fashon with the head, as we began with praier, so let vs end after the example of S. Paule that we spake of before, and saie, 30 the grace and fauour of our Lord Iesu Christ, the charitie and loue of God and the communication of the holie ghost be with you all, Amen.

The determination of the diuines in the popes vniuersitie of Bononie.

GOD best and mightiest taught first the old law and testament with his owne mouth, to foyme and fashon according to loue and charitie the ma-ners and life of men. And secondarilie the same God 40 did take after wards manhood vpon him for to be the redemer of man, and so made the new law or new testament, not onlie to foyme and fashon according to loue and charitie the life and manners of men, but also to take awaie and to declare doubts, the which did arise in manie caies, which when they be once clerelie determined, shall helpe greatlie to perfect vertue and godnesse, that is to saie, to perfect loue and charitie.

Wherefore we thought it euermore, that it should be our part to followe these most holie doctrines and lawes of our father of heauen, and that we lightened by the light of God aboue & of the holie ghost, should giue our sentence and iudgement in high and doubt-full matters, after that we haue once leasurelie and sufficientlie taken aduiseement vpon the cause, and haue clerelie searched out and opened the thing by many reasons and writings of holie fathers, as well for the one part as for the other, doing nothing (as nere as we can) rashlie or without deliberation.
Therefore where certeine great and noble men did instantlie desire vs, that we would with all diligence possible loke for this case that after insuch, & afterwards to giue our iudgement vpon the same, according to most equitie, right, and conscience, thing onelie to the truth.

All the doctors of diuinitie of this vniuersitie, when we had euerie one by himselfe examined the matter at home in our houses, came all together into one place, and there treated vpon it manie daies with as much cunning and learning as we could, we anon looked on the case together, we examined it together, we compared all things together, we handling euerie thing by it selfe, did trie them euen as you would saie by line and rule, we brought forth all maner of reasons which we thought could be brought for the contrarie part, and afterward solved them, yea euen the reasons of the most reuerend father cardinal Caietane, yea and moreover the Decretone-mic dispensation of stirring by the brothers sed, and hostlie all other manner of reasons and opinions of the contrarie part, as manie as seemed to belong to this purpose.

And this question that was asked of vs, was this: Whether it was forbidden onelie by the ordinance of the church, or else by the law of God, that a man might not marrie the wife left of his brother departed without children? And if it were commanded by both the lawes not to be done, whether the pope may dispense with anie man to make such ma-riage? The which question now that we haue examined both by our selfe secretlie, and also openlie as diligentlie and exactlie as we could possible, and discussed it after the best manner that our wits would serue: we determine, giue iudgement, and saie, and as stille as we can we witnesse, and without anie doubt do stedfastlie hold, that this marriage should be horrible, accursed, and to be cried out vpon, and vtterlie abominable not onelie for a chistian man, but for an infidell, vnfaithfull or heathen.

And that it is prohibited vnder greuous paines and punishments by the law of God, of nature, and of man, and that the pope, though that he almost may do all things, vnto whome Christ did giue the keyes of the kingdome of heauen, hath no power to giue a dispensation to anie man for to contract such marriage for anie manner of cause, consideration or suggestion: and all we be readie at all times & in all places to defend & mainteine the truth of this our conclusion. In witnesse whereof we haue made this present writing, and haue fortified the same both with the seale of our vniuersitie, and also with the seale of our college of doctors of diuinitie, and haue subscribed & signed it with our generall and accustomed subscription in the cathedrall church of Bononie, the tenth daie of June, the yeare of our Lord 1530.

The determination of the facultie of diuinitie in the vniuersitie of Padua in Italie.

They that haue written for the maintenance of the catholike faith, affirme that God (best and mightiest) did giue the precepts & commandements of the old law with his owne mouth, to be an example for vs, wherein we might see how we should order our life and manners, and this God had done before he became man: and after that he had put vpon him our manhood, & was become redemer or buier of mankind, he made the new law or testament, and of his mere liberalitie did giue it vs, not onelie for the cause aforesaid; but also to take awaie and declare all manner of doubts and questions that might arise, the which once opened and declared, that their verie true meaning is, to the intent that thereby we might be made perfectlie god, which be greatlie fruitfull vnto vs and wholesome.

And seeing that this was the mind of God in making these lawes, it hath bene our intent, and euermore shall be, as it becometh chistian men, to follow these most solemnne ordinances of the most high workemaster God, & the helpe of his light, that is about the capacitie of nature, to vtter our iudgment in all manner of doubts and hard questions. After we had once considered the thing after the best maner, and had by sufficient leasure made it clere by manie evident reasons of both parties, and by manie authorities

theories of the fathers of the church, determining nothing (as nere as we can) rashlie or without convenient deliberation. Seeing therfore that certeine great orators or ambassadoys did humble require and praeise vs, that we would vouchsafe to search out with all the diligence we could this case following, and afterwards to give our sentence vpon the same, plainlie and simple looking onelie on the truth.

After the doctors of diuinitie of this vniuersitie came togither, and after that we had euerie man examined the thing particularlie in our owne houses, and had beaten it with all learning and cunning that we were able: anon when we were togither, we considered, examined, and weighed all things by themselves, and brought in all maner of reasons, which we thought might by anie meanes be made to the contrarie, and without all colour or cloke did wholie and clerie dissolue them and take them awaie. And amongst all, the dispensation by the law of Deuteronomie, of stirring vp the brothers feed, and all maner other reasons and determinations to the contrarie, that seemed to vs to pertaine anie thing to that purpose, we utterly confuted and dispatched them.

The question that is put vnto vs is this: Whether to marrie the wife of our brother departed without children, is forbidden onelie by the law of the church, or by the law of God also? And if it be forbidden by both these laws, whether the pope maie dispense with anie man for such matrimonie or no? Which question now that we haue discussed it, and as farre as we could, haue made it clere, both priuatlie euerie man by himselfe, and after all togither openlie, we saie, iudge, decree, witnesse, and for a truth affirme, that such marriage is no marriage; yea and that it is abhorred and cursed of euerie christian man, and to be abhominable as a grieuous sinne; and that it is as clere as can be forbidden vnder most cruell penalties by the lawes of nature, of God, and of man; and that the pope, vnto whome the heies of the kingdome of heauen be committed by Christ the sonne of God, hath no power to dispense by the right of law for anie cause, suggestion, or excuse, that anie such matrimonie should be contracted.

For these things which be forbidden by the law of God, be not vnderneath his power, but aboue it; nor he is not the beare of God as concerning those things, but onelie in such things as God hath not determined himselfe in his law; but hath left them to the determination and ordinance of man. And to mainteine the truth of this our sentence and conclusion, and for the most certeine and vndoubted defense of the same, we all of one mind and accord shall at all times and in euerie place be readie. In witnesse whereof we haue made this writing, and haue authorized it with the accustomed seale of our vniuersitie and also of our college of diuines. Dated at Padua in the church of the heremites of saint Augustine the first daie of Iulie, in the yere of our Lord 1530.

The determination of the vniuersitie of Tholose.

Tholose.

There was treated in our vniuersitie of Tholose a verie hard question; Whether it be lawfull for the brother to marrie his which had bene wife to his brother now departed, that without children: There was besides this an other thing that troubled vs verie sore; Whether, if the pope which hath the cure of Christs flocke, would by his dispensation (as men call it) suffer this, that then at the least wile it might be lawfull? The rector of the vniuersitie called to counsell all the doctors regents, that were at that time at Tholose for to shew their minds on this que-

tion, and that not once, but twise: for he iudged that counsell giuing ought not to be hastied nor done vpon head, and that we had need of time and space to doe anie thing conuenientlie and as it ought to be.

At the last there came togither into one place all the best learned and cunningest doctors, both of holie diuinitie, and also doctors that were best learned in both lawes; yea, and finally as manie as had anie experience in anie matter, and were able to doe anie thing either by iudgement and discretion, or by eloquence or their excellent wits; and there did sweare that they would obeie the sacred and holie counsels, and would follow the decrees of the fathers, which no man that hath anie god conscience will violat or breake. And so euerie man said his mind, & the matter was debated and reasoned diffuselie and at large for both parts.

In conclusion, we fell so fast to this point, that this was the sentence and determination that our vniuersitie, with one voice of all, did determine and conclude with most pure and clere conscience, and defiled with no maner of leuen of corruption: That it is lawfull for no man, neither by the law of God, nor by the law of nature, to take his wife that his brother hath left: and seeing that it maie not be done by the law of God nor of nature, we answered all, that the pope can lose no man from that law, nor dispense with him. And as for that thing can not be contrarie to our sentence and verdict, that the brother in old time was compelled by the law of Deuteronomie to marrie the brothers wife departed without issue. For this law was but a shadow and a figure of things to come, which vanished awaie as soone as euer the light and truth of the gospel appeared. And because these things be thus, we haue given our sentence after this forme aboue, and haue commanded the same to be signed by our notarie which is our secretarie, and to be fortified and authorized by the putting to of our authentical seale of our vniuersitie aforesaid, at Tholose the calendrs of first daie of October, the yere of our Lord 1530.

After these determinations were read, there were shewed aboue an hundred books drawn by doctors of strange regions, which all agreed the kings marriage to be vnlawfull, which were not read, for the daie was spent. Then the chancelor said: Now you of this common house maie report in your countries what you haue seene and heard, & then all men shall openlie perceiue, that the king hath not attempted this matter of will and pleasure, as some strangers report, but onlie for the discharge of his conscience and suertie of the succession of his realme: this is the cause of our repaire hither to you, and now will we depart.

When these determinations were published, all wise men in the realme much abhorred that marriage; but women, and such as were more wilfull than wise or learned, spake against the determination, and said that the vniuersities were corrupt and inticed so to do, which is not to be thought. The king himselfe sore lamented his chance, and made no maner of mirth nor pastime as he was wont to do. He dined and reioyced to the quene as he was accustomed, and diminished nothing of his estate, and much loued and cherished their daughter the ladie Marie: but in no wile he would not come to his bed. When Easter began to draw nere, the parlement for that time ended, and was proroged till the last daie of March, in the next yere. In the parlement aforesaid was an act made, that whosoever did poison any person, should be boiled in hot water to the death: which act was made, because one Richard Rouse, in the parlement time had poisoned diuerse persons at the bishop shop of Rochesters place, which Richard, according to the same act, was boyled in Smithfield the teneber wednesdaie following, to the terrible example of all other.

The queene sent the king the following.

When the vniuersitie aforesaid, and a great number of clearks and well learned men had determined the kings marriage to be vnlawfull, detestable, and against Gods law (as you haue heard) the king willing the queene to haue knowledge of the same, sent to hir diuerse lords of the counsell, the last daie of Maie, being the wednesdaie in Whitsun weeke: the which Lords, in hir chamber at Grenewich, declared to hir all the determinations (as you haue heard) and asked hir whether she would (for the quietnesse of the kings conscience) put the matter to foure prelates, and foure temporall lords of this realme, or abide by hir appeal: The queene answered: The king my father which concluded my marriage, I am sure, was not so ignorant but he asked counsell of clearks and well learned men before he married me the second time: for if he had had anie doubt in my marriage, he would not haue disturbed so great a treasure as he did, & then all the doctors in a manner agreed my marriage to be good, inasmuch that the pope himselfe, which knew best what was to be done, did both dispense and ratifie the second marriage, against whose doings I maruell that any person will speake or write.

And as to the determination of the vniuersitie, I am a woman, and lacke wit and learning to answer to them, but to God I commit the iudgement of that, whether they haue done iustlie or parciallie: for this I am sure, that neither the kings father, nor my father would haue condescended to our marriage, if it had bene declared to be vnlawfull. And where you saie that I should put the cause to eight persons of this realme for quietnesse of the kings conscience, I pray God send his grace a quiet conscience. And this shall be your answer: that I saie I am his lawfull wife, and to him lawfullie married, and by the order of holie church I was to him espoused as his true wife (although I was not so worthie) and in that point I will abide till the court of Rome, which was plaie to the beginning, haue made thereof a determination and final ending. With this answer the lords departed to the king, which was sozie to heare of hir willfull opinion, and in especiall that the more trusted in the popes law, than in keeping the precepts of God.]

Proclamation: the merchants.

Forasmuch as merchant strangers, bringing their wares into the realme, did receiue readie monie for them, and euer deliuered the same monie to other merchants by exchange, not emploeing it vpon the commodities of the realme, a proclamation was set forth and made, that no person should make anie exchange, contrarie to the meaning of a statute ordeined in the time of king Richard the second: by reason whereof, clothes and other commodities of this realme shortly after were well sold, till they fell to exchange againe, and that this proclamation was forgotten. After Whitsuntide, the king & the queene remoued to Windsor, and there continued till the fourteenth of Iulie, on the which daie the king remoued to Woodstocke, and left the queene at Windsor, where she remained a while, & after remoued to the Horse, and from thence to Chamsted, whither the king sent to hir diuerse lords, to aduise hir to be conformable to the law of God, shewing sundrie reasons to persuaade hir to their purpose, and one among the rest vsed for that present this communication, as I find it left in writing, in the behoufe of the king.

The king, ex lib. 150 Reg. 23. The king, ex lib. 150 Reg. 23.

Adam, the kings highnesse hath commanded vs repairing vnto you, on his highnesse behalfe to shew vnto you thus much, that his maiestie hauing heretofore sent vnto you a great number of his counsellors and learned men, to declare what great iniuries and wrongs by your procurement and solicitation were and yet be done vnto his maiestie and this his realme, in citing his highnesse in his owne person, or by his proxy to appeare at Rome, to make answer to your sute, contrarie to the determination of all lawes, as not onelie the famous vniuersities of Oxiffendome, as Paris and Aleance, but also as the most part of the learned men here or elsewhere in that facultie asfirme, and as maister deane learned in that facultie can and will testifie vnto you, on his conscience, if it shall please you to heare him, and contrarie also to his estate roiall, and to the priuileges and prerogatives of this his graces realme.

His highnesse perceiuing your grace not to regard their aduertisements in right and iustice, but still to perseuere and continue, and rather increase your inturious procurements and solicitations in that behalfe, is not a little grieved & displeased with your continuance and prosecution of this iniurie and manifest wrong towards his maiestie, and this his graces realme. The continuance of which your vnkind dealing hath compelled his highnesse not onelie to absieine from the sight of you, but also to forbear to receiue anie of your tokens, which do nothing else but renew and refresh his displeasure, inforcing him also to an indignation, to see tokens offered and sent by hir, who continueth in prosecuting of so notable an iniurie and manifest wrong towards his maiestie, & this his realme, perceiuing also what boldnesse other outward princes might take to mistreat his highnesse, when they should vnderstand how his maiestie suffereth himselfe to be wronged by his pretended subiect, and so notable wrong to be done to this his realme.

And vpon this cause and ground, like as the kings highnesse these certeine moneths past, hath disceuered your grace from his presence, so he intendeth yet to continue, and hath commanded vs to shew you, that his pleasure is ye shalbe at your libertie, (as ye shall thinke most commodious) repaire to either of these three places, his manour of Woking, his manour of Chamsted, or the monasterie of Bisham, and there to continue without further molesting of his highnesse with your sutes or requests to the contrary, as wherewith ye shall not preuaile; but more and more molesting and troubling his highnesse, procure his further displeasure towards you.

And though percase the pope shall desist, as perceiuing now the matter of right he will, yet the kings highnesse cannot digest in his stomach this iniurie done, not to be amended or reformed at your graces procurement, but your grace rather saing and instanting the contrarie. And this is the charge, madam, which the kings highnesse hath committed vnto vs, to be spoken vnto you on his highnesse behalfe. And to saie to you as of my selfe, concerning the iniurie of the kings cause, as I haue heretofore said, I shall now repeat and rehearse againe vnto your grace; which is, that your grace being knowne by prince Arthur, ye be not lawfull wife to the kings highnesse our soueraigne lord in my conscience. This speech ended, others of the companie vsed their perswasorie talke to the queene: whose words notwithstanding did so little moue hir, that she stood still in hir first opinion, that she was his true and lawfull wife, and from the same would not by anie meanes be remoued.]

The priests of London being called afoze the bishop that would haue had them contributaries to the payment of the hundred thousand pounds, granted to the king for his pardon of the premunire, kept such a stre

in breaking into the chapel house (where the bishop sat) all at once, and striking and buffeting the bishops servants which gave them evil language, that the bishop was faine to give them his blessing, and suffer them to depart in quiet for that time. But after, upon complaint made to the lord chancelor, diuerse of them and of their partakers were arrested, and committed to prison, to the number of fiftene priests, and five laie men, some to the Tower, and some to the Fleet, and to other places, where they remained long after. ¶ Thomas Wilshe, bachellor of law, was burnt at Dozwich the nineteenth of August, and the fourth of December sir Rics Griffin was beheaded at the Tower hill, and his man named John Hewes was drawne to Tyburne, and there hanged and quartered.

The five and twentieth of Maie, betwene London and Cranesend, were taken two great fishes called whorlepoles, male and female. ¶ In this season, there was in the realme much preaching, one learned man holding against another, namely in the matter of the kings marriage. After Christmas, the parliament began to sit againe, in the which the commons found themselves sore grieved with the crueltie of ordinaries, that called men before them Ex officio. At length, a booke was drawne of all the griefes of the commons, for the cruell demeanour of the cleargie, and the same deliuered to the k. by the speaker; humbly beseeching him in the name of all the commons, to take such direction therein, as to his high wisdom might seeme most expedient. The king answered, that he would take advise, and heare the partie accused speake. He was not so readie to gratifie the commons in their requests, as some thought that he would haue bene, if they had not ticked and refused to passe a statute, which he had sent to them touching wards and primer seasons.

After this, was the parlement prologed till the tenth of Aprill. In this parlement was an act made, that bishops should paie no more annates or monies for their bulles to the pope: for it was proued that there had bene paid for bulles of bishops, since the fourth yeare of Henrie the seventh an hundred thre-score thousand pounds sterling, beside other dispensations & pardons. When the parlement was begun againe after Easter, there was a motion made to helpe the king with monie toward his charges about the edifying of houses, piles, and other fortifications, vpon the borders fore against Scotland, both for better habitation to be had there, & also for the restraint of the Scots that vsed to make inuasions. There was therefore a fifteenth granted, but not enacted at this session, because the king began a pestilence in Westminister, where the parlement was prologed, as ye shall heare in the next yeare.

In this yeare was an old toll demanded in Flanders of Englishmen called the toll of the hound, which is a river and a passage. The toll is twelue pence of a fardell. It had bene often demanded, but neuer paid, insomuch that king Henrie the seventh for the demand of that toll, prohibited all his subiects to keepe anye mart at Antwerpe or Barrow, till it was promised that vpon their returne the said toll should neuer be demanded. The king sent doctor Knight, and others to Calis, whither came the emperours commissioners, and there (vpon talke) the matter was put in suspension for a time. The king hauing purchased of the cardinall after his attendure in the pemuire his house at Westminister, called Poike place, and got a confirmation of the cardinals feoffment thereof, made of the chapter of the cathedraall church of Poike, purchased this yeare also all the medows about saint James, and there made a faire mansion and a park for his greater commoditie & pleasure.

And because he had a great affection to the said house at Westminister, he bestowed great cost in going forward with the building thereof, and changed the name, so that it was after called the kings palace of Westminister.

The fourteenth daie of Maie, the parlement was prologed till the fourth of February next coming. After which prologation, sir Thomas More, chancelor of England, after long sutes made to the king to be discharged of his office, the sixteenth of Maie he deliuered to the king at Westminister the great seale of England, and was with the kings fauour discharged, which seale the king kept till mondaie in Whit-suntwaeke, on which daie he dubbed Thomas Audley speaker of the parlement, knight, and made him lord keeper of the great seale, and so he was called. ¶ The king being informed, that the pope and the French king should meet in the beginning of the next spring at Paris, he thought good for diuerse considerations, to speake with the French king in his owne person, before the pope and he should come together; whereupon it was concluded, that in October following, both the princes should meet betwene Calis and Bullongne. Therefore the king of England sent out his letters to his nobles, prelates, and seruants, commanding them to be ready at Cantuerburie the six and twentieth of September, to passe the seas with him, for the accomplishment of the interuiew betwixt him and the French king.

On the first of September being sundaie, the k. being come to Windsor, created the ladie Anne Bullongne marchionesse of Denbroke, and gave to hir one thousand pounds land by the yeare; and that solemnitie finished, he rode to the college, where after that seruice was ended, a new league was concluded and sworne betwene the king, and the French king, Messire Pomouaie the French ambassado; being present. On the tenth of October, the king came to Douer, and on the eleuenth daie in the morning at thre of the clocke he toke shipping at Douer rode, and before ten of the same daie, he with the ladie marchionesse of Denbroke landed at Calis, where he was receiued with all honour, and lodged at the Eschecker. There came to him while he laie in Calis, diuerse lords from the French court, and amongst other the lord great maister of France, and the archbishop of Roane, which were honorable of him receiued, and with them he toke a daie and place of meeting with the king their maister.

Whereupon the one and twentieth of October, he marched out of Calis, accompanied with the dukes of Poissolke and Suffolke, the marquesses of Dorset and Excester, the erles of Arundell, Erford, Surrey, Essex, Warbie, Rutland, Huntington, and Suffolk, with diuerse vicounts, barons, knights of the garter, and other of the nobilitie and gentlemen freshlie appareled, and richlie trimmed; and coming to the place appointed, he there met with the French king, who was come to receiue him with all honor that might be: and after salutations and embracings vsed in most louing manner, the king of England went with the French k. to Bullongne, and by the waie was encountered by the French kings three sons, and other great lords that attended them, with welcomming the king of England; he them gentlie receiued, and so all this noble company came to Bullongne, where the king of England and his nobles were so noble interteined, feasted, banketed, and cheered, that wonder it was to consider the great plentie of viands, spices, wines, and all other prouision necessarie for man and horse, so that there was no more but aske and haue; and no man durst take anye monie, for the French king paid for all.

The five and twentieth of October, whilst the king laie thus in Bullongne, the French king called a chapter of the companions of his order named St. Michael, of whom the king of England was one, and so there elected the dukes of Suffolke and Suffolke to be companions of the same order: and being brought to the chapter, they had their collars delivered to them, and were sworn to the statutes of the order, their obedience to their sovereign lord allwaie reserved. Thus the two kings laie in Bullongne, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday: and on Friday the five and twentieth of October, they departed out of Bullongne to Calis. Without the towne of Calis about the distance of two miles, the duke of Richmond the kings base son, with a great companie of noble men, which had not bene at Bullongne, met them, and saluting the French king, embraced him in most honorable and courteous manner.

Thus they passed forward, and came to Newham bridge, and so to Calis, where was such provision made for the receiving of them, as well for lodgings, plate, and all such other furniture of household, as also of all sorts of viands, wines, and other necessities, that it seemed wonderfull: in so much as the proportion assigned to the French lords oftentimes was so abundant, that they refused a great part thereof. The French kings traine was twelve hundred horses, or rather above. But there was lodging enough in Calis, not onlie for them, but also for manie other, so that there were about eight thousand persons lodged within the towne in that season. The French king coming thither on the Friday, tarried there till Tuesday the thirtieth of October, and then departed; the king of England accompanying him out of the towne, till he came to enter into the French ground, and there either took leave of other with right princelie countenance, loving behaviour, and so hartie words, that all men resolved that saw them.

Whilst the two kings laie in Calis, the lord Anas de Montmozanck earle of Beaumont, great master of the French kings house, & Philip de Chabot earle of Newblanke, great admirall of France, were admitted into the order of the garter, the king calling a chapter for that purpose, of the knights of that order, at the which the French king was present, and wore a blew mantell, because he was one of the same order. Whilst the king was in the French kings dominion, he had the upper hand, and likewise had the French king in his dominion. And as the French king paid all the Englishmens charges at Bullongne: so did the king of England at Calis. There rose about the same season such soze weather, storms and rigorous winds, continuing for the more part at north and north-west, that the king staid at Calis for a convenient wind till Tuesday the thirtieth of November at midnight, and then taking his ship, landed at Dover the next daie about five of the clocke in the morning. And herewith upon his returne, he married princelie the lady Anne Bullogne the same daie, being the fourteenth daie of November, and the feast daie of saint Erkenwald; which marriage was kept so secret, that verie few knew it till Easter next ensuing, when it was perceived that she was with child.

When the king should passe over the sea, he considered that the Scots would happlie attempt some what to the prejudice of his subjects in his absence, which sicked not (he being within the realme) to rob both by sea and land. Wherefore to resist their malice, he appointed sir Arthur Darcie with three hundred men to go into Berwik, to defend the borders from invasions of the Scots, who shortly after by the middle marches entered the realme, and came to a place called Fowberie, and firing certeine villages in their waie, returned. The erle of Angus as then was at Berwik as a banished man; and the said sir Arthur determined to revenge this displeasure: and thereupon with foure hundred men made a rode into Scotland, and set a village on fire. Then immediatlie assembled together eight hundred Scots, and began to approach nere to the Englishmen, who perceiving them, caused their trumpet to blow the retreat, and the erle and twentie with him shewed himselfe on an hill, even in the face of the Scots, and the trumpet blew at their backs, so that the Scots thought that there had bene two companies, which caused the Scots to flee, and the Englishmen followed and slew a great number of them, and took manie of them prisoners.

After Christmasse sir Thomas Audley lord keeper of the great seale was made high chancelor of England. And when the parlement began, because the office of the speaker was void, Humfreie Wylkynfield of Greis inne was chosen speaker. In this parlement was an act made, that no person should appeale for any cause out of this realme to the court of Rome, but from the commissarie to the bishop, and from the bishop to the archbishop, and from the archbishop to the king; and all causes of the king to be tried in the upper house of the convocation. It was also enacted the same time, that quene Katharine should no more be called quene, but princesse Dowager, as the widow of prince Arthur. In the season of the last summer died William Warham archbishop of Canturburie, and then was named to that sea Thomas Cranmer the kings chapleine, a man of good learning, and of a vertuous life, which larelye before had bene ambassadoe from the king to the pope.

After that the king perceived his new wife to be with child, he caused all officers necessarie to be appointed to hir, and so on Easter euen she went to hir closet openlie as quene; and then the king appointed the daie of hir coronation to be kept on Whitsundaie next following: and writings were sent to all shiriffs, to certifie the names of men of fortie pounds to receive the order of knighthood, or else to make fine. The assessment of the fine was appointed to Thomas Cromwell, master of the kings icwell house, & counsellor to the king, a man newlie received into high favour. He so vied the matter, that a great summe of monie was raised to the kings use by those fines. The matter of the quenes appeale whereunto she still sticked, and by no means could be removed from it, was communed of both in the parlement house, and also in the convocation house, where it was so handled, that manie were of opinion, that not onelie hir appeale, but also all other appeales made to Rome were void and of none effect: for that in ancient times it had bene determined, that a cause rising in one province should be determined in the same.

This matter was opened with all the circumstances to the lady Katharine Dowager (for so was she then called) the which perswaded still in hir former opinion, and would revoke by no means hir appeale to the court of Rome. Whereupon the archbishop of Canturburie accompanied with the bishops of London, Winchester, Bath, Lincoln, and divers other learned men in great number, rode to Dunstable, which is six miles from Amptill, where the princesse Dowager laie, and there by one doctor Lee she was cited to appeare before the said archbishop in cause of matrimonie in the said towne of Dunstable, and at the daie of appearance she appeared not, but made default, and so she was called perempforie euerie daie fiftene daies together, and at the last, for lacke of appearance, by the assent of all the learned men there present, the was dissolved from the king, and the marriage declared to be void and of none effect. Of this divorce and of the kings marriage with the ladie Anne Bullongne men spake diuerse-ly; some said the king had done wiselye, and so as became him to do in discharge of his conscience. Other otherwise iudged, and spake their fantasies as they thought good: but when euerie man had talked inough, then were they quiet, and all rested in good peace.

Ambassadors
to the French
king.

In Maie pope Clement sent an orator to the king, requiring him to appeare personallie at the generall counsell which he had appointed to be kept the yere following. But when his commission was shewed, at the earnest request of the king, there was neither place nor time specified for the keeping of that counsell; and so with an uncerteine answer to an uncerteine demand he departed, but not unrewarded. The king understanding that the pope, the emperor, & the French king shuld meet at Nice in Julie following, appointed the duke of Norfolk, the lord Rochford brother to quene Anne, sir William Boleet controller of his house, sir Anthoine Browne, and sir Francis Wian knights, to go in ambassage to the French king, and both to accompanie him to Nice, and also to commune with the pope there concerning his state in the kings divorce. These worthie personages made their prouision readie; and so with the number of eight score horses they went to Douer, and passing ouer to Calis, toke their waie through France, to accomplish their ambassage as they had in commandement.

In the beginning of Maie, the king caused open proclamations to be made, that all men that claimed to do anie service, or execute anie office at the solemne feast of the coronation by the waie of tenure, grant, or prescription, should put their grant three weekes after Easter in the Starre chamber before Charles duke of Suffolke, for that time high steward of England, and the lord chancellor and other commissioners. The duke of Suffolke claimed to be erle marshall, and to exercise his office at that feast; the erle of Arundell claimed to be high butler, and to exercise the same; the erle of Oxford claimed to be chamberlaine; the vicount Lille claimed to be painter; the lord Aburgauennie to be chiefe larderer; and the lord Wate claimed to be almoner, and sir Henrie What knight claimed to be twer. All these noble personages desired their offices with their fees.

Beside these, the maior of London claimed to serue the quene with a cup of gold, and a cup of assaie of the same, and that twelue citizens should attend on the cupbord, and the maior to haue the cup and cup of assaie for his labor: which petition was allowed. The sixe ports claimed to beare a canopie ouer the quens head the daie of the coronation with foure gilt belles, and to haue the same for a reward, which to them was allowed. Diuerse other put in petie claimers which were not allowed, because they seemed onlie to be done at the kings coronation. All this season great purueiance was made of all manner of vittels: & lords, knights & esquires were sent for out of all countries, which came to London at their daie with a great number of people.

After that the kings highnesse had adressed his gracious letters to the maior and communalitie of the citie, signifying to them, that his pleasure was to solemnize and celebrate the coronation of his most deare and welbeloued wife quene Anne, at Westminster the Whitsundaie next ensuing, willed them to make preparation, as well to fetch hir grace from Greenwich to the Tower by water, as to see the citie ordered and garnished with pageants in places accustomed, for the honor of his grace. When she shuld be conueried from the Tower to Westminster, there was a common counsell called, and commandement was giuen to the haberdashers (of which craft the maior sir Stephan Percocke then was) that they should prepare a barge for the bachelors, with a wafter and a foist, garnished with banners and streamers likewise, as they use to do. When the maior is presented at Westminster on the morrow after Simon and Jude. Also all other crafts were commanded to prepare barges, and to garnish them, not onelie with their banners accustomed, but also to decke them with targets by the sides of the barges, and to set up all such seemelie banners and banners as they had in their halles, or could get met to furnish their said barges, and euerie barge to haue minstrelle: according to which commande-ments great preparation was made for all things necessarie for such a noble triumph.

preparation.

The nineteenth daie of Maie, the maior and his brethren all in scarlet, and such as were knights had collars of SS, and the remnant hauing god chains, and the counsell of the citie with them, assembled at saint Martie hill, and at one of the clocke descended to the new staire to their barge, which was garnished with manie goodlie banners and streamers, and richlie couered. In which barge were shalmes, shagbushes, and diuerse other instruments, which continuallie made goodlie harmonie. After that the maior and his brethren were in their barge, seeing that all the companies to the number of fiftie barges were readie to wait vpon them, they gaue commandement to the companies, that no barge should rowe nether to another than twise the length of the barge vpon a great paine. And to see the order kept, there were three light wheries prepared, and in euerie one of them two officers to call on them to keepe their order, after which commandement giuen, they set forth in order as hereafter is described.

The coming by water from Greenwich
on this daie.

First before the maiors barge was a foist or wafter full of ordinance, in which foist was a great dragon continuallie mouing and casting wild fire: and round about the said foist stood terrible monsters and wild men casting fire, and making hideous noises. Next after the foist a good distance came the maiors barge: on whose right hand was the bachelors barge, in the which were trumpets and diuerse other melodious instruments; the decks of the said barge and the saylards, with the top castles were hangd with rich cloth of gold and silke: at the foreship and the sterne were two great banners rich, beate with the armes of the king and the quene, and on the top castell also was a long streamer netlike beate with the said armes. The sides of the barge was set full of flags and banners of the deuises of the companie of the haberdashers and merchants aduenturers, and the corbs were hangd with innumerable penselles, hauing little belles at the ends, which made a goodlie noise and a goodlie sight, waue- ring in the wind. On the outside of the barge were three dozen sentillions in metall of arms of the king and the quene, which were beate vpon square bucrum diuided, so that the right side had the kings colours, and the left side the quens, which sentillions were fastened on the clothes of gold and siluer, hanging on the decks on the left hand.

On the left hand of the maior was another foist, in the which was a mount, and on the same stand a white falcon crowned, vpon a roste of gold inuolued with white roses and red, which was the quens deuise; about which mount sat virgins singing and plaieng sweetlie. fellowship the haberdashers; next after them the mercers, then the grocers, and so euerie companie in his order, and last of all the maior and shiriffes officers, euerie companie hauing melodie in his barge by himselfe, and goodlie garnished with banners, and some garnished with silke, and some with arras and rich carpets, which was a goodlie sight to behold: and in this order they rowed to Greenwich, to the point next beyond Greenwich, and there they turned backward in another order, that is to wit, the maior and shiriffes officers first, and the meanest craft next, and so ascending to the uttermost crafts in order, and the maior last, as they go to Danles at Christmas, and in that order they rowed downe toward to Greenwich towne, and there cast anchor, making great melodie.

Then came the barge
with the maior attending upon her.

At thre of the clocke the quene appeared in rich cloth of gold, entring into hir barge accompanied with diuerse ladies and gentlewomen: and incontinent the citizens set forwards in their order, their mistresses continuallie plaing, and the bachelors barge going on the quenes right hand, which she took great pleasure to behold. About the quenes barge were manie noble men, as the duke of Suffolke, the marques Dorset, the erle of Willshire hir father, the erles of Arundell, Warbie, Rutland, Worcester, Huntingdon, Sussex, Oxford, and manie bishops and noble men, euerie one in his barge, which was a goodlie sight to behold. She thus being accompanied rowed toward the tower: and in the meane while the ships which were commanded to lie on the shore for letting of the barges, shot diuerse peales of guns, and per the was landed, there was a marvellous shot out of the tower as euer was heard there. And at hir landing there met with hir the lord chamberlaine with the officers of armes, and brought hir to the king, which receiued hir with loving countenance at the postern by the water side, and then she turned backe againe, and thanked the maior and the citizens with manie goodlie words, and so entred into the tower. After which entrie the citizens all this while howred before the tower, making great melodie, and went not on land, for none were assigned to land but the maior, the recorder, and two aldermen. But for to speake of the people that stood on either shore to behold the sight, he that saw it not would scarce beleue it.

Knights of the bath served at dinner.

On Fridaie at dinner served the king all such as were appointed by his highnesse to be knights of the bath, which after dinner were brought to their chambers, and that night were bathed and shiuered, according to the old vsage of England; and the next daie in the morning the king dubbed them according to the ceremonies thereto belonging; whose names infue; the marques Dorset, the erle of Warbie, the lord Cliford, the lord Fitzwater, the lord Hastings, the lord Mounteagle, sir John Howard, the lord Blay, sir Henrie Parker, sir William Willshire, sir Francis Weston, sir Thomas Arundell, sir John Hulton, sir Thomas Pointings, sir Henrie Hauell, sir George Fitzwilliam, sir John Sandall, sir Thomas Trenchard.

So the intent that the hazards should not slide on the pavement, nor that the people should not be hurt by horses, the high streets where the quene should passe were all grauelled from the tower to temple barre, and railed on the one side, with which railed stood the crafts along in their order from Chace church, where the merchants of the shire stood till the little conduit in Cheape, where the aldermen stood: and on the other side of the street stood the constables of the citie, apparelled in velvet and silke, with great staves in their hands, to cause the people to keepe comie and good order. And when the streets were somewhat ordered, the maior clothed in a gowne of crimsin velvet, and a rich collar of S S S, with two footmen clad in white and red damaske, rode to the tower to giue his attendance on the quene, on whom the shiriffes with their officers did wait till they came to tower hill, where they taking their leaue, rode downe the high streets, commanding the constables to see comie and good order kept, and so went and stood by the aldermen in Cheape.

Now before the quene and hir traine should come, Cornhill and Gracious street were hanged with fine scarlet, crimsin, and other grained cloths, and in some place with rich arras, tapistrie, and carpets; and the most part of the Cheape was hanged with cloth of tissue, gold, velvet, and manie rich hangings, which made a goodlie shew, and all the windowes were replenished with ladies and gentlewomen, to behold the quene and hir traine as they should passe by. The first of the quenes companie that set forward were twelue Frenchmen, which were belonging to the french ambassado; clothed in coates of blein velvet, with sleeves of yelloe and blein velvet, and their horses trapped with close trappers of blein sarsenet powdered with white crosses: after them marched gentlemen, esquires and knights two and two: after them the iudges, and after them the knights of the bath in violet gownes, with hoods purpled with minster like doctors; after them abats, then barons; after them bishops, then earls and marqueses; then the lord chancellor of England; after him the archbishop of Yorke, and the ambassado of Venice, after him the archbishop of Canturburie and the ambassado of France, after rode two esquires of honor with robes of estat rolled and woone bauldyke-wise about their necks, with caps of estat, representing the dukes of Normandie & Aquitaine: after them rode the maior of London with his mace and garter in his cote of armes, which maior bare his mace to Westminster hall.

After all these rode the lord William Howard with the marshalles rod, deputie to his brother the duke of Suffolke marshall of England, which was ambassado; then in France: and on his right hand rode Charles duke of Suffolke, for that daie high constable of England, bearing the border of silver appertaining to the office of constableness, and all the lords for the most part were clothed in crimsin velvet, and all the quenes servants or officers of armes in scarlet. Next before the quene rode hir chancellor bareheaded, the sargeants and officers of armes rode on both the sides of the lords. Then came the quene in a litter of white cloth of gold, not covered, nor headed, which was lead by two palfries clad in white damaske downe to the ground, head and all, led by hir footmen. She had on a circot of white cloth of tissue, and a mantell of the same furred with ermine; hir haire hanged downe, but on hir head she had a coiffe with a circlet about it full of rich stones. Over hir was bozne a canopie of cloth of gold, with foure guile-staves and foure silver belles. For the bearing of which canopie were appointed sixteen knights, foure to beare it one space on foot, and other foure another space, according to their owne appointment.

After after the quene rode the lord Borough hir chamberlaine, next after him William Coffin master of the horses, leading a spare horse with a side saddle trapped downe with cloth of tissue. After him rode seauen ladies in crimsin velvet turned by with cloth of gold and of tissue, and their horses trapped with cloth of gold, after them two chariots covered with red cloth of gold. were foure ladies all in crimson beluet. Then rode seauen ladies in the same sute, their horses trappers and all. Then came the third chariot all white, with six ladies in crimson beluet; next after them came the fourth chariot all red with eight ladies also in crimson beluet: after whom folloved thirtie gentlewomen all in beluet and silke in the liverie of their ladies, on whom they gaue their attendance. After them folloved the gard in cotes of goldsmiths worke.

Handyle pageants with the descriptions of their devises.

Thus they rode forth till they came to Fanchurch, where was made a pageant all with children, apparelled like merchants, which welcommed hir to the citie, with two proper propositions both in French and English. And from thence she rode to Gratiouns church corner, where was a colliie and a marvelous cunning pageant made by the merchants of the Stillard, for there was the mount Parnassus with the founteine of Helicon, which was of white marble, and foure streames without pipe did rise an ell high, and met together in a little cup above the founteine, which founteine ran abundantlie racked withenith wine till night. On the mounteine sat Apollo, and at his feet sat Calliope, and on euerie side of the mounteine sat foure muses plaing on severall sweet instruments, and at their feet epigrams and poesies were written in golden letters, in the which euerie muse according to hir propertie praised the quene.

The quene from thence passed to Leaden hall, where was a godlie pageant with a type and a heavenly rose, and under the type was a roset of gold set on a little mounteine intrenched with red roses and white: out of the type came downe a falcon all white & sat upon the roset, and incontinent came downe an angell with great melodie, and set a close crowne of gold on the falcons head. And in the same pageant sat saint Anne with all hir issue beneath hir, and under Marie Cleopha sat hir foure children, of the which children one made a godlie oration to the quene of the fruitfulness of saint Anne and of hir generation, trusting that like fruit should come of hir. Then she passed to the conduit in Cornhill, where were three graces set in a throne, above whom was the spring of grace continually running wine. Above the founteine sat a poet declaring the properties of euerie grace: and that done euerie lady by hir selfe, according to hir propertie, gaue to the quene a severall gift of grace.

An oration made to the quene by one of the children in the pageant.

The conduit in Cheape runneth wine white and claret.

The recorder presenteth a 1000 marks in gold to the quene for a gratuite in the cities behalfe.

That done, she passed by the great conduit in cheape, which was newlie painted with armes of devises: out of the which conduit by a godlie founteine set at the one end ran continually wine both white and claret all that afternoon, and so she rode to the Standard which was richly painted with images of kings and quenes, and hanged with banners of armes, and in the top was marvellous sweet harmonie both of song and instrument. Then she went forward to the crosse, which was newlie gilded, till she came where the aldermen stood, and then master Baker the recorder came to hir with low reverence, making a proper and blessed proposition, and gaue to hir in the name of the citie a thousand marks in a purse of gold, which she thankfullie accepted with manie godlie words, and so rode to the little conduit, where was a rich pageant full of melodie and song.

In this pageant was Pallas, Juno and Minerva, and before them stood Mercurie, which in the name of the three goddesses gaue to hir a ball of gold divided in three, signifying three gifts which the three goddesses gaue to hir, that is to saie, wisdom, riches, and felicitie. As she entered into Paules gate there was a pretie pageant, in which sat three ladies richly clothed, and in a circle on their head was written

Regina Anna prosperi procede & regna. The lady in the middes had a tablet, in the which was written Veniamina coronaberis, and under the tablet sat an angell with a close crotone, and the lady sitting on the right hand had a tablet of silver in which was written, Domine dirige gressus meos, & the third lady had a tablet of gold with letters azure written, Confido in Domino, & under their feet was written in legible letters:

And these ladies cast downe wafers, on the which the two verses were written. From thence she passed to the east end of Paules churchyard against the schole, where stood on a scaffold two hundred children well apparelled, which said to hir diverse godlie verses of poets translated into English, to the honour of the king and hir, which she highlie commended. And when she came to Ludgate, the gate was newlie garnished with gold & silke. And on the leads of saint Martins church stood a godlie quere of singing men and children, which song new balads made in praise of hir. After that she was passed Ludgate, she proceeded toward Fleetstreet, where the conduit was newlie painted, and all the armes and angels refreshed, & the chime melodiously sounding. Upon the conduit was made a towe with foure turrets, and in euerie turret stood one of the cardinal virtues with their tokens and properties, which had severall speeches, promising the quene never to leave hir, but to be aiding and comforting hir: and in the middell of the towre clostellie was such severall solemne instruments, that it seemed to be an heavenly noise, and was much regarded and praised: and beside this the said conduit ran wine claret and red all the afternoon.

So she with all hir companie and the mayor rode forth to Temple barre, which was newlie painted and repared, where stood also diverse singing men and children, till she came to Westminster hall, which was richly hanged with cloth of arras, and new-glased. And in the middell of the hall she was taken out of hir litter, & so led up to the higher deske under the cloth of estate, on whose left hand was a cupboard of ten stages marvellous rich and beautiful to behold: and within a little season was brought to the quene with a solemne service in great standing spice plates, a hold of spice and subtilties with ipocras and other wines, which she sent downe to hir ladies, and when the ladies had drinke, she gaue hartie thanks to the lords and ladies, with the mayor and other that had given their attendance on hir, and so with drew hir selfe with a few ladies to the White hall and so to hir chamber, and there rested hir, and after went into hir barge secretly to the king to his manour of Westminster, where she rested that night.

On Sunday the mayor clad in crimson velvet and with his collar, and all the aldermen and shiriffes in scarlet, and the counsell of the citie took their barge at the stand by seaven of the clocke and came to Westminster, where they were welcomed & brought into the hall by master Treasurer and others of the kings house, and so gaue their attendance till the quene should come forth. Between eight and nine she came into the hall and stood under the cloth of estate, and there waited in the kings chapel, and the monks of Westminster all in rich copes, and manie bishops and abbats in copes and miters, which went into the middell of the hall, and there stood a saloon. Then was there a rare cloth spread from the quenes standing in the hall through the palace and sandwiche, which was railed on both sides to the high altar of Westminster. After that the rare cloth was cast, the officers of armes appointed the order accustomed.

Sunday being whitsun day the first date of June, and the date of hir coronation.

The comite of the coronation of Henrie
the eighth
in
the year 1534.

First went gentlemen, then esquires, then knights, then the aldermen of the cite in their cloaks of scarlet, after them the iudges in their mantels of scarlet and coiffes. Then followed the knights of the bath being no lords, euerie man having a white lace on his left sleeve, then followed barons and vicounts in their parlement robes of scarlet. After them came earls, marquesses and dukes in their robes of estate of crimson velvet furred with ermine powdered according to their degrées. After them came the lord chancellor in a robe of scarlet open before, bordered with lettise: after him came the kings chapell and the monks solemnly singing with procession, then came abbats and bishops mitred, then sargeants and officers of armes, then after them went the mayor of London with his mace and garter in his cote of armes, then went the marquess Dorset in a robe of estate which bare the scepter of gold, and the earle of Arundell which bare the rod of suzerie with the dove both together.

The quene
with a canopy borne by four of the highest porters.

Then went alone the earle of Orford high chamberleine of England which bare the crowne, after him went the duke of Suffolke in his robe of estate also for that daie being high steward of England, having a long white rod in his hand, and the lord William Howard with the rod of the marshallship, and euerie knight of the garter had on his collar of the order. Then proceeded forth the quene in a circot and robe of purple velvet furred with ermine in hir here coiffe and circlet as she had the saturdaye, and over hir was borne the canopy by foure of the five porters, all crimson with points of blue and red hanging on their sleeves, and the bishops of London and Winchester bare up the laps of the quenes robe. The quenes traine which was verie long was borne by the old duchess of Norfolk: after hir followed ladies being lords wives, which had circots of scarlet with narrow sleeves, the best all lettise with bars of borders according to their degrées, and over that they had mantels of scarlet furred, and euerie mantell had lettise about the necke like a neckercher like twice powdered, so that by the powderings their degrée was knowen. Then followed ladies being knights wives in gownes of scarlet, with narrow sleeves without traines, onlie edged with lettise, and likewise had all the quenes gentlewomen.

the coronation
the eighth.

When she was thus brought to the high place made in the middell of the church, betwene the quere and the high altar, she was set in a rich chaire. And after that she had rested a while, she descended downe to the high altar and there prostrate hir selfe while the archbishop of Canturburie said certeine collectes: then she rose, and the bishop annointed hir on the head and on the breast, and then she was led up againe, where after diuerse orisons said, the archbishop set the crowne of saint Edward on hir head, and then deliuered hir the scepter of gold in hir right hand, and the rod of suzerie with the dove in the left hand, and then all the quere song Te Deum, &c. Which done, the bishop took off the crowne of saint Edward being heauie and set on the crowne made for hir. Then went she to saint Edwards shrine and there offered, after which offering done she withdrew hir into a little place made for the nones on the one side of the quere.

The quene
with her ladies companye returned in the same order.

Now in the meane season euerie duchess had put on their bonets a coronall of gold wrought with flowers, and euerie marquess put on a denie coronall of gold, euerie countesse a plaine circlet of gold without flowers, and euerie king of armes put on a crowne of copper and gilt, all which were worn till night. When the quene had a little reposed hir, the companye returned in the same order that they set forth, and the quene went crowned and so did the ladies afore said. Hir right hand was susteyned by the earle of Wiltshire hir father, and hir left hand by the lord Albot deputie for the earle of Shrewesburie and lord Fozinfall his father. Now when she was out of the sanctuary and appeared within the palace, the trumpets played marvellous freshe, then she was brought to Westminster hall, & so to hir withdrawing chamber: during which time the lords, iudges, mayo: and aldermen put off their robes, mantels and clokes, and took their hoods from their necks and cast them about their shoulders, and the lords sat onlie in their circots, and the iudges and aldermen in their gownes. And all the lords that serued that daie serued in their circots and their hoods about their shoulders: also diuerse officers of the kings house being no lords had circots and hoods of scarlet edged with mineuer, as the treasurer, controulloz, & master of the iewel house, but their circots were not gilt.

The attire of the lords all the time that they serued.

While the quene was in hir chamber, euerie lord and other, that ought to do seruice at coronations, did prepare them according to their dutie, as the duke of Suffolke high steward of England which was richly apparelled, his doublet and iacket set with orient pearle, his gowne of crimson velvet imbodered, his courter trapped with a cloth trapper head and all to the ground of crimson velvet, set full of letters of gold of goldsmiths worke, having a long white rod in his hand, on his left hand rode the lord William, deputie for his brother as earle marshall with the marshalls rod, whose gowne was crimson velvet, and his horse trapper purple velvet cut on white sattin imbodered with white lions. The earle of Drenford was high chamberleine, the earle of Essex caruer, the earle of Suffolke sewer, the earle of Arundell chiefe butler, on whom twelue citizens of London did glue their attendance at the cupbord. The earle of Warbie cupbearer, the vicount Aile pantler, the lord of Aburgaine chiefe larder, the lord Haste almoner for him and his coparteners, and the mayo: of Orford kept the buttrie bar, and Thomas Wiat was chiefe eurer for sir Henrie Wiat his father.

When all things were redie, the quene under hir canopy came to the hall, and washed and sat downe in the middell of the table under the cloth of estate. On the right side of the chaire stood the countesse of Orford widow, and on the left side stood the countesse of Gloucester all the dinner season, which diuerse times in the dinner time did hold a fine cloth before the quenes face when she list to spee or do otherwise at hir pleasure. At the tables end sat the archbishop of Canturburie on the right hand of the quene, and in the middell betwene the archbishop and the countesse of Orford stood the earle of Orford with a white staffe all dinner time, and at the quenes feet under the table sat two gentlewomen all dinner time. When all these things were thus ordered, in came the duke of Suffolke and the lord William Howard on horsebacke, and the sargeants of armes before them, and after them the sewer, and then the knights of the bath bringing in the first course which was eightene dishes, besides subtilties and ships made of wax marvellous gorgeous to behold, all which time of seruice the trumpets standing in the window at the nether end of the hall played melodiously.

When hir grace was serued of two dishes, then the archbishops seruice was set downe, whose sewer came equall with the third dish of the quenes seruice on his left hand. After that the quene and the archbishop was serued, the barons of the ports began the table on the right hand next the wall, next them at the table sat the masters and clerks of the Chancerie, and beneath them at the table other doctors and gentlemen. the left hand by the cupbord, was begun by the maior and aldermen, the chamberleine and the counsell of the citie of London, and beneath them sat substantiall merchants, and so downeward other worshipfull persons. At the table on the right hand in the midst of the hall sat the lord chancellor, and other temporall lords on the right side of the table in their circots: and on the left side of the same table sat bishops and abbats in their parlement robes: beneath them sat the iudges, sargeants, & the kings counsell, beneath them the knights of the bath. At the table on the left hand, in the middle part, sat dutchesses, marquesses, countesses, baronesses, in their robes, and other ladies in circots, and gentlewomen in gownes. All which ladies and gentlewomen sat on the left side of the table along, and none on the right side.

Banning at tilt.

When all were thus set, they were incontinent served, and so quicklie that it was maruell: for the seruitors gaue such good attendance, that meat or drinke nor any thing else needed not to be called for, which in so great a multitude was maruell. As touching the fare, there could be deuised no more coselier dishes nor subtilties. The maior of London was served with three and thirtie dishes at two courses, and so were all his brethren, and such as sat at his table. The quene had at hir second course foure and twentie dishes, and thirtie at the third course: & betwene the two last courses, the kings of armes cried larges, in three parts of the hall: and after stood in their place, which was in the bekins at the kings bench. And on the right hand out of the cloister of S. Stephens, was made a little closet, in which the king with diuerse ambassadoes stood to behold the seruice. The duke of Suffolke and the lord William rode often times about the hall, chering the lords, ladies, and the maior and his brethren. After they all had dined, they had wafers and ipocras, and then they washed, and were commanded to rise, and to stand still in their places, before the table on the formes till the quene had washed.

When she had taken wafers and ipocras, the table was taken vp, and the earle of Rutland brought vp the furnap, and laid it at the boards end, which immediately was drawne, and cast by master Rode, marshall of the hall: and the quene washed, and after the archbishop, and when the furnap was drawne off, she arose and stood in the midst of the palace hall: to whom the earle of Suffolke in a goodlie spice plate brought a viall of spice and comets. After him the maior of London brought a standing cup of gold, set in a cup of assaie of gold, and after that she had drinke, she gaue the maior the cup, with the cup of assaie, because there was no leas, according to the claime of the citie, thanking him and all his brethren, for their paine. When she vnder hir canopie departed to hir chamber, and at the entrie of hir chamber, she gaue the canopie with bells and all, to the barons of the ports, according to their claime, with great thanks. Then the maior of London bearing his cup in his hand, with his brethren, went through the hall to their barge, and so did all other noble men and gentlemen, for it was six of the clocke. On mondaie were the tilts at the tilt, before the kings gate, where the maior and his brethren had a goodlie standing: but there were verie few speares broken, by reason the horses would not cope. On wednesdaie, the king sent for the maior and his brethren to Westminster, and there he himselfe gaue to them hartie thanks, with manie goodlie words. On Midsummer daie after, the ladie Marie the French quene died in Suffolke, who was the late wife to Lewes the twelfth, & after married to Charles duke of Suffolke, & was buried at S. Edmundsburie. The king kept his progresse about London, because of the quene. The seventh of September being Sunday, betwene three & foure of the clocke in the afternone, the quene was deliuered of a faire yong ladie, on which daie the duke of Dorset came home to the christening, which was appointed on the Wednesday next following, and was accordingly accomplished on the same daie, with all such solemne ceremonies as were thought convenient. The godfather at the font, was the lord archbishop of Canturburie, the godmothers, the old dutches of Dorset, & the old marchionesse Dorset widow, and at the confirmation the ladie marchionesse of Excester was godmother: the child was named Elizabeth.

Edw. Hall, Croy.

Upon the daie of the christening, the maior sir Stephan Beacocke, in a gowne of crimlin velvet, with his collar of S.S. and all the aldermen in scarlet, with collars and chaines, and all the counsell of the citie with them, took their barge after dinner, at one of the clocke, and the citizens had another barge, and so rowed to Greenwich, where were manie lords, knights, and gentlemen assembled. All the walles betwene the kings palace & the friers were hanged with arras, and all the waie strawed with greene rushes: the friers church was also hanged with arras.

The font was of silver, and stood in the midst of the church, three steps high, which was couered with a fine cloth, and diuerse gentlemen with aprens and towels about their necks gaue attendance about it, that no filth should come in the font, ouer it being a square canopie of crimlin sattin, fringed with gold, about it was a raille couered with red saie: betwene the quier and the bodie of the church was a close place with a pan of fire, to make the child reade in. When all these things were ordered, the child was brought to the hall, and then euery man set forward: first the citizens two and two, then gentlemen, squiers and chapeins, next after them the aldermen and the maior alone: next the maior the kings counsell, the kings chappell in copes: then barons, bishops, earles, then came the earle of Essex, bearing the couered bassins gilt, after him the marquesse of Excester with the taper of virgin wax, next him the marquesse Dorset bearing the salt.

The christening of quene Elizabeth.

The honourable traine of courtiers and their degrees.

Behind him the ladie Marie of Dorset, bearing the creasome which was verie rich of pearle and stone, the old dutches of Dorset bare the child in a mantell of purple velvet, with a long traine furred with ermine. The duke of Dorset with his marshall rod went on the right hand of the said dutches, and the duke of Suffolke on the left hand, and before them went the officers of armes. The countesse of Kent bare the long traine of the child's mantell, and betwene the countesse of Kent and the child went the earle of Wilshire on the right hand, and the earle of Darbie on the left hand, supporting the said traine: in the midst ouer the said child was borne a canopie, by the lord Rochford, the lord Hunsie, the lord William Howard, and by the lord Thomas Howard the elder, after the child followed manie ladies and gentlewomen. When the child was come to the church doore, the bishop of London met it with diuerse bishops and abbats mitred.

A canopie borne ouer the yong princeesse.

When the ceremonies and christening were ended, Carter cheefe king of armes cried aloud, God of his infinite goodnesse send prosperous life & long to the high and mightie princeesse of England Elizabeth: & then the trumpets blew. When the archbishop of Canturburie gaue to the princeesse a standing cup of gold: the dutches of Dorset gaue to hir a standing cup of gold, frettyed with pearle: the marchionesse of Dorset gaue three gilt bolles, pounced with a couer: and the marchionesse of Excester gaue three standing bolles grauen, all gilt with a couer. such plentie, that euerie man had as much as he would desire. Then they set forthward, the straipeta going before in the same order towards the kings palace, as they did when they came thitherward, saving that the gifts that the godfather and the god-mothers gaue, were borne before the child by foure persons, that is to saie, first sir John Daulie bore the gift of the ladie of Cestre, the lord Thomas Howard the yonger bore the gift of the ladie of Dorset, the lord Fitzwater bore the gift of the ladie of Northfolke, and the earle of Worcester bore the gift of the archbishop of Canturburie, all the onside as they went was full of kasse torches to the number of five hundred, borne by the gard and other of the kings servants, and about the child were borne manie by ther proper torches by gentlemen.

In this order they brought the pryncesse to the chamber, & tarried there a while, in the mator & his brethren the aldermen, and at the last the dukes of Northfolke & Suffolke came out fro the chamber, thanking them hartlie, who commanded them to giue thanks in his name: which being done with ather courtesies they departed, & so went to their barges. From that time forthward (God him selfe undertaking the tuition

This yeere also one Dauier the towne clerke of the cittie of London hanged himselfe, which suerly was a man that in no wise could abide to heare the gospel shoulde be in English. And I my selfe heard him once saie to me and other that were by, swearing a great oth, that if he thought the kings highnesse would set forth the scripture in English, and let it be read of the people by his authoritie, rather than he would so long lue, he would cut his owne throat, but he brake promise, for (as you haue heard) he hanged himselfe: but of what mind and intent he so did, maie be some gathered. For God had (no doubt) appointed him to that indgement, no lesse heauie than his offense was heinous; namely the contempt of Gods word, the knowledge of Gods damnable, preferring it before gold & silver, yea before pearles & pretious stones, & riches; and before honie and the honie combe in sweetnes, as the paraphrase noteth, saing: Quid tibi est aurum & argentum & lapides in oculis palato?

Nihil tibi est aurum & argentum & lapides in oculis palato?

About this time the pope, by lingering sicknesses, (whose greife in the first apprehension was the pains of the stomach, which by drawing with them to passions of a feuer and other accidents, kept him long time tired and tormented) sometimes seeming to be reduced to the point of death, and sometimes so eased and relaxed, that he gaue to others but not to himselfe a kind of hope of recovering, being no longer able to make resistance against his maladic, & changed his life the five and twentieth of September, leauing behind him in the castell of saint Angelo manie rich stones and iewels, more than was expected of him; and in the chamber of the se apostolike infinit offices, contrarie to custome and god order; but in the treasure a verie small store of monie, therein he beguiled the opinion of all men. He was raised from base degre to the place of the pope dome with won-derfull felicitie; but in managing the place he proued a verie great variation of fortune, wherein if both the properties of fortune be euellie balanced the one with the other, the worse fortune without all comparison was farre more familiar with him than the better.

Guic. pag.

Death of pope Clement the seuenth.

For as there could happen to him no greater in-felicitie than the aduersitie of his imprisonment (for that with his owne eyes he beheld with so great a ruine and destruction the sacke of Rome; a desolation which his fortune suffered him to be walle with pittie and compassion, but not to turne awaie or remedie the harme) so also by him moued the generall desolation of his naturall countrie, to the which by how much more he was bound by perpetuall obligations, by so much greater was his aduersitie to be a chiefe instrument in the ruine of the place where he had taken his first being.

Pope Clement more infortunate than fortune nate.

He died hated of all the court, suspected to most princes, and for the discourse of his life, he left behind him a retolome rather hatefull than acceptable: for he was accounted couetous, of little fidelitie, and naturallie farre off from doing pleasures to men.
And in that humo: albeit during his time of pope he created one and thirtie cardinals; yet upon none of them did he impose that dignitie to content himselfe but was drawne as it were by the violent law of ne-cessitie and to please others: yea he called to that dignity the cardinall of Apedicia, not of his proper and free election, but at the contemplation and persuation of others, and at that time when being oppressed with a dangerous maladic, if he had died, he had left his friends and kindred in the state of beggers and deprived of all aid. Hewertheless he was in counsell verie grane, and in his actions much foreseeing; touching passions and affections a conqueror of himselfe, and for the facultie of his mind & spirit of great capacitie and power, if timorousnesse had not oftentimes corrupted his iudgement.

How manie cardinals he created during his pope dome.

Immediatlie after his death the cardinals going the same night into the conclaue, elected in his place with full voice, Alexander of the familie of farne-sa, a Roman by nation, and for his time the most ancient cardinall of the court: in which election their voices seemed conformable to the iudgement and instance that Clement had made, the person elected being most worthy to be preferred before all the other

to

to so foueraigne a degre: for that he was both furnished with doctrine and good learning, and fullier replenished with good apparances and custumes. And for the cardinals, they were so much the more forward to passe the election in his person, by how much for the greatnesse of his age, being alreadye upon the thirtie and seuenth yeare, and suposed to beare a weake and vnfound complexion. Elizabeth

About this season, the craftie practises of one Elizabeth Barton, named the holie matre of Kent, came to light and were discovered: so that she and hir adherents in Nouember folowing were brought to the Starchamber, & there before the kings couni cell confessed their feined hypocritie and dissembled holinesse, traitorous purposes and intents. The names of those hir adherents, which were presented with hir before the lords in the Starchamber were as followeth: Richard Passer priest, parson of Aldington in Kent: Edward Bocking doctour in diuinitie, a monke of Canturburie: Richard Wering, monke also of Canturburie: Edward Waites gentleman: Thomas Laurence register to the archdeacon of Canturburie: Henrie Gold parson of Aldermarie, bachellor of diuinitie: Hugh Rich fric obseruant: Richard Kibbie: and Thomas Gold gentleman. They were abjudged vpon their confession aforesaid, to stand at Pauls crosse in the sermon time, where they with their owne hands should seuerallie deliuer ech of them to the preacher that should be appointed, a bill, declaring their subtil, craftie, and superstitious doings. Which thing they did the sundaie next folowing, standing vpon a stage at the crosse erected for that purpose. But for their treasons committed, the order was respited till the parliament next folowing, in the which they were attainted, and suffered (as after ye shall heare.)

mouse warre.

In this meane time, the Scots were not quiet, but still robbed the kings subiects both by sea and land: whereupon the king caused them to be requited, not onelie by the borderers and other to them associate, which entring by the marches, burnt manie of their strong pils, but also he set forth certeine ships which entered into their streames, and fetched out manie of those pises, which they had taken out of their haucens and creekes, mawger all their heads. Yet was there no warre proclaimed, but still commissioners sat and communed of agreement, and amends to be made on either part. Now in the end when the Scots had much demanded, and little or nothing granted, they for that time being wearie of warre, desired peace, which was concluded to indure both the kings liues. And so the twentieth daie of Maie in the yeare folowing, it was openlie proclaimed, to the comfort of all them that delighted in peace and goodlie quietnesse.

the pope.

At the suit of the ladic Katharine Dowager, a curse was sent from the pope, which cursed both the king and the realme. This curse was set vp in the towne of Dunkirke in Flanders (for the bringing thereof durst no nearer approach) where it was taken downte by one William Locke a mercer of London. Whome it durst not knowe that the ladic Katharine Dowager had p<sup>r</sup>ocured this curse of the pope, wh the order of the court was by him: for the duke of Suffolk the being sent to hir as then being at Woburn in the p<sup>r</sup>incing house, according to that he had in commandement; discharged a great sort of his household servants, and left but a small number to serue hir like a p<sup>r</sup>ince: which thing was done to serue hir not as a p<sup>r</sup>ince, but as a p<sup>r</sup>ince's wife. And so as those that of the viceroy refused, and would none of their scrupul that the remanent with the lesse number of servants about hir;

After which the parliament began, wherein the forenamed Elizabeth Barton and other hir companions were attainted of treason, for sundrie practised deuises and tales by them advanced, put in by, and sold, sounding to the bitter reproch, perill, and destruction of the kings person, his honour, fame and dignitie: for they had of a diuillish intent put in the heads of manie of the kings subiects, that to the said Elizabeth Barton was giuen knowledge by revelation from God and his saints, that if the king proceeded to the disp<sup>r</sup>ise, and married another, he should not be king of this realme one moneth after, and in the reputation of God not one daie nor houre.

This Elizabeth first through sickness, being oftentimes brought as it were into a trance, whereby hir visage and countenance became maruellouslie altered at those times when she was so viced, at length, by the incouraging, procurement, and information of the forenamed Richard Passer parson of Aldington, she learned to counterfeit such manner of trances (after she came to perfect health) as in her sickness by force of the disease she had bene acquainted with: so that she practised, vied, and shewed vnto the people diuerse maruellous and sundrie alterations of the sensible parts of hir bodie, craftilie uttering in hir said feigned and false trances, diuerse and manie counterfeit, vertuous, and holie words, tending to the rebuke of sin, and reproofing of such new opinions as then began to rise.

And to bring the people the more in beliefe with hir hypocriticall doings, she was counselled to saie in those hir trances, that she should neuer be perfectlie whole, till she had visited an image of our ladie, at a place called Court at Strat, within the parish of Aldington aforesaid. Thither was she brought, and by the meanes of the said Richard Passer, and Edward Bocking, that was now made of counsell in the matter, there assembled about two thousand persons at the daie appointed of hir thither coming, to see the miracle. At which daie, being brought before all that assemble and multitude of people, she falselie feigned and shewed vnto the people in the chappell of our ladie there in Court at Strat, manie alterations of hir face, and other outward sensible parts of hir bodie, and in those trances she uttered wondrous words, as she was before subtilie and craftilie induced, and taught by the said Edward Bocking and Richard Passer.

And amongst other things she uttered, that it was the pleasure of God, that the said Bocking should be hir ghostlie father, and that she should be a religious woman. And within a while, after such feigned and counterfeit trances, she appeared to the people to be suddenlie relieved from hir sickness and afflictions, by the intercession and meane of the image of our ladie, being in the same chappell. By reason of which hypocriticall dissimulation, the said Elizabeth was brought into a marvellous fame, credit, and good opinion of a great multitude of the people of this realme. And to increase the same, by counsell of the said Edward Bocking, she became a nun.

ment in the pzoize of saint Sepulchres at Canturburie, to whom the said Edward Bocking had commorlie his resort, not without suspicion of incontinencie, pretending to be his ghostlie father by Gods appointment. And by conspiracie betwene hir & him, the still continued in practising hir dissembled traies, alledging, that in the same the had revelations from almightie God and his saints, and amongst other, that which (as before we have mentioned) toucheth the kings marriage, as ye have heard.

This matter proceeded so farre, that there was a booke writtten by hir complices, and namelie by Thomas Laurence, register to the archbishop of Canturburie, of hir feigned and counterfeit miracles, revelations, and hypocriticall holiness. All things were handled so craftilie, that not onelie the simple, but also the wise and learned sort were deceived by the same, insomuch that William Warham the late archbishop of Canturburie, and John Fisher bishop of Rochester, and diuerse others, being informed thereof, gaue credit thereto. All which matters and manie other had bene traitorously practised and imagined amongst the parties manie yerres, chieflie to interrupt the diuorise and to destroe the king, and to depriue him from the crowne and dignitie roiall of this realme, as in the act of their attainder made more at large it maie appeare, and likewise in the chronicles of maister Edward Hall. Therefore to conclude with hir and hir adherents, on the one and twentieth of Aprill next following, the with diuerse of them before condemned, was dralwen to Tiburne, and there executed, as inlie they had deserued; where and when she made this confession following, even at the present time that she suffered, in the hearing of the people.

The words of Elizabeth Barton, otherwise called the holie maid of Kent at the houre of hir death in manner of a confession.

Ether am I come to die, and I haue not bene the onelie cause of mine owne death, which most iustlie I haue deserued, but also I am the cause of the death of all these persons which at this time here suffer: and yet to say the truth, I am not so much to be blamed, considering that it was wel known vnto these learned men, that I was a poore wench, without learning, and therefore they might haue easilie perceiued, that the things that were done by me, could not proceed in any such sort, but their capacities and learning could right well iudge from whence they proceeded, and that they were altogether feined: but bicause the things which I feined were profitable vnto them, therefore they much praised me, and bare me in hand that it was the holie ghost, and not I that did them, and then I being puffed up with their praises, fell into a certeine pride and foolish fantasie with my selfe, and thought I might feine what I would, which thing hath brought me to this case, and for the which now I crie God and the kings highnes most hartilie mercie, and desire all you good people to praye to God to haue mercie on me, and on all them that suffer here with me.

In this parlement also was made the act of succession, for the establishing of the crowne, to the which euerie person being of lawfull age should be sworne. On mondaie the thre & twentieth of March in the parlement time, were solempnly receiued into London ambassadours from James the first king of Scots, the bishop of Aberdine, the abbat of Dunlos, and Adam Otterborne the kings attourneie, with diuerse gentlemen on them attendant, which were brought to the tailor's hall, and there lodged. And on the daie of the Annunciation, they were brought to the kings palace at Westminster, where they shewed their commission and message, for the which the king appointed them daies to counsell. During the parlement time, euerie sundaie at Paules croffe preached a bishop, declaring the pope not to be supreme head of the church.

The thirtieth of March was the parlement prozed, and there euerie lord, knight, and burges, and all other were sworne to the act of succession, and subscribed their hands to a parchment fixed to the same. The parlement was prozed till the thirde of Nouember next. After this were commissioners sent into all parts of the realme, to take the oth of all men and women to the act of succession. Doctor John Fisher, and sir Thomas More knight, and doctor Nicholas Wilson parson of Saint Thomas apostles in London, expressely denied at Lambeth before the archbishop of Canturburie, to receiue that oth. The two first stood in their opinion to the verie death (as after ye shall heare) but doctor Wilson was better aduised at length, and so dissembling the matter escaped out of further danger.

In this yere it chanced that two merchant strangers fell in loue with a harlot, which was called Wolfes wife, and this harlot had often hanted the strangers chambers. And so on a time the said harlot appointed these strangers to come to Westminster, and she had prepared for them a bote, in the which bote was but one man to row which was a strong theefe, and in the end of the bote laie Wolfe hir husband, couered with a leather that botemen vse to couer their cushions with, and so these strangers sat them down mistrusting nothing. Now when this boteman had brought them as farre as a place called the turning tree, suddenly stepped by the said Wolfe, and with his dagger thrust the one of them through: the other cried out to save his life, and offered great sums of monie to the boteman and him to saue his life. But no proffers would be heard, nor mercie would they extend, but as cruell murderers without pitie slue the other also, and bound them face to face, and so threw them into the Thames in the foresaid place, where they were long after before they were found. But immediatlie the harlot Wolfes wife went to the strangers chambers, & toke from thence so much as she could come by. And at the last she and hir husband (as they deserued) were apprehended, arraigned, and hanged at the aforesaid turning tree.

On the ninth of Iulie was the lord Dacres of the north arraigned at Westminster of high treason, where the duke of Norfolkke late as iudge, and high steward of England. The said lord Dacres being brought to the barre, with the are of the Tower before him, after his indictment read, so improued the same, answering euerie part and matter therein contained, and so plainlie and directlie confuted his accusers, which were there readie to anouch their accusations, that to their great shame, and his high honor, he was found that day by his peers not guilty, whereof the commons not a little reioiced, as by thei shout and crie made at those wordes, not guilty, they freilie testified.

The two and twentieth of Iulie was John Frith burned in Smithfield, for the opinion of the sacrament: and with him the same time, and at the same stake, suffered also one Andrew Hewet, a young man, by

by his occupation a tailor. The eleventh of August were all the places of the obſervant friers ſuppreſſed, as Greenwich, Canterbury, Richmond, Newark, and Newcaſtle, and in their places were ſet Auguſtine friers, and the obſervant friers were placed in the houſes of the graie friers. ¶ The one and twentieth of September, doctor Tailor, maſter of the rolles, was diſcharged of that office, and Thomas Cromwell ſwoone in his place the nineteenth of October. Whereover the third of November, the parliament began againe, in the which was concluded the act of ſupremacie, which authoriſed the kings highneſſe to be ſupreme head of the church of England, and the authoritie of the pope aboliſhed out of the realme. ¶ In the ſame parliament alſo was given to the king, the firſt fruits and tenths of all ſpiritual dignities and promotions. This yeare came the great admerall of France into England, ambalaſſadour from the French king, and was honorable received.

In this time died the earle of Hilbare, priſoner in the Tower, and his ſonne Thomas Fitzgaret began to rebell, and toke all the kings ordinance, and ſent to the emperour, requiring him to take his part: alſo he ſue the biſhop of Dublin, and robbed all ſuch as would not obeye him. In the beginning of this yeare, the duke of Norfolk and the biſhop of Ely went to Calis, and thither came the admerall of France. On the two and twentieth of Aprill the prior of the Charterhouſe at London, the prior of Weſtall, the prior of Wyham, Reynolds a brother of Sion, and John bicar of Chicheſtre, were arreigned and condemned of treason: and thereupon ſwaine, hanged and quartered at Tyburne the fourth of Maie: their heads and quarters were ſet over the bridge and gates of the citie, one quarter excepted, which was ſet up at the Charterhouſe at London. ¶ On the eight of Maie, the king commanded that all belonging to the court ſhould poll their heads, and to give example, cauſed his owne head to be polled, and his beard from thenceforth was cut round, but not ſhaven, which faſhion the courtiers imbraced, and would (no doubt) have put in practice, though they had not bene there, unto bound by precept: for the people imitate the prince, as the poet long ago well noted, ſaieing:

¶ The five and twentieth daie of Maie, was in ſaint Pauls church at London examined nineteen men and ſix women borne in Holland, whoſe opinions were, firſt, that in Chriſt is not two natures, God and man: ſecondlie, that Chriſt toke neither fleſh nor blood of the virgin Marie: thirdlie, that children borne of infidels ſhall be ſaved: fourthlie, that baptiſme of children is to none effect: fifthlie, that the ſacrament of Chriſts bodie is but bread onelie: ſixtly, that he, who after his baptiſme ſinneth wittinglie, ſinneth deathie, and cannot be ſaved. Fourtene of them were condemned, a man and a woman of them were burned in Smithfield, the other twelve were ſent to other townes there to be burnt.]

On the nineteenth of June were three monkes of the Charterhouſe hanged, diſturb, and quartered at Tyburne, and their heads and quarters ſet up about London, for denieng the king to be ſupreme head of the Church: Their names were, Ernſley, Middleton, and Audigate. Alſo the one and twentieth of the ſame moneth, and for the ſame cauſe, doctor John Fiſher biſhop of Rocheſter was beheaded for denieng of the ſupremacie, and his head ſet upon London bridge, but his bodie buried within Barling churchyard. This biſhop was of manie foze lamented, for he was reported to be a man of great learning, and of a verie good life. The pope had elected him a cardinall, and ſent his hat as far as Calis, but his head was off before his hat was on: ſo that they met not. On the ſirſt of Julie was ſir Thomas More beheaded for the like crime, that is to wit, for denieng the king to be ſupreme head. And then the bodie of doctor Fiſher was taken up, and buried with ſir Thomas Mores in the Tower. This man was both learned and wiſe, and given much to a certaine pleaſure in merie taunts and tealling in moſt of his communication, which manner he forgot not at the verie houre of his death.

¶ I cannot tell (ſaith maſter Hall) whether I ſhould call him a ſolliſh wiſe man, or a wiſe ſolliſh man, for undoubtedly he beſide his learning, had a great wit, but it was ſo mingled with taunting and mocking, that it ſeemed to them that beſt knew him, that he thought nothing to be well ſpoken except he had miſtred ſome mocke in the communication. Inſomuch as at his coming to the Tower, one of the officers demanded his upper garment for his ſie, meaning his gowne: and he answered, he ſhould have it, and toke him his cap, ſaieing it was the uppermoſt garment that he had. The wiſe euen going to his death at the Tower gate, a poore woman called unto him, and beſought him to declare what he had done with evidences of hers in the time that he was in office (which after he was apprehended ſhe could not come by) and that he would intreat ſhe might have them againe, or elſe ſhe was widdow. He answered, good woman, have patience a little while, for the king is ſo good unto me, that euen with in this halfe houre he will diſcharge me of all buſineſſe, and helpe thee himſelfe.

Alſo when he went up the ſtaires on the ſcaffold, he deſired one of the Chirſes officers to give him his hand to helpe him up, and ſaid: When I come downe againe, let me ſit for my ſelfe as well as I can. Alſo the hangman kneeled downe to him, aſking him forgiveness of his death (as the manner is) to whom he ſaid, I forgive thee, but I promiſe thee thou ſhalt never have honeſtie by ſticking off my head, my necke is ſo ſhort. Alſo euen when he ſhould laie downe his head on the blocke, he having a great graie beard, ſtroked out his beard, and ſaid to the hangman, I praye you let me laie my beard over the blocke, leaſt you ſhould cut it. Thus with a mocke he ended his life.

God had in moſt bountifull ſort polvered his bleſſings upon this man, induing him with eloquence, wiſedome and knowledge: but the grace of God withholden from him, he had the right uſe of none, no not of reaſon as it ſhould be rightlie uſed. God had extraordinarylie bleſſed his children, and namelie his three daughters, to whom he had given an admirable dexteritie in the ſcience of tongues and arts, as John Leland our reverend antiquarie ſeteth in a proper and learned epigramme, ſaieing:

*Deſine ſacundas nimium laudare diſenti

And yet was not the will of God for the inſuſing of ſpiritual graces, ſo linked to that of temporall, as becauſe the one was granted; therefore the other muſt not be denied. For the bleſſings of God which be outward, are common to the wicked with the good:

god: the sun shined upon all, the raine is kept from none: naie, God with a sparing hand reacheth out those things to the faithfull, which with full gripes he filleth out and poyreth into the laps and bosoms of infidels and epicures: insomuch that the prophet Dauid noting no lesse, with a kind of indignation opened his mouth saying; I was grieved at the wicked, I do also see the vngodlie in such prosperitie, these flourish in the world, these haue riches in possession, and I said; When haue I cleansed my heart in vaine, and washed my hands in innocencie: yea, and I had almost said euen as they; but lo, then should I haue condemned the generation of Gods children. But the end of these men, being set in slippery places, are cast downe and destroyed, yea suddenlie do they consume and come to a fearefull end: euen like as a dreame when one awaketh, so doth God make their image to vanish out of the citie.

And albeit the fall of this sir Thomas More was reprochfull, issuing from a treasonable offense: yet as in pagans manie times there is somewhat which may teach christians lessons for their learning to their shame: so in this papist was one praise-worthie propertie among the rest most eminent, which I will note to the rebuke of protestants. ¶ The reuerend father doctor Cinner bishop of London, in a sermon at Pauls crosse by him made in a solemne audience assembled at the parlement time 1584, teaching diuerse points of doctrine, and the duties of sundrie degrees, said, that it was commendable for noble men and gentlemen, and a great furtherance to the loue of religion, to be deuout: he brought an example of sir Thomas More, a man for his zeale (saith the bishop) to be honored, but for his religion to be abhorred.

This knight would diuerse times put on a surplese, and helpe the priest in proper person to saie service: insomuch that vpon a time being at Chelise, and busie about that exercise, the duke of Norfolk then liuing, came to the said sir Thomas, then lord chancelor of England, about speciall affaires: and being informed that sir Thomas was at the church; thither went the duke, expecting the end of service. In the end, the duke and the lord chancelor met, and after mutuall greeting the duke said thus: What is my lord chancelor become a parish clark? What will the kings maiestie saie to this gere, when he shall vnderstand that the lord chancelor of England, a speciall pære of the realme, and in highest reuene of honor in the land next the prince is become a parish clark? How tralie (saith sir Thomas) I thinke, and verelie belæue, that his highnesse will be so farr to misdæme or mislike me herein, that when he shall heare of the care which I haue to serue both his maiestie and mine, he will accept and take me for a faithfull seruant. And thus much of him.]

This yere in the time that the king went his progress to Gloucester, and to other places westward, the king of Scots was installed knight of the garter at Winsoze by his procurator; the lord Crskine: and in October following, Stephen Gardiner (which after the cardinals death was made bishop of Winchester) was sent ambassadoz into France, where he remained thre yeres after. ¶ In August the lord Thomas Fitzgerard, sonne to the earle of Bilsbare, was taken in Ireland, and sent to the tower of London.

In the moneth of October, doctor Lee and other were sent to visit the abbeyes, priories, and nunneries in England, who set all those religious persons at libertie that would forsake their habit, and all that were vnder the age of foure and twentie yeres, and the residue were closed vp that would remaine. Further, they took order that no men should haue accesse to the houses of women, nor women to the houses of men, except it should be to heare their service. The abbat or prior of the house, where any of the brethren was willing to depart, was appointed to giue to euerie of them a priests gowne for his habit, and forty shillings in monie, the nunnies to haue such apparel as secular women ware, and to go whither they liked best. ¶ The eleuenth of December was a great procession at London for iote of the French kings recouerie of health from a dangerous sicknesse. ¶ In December a sorow was taken of all chanteries, and the names of them that had the gift of them.

The princesse Dowager liuing at Kimbalton, fell into hir last sicknesse, wherof the king being aduertised, appointed the emperors ambassadoz that was legier here with him named Eustachius Caputius, to go to visit hir, and to do his commendations to hir, and to tell hir to be of god comfort. The ambassadoz with all diligence did his doctie therein, comforting hir the best he might: but she within six daies after, perceiuing hir selfe to war verie weake and feeble, and to faile death appoything at hand, caused one of hir gentlewomen to write a letter to the king, commending to him hir daughter and his, beseeching him to stand god father vnto hir: and further desired him to haue some consideration of hir gentlewomen that had serued hir, and to see them bestowed in marriage. Further, that it would please him to appoint that hir seruants might haue their due wages, and a yeres wages beside. This in effect was all that she requested, and so immediatly herevpon she departed this life the eight of Januarie at Kimbalton aforesaid, and was buried at Peterborough. ¶ The nine and twentieth of Januarie quene Anne was deliuered of a child before hir time, which was bozne dead.

On the fourth of February the parlement began, in the which (amongst other things) enacted, all religious houses of the value of thre hundred marks and vnder, were giuen to the king, with all the lands and goods to them belonging. The number of these houses were thre hundred seauentie and six; the value of their lands yearlie about two and thirtie thousand pounds; their mouable goods one hundred thousand; the religious persons put out of the same houses, amounted to the number of about 10000. This yere was William Lindall burnt at a towne betwixt Burels and Spaulin called Willefoz. This Lindall, otherwise called Pichins, was bozne in the marches of Wales, and hauing a desire to translate and publish to his countrie diuerse books of the bible in English, and doubting to come in trouble for the same, if he should remaine here in England, got him ouer into the parties of beyond the sea, where he translated not onelie the new testament into the English tong, but also the five bookes of Moses, Zoussa, Iudicum, Ruth, the bookes of the kings, and Paralipomenon, Pechemias, or the first of Eozas, and the prophet Jonas.

Beside these translations, he made certeine treatises, and published the same, which were brought ouer into England, and read with great desire of diuerse, and of many soze despised and abhorred, so that proclamations were procured forth for the condemnation and prohibiting of his books (as before you haue heard.) Finallie, he was apprehended at Antwerpe by meanes of one Philips an Englishman, and then scholer at Louaine. After he had remained in prison a long time, and was almost forgotten, the lord Cromwell wrote for his deliuerance; but then in all hast, because he would not recant any part of his doctrine, he was burned (as before you haue heard.) she was accused, and then desired the said lords they left hir there prisoner. On the sixtenth of Paie

She is ar-

quene Anne was arreigned in the tower of London on a scaffold for that purpose, made in the kings hall, before the duke of Norfolk, who sat vnder the cloth of estate as high steward of England, with the lord chancelor on his right hand, the duke of Suffolke on his left hand, with marquesses and lords, &c. and the earle of Surrie sat before the duke of Norfolk his father, as earle marshall of England. The kings commission being read, the constable of the tower, and the lieutenant brought the quene to the barre, where was made a chaire for hir to sit downe in, and there hir indictment was read, whereinto she made so wise and discret answers, that she seemed fullie to clere hir selfe of all matters laid to hir charge: but being tried by hir peeres, whereof the duke of Suffolke was chiefe, she was by them found guiltie, and had iudgement pronounced by the duke of Norfolk.

Immediatlie the lord Rochford the quenes brother was likewise arreigned and condemned: the lord maio of London, his brethren the aldermen, the wardens and foure persons mo of euerie the twelue principall companies being present. The seauentyfenth of Paie, the lord Rochford brother to the quene, Henrie Portis, Marke Smeton, William Brierton, and Francis Welson, all of the kings private chamber, about matters touching the quenes were beheaded on the tower hill: the lord Roch-fords bodie with the head was buried in the chappell of the tower, the other foure in the churchyard there.
On the nineteenth of Paie quene Anne was on a scaffold (made for that purpose) vpon the greene with in the tower of London, beheaded with the sword of Calis, by the hands of the hangman of that towne: hir bodie with the head was buried in the

The words of queene Anne at hir death.

God christian people, I am come hither to die, for according to the law, and by the law I am iudged to die, and therefore I will speake nothing against it. I am come hither to accuse no man, nor to speake anie thing of that whereof I am accused & condemned to die, but I praise God saue the king and send him long to reigne ouer you, for a gentler, nor a moze mercifull prince was there neuer, and to me he was euer a good, a gentle, and a souereigne lord. And if anie person will meddle of my cause, I require them to iudge the best. And thus I take my leaue of the world, and of you all, and I hartilie desire you all to praise for me, Oh Lord haue mercie on me, to God I commend my soule, Iesu receiue my soule: di-uerse tunes repeting those words, till that hir head was striken off with the sword,

Now because I might rather saie much than so gentlie inough in praise of this noble quene, as well for hir singular wit and other excellent qualities of mind, as also for hir fauouring of learned men, zeale of religion, and liberalitie in distributing almes in reliefe of the poore, I will refer the reader vnto master Fox his volume of Acts and Monuments, where he commendeth hir mild nature in taking admonition, proueth hir marriage lawfull, defendeth hir succession, ouerthroweth the finisier iudgements, opinions and objections of backbiters against that ver-tuous quene, sheweth hir faith and trust in Christ at hir death, and finally how the protestants of Ger-manie forsooke king Henrie for the death of so good a princeesse. ¶ Anglorum prelia faith, that this good quene was forwarned of hir death in a dreame, wherein Morpheus the god of sleepe (in the likenesse of hir grandfather) appeared vnto hir, and after a long narration of the vanities of this world (how enie reigneth in the courts of princes, maligning the fortunate estate of the vertuous, how king Henrie the eight and his issue should be the utter ouerthrow and expulsion of poperie out of England, and that the go-uernment of quene Elizabeth should be established in tranquillitie & peace) he saith vnto hir in conclusion by waie of prophesie, as our poet hath recorded:

*Fortis animo, tristis si nunciatus adsum, Insuperata tue velox necis aduenit hora, Intra triginta spacium moriere diemum:
Hoc magnum mortis solamen habetis futura, Elizabetha suis praeclaret filia gestis Nomen ad astra feret patris, matrisque, suumque.]*

Immediatlie after hir death, in the weeke before Whitsuntide, the king married the ladie Jane Sei-mer, daughter to sir John Seimer knight, which at Whitsuntide was openlie thewed as quene. And on the tuesday in Whitsun weeke, hir brother sir Edw.
Seimer was created vicount Beauchampe, and sir Water Hungerford, lord Hungerford. The eight of June began the parlement, during the which the lord Thomas Howard, without the kings assent, asked the ladie Margaret Douglas daughter to the quene of Scots, and nece to the king, for which act he was atteinted of treason, and an act made for like offenders, and so he died in the tower, and he remained long there as prisoner. In the time of this parlement the bishops and all the cleargie of the realme held a solemne conuocation at Bailes church in London, where after much disputation and debating of matters, they published a booke of religion, intituled Articles deuised by the kings highnesse, &c. In this booke is speciallie mentioned but three sacraments.

Also beside this booke certeine inunctions were gi-uen forth, wherby a number of their holie daies were abrogated, & speciallie those that fell in harvest time.
¶ The nine & twentieth of June, the king held a great iusting and triumph at Westminster, where were ordained two lighters made like ships to fight vpon the water, one of the which brake in the midst, wherby one Gates a gentleman, & seruant to M. Knicut was drowned in his harnesse. In the other a gun brake hir chamber, & mained two of the mariners.

maister of the tols, was made lord keeper of the priuie seale, and the ninth of Julie the lord Fitzwarren was created erle of Bath, and the morrow after the said lord Cromwell was created lord Cromwell. The eighteenth of Julie he was made knight, and became generall under the king ouer the spiritualtie, and sat diuerse times in the conuocation amongst the bishops as head ouer them. The two and twentieth of Julie, Henrie duke of Richmond and Summerfet, earle of Northampton, base sonne to the king, begot of the ladie Tailibois then called Elizabeth Blunt, departed this life at saint James, and was buried at Sherford in Dorsetholke, of whome you shall finde more in the treatise of the dukes of this land.

In September, Thomas Cromwell lord priuie seale and vicegerent, sent abroad under the kings spiritual priuie seale certeine iniunctions, commanding that the persons and curats should teach their parishioners the Pater noster, the Ave & Creed, with the ten commandements, and articles of the faith in English. These articles and iniunctions being established by authoritie of parlement, and now to the people deliuered, bred a great misliking in the hearts of the common people, which had bene euer brought up and trained in contrarie doctrine. And herewith diuerse of the cleargie as monks, priests, and others, took occasion hereby to speake euill of the late proceedings of the king, touching matters of religion, affirming that if speedie remedie were not in time prouided, the faith would shortly be utterly destroyed, and all praier and diuine seruice quite abolished and taken awate.

Spanis sinister reports, slanderous tales, and felged fables were blowne abroad, and put into the peoples eares, and diuerse of the nobilitie did also what they could to stir the commons to rebellion, faithfully promising both aid and succour against the king. The people thus prouoked to mischief, and deceived through ouer light credence, incontinentlie as it were to mainteine that religion, which had so manie yeares continued, and bene esteemed, they stiffelie and stoutlie conspired together, and in a part of Lincolnshire they first assembled, and shortly after joined into an armie, being (as it was supposed) of men apt for the warres, in number about twentie thousand. Against these rebels with all the hast that might be, the king in his proper person upon intelligence therof had marched towards them, being furnished with a warlike armie, perfectlie appointed of all things that to such a companie should appertene.

The rebels hearing that his person was present with his power to come thus against them, began to feare what would follow of their doings: and such nobles and gentlemen as at the first fauoured their cause, fell from them and withdrew, so that they being destitute of capteines, at length put certeine petitions in writing, which they exhibited to the king, professing that they neuer intended hurt towards his roiall person. The king receiued their petitions, which consisted in choise of counsellors, suppression of religious houses, maintenance of the seruice of almightie God, the statute of bles, the release of the fifteenth, and receiuing of the first fruits, with such other matters as nothing appertained to them: whereupon he made them answer in pithie sentence, repprouing them of their presumptuous follie and rebellious attempt, to meddle in anie such matters and weightie affaires, the direction whereof onelie belonged to him, and to such noble men and counsellors as his pleasure should be to elect and chosse to haue the ordering of the same.

Wherefore he aduised them to remember their rash and inconsiderate doings, and that now in anie wise they should resort home to their houses, and no more to assemble contrarie to his lawes and their owne allegiances; and also to cause the prouokers of this mischief to be deliuered to the hands of his lieutenant, and further to submit themselves wholie to such punishment as he and his nobles should thinke their worthie to receiue: for otherwise he would not suffer that inturie at their hands to go unreuenged. After thus made to their petitions, each mistrusting other, who should be noted the greatest meddler, suddenly they began to thinke, and got them home to their houses without longer abode.

Herewith the duke of Suffolke the kings lieutenant was appointed to go with the armie, to see the countrie set in quiet, accompanied with the lord admirall, sir Francis Blian, and sir John Russell that were ioined with him also in commission for the ordering of things there within the countie of Lincoln. The duke entred into the citie of Lincoln the seuententh of October. On the ninetenth all the inhabitants of Louth (according to order giuen by the duke) came to Lincoln, and there in the castell made their submission, holding up their hands, and crying for the kings mercie. And herewith were chosen forth Nicholas Pelton, capteine Cobler, & thirtene more, which were commanded to ward, and all the residue were new sworn to the king, renouncing their former oth receiued in time of their rebellion, and then departed home to their houses in the kings peace. After this were proclamations made abroad in the countrie in euerie market towne by the heralds of armes, Summerfet and Willinsoze, that the capteins and souldiers of the dukes armie should not take anie mans goods, cattels, or vittels, except they paid or agreed with the owners of the same.

And further commandement was giuen, that all inhabitants and dwellers within the townes and villages about, should repaire to the citie of Lincoln, with all maner of vittels as well for men as for horses, where they should receiue payment at reasonable prices for the same. After this, there was likewise proclamation made for the apprehending of all such lewd persons, as had sowne anie false rumors abroad in the countrie (the chiefe occasion of this rebellion) bynting that the king pretended to haue the gold in the hands of his subjects brought into the tower to be touched, and all their cattell unmarked, the chalices, gods, and ornaments of parish churches, fines for christenings, weddings, and buriens, licences to eat white meat, bread, pig, goose or capon, with manie other slanderous, false, and detestable tales and lies, forged of diuelish purpose to incourage the people to rebellion. If therefore anie man could apprehend such as had bene the setters forth and sowers of such seditious reports, they that brought them in, should be so rewarded, as they should thinke their labour well bestowed.

Moreover, if there were anie assemblies made in anie part of the realme without the kings licence, by anie burlesque persons, and would not depart to their houses upon warning by his graces proclamations, they should not looke for further mercie at the kings hand, but to be prosecuted with fire and sword to the uttermost. To conclude, by the wise and sage direction taken in appeasing the countrie by that noble duke, all things were quieted in those parties. Diuerse of the principall offenders were sent unto London. He that took upon him as chiefe capteine of the rout, was the same that called himselfe capteine Cobler: but he was indeed a monke named doctor Spakarell, which afterwards with diuerse others was executed.

But now in the meane time, whilst the duke was was sent forwards into Lincolnshire, within six daies after the king was trulie informed, that there was a new stir begun in the north parts by the people there, which had assembled themselves into an huge armie of warlike men & well appointed, both with captaines; horses, armor, and artillerie, to the number of fortie thousand men, which had incamped themselves in Yorkshire. These men declared by their proclamations solemnlie made, that this their rising and commotion should extend no further, but onelie to the maintenance and defense of the faith of Christ, and deliuerance of holie church, sore decayed and oppressed, and also for the furtherance as well of private as publick matters in the realme, touching the wealth of all the kings poore subjects.

An holie pilgrimage.

They named this their seditious voiage, an holie and blessed pilgrimage: they had also certeine banners in the field, in which was painted Christ hanging on the crosse on the one side, and a chalice with a painted cake in it on the other side, with diuers other banners of like hypocrisie and feigned holinesse. The souldiers had also imbrodered on the sleeves of their cotes in stead of a badge, the similitude of the five wounds of our sauour, and in the middell thereof was written the name of our Lord. Thus had the rebels host of sathan with false and counterfeite signes of holinesse set out themselves, onelie to deceiue the simple people in that their wicked and rebellious enterprise against their liege lord and naturall prince, whome by the law of nations and by Gods commandments they were bound in conscience to obey, and so farre to be from lifting up the least finger of their hand, as rather to put life and goods in hazard for his sake, to testifie their allegiance.

The faithfull diligence of
Shrewsburie

The speedie diligence and losall dutie which was found at that present in the woorthie counsellour George earle of Shrewsburie, is not to be forgotten. Who immediatlie after he vnderstood how the northerne men were thus by in armes, considering how much it imported to stop them of their passage before they should aduance too far forwards, where by they might both increase in power, and put all other parts of the realme in hazard, through feare or hope to incline to their wicked purposes, he sent abroad with all speed possible to raise such power of his seruants, tenants, and friends, as by anie means he might make, and withall dispatched one of his seruants to the king, both to aduertise him what he had done, and also to purchase his pardon, for making such leuie of power, before he had receiued his maiesties commission so to doe.

A good meaning of intent was not by and by mislike and make good the action.

I haue heard by relation of men of good credit that were there present: that when such knights and gentlemen as were of his counsell, and other of his respectall friends were come vnto him, he put forth this question to them; Whether his fact in raising a power of armed men without the kings commission (although he had done it to resist the rebels) were treason or not? Wherevnto when answer was made by some that were knowne to haue skill in the laws of the realme, how that by no means it could be intended treason, sith his intent was good, and no euill thereby meant, but contrarielie the aduancement of the kings seruice dutifullie sought: He answered (quoth the earle) I know it in substance to be treason, and I would thinke my selfe in an hard case, if I thought I had not my pardon comming.

The loialtie of the earle.

Such a reuerend regard had this noble earle to his bounden allegiance towards his prince, that what soeuer seemed but as it were to sound in anie behalfe to the breach thereof, it so troubled his loiall mind, that he could not be satisfied, till as it were in confessing his fault: where according to the truth there was none at all. He had signified his assured fi-delitie in craving pardon, where otherwise he might haue looked for thanks, which indeed he receiued with his pardon, according to his petition, and a commission to proceed as he had begun. Whereafter, whereas there were diuerse speeches amongst the souldiers in the armie, uttered by some not altogether happlie well disposed, that the said earle had so good liking of the northerne mens cause, that when it came to the point of triall, he would surelie ioine with them against that part, which he yet pretended to mainteine.

To put that matter out of doubt, he caused the multitude of his souldiers to come before him, and there declared to them, that he vnderstood what lewd talkie had bene raised of his meaning among them in the campe, as if he had fauoured the part of the rebels: But (saith he) what soeuer their colourable pretense may be, true it is, that traitors they are in this their wicked attempt. And whereas my ancestors haue bene euer true to the crowne, I meane not to staine my blood now in joining with such a sort of traitors, but to liue and die in defense of the crowne, if it stand but vpon a stake: and therefore those that will take my part in this quarrell, I haue to thanke them, and if there be anie that be otherwise minded, I would wish them hence. And herewith he caused his chaplaine to minster an oth to him, which he receiued to the effect aforesaid, in the presence of them all.

And verelie this was thought to be done not without great cause that moued him thereto: for whereas the more part of his souldiers consisted of the countrie people, who with forged tales and wicked surmises were easilie led to beleue what soeuer was reported in fauor of the rebels, and disfauor of such as were then chiefe counsellors to the king, against whome they pretended to rise (although there was no reasonable occasion leading them thereto) it was greatlie to be suspected, least they might through some traitorous practise haue bene induced to forget their dutifull allegiance to their soueraigne, and souldiourlike obedience to their leaders, in so much that the captaines of the rebels were perswaded (and some of them reported no lesse) that they might haue fought with the duke of Norfolk, and the earle of Shrewsburie, on this hither side of the riuer of Dun, euen with their owne men, not needing to haue brought a man of their armie with them.

Wherefore it was thought, that the oth which the earle of Shrewsburie in that sort receiued before all his people there openlie in field, serued to great purpose; to put out of his souldiers wauering heads all such lewd expectation that he would turne to the enemies, staing thereby their fickle minds; sith they were now assured, that he being their chiefeine meant no dissimulation. A matter trulie of no small importance, considering the fauor which the commons bare towards him, and the opinion they had conceiued of his high prouesse; so that which waie he inclined, it was thought verelie the game were likelie to go. But now after the king was aduertised of that perilous commotion of the northerne men, he appointed not onlie the said earle of Shrewsburie to raise a power to resist them: but also ordeined the duke of Norfolk his lieutenant generall, with the marquesse of Creffer, and the said earle of Shrewsburie, the earles of Huntington and Rutland, accompanied with a mightie power to go against them.

These lords raising such retinues of souldiers and men of warre as were to them assigned, made forward to the place where the armie of the rebels was then incamped, which was beyond the towne of Doncaster, in the high waie towards York. But first the said earle of Shrewesburie, with the earles of Huntington, and Rutland, and such other that were next adjoining to those parties, with their powres assembled out of the shires of Salop, Stafford, Leicesters, Rutland, Nottingham, and Derby, came to a place in Nottingham shire called Blithlow, and there taking the masters of their people, freights waies passed forth to Doncaster, and appointed certeine bands of their men, to lie in places where anie fords or passages late ouer the riuer of Dun, that runneth by the northside of Doncaster, to staie the enemies if they should attempt to come ouer. Shortly after came the duke of Suffolke, and finallye the marquisse of Excester with a iollie companie of westerne men, well and perfectlie appointed.

When these capteins and sage counsellors being here assembled, vnderstood the manner of the northerne men, their number, and readinesse to battell, they first practised with great policie, to haue pacified the matter without bloodshedding: but the northerne men were so bent to mainteine their willfull enterpryse, that there was no hope to take by the matter without battell: the refoze a daie was set, on the which they should trie the quarrell betwixt them with dint of sword. But for the chance. The night before the daie assigned for this bloodie and vnnaturall battell, to haue bene fought betwixt men of one nation, and subiects to one king; there fell a raine not great to speake of, but yet as it were by miracle, the riuer of Dun rose suddenly on such a height, that felddome had bene scene there the like hugeness of water: so that the daie when the houre of battell should come, it was not possible for the one armie to come at the other, and so the appointment made betwixt both the armies for trial of the matter by force of armes, was by Gods god prouidence disappointed, and manie an innocent mans life preserved, that should haue died, if their purposes had taken place.

After this by the great wisdom and policie of the nobles and capteins, a communication was had, and an agreement made vpon the kings pardon, obtained for all the capteins and chiefe doers in this insurrection, and promise made that they should be gentle heard, to declare such things as they found themselves greued with: and that vpon their articles presented to the king, their reasonable petitions should be granted, as by him & his counsell it should be thought expedient, whereby all troubles might be quieted, and ech thing brought to a good conclusion. Wherewith euerie man departed, and those which before came as hot as fire to fight, letted of their desperate purpose, by Gods mercifull prouidence, returned now peaceable to their houses without anie more business.

At the selfe same time that these northerne men were lodged nere to Doncaster, and the kings power readie to stop them of their passage (as before ye haue heard) there was an other armie readie to haue marched southwards thorough Lancashire: but by the faithfull diligence of the earle of Derby, who with the forces of Lancashire and Cheshire was appointed to resist them, they were likewise kept backe and brought to quiet; notwithstanding they were a verie great number assembled together of the commons out of Cumberland, Westmerland, and of the north parts of Lancashire. The earle of Suffolke was sent downe by the king, to ioine in assistance with the earle of Derby; who causing diuerse of the chiefe procurers of that rebellion in those parties to be apprehended and arreigned, they being found guiltie had iudgement, and were executed, as the abbats of Malleie, Sauleie, and others.

In time of this rebellion, a priest that by a butcher dwelling within five miles of Windsoz had been procured to preach in fauor of the rebels, and the butcher (as well for procuring the priest thereto, as for words spoken as he sold his meat in Windsoz) were hanged: the priest on a tree at the foot of Windsoz bridge, and the butcher on a paire of new gallows set vp before the castell gate, at the end of the same bridge. The words which the butcher spake were these. When one had him lesse for the carcase of a sheepe than he thought he could make of it: Asic by Gods soule (said he) I had rather the good fellows of the north had it, and a score more of the best I haue, than I would so sell it. This priest and butcher being accused on a mondaie in the morning whilst the kings armie was in the field, and the king himselfe lying at Windsoz, they confessed their faults vpon their examinations, and by the law martiall they were adiudged to death, and suffered as before is mentioned. This yeare in December, the Thames was frozen ouer: insomuch that the king and quene rode thorough London to Grenewich.

In Christmas the king by his messengers and heralds sent downe into the north his generall pardons to all the offenders; and shortly after Aske that had bene the principall procurer, & as it were chiefe capteine of the northerne rebels, came to London, and now was both pardoned and receiued into fauor, receiuing of the kings bounteous liberalitie, apparell, and diuerse other rewards, whereof he was most vntwofthie: for there liued not (as Hall saith) a better wretch, as well in person as conditions and deeds, speciallie towards the kings maiestie, as after appeared. Sir Rafe Cuers kept Scarbotoz castell in the north, being six weeks besieged by the rebels, twentie daies thereof he and all his companie (which were his onelie friends, seruants, and tenants, and serued for good will to him) were forced to susteine themselves with bread and water, and yet he kept the same to the end of that rebellion; and so deliuered it to king Henric, who sent him some after to serue in the borders against Scotland, where in great credit he continued his seruice, keeping the Scots without doing hurt to England, and with such obedience of them, as within twentie miles of the borders of Scotland fore against him, there was not a Scot but at his commandement: and so continued, till he was killed in the yeare 1545.]

The twelue of Nouember, sir Thomas Peloman priest bare a faggot at Daules crosse, for singing masse with god ale. On the thirde of Februarie, Thomas Fitzgaret sonne and heire to the earle of Arundell was beheaded, and six of his vnckles were dialone, hanged, and quartered at Tiborne for treason. In the same moneth Nicholas Busgrauie, Thomas Tibbie, with others, began a new rebellion at Kirkbie Stephan in Westmerland, who having got together eight thousand men, besieged the citie of Carleill, from whence they were beaten with the onlie power of the citie: and in returning from thence, the duke of Suffolke, who then was lieutenant of the north, encountered with them, toke the capteins, and according to the law martiall arreigned seuentie and foure of them, whome he hanged on Carleill wals; but Busgrauie escaped.

In the same moneth of Februarie began a new commotion, by the procurement of sir Francis Bigod, who being intified to that mischieuous enterpryse by certeine wicked persons, forgot his dutie to his prince, although he had bene a man (as Hall saith) that vndoubtedlie loued God, and reuerenced his prince with a right obedient and louing feare: but such are men when God leaueth them, and that they will take in hand things which Gods most holie word utterlie forbiddeth. it was quicklie suppressed, and the said sir Francis Wigod apprehended, and brought to the Tower. The said sir Francis & one Halam, having raised a great companie of rebels, meant to haue taken the towne of Hull, there to haue fortified themselves, and to haue assembled moze power; but by the wisdom of sir Rafe Ellerker, & the maior of the towne of Hull, the said Halam, & threescore other of the rebels without anie slaughter were taken, which Halam was afterwards hanged in chaines, and two other with him, at the said towne of Hull. Sir Francis Wigod fled, & could not be heard of for a time, but at length he was also apprehended.

Moreover, about the latter end of this twentieth and eight yeare, the lord Darcie, Alke, sir Robert Constable, sir John Bulmer and his wife, sir Thomas Percie brother to the erle of Northumberland, sir Stephan Hamilton, Nicholas Tempest elquier, William Lomleie, began euenly to conspire, although euerie of them before had received their pardons: and now were they all taken and brought to the Tower of London as prisoners. This yeare Robert Packington a mercer of London, a man both rich, wise, and of good credit, dwelling at the signe of the leg in Cheapside, on a morning going (as his custom was) about foure of the clocke to heare masse, in the church then called St. Thomas of Acres, & now the Percers chapell, as he crossed ouer the street from his house to the church, was suddenlie murdered with a gun, the cracke whereof was heard of the neighbors, and of a great number of laborers that stood at Soper lane end, and saw the said Packington go forth of his house: but there was such a thicke mist that morning, as the like had not bene seene, by couert whereof the murderer found thist the moze easilie to escape.

Marie were suspected, but none found in fault, albeit forsomuch as he was one that would speake his mind frelie, and was at the same time one of the burgesses of the parlement for the cite of London, and had talked somewhat against the couetousnesse and crueltie practised by the cleargie, it was mistrusted least by some of them he came thus to his end. At length the murderer in deed was condemned at Wimburie in Wiltshire, to die for a felonie which he afterwards committed: and when he came to the gallows on which he suffered, he confessed that he did this murder, and till that time he was neuer had in anie suspicion thereof. The nine and twentieth of March, were twelue of the Lincolnshire rebels drayned to T. burne, and there hanged and quartered, five of them were priests, the residue laic men. One of the priests was doctor Wakarell, and another was the vicar of Louth.

About this season the maner of casting pipes of lead for the conuenance of water under the ground, without occupieng of soulder to the same, was inuented by Robert Wocke clearke, then one of the kings chapleins, an inuention right necessarie for the sauing of expenses: for two men and a boie will do that in one daie, which before could not be done by manie men in manie daies. Robert Coper goldsmith was the first that made the instruments, and put this inuention in practise. In the verie beginning of this yeare, certeine commissioners being sent into Summersteshire to take by compaign, the people began to make an insurrection: but by the wisdom and diligence of young master Paulet & others the same was suppressed, and the beginners thereof, to the number of threescore, were apprehended & condemned, and fourtene of them were hanged and quartered, one of the number being a woman, the residue were saued by the kings mercifull pardon.

In June the lord Darcie & the lord Huseie were arreigned at Westminster before the marquesse of Excester then high steward, where they were found guiltie, and had iudgment, as in cases of high treason. Shortly after also were arreigned sir Robert Constable, sir Thomas Percie, sir Francis Wigod, sir Stephan Hamilton, sir John Bulmer, and his wife, or rather (as some report) his paramour: also William Lomleie, Nicholas Tempest, William Thurst abbat of Mountfains, Adam Sudburie abbat of Teruener, William Wolprie of Wirlington, also the abbat of Kluers, and Robert Alke. They were all found guiltie of high treason, and all put to death. Sir Robert Constable was hanged in chains ouer Beuerleie gate at Hull, and Robert Alke was also hanged in chains on a tower at Porke, and Margaret Cheineie sir John Bulmers paramour burnt in Smithfield in London. The other suffered at T. burne.

In the latter end of June, was the lord Darcie beheaded at the Tower hill, and shortly after the lord Huseie was likewise beheaded at Lincolne. This yeare at saint Georges feast, was the lord Cromwell made knight of the garter. In October on saint Edwards euen, which falleth on the twelfth of that moneth, at Hampton court the queene was deliuered of hir sonne named Edward, for whose birth great iote was made thorough the realme, with thanksgiving to almighty God, who had sent such a young prince to succeed his father in the crowne of this realme (as afterwards he did) by the name of king Edward the first. His godfathers at the font were the archbishop of Canturburie & the duke of Northfolke, the ladie Marie was his godmother, and at the bishopping, the duke of Suffolke was his godfather. On the eighteenth of October he was made prince of Wales, duke of Cornewall, and erle of Chester.

But as iote is often mixed with sorrow, so at that time it came to passe by the death of his mother, that noble and vertuous ladie queene Jane, which departed out of this life the fourteenth daie of this moneth of October, to the great griefe of the whole realme: but namely the king hir husband took it most grievouslie of all other, who removing to Westminster, there kept himselfe close a great while after. The eight of November, the corps of the queene was carried to Windsor, with great solemnitie, and there buried in the midst of the quire in the castell church. There was also a solempne hearie made for hir in Pauls church, and funerall requies celebrated, as well as in all other churches within the cite of London. Thus was the king left againe a widower, and so continued the space of two yeares together. Upon the death of which queene Jane, and the birth of prince Edward hir son this distinction following was made:

Phoenix Iana iacet nato Phœnice, dolendum Secula Phœnice nulla tulisse duas.

The king held his Christmas at Crænethwich, and as well he as all the court were mourning apparell, till the morrow after Candlemas daie, & then he and all other changed. This yeare Edward Seimer viscount Beauchampe the queenes brother was created earle of Hertford, & sir William Fitzwilliams lord high admerall was created earle of Southampton, & and master Paulet was made viceroy, sir John Russell comptroller of the kings house, master Henedge, master Long, master Knevet of the kings priuite chamber, knights; master Coffin, master L. star, & master Seimer the queenes brother, knights. On Allhalloves euen, the lord Thomas Howard, brother to the duke of Northfolke, died prisoner in the Tower of London, and was buried at Thetford, and then the ladie Margaret Douglas was pardoned, and

The soure and twentieth of February, being fundae, the rood of Worleie in Kent, called the rood of grace, made with diuerse vices, to moue the eyes and lips, was shewed at Pauls crosse by the preacher, which was the bishop of Rochester, and there it was broken and plucked in pieces.

The five and twentieth of February, sir Iohn Allen priest, and also an Irish gentleman of the Carets were hanged & quartered at Tiburne. The second of March, the image of the rood, called saint Sancio, at Bermonsie abbey in Southwiche, was taken downe by the kings commandement. The one and twentieth of March, Henrie Hartam customer of Wilmouth, and Thomas Cwell, were hanged and quartered at Tiburne. In Aprill a frier obseruant called frier Forrest was apprehended, for that he was knowne in secret confessions to haue declared to manie of the kings liege people, that the king was not supreme head of the church, where he had by his oth neuertheless affirmed him so to be. Whereupon in his examination, that point being laid to his charge, he answered that he toke his oth with his outward man, but his inward man neuer consented thereunto. But being further accused of diuerse hereticall and damnable opinions that he held & maintained contrarie to the scripture, at length being not able to defend the same, he submitted himselfe to the punishment of the church.

Now when upon this his submission, hauing more libertie than before he had to talke with whome he would, and other hauing libertie to talke with him, he was incited by some such as had conference with him, that when his sozmall abstration was sent him to read and peruse, he vtterlie refused it, and obstinatelie stood in all his heresies and treasons. Whereupon he was condemned, & afterwards on a paire of new gallowes prepared for him in Smithfield, he was hanged by the middle and armes holes all quicke, and vnder the gallowes was made a fire wherewith he was consumed and burnt to death. There were diuerse of the counsell present at his death ready to haue granted him pardon, if any sparke of repentance would haue appeared in him. There was also a pulpit prepared, in which that renowned preacher Hugh Latimer, then bishop of Worcester, by manifest scriptures confuted the friers errors, and with manie godlie exhortations moued him to repentance, but he would neither heare nor speake.

A little before the execution, an huge and great image was brought to the gallowes. This image was fetched out of Wales, which the Welshmen had in great reuerence: and it was named Daruell Ga theren. They had a prophesie in Wales, that this image should set a whole forest on fire, which prophesie was now thought to take effect, for he set this frier Forrest on fire, and consumed him to nothing. The frier when he saw the fire come, caught hold on the ladder, which he would not let go, but in that sozt impatientlie toke his death, so as if one might iudge him by his outward man, he appeared (saith Hall) to haue small knowledge of God, and lesse trust in him at his ending: otherwisse he would haue bene persuaded to patience, and a christian farewell to the world. Upon the gallowes that he died on, was set up in great letters these verses here following:

David Daruell Gatheren, As saith the Welshmen, Fetched outlawes out of hell:
Now is he come with speare and shield, In harnesse to burne in Smithfield, For in Wales he maie not dwell.

And Forrest the frier, That obstinate lier,
That wilfullie shall be dead:
In his contumacie,
The gospell dooth denie,
The king to be supreme head.]

In Iulie was Edmund Cuninghie atteinted of treason, for counterfeiting the kings signe manuell, and in August was Edward Clifford for the same cause atteinted, and both put to execution as traitors at Tiburne. In September by the speciall motion of the Lord Cromwell, all the notable images, vnto the which were made any especiall pilgrimages and offerings, were vtterlie taken away, as the images of Walsingham, Ipswich, Worcester, the ladie of Wilton, with manie other, and likewise the shynes of counterfeited saints, as that of Thomas Becket, and others. And euen forthwith, by means of the said Cromwell, all the orders of friers and nuns, with their cloisters and houses, were suppressed and put downe. As for the images of our ladie of Walsingham, and Ipswich, were brought by to London, with all the iewels that hong about them, and diuerse other images both in England & Wales, whereunto ante common pilgrimage was vsed, for auoiding of idolatrie, all which were burnt at Chelise by the lord priuie seale.

On the first of September being fundae, one Gratnell hangman of London and two other were hanged at the wexling place by Clearken well, for robbing a booth in Bartholomew faire, at which execution were aboute twentie thousand people, as Edward Hall himselfe (then a present beholder) iudged. This moneth of September, Thomas Cromwell lord priuie seale, vicegerent to the kings highnesse, sent forth instructions to all bishops & curats throught the realme, charging them to see that in euery parish church, the bible of the largest volume, printed in English, were placed for all men to read on: and that a booke of register were also prouided and kept in euery parish church, wherein shall be written euery wedding, christening, and burleng, within the same parish for ever.

The monks there were commanded to change their habits, &c. The one and twentieth of October, the church of Thomas Becket in London called the hospitall of saint Thomas of Acres was suppressed. Nicholas Gibson groser, for this yeare shiriffe of London, builded a free schole at Kitchiffe, nere vnto London, appointing to the same, for the instruction of thre score poore mens chyldren, a schole master and other, with a stipend of ten pounds by the yere to the master, and six pounds thirtene shillings foure pence to the vsher. In this season sute was made to the king by the emperour, to take to wife the duchesse of Milan: but shortly after that sute brake off, because (as was thought) the emperours counsell ment by a cautell to haue brought the king in mind to sue for a licence of the pope. When the duke of Cleue began to sue to the king, that it would please him to match with his sister the ladie Anne, which after toke effect. In November, one John Richolson, otherwisse called Ham-U n u . i y . b e r i , bert, a priefte, was accused of heresie, for holding opinion against the bodilie presence in the sacrament of the altar. He appealed to the kings maiestie, who fauourable consented to heare him at a daie appointed, against which daie, in the kings palace at Westminster, within the kings hall, there was set up a throne or seat rofall for the king, with scaffolds for all the lords, and a stage for Nicholson to stand vpon.

This Nicholson was esteemed to be a man well learned, but that daie he uttered no such knowledge (saith Hall) as was thought to be in a man of that estimation. Diuerse arguments were ministred to him by the bishops, but namelie the king pressed him fore, and in the end offered him pardon if he would renounce his opinion: but he would not consent thereto, and therefore he was there condemned, and had iudgement, and so shortly after he was drawne into Smithfield, and there burnt to ashes. The third of Nouember, Henrie Courtneie marques of Exce-ster and earle of Deuonshire, Henrie Pole lord Pontacute, and sir Edward Heuill brother to the lord Aburgauennie, were sent to the tower, being accused by sir Gessrie Pole, brother to the lord Pontacute, of high treason. They were indicted for deui-sing to mainteine, promote, & aduance one Reginald Pole, late deane of Excester, enemie to the king beyond the sea, & to depriue the king. The marques, and the lord Pontacute were arreigned the last of December at Westminster before the lord Audleie that was chancellor, and for that present time high steward of England, and there they found him guilty.

The third daie after were arreigned sir Edward Heuill, sir Gessrie Pole, two priefests called Crofts and Collins, & one Holland a mariner, & all attein-ted. The firste of Nouember, was the blacke friers in London suppressed, the next daie the white friers, the graie friers, and the monks of the Chaterhouse, and so all the other immediatlie. The foure and twentieth of Nouember, the bishop of Rochester preached at Pauls crosse, & there shewed the blood of Wales, and affirmed the same to be no blood, but honic clarified, and coloured with saffron, as it had bene euidentlie proued before the king and his councell. Also foure anabaptists, three men, and one woman, all Dutch, bare fagots at Pauls crosse the same daie. The nineteenth of Nouember, a man and a woman Dutch anabaptists, were burnt in Smithfield.

The ninth of Ianuarie, the lord marques, and the lord Pontacute, with sir Edward Heuill lost their heads on the Tower hill. The two priefests and Holland were drawne to Tiburne, and there hanged and quartered. Sir Gessrie Pole had his pardon. On A Wednesday, John Johns, John Potter, & William Panering, were hanged in the princes lueries (because they were the princes seruants) on the southside of Pauls churchyard, for killing Roger Cholmelcie esquier in that place, of malice prepensed. The third of March, sir Nicholas Carew of Bedington in the countie of Surrie knight of the garter, and maister of the kings horste, condemned before of treason, was beheaded on the Tower hill, where he made a godlie confession, both of his fault, and superstitious faith, giuing God thanks, for that his hap was to be prisoner in the Tower, where he first sawored the pleasant tast of Gods holie word, meaning the bible in English, which there he read by the exhortation of one Thomas Phillips then keeper of that prison, and sometime a citizen and point-maker of London, who had bene in some trouble for religion, and examined before doctor Stokeleie bishop of London, and sir Thomas More, but through his wise demeanor and mild answers, he escaped their hands.

The ninth of March, the king created sir William Paulet knight treasurer of his house, lord saint John, and sir John Russell comptroller of his household, lord Russell. Also either then or shortly after, was sir William Par created lord Par. The new abbie of white monks at the Tower hill, and the Spinozies, nuns without Algate, were suppressed on the last of March. The same time the king caused all the hauens to be fenced with bulwarks, and blockehouses, and riding to Douer, he took order to haue bulwarks made alongst the sea coasts, and sent commission to haue generall musters made through the realme. Moreouer on Easter daie there were three score saille discovered that laie in the Downes, and for that it was neither knowne what they were, nor what they intended to do, all the able men in Kent rose and mustered in armour the same daie. The eight and twentieth of Aprill began a parlement at Westminster, in the which Margaret countesse of Salisbury, Gertrude wife to the marques of Exce-ster, Reginald Pole cardinall, brother vnto the lord Pontacute, sir Adrian Foksew, & Thomas Dingleie knight of saint Johns, and diuerse other were atteinted of high treason, which Foksew and Dingleie the tenth of Iulie were beheaded.

In this parlement the act of the six articles was establisshed. Of some it was named the blodie statute, as it proued indeed to manie. And euen shortly after the making thereof, when the first inquest for inquirie of the offenders of the same statute sat in London at the mercers chappell, those that were of that inquest were so chosen forth for the purpose, as there was not one amongst them that wished not to haue the said statute put in execution to the bitter-most, in somuch that they were not contented onelie to inquire of those that offended in the six articles contained in that statute, but also they deuised to inquire of certeine branches (as they took the matter) belonging to the same, as of those that came selborne to heare masse, that held not by their hands at the sacring time, who took no holie bread nor holie water, who used to read the bible in churches, or in communication seemed to despise priefests, or images in the churches, &c. To conclude, they inquired so dili-gentlie of them that had so offended in anie of those articles or the branches, that they indicted & presented to the number of five hundred persons and aboue, so that if the king had not granted his pardon, for that he was informed by the lord Audleie then lord chancellor that they were indicted of malice, a great manie of them which already were in prison, had died for it in Smithfield, in firing a faggot.
But although the king at that present granted his gratious pardon, and forgane all those offenses: yet afterwards, during the time that this statute stood in force, which was for the space of eight years insuing, they brought manie an honest and simple person to death. For such was the rigor of that law, that if two witnesses, true or false, had accused anie, and ad-uouched that they had spoken against the sacrament, there was no waie but death; for it boted him not to confesse that his faith was contrarie, or that he said not as the accusers reported, for the witnesses (for the most part) were beleued.

The king being informed that the pope by instigation of cardinall Pole, had moued and stirred di-uers great princes and potentats of christendome to inuaide the realme of England; without all delay rode himselfe toward the sea coasts, and sent diuerse of his nobles and counsellors to farweie all the ports and places of danger on the coast, where anie meet and conuentent landing place might be doubted, as well in the borders of England, as also of Wales: in which dangerous places he caused bulwarks and forts to be erected. And further, he caused the lord admiral earle of Southampton to prepare in a readinesse his maner of ships, for defence of the coasts. Beside this, he sent forth commissions to haue generall musters taken thorough the realme, to vnderstand what number of able men he might make account of: and further to haue the armoz and weapons seene and viewed. Nothing left he vndone that tended to the foreseeing and preventing of a mischiefe to insue, which in a prince is counted a vertue, because such prouidence and circumspection is reputed no lesse in a priuat & ordinarie man, as the poet Plautus saith; virtus est, ubi occasio admonet, diffidere.

Sir William Forman knight, at that present maior of London, was commanded to certifie the names of all the able men within the citie and liberties thereof, betwene the ages of thre score and of fiftene, with the number of armoz and weapons of all kinds of sorts. Whereupon the said maior and his brethren eche one in his ward, by the oth of the common counsell and constable, toke the number of men, armoz, and weapons. And after well considering of the matter, by view of their books, they thought it not expedient to admit the whole number certified for apt and able men: and therefore assembling themselves againe, they chose forth the most able persons, and put by the residue, speciallie such as had no armoz, nor for whom anie could be prouided. But when they were credible aduertised by Thomas Cromwell lord priuie seale (to whome the citie was greatlie beholden) that the king himselfe would see the people of the citie muster in a convenient number, and not to set forth all their powder, but to leaue some at home to keepe the citie; then eche one euerie alderman repaired to his ward, and there put aside all such as had iacks, cotes of plate of maille, and bygandines, and appointed none but such as had white armoz, except such as should beare morris pikes, which ware no armoz but sculles, and there was no stranger (although he were a denishman) permitted to be in this muster.

Euerie man being of anie abilitie, prouided him selfe a cote of white silke, and garnished their basenets with turues like caps of silke, set with owtches, furnished with chaines of gold and feathers, or caused their armoz to be gilt, and likewise their halberds and pollaxes. Some, and especiallie certeine goldsmiths, had their whole armoz of siluer bullion. The lord maior, the recorder, the aldermen, and euerie other officer beside were gorgeously trimmed, as for their degrees was thought seemelie. The maior had fiftene tall fellows on foot attending on him with gilt halberds, apparellled in white silke doublets, and their hose and shoes were likewise white, cut after the Almaine guise, pounsed and pulled out with red sarsenet: their ierkins were of white leather cut, and chaines about their necks, with feathers and bygones in their caps. The recorder and euerie alderman had about him foure halberders trimmed also in warlike sort. The chamberleine of the citie, the counsellors & aldermens deputies were appointed to be wisers on horsebacke, which aloft on their armoz ware white damaske cotes, mounted on good horses well trapped, with great chaines about their necks, and proper sauelins or battell aces in their hands, and caps of velvet richlie trimmed.

The wisers.

The minstrels.

The wisers on foot, being in number foure hundred proper light persons, were clad in white ierkins of leather cut, with white hose and shoes, euerie man with a sauelin or haughsword in his hands, to keepe the people in arraie. They had chaines about their necks, and fetters in their caps. The minstrels were in white, with the armes of the citie, and so was eu-

erie other person at this muster without anie diuersitie; the lord maior, recorder, and aldermen, onchie excepted, who had crosses of velvet or satin piked with gold. The standard bearers were the tallest men of euerie ward, for whome were made thirtie new standards of the deuisie of the citie, beside banners. Euerie alderman mustred his own ward in the fields, to see that euerie man were in furniture prouided as was requisite.

The eight of Maie being the daie appointed for to shew themselves before the king, euerie alderman in order of battell with those of his ward came into the fields at Spile end, and then all the gunners leuered themselves into one place, the pikes into another, and the archers into an other, and likewise the billmen, and there cast themselves in rings, and other formes of battell, which was a beautifull sight to behold: for all the fields from white Chapell to Spile end, and from Bednall greene to Hatchliffe & Stepnie, were all covered with armour, men, and weapons, and especiallie the battell of pikes seemed to be as it had bene a great forest. Then was euerie part diuided into thre battells, a for-ward, a middle-ward, and a reere-ward.

About seauen of the clocke marched forward the light peeces of ordinance, with stone and powder. After them followed the drums and fifes, and immediately after them a guldion of the armes of the citie. Then followed master Sadler capitaine of the gunners on horsebacke armed, and in a cote of velvet, with a chaine of gold, and foure halberders about him apparellled as before is recited. Then followed the gunners foure in a ranke, euerie one going five foot in sunder, which shot altogether in diuerse places berie liuelie, and in speciallie before the kings maiestie, which at that time sat in his new gatehouse at his palace of Westminster, where he viewed all the whole companie. In like maner passed the other companies of all the thre battells in good and seemelie order. The foremost capitaine at nine of the clocke in the morning, by the little conduit came and entered into Paules churchyard, and from thence directed to Westminster, and so through the sanduarie, and round about the parke of St. James, and by into the field, comming home through Holborne, and as the first capitaine entered againe to the little conduit, the last of the muster entered Paules churchyard, which was then about foure of the clocke in the afternoon. The number, beside the wisers, and of other waiters was fiftene thousand.

The eight of Iulie, Griffith Clarke, vicar of Wandsworth, with his chapleine and his seruant, & frier Waite, were all foure hanged and quartered at St. Thomas Waterings. The tenth of Iulie sir Adrian Fortescue, and Thomas Dingleie were beheaded. The ninth of September, the nunnerie of Clerkenwell and diuerse others were suppressed. This yeare the firste of September came to London duke Frederike of Banier, the Pallgrave prince elector of Saronie, and the chancelor of William duke of Cleue, Culliche, Gelderland, and Berghen. The Pallgrave was receiued and conducted to Windsor by the duke of Suffolke, and the other were accompanied with other noble men, and the thre and twentieth of the same moneth they all came to Windsor, where eight daies together they were continually feasted, and had pastime shewed them, in hunting and other pleasures, so much as might be. The Pallgrave shortly after departed homewards and was princelie rewarded, & at that present was the marriage concluded betwixt the king and the ladie Anne, sister vnto duke William of Cleue, Cleue, and a great preparatton was made for the receiuing of hir. The twelue of October the nunnerie of Haliwell, & forthwith the prioie of S. Marie oueries in Southworke, and S. Bartholomeus in Smithfield, were suppressed, & all their lands & goods taken to the kings vse. The fouretenth of Ponember, Hugh Feringdon abbat of Reding, and two priests, the one called Rug, and the other Wion, attainted of high treason for denieng the supremacie of the king ouer the church of England, were by awone, hanged, and quartered at Reding. The same date was Richard Whiting abbat of Glasseburie likewise hanged and quartered on Towze hill beside his monasterie, for the same matter and other treasons whereof he had bene convicted. The first of December was John Bedy abbat of Colchester put to death for the like offense. In December were appointed to wait on the kings person fiftie gentlemen called pensioners, or speares, vnto whome was assigned the sum of fiftie pounds pexellie a peece, for the maintenance of themselves and two horses, or one horse and a gelding of seruice.

The eleuenth date of December at the turne pike on this side Graueling, was the ladie Anne of Cleue receiued by the lord deputie of the towne of Calis, and with the speares and hoysmen belonging to the retinue there. When she came with in little more than a mile of the towne of Calis, she was met by the erle of Southampton high admerall of England, who had in his companie thirtie gentlemen of the kings houthold, as sir Francis Wian, sir Thomas Scimier, and others, beside a great number of gentlemen of his owne retinue clad in blue veluet, and crimson satin, and his yeomen in damaske of the same colours. The mariners of his ship were apparelled in satin of Widges, cotes & slops of the same colour. The lord admerall brought hir into Calis by Lanterne gate. There was such a peale of ordinance shot off at hir entrie, as was marvellous to the hearers. The maior presented hir with an hundred markes in gold, the merchants of the Staple with an hundred souverignes of gold in a rich purse. She was lodged in the kings place called the Chequer, and there she laie fiftene daies for want of prosperous wind.

During which time, godlie iusts and coslie banquets were made to hir, for hir solace and recreation. And on S. Johns date in Christmasse, she with fiftie saille toke passage about none, and landed at Dele in the Dolones about fve of the clocke, where sir Thomas Chenie lord Warden of the ports receiued hir. She taried there a certeine space in a castell newlie built, and thither came the duke of Suffolke, and the dutches of Suffolke, and the bishop of Chichester with a great number of knights and esquires, and ladies of Kent and other, which welcomed hir grace, and brought hir that night vnto Dover castell, where she rested till mondaie, on which date (notwithstanding it was berie foule and stormie weather) she passed towards Canturburie, and on Waram downe met hir the archbishop of Canturburie, with the bishops of Elic, S. Asse, S. Dauides, and Douer, and so brought hir to S. Augustins without Canturburie, where she late that night. The next date she came to Sittingburne, and laie there that night. As she passed towards Rochester on Rewycares even, on Keinam downe met hir the duke of Suffolke, and the lord Dacres of the south, and the lord Spontioe, with a great companie of knights and esquires of Suffolke and Suffolke, with the barons of the cheker which brought hir to Rochester, where she laie in the palace all Rewycares date. On which date, the king (longing to see hir) accompanied with no more but eight persons of his priue chamber, both he and they all apparelled in marble cotes, priuie comming to Rochester, suddenly came to hir presence, whereof at the first she was somewhat astonied, but after he had spoken to hir and welcomed hir, the with louing countenance and gracions behauiour him receiued, and welcomed him on hir knees, whom he gentlie toke vp and kissed, and all that after none communed and deuilled with hir, supped that night with hir, and the next date he departed to Crane-wich, and she came forward to Dartford.

On the morrow the thir date of Januarie being saturday, in a faire plaine of Blackheath, more nere to the foot of Shoters hill, than the ascendent of the same, called Blackheath hill, was pitched a pavilion of rich cloth of gold, and diuerse other tents and pavillions, in which were made fiers and perfumes for hir and such ladies as were appointed to receiue hir: and from the tents to the parkie gate of Crane-wich, all the bushes and firs were cut downe, and a large open waie made for the shew of all persons. And first next to the parkie pale on the east side stood the merchants of the Stillard, and on the west side stood the merchants of Genoa, Florence and Venice, and the Spaniards in cotes of beluet. Then on both sides the waie stood the merchants of the cite of London, and the aldermen, with the counsellors of the said citie, to the number of a hundred and threecore which were mingled with the esquires; then the fiftie gentlemen pensioners: and all these were apparelled in beluet and chaines of gold, trulle accounted to the number of twelue hundred & above, beside them that came with the king and hir, which were sir hundred in beluet cotes and chaines of gold. Behind the gentlemen stood the seruingmen in god order well hoysed and apparelled, that who so ever had well viewed them, might haue said, that they for tall and comelie personages, and cleane of lim and bodie, were able to giue the greatest prince in christendome a mostall breakfast, if he had bene the kings entrie.

About twelue of the clocke, hir grace with all the companie which were of hir owne nation, to the number of an hundred horse, accompanied with the dukes of Suffolke and Suffolke, the archbishop of Canturburie, and other bishops, lords, and knights, which had receiued and conueied hir, came downe Shoters hill towards the tents, and a god space from the tents met hir the earle of Rutland appointed lord chamberlaine to hir grace, sir Thomas Denise hir chancelor, and all hir counsellors and officers, amongst whom doctor Dole (appointed to be hir almoner) made to hir an eloquent oration in Latine, presenting to hir on the kings behalfs all the officers and seruants: which oration was answered vnto by the duke hir brothers secretaire, there being present: which done the ladie Margaret Douglas, daughter to the queene of Scots, the ladie mar-quette Dorell, daughter to the French queene, being neres to the king, and the dutches of Richmond the countesses of Rutland and Hereford, with diuers other ladies and gentlewomen, to the number of threecore and fve, saluted and welcomed hir grace, who alighted out of hir chariot in the which she had rid all hir long iourneie, and with courteous demeanour louting countenance, gaue to them hartie thanks, and kissed them all, and after all hir counsellors and officers kissed hir hand: whych done, the with all the ladies entered the tents, and there warmed them a space.

When the king knew that he was arrived in hir tent, he with all diligence set out through the parke. And first issued the kings trumpets, then the kings officers sworne of his counsell, next after came the gentlemen of his priue chamber, after them followed barons, the yongest first, and sir William Holles lord maior of London rode with the lord Iar that was the yongest baron. Then followed the bishops, and immediatlie after them the earles, and then the duke of Bauiere, and countie Palatine of the Rhine, with the linerie of the Colson or golden fleece about his necke.

Then came the ambassadours of the French king and emperour, next to whome followed the lord priue seale lord Cromwell, and the lord chancellor, then Carter king at armes, and the other officers and sargeants of armes gaue their attendance on each side the lord. The lord marquesse Dorset bare the sword of estate, and after him a good distance followed the kings highnesse, mounted on a goodlie courser. To speake of the rich and gorgeous apparell that was there to be seene that daie, I haue thought it not greatlie necessaie, sith each man may well thinke it was right sumptuous, and as the time then serued, verie faire and coslie, as they that are desirous to vnderstand the same may read in master Halles chronicle more at large, whych in this part I haue thought good to abridge.

After the king followed the lord chamberleine, then came sir Anthonie Browne master of his horses, a goodlie gentleman, and of personage verie semelie, richlie mounted, & leading the kings horse of estate by a long reine of gold. Then followed his pages of honour riding on great couriers, and lastlie followed sir Anthonie Wylshfield capteine of the gard, and then the gard well horsed, and in their rich cotes. In this order rode the king till he came to the last end of the ranke of the pensioners, & there euerie person that came with him placed himselfe on the one side or the other, the king standing in the middle.

When hir grace vnderstood that the king was come, she came forth of hir tent, and at the doze thereof, being set on a faire and beautifull horse richlie trapped, she rode forth towards the king, who perceiving hir to appoach, came forward somewhat beyond the crosse on Blackheath, and there staid till she came nether, & then putting off his cap, he made forward to hir, and with most louting countenance and princelie behauiour saluted, welcomed, and embraced hir, to the great reioicing of the beholders: and she likewise not forgetting hir dutie, with most amiable aspect and womanlie behauiour receiued him with manie apt words and thanks, as was most to purpose. Whilste they were thus talking together, the fiftie pensioners with the gard departed to furnish the hall at Grenewich. After the king had talked with hir a small while, he put hir on his right hand, and so with their footmen they rode together, and with their companies being thus met, returned in this manner through the ranks of the knights and esquieres (whych stood still all this while and remoued not.)

First hir trumpets set forward being twelue in number, beside two kettledrums on horsebacke; then followed the kings trumpeters, then the kings counsellors, then the gentlemen of the priue chamber, after them the gentlemen of hir graces countie in robes of velvet, and all on great horses. Then the maior of London with the yongest baron, then all the barons: next them the bishops, then the earles, with whom rode the earles of Duerstein and Waldec hir countymen, then the dukes of Porffolke and Suffolke, and the archbishop of Canturburie, and duke Phillip of Bauier: next followed the ambassadours, then the lord priue seale, and the lord chancellor, then the lord marquesse Dorset that bare the sword: next followed the king himselfe equallie riding with the ladie Anne, and behind him rode sir Anthonie Browne with the kings horse of estate, as yee haue heard, and behind him rode sir John Dobleie master of hir horses, leading hir spare horse trapped in rich tisse downe to the ground; after them followed hennymen and pages of honor.

Then followed the ladie Margaret Douglas, the ladie marquesse Dorset, the dutches of Richmond and Suffolke, the countesses of Rutland and Hertford, and other countesses. Then came hir chariot in which she had rid all hir iournie, well carued and gilt with the armes of hir countie curiously wrought & couered with cloth of gold, all the horses were trapped with blacke velvet, and on them rode pages of honor, in which chariot rode two ancient ladies of hir countie: next after the chariot, followed sir ladies and gentlewomen of hir countie verie beautifull and richlie appareled, and with them rode sir ladies of England. Then followed an other chariot, gilt and furnished, then ten English ladies, and next them an other chariot couered with blacke cloth, and therein rode foure gentlewomen that were hir chamberers. Then followed all the remnant of the ladies, gentlewomen and damoels in great number: and last of all came an other chariot all blacke, with three launders appertaining to hir grace; next after followed an horsefitter of cloth of gold and crimson velvet upon velvet paled, with horses trapped accordingly, which the king had sent to hir. Then followed the seruingmen of hir traine, all clothed in blacke, mounted on great horses, euerie one in due place and decent order, so that it was verie magnificall and more than princelie brauerie that then was exhibited to the beholders eyes, as the poet saith:

In this order they rode through the ranks and through the parke, till they came at the late friers wall, where all men alighted except the king, the two masters of the horse, and the hennymen, which rode to the hall doze, & the ladies rode to the court gate, & as they passed, they might behold on the wharfe, before the citizens of London were rowing by and downe on the Thames right before them, euerie craft with his barge garnished with banners, flags, streamers, pencels, and targets, painted and beaten with the kings armes, some with hir armes, and some with the armes of their craft and mysterie.

There was also a barge called the bachelors barks, richlie decked, on the which waited a foist that shot great peeces of artillerie, and in euerie barge was great store of instruments of diuerse sorts, and men and children singing and plaing altogether, as the king and the ladie Anne passed by on the wharfe. When the king and she were within the bitter court, they alighted from their horses, and the king loutinglie embraced hir, kissed hir, & bad hir welcome to hir owne, leading hir by the left arme through the hall, which was furnished beneath the harch with the gard and about the harch with the fiftie pensioners, with their battell arcs; and so the king brought hir up to hir priue chamber, where he left hir for that time. As soon as the king and she were entered the court, a great peale of artillerie was shot off from the tower of Grenewich, and there about.

come with in the parke (as befoze y<sup>e</sup> haue heard) then all the horsemen on Blackheath brake their arais, and had licence to depart to London or otherwhere to their lodgings.

On the tuesday following, being the daie of the Epiphanie, the marriage was solemnized betwixt the king and the said ladie. She was fetched from hir chamber by the lords, so that the going betwene the carle of Duerstaine, and the grand master Holcon-der, which had the conduct and order to see the mariage performed, she passed through the kings chamber & all the lords befoze hir, till she came into the galle-rie, where the king was readie, waiting for hir, to whom she made thre low obeisances and courtesies.
Then the archbishop of Cantorburie received them, and married them together, and the carle of Duer-staine did giue hir. When the marlage was celebratz they went hand in hand into the kings closet, and there hearing masse, offered their tapers, and after masse was ended, they had wine and spices. And that done, the king departed to his chamber, and all the ladies waited on hir to hir chamber, the duke of Norfolke going on hir right hand, and the duke of Suffolke on hir left.

After nine of the clocke, the king hauing shifted his apparell, came to his closet, & the likewise in hir came to hir closet with hir sargeant at armes, & all hir officers befoze hir like a queene, & so the king and she went openlie in procession, and offered and dined together. After they had supped together, there were bankets and maskes, and diuerse disports shewed, till time came, that it pleased the king and hir to take rest. On the sundaie after were kept solenne tusts, which greatlie contented the strangers. This daie she was apparelled after the English manner, with a french hood, which became hir exceeding well.

When the carle of Duerstaine and the other lords and ladies which had giuen their attendance on hir grace all that tourneie, had bene highlie feasted and interteined of the king and other of the nobles, they toke leaue, and had great gifts giuen to them, both in monie and plate, and so returned toward their countrie, leauing behind them the erle of Wal-

The fourth of February, the king and the remoumaior & his brethren, with twelue of the chiefe companies of the cite, all in barges gorgeously garnished with bancers, penons, and targets, richlie coue-red, and furnished with instruments, sweetlie sounding, gaue their attendance: and by the waie, all the ships shot off, and likewise from the towre, a great peale of ordinance went off lustilie. The twelue of February, the duke of Norfolke was sent in am-bassage to the french king, of whome he was well interteined, and in the end of the same moneth he returned againe into England.

After Christmas, the priorie church of S. Marie Deueris in Southwiche was purchased of the king by the inhabitants of the Borow, W. Gardener bishop of Winchester putting to his helping hand: they made thereof a parish church, and the little church of Marie Magdalen joining to the same priorie, was made all one church, and saint Margarets in Southwiche a parish, was admitted to the same parish.
The twelue of March, Henrie Bourcher erle of Essex riding a pong horse, was cast, & brake his necke, at his manour in Essex: he was the eldest carle in England. The nineteenth of March, John Clerc erle of Orford, high chamberleine of England, deceased at his manour in Essex. The tenth of Aprill, sir William Peterson priest, late commissarie of Calis, and sir William Richardson priest of S. Maries in Ca-lis, were both there hanged, and quartered in the market place for denieng obstinatelie the kings supremacie.

The thirde sundaie in Lent, one doctor Barnes preached at Pauls crosse, and in his sermon touchied against the bishop of Winchester, for doctrine by him preached in the same place, the first sundaie of that Lent, intrating of iustification. Among other taunts that Barnes uttered against the bishop, this was one, that if he & the bishop were both at home, he knew that great sums of monie would not saue his life, where but for the bishop, there was no great fear, but such all intreatance would serue. The bishop offended herewith, complained of Barnes to the is, and had him examined, & at length by the kings commandement he came to the bishops house, where the matter was so handled at this time, that Barnes with two other preachers, the one named Hierome, and the other Carrel (of whom hereafter more shall be said) were appointed to preach at S. Maries spittle by London in the Ester weeke. In that sermon which Barnes made befoze all the people, he asked the bishop forgiveness, for speaking so vnrerentlie of him in his former sermon, and required the bishop (if he did forgive him) in token thereof to hold by his hand, which like as it was long befoze he did, so (as manie thought afterward) it was but a signed forgiuenesse.

The twelue of Aprill began a parlement, and sir Nicholas Hare was restored to the office of speaker, who together with sir Humfreie Bowton knight, and William Connelbie esquier, the thre and twentieth of February last past, had bin called befoze the lords into the Star chamber, for being of counsell with sir John Shelton knight, in making a fraudulent will of his lands, to the hinderance of the kings prerogative, and contrarie to the statute of Anno 27, for the which offense they were all at that time dismissed of their offices and seruices to the king, and the two knights were immediatelie sent to the towre, and thre daies after Connelbie was committed thither also. They remained there in ward about ten daies, and were then deliuered. Sir Humfreie Bowton was the kings sargeant at law, sir Nicholas Hare was one of the kings counsellors, and speaker of the parlement, who being then depriued, was now againe thereto restored. William Connelbie was attorneie of the dutchie of Lancaster. In this parlement, were frelie granted without contradiotions, fourre subsidies and a subsidie of twelue shillings of lamb, and twelue pence of goods, toward the kings great charges of making Batailles.

The eighteenth of Aprill at Westminster was Thomas lord Cromwell created erle of Essex, and ordained great chamberleine of England, which office the earles of Orford were wont er to enioie; also Gregorie his sonne was made lord Cromwell.
The foure and twentieth of Aprill, Thomas lord Audley, & chancelor of England, with sir Anthone Bowton, master of the kings horses, were made knights of the right honourable order of the garter.
On spais daie, was a great triumph of iusting at Westminster, which tusts had bene proclaimed in France, Flanders, Scotland, and Spaine, for all commers that would, against the challengers of England, which were, sir John Audley, sir Thomas Seimier, sir Thomas Moynings, sir George Carw well esquiers, which said challengers came into the lists that daie richlie appareled, and their horses trapped all in white beluet, with certeine knights and gentlemen riding afore them, appareled all in white beluet, veluet, and white farset, and all their seruants in white dublets, and hozen cut after the Burgonion fashion: and there came to iust against them the said daie, of defendants fortye fir, the earle of Surrie being the foremost, lord William Howard, lord Clinton, and lord Cromwell, sonne and heire to Thomas Cromwell earle of Essex, and chamberleine of England, with other, which were richlie appareled.

And that day, sir John Dobleie was ouerthowne in the field, by mischance of his horse, by one master Syme defendant, neuertheless he brake diuerse speeres valiantlie after that. And after the said iusts were done, the said challengers rode to Durham place, where they kept open household, and feasted the king and quene, with hir ladies, and all the court. The second of Maie, Anthonie Kingston & Richard Cromwell were made knights at the said place. The third of Maie, the said challengers did tourne on horsebacke with swords, & against them came nine and twentie defendants: sir John Dobleie, and the earle of Surrie running first, who in the first course lost both their gantlets: and that daie, sir Richard Cromwell ouerthrew master Palmer in the field off his horse, to the great honor of the challengers. On the fift of Maie, the said challengers fought on foot at the barriers, and against them came thirtie defendants, which fought valiantlie: but sir Richard Cromwell ouerthrew that daie at the barriers master Culpeper in the field.

The said challengers brake by their household, after they had kept open hospitalitie, and feasted the king, quene, and all the lords, beside all the knights and burgesses of the common house in time of the parlement, and the maior, aldermen, and all their wiues to their no small honor, though great expence. In the parlement which began the eighteenth of April last past, the religion of saint Johns in England, commonlie called the order of knights of the Rhodes, was dissolved: & on the ascension day, being the fift of Maie, sir William Weston knight, prior of saint Johns departed this life for thought (as was reported) which he took to the heart, after he heard of that dissolution of his order. & For the king took all the lands that belonged to that order into his hands, to the augmentation of his crowne, and gaue vnto euerie of the challengers aboute written for a reward of their valiantnesse, a hundred marks, and a house to dwell in of pearelie reuenues out of the said lands for euer.]

The same moneth were sent to the Tower doctor Samson, bishop of Chichester, and doctor Willson, for releasing certeine traitorous persons: and for the same offense was one Richard Farmer, a grocer of London, a rich and welthie man, and of good estimation in the cite, committed to the Spawthalseie, & after at Westminster hall arraigned, and atteinted in the psumptre; so that he lost all his goods. & The ninth daie of Iulie, Thomas lord Cromwell, late made earle of Essex (as before you haue heard) being in the counsell chamber, was suddenlie apprehended & committed to the Tower of London: the which manie lamented, but more reioiced, and speciallie such as either had bene religious men, or fauoured religious persons, for they banketed & triumphed together that night, manie wishing that that daie had bene seven yeares before: & some fearing that he should escape, although he were imprisoned, could not be merie.

Other who knew nothing but truth by him, both lamented him, and heartlie praied for him. But this is true, that of certeine of the cleargie he was detestable hated, and speciallie such as had borne swinge and by his meanes were put from it: for in deed he was a man that in all his doings seemed not to fauor anie kind of poperie, nor could not abide the smussing pride of some prelates, which briddoubtles (whatsoeuer else was the cause of his death) did shorten his life, and procured the end that he was brought vnto: which was, that the nineteenth daie of the said moneth he was atteinted by parlement, and neuer came to his answer: which law manie reported that he caused first to be made, howbeit the plaine truth thereof I know not. The articles for which he died appeare in the records, where his attainder is written, which are too long here to be rehearsed; but to conclude he was there atteinted of heresse and high treason, and the eight & twentieth of Iulie was brought to the scaffold on the Tower hill, where he said these words following.

The words of the lord Cromwell spoken at his death.

I Am come hither to die, and not to purge my selfe, as may happen some thinke that I will, for if I should so do, I were a verie wretch and a miser. I am by the law condemned to die, and thanke my Lord God, that hath appointed me this death for mine offense. For since the time that I came to yeares of discretion I haue liued a sinner, and offended my Lord God, for the which I aske him hartlie forgiveness. And it is not vnknowne to manie of you, that I haue bene a great trauelier in the world, and being but of a bale degree, was called to high estate. And since the time I came therevnto, I haue offended my prince, for the which I aske him hartlie forgiveness, and beseech you all to praie to God with me, that he will forgive me. O Father forgive me, O Sonne forgive me, O Holie ghost forgive me, O thre persons and one God forgive me. And now I praie you that be here, to beare me record, I die in the catholike faith, not doubting in anie article of my faith, no nor doubting in anie sacrament of the church. Manie haue slandered me, and reported that I haue bene a bearer of such as haue maintained euill opinions, which is vntrue: but I confesse, that like as God by his holie spirit doth instruct vs in the truth, so the diuell is ready to seduce vs, and I haue bene seduced: but beare me witnesse, that I die in the catholike faith of the holie church, and I hartlie desire you to praie for the kings grace, that he may long liue with you in health and prosperitie, & after him that his sonne prince Edward, that goodlie impe may long reigne ouer you. And once againe I desire you to praie for me, that so long as life remaineth in this flesh, I wauer nothing in my faith.

Then made he his praier, which was long, but not so long as godlie and learned, and after committed his soule to the hands of God, and so patientlie suffered the stroke of the ar, by a ragged and butcherlie miser, which ill fauouredlie performed the office. This man being borne in Putneie, a village in Surreie by the Thames side, foure miles distant from London, was sonne to a Smith, after whose deceasse, his mother was married to a Shereman. But notwithstanding the basenesse of his birth and lacke lacke of maintenance was at the beginning (as it happeneth to manie others) a great let and hindrance for vertue to shew hir selfe: yet through a singular excellencie of wit, joined with an industrious diligence of mind, and helpe of knowledge, gathered by painefull trauell, and marking the courses of states and governments as well of his native countrie at home, as in forren parties abroad, he grew to such a sufficient ripenesse of understanding and skill, in ordering of weightie affaires, that he was thought apt and fit for anye some or office where to he should be admitted.

Which being perceived of cardinall Wolseie, then archbishop of Yorke, he took him into his service, and making him his solicitor, imploied him about businesse oftentimes of most importance, wherein he acquitted himselfe with such dexterity, as answered alwaies the credit committed to him. After the cardinals fall, he was advanced to the kings service, behaving himselfe so aduisedly in matters which he took in hand, that within a small time he rose to high authoritie, and was admitted to be of the priuate counsell, bearing most rule of all other under the king, as partly ye haue heard: so that by him it well appeared, that the excellencie of heretofore vertues, which aduance men to fame and honor, resteth not onely in birth and blood, as a priuilege appoynted and alonely annexed vnto noble houses, but remaineth at the disposition of almighty God the giuer: disposer of all gifts, who raiseth the poore manie times from the basest degree, and setteth him vp with princes, according to the saying of Ecclesiastes:

Paria suis meritis regia septris tulit.*

Penetheliese, concerning the lord Cromwell earle of Essex, if we shall consider his comming vp to such high degree of honor as he attained vnto, we maie doubt whether there be cause more to maruell at his good fortune, or at his worthy and industrious demeanour. But sith in the booke of Acts and Spontaneousments ye maie find a sufficient discourse hereof, we need not to spend more time about it, save onely as master Fox hath trulie noted, such was his actiuitie and forward ripenesse of nature, so readie and pregnant of wit, so discret and well aduised in iudgement, so eloquent of tong, so faithfull and diligent in seruice, of such an incomparable memorie, so bold of stomack and hardie, and could doe so well with his pen, that being conuersant in the sight of men, he could not long continue vnspied, nor yet vnpraised of fauor and helpe of friends, to set him forward in place and office.

Thankfull he was and liberall, not forgetting benefits receiued, as by his great courtesie shewed to Friscolbal the Italian it well appeared: a fauourer of the poore in their lutes, and readie to relieue them that were in danger to be oppressed by their mightie aduersaries: a fauourer of the gospel, and an enemy to the pride of prelates, vertie stout, and not able well to put by injuries, which wane him shewd enemies that ceased not (as was thought) to seeke his overthrow, till at length they had brought to passe that they wished. Carefull he was for his seruants, and readie to doe them good, so that fearing the thing which came to passe, he provided well for the more part of them, notwithstanding his fall. And thus much for the lord Cromwell. The morrow after Whitsunsummer daie, the king caused the queene to remoue to Richmond, supposing it to be more for hir health, and more for hir pleasure.

The first of Iulie, certeine lords came downe into the nether house, & expressly declared causes, for the which the kings marriage was not to be taken lawfull: & in conclusion, the matter was by the conuocation clarelle determined, that the king might lawfullie marrie where he would, and so might she. And thus were they clarelle diuorced, and by the parliament it was enacted, that she should be taken no more for queene, but called the ladie Anne of Cleue. In this yeare, the lord Leonard Greie, brother vnto Thomas marquesse Dorset, being the kings lieutenant in Ireland, was reuoked home, and vpon his comming to London was sent to the Tower. In Iulie the prince of Salerne, and the lord Aloisius Doria came into England to see the king, & after they were departed, don Frederike, marquesse of Padula, brother to the duke of Ferrara, the prince of Macedonie, the marquesse of Terra Jona, & monsieur de Flacie, with other, came from the emperors court into England to see the king, the which on Marie Magdalens daie came to the court at Westminster, and after they had bene highlye feasted, and noblie intertained, they were richlye rewarded as the other, and so departed.

The eight and twentieth of Iulie (as ye haue heard before) the lord Cromwell was beheaded, and likewise with him the lord Hungerford of Hertsfordrie, who at the house of his death seemed vnquiet, as manie iudged him rather in a frensie than otherwise: he suffered for buggerie. The thirtieth of Iulie were drawne on hurdles from the Tower to Smithfeld, Robert Barnes doctor of diuinitie, Thomas Garard, and William Jeron bachelors in diuinitie; Jeron was vicar of Stepnite, and Garard was person of Honie laie: also Polwell, Jetherston, and Abell priests. The first three were drawne to a stake, there before set vp, and then burned. The other three were drawne to the gallows, and hanged, beheaded and quartered. The three first (as is found in their attaindors) were executed for diuerse heresies, but none alledged, whereat (saith Hall) I haue much marvelled, that their heresies were so manie, and not one alledged as a speciall cause of their death. And verelie at their deaths they asked the chiriffs what was their offense for which they were condemned: who answered, they could not tell: but most men said it was for preaching against the doctrine of Stephan Gardiner bishop of Winchester, who chiefe (as the same Hall saith) procured their deaths. The last three, to wit, Polwell, Jetherston, and Abell, suffered for treason, as in their attaindors was speciall mention made, to wit, for denieng the kings supremacie, and affirming his marriage with the ladie Katharin Dowager to be good.

The fourth of August, Thomas Empton some time a monke of Westminster, which had bene in prison for treason in Petegate now for the space of three yeares and more, came before the iudices of gaole deliuerie at Petegate, and for that he would not aske the kings pardon, nor be sworn to be true to him, his monks garment was plucked from his backe, and he repriued, till the king were informed of his malicious obstinacie: and this was the last monke that was seene in his clothing in England till queene Maries daies. The fourth of August were drawne from the Tower of London to Tiburne, Giles Heron gentleman, Clement Hilpot gentleman, late of Calis, and seruant to the lord Aulse, Darbie Genning, Edmund Windholme priest, chapleine to the said lord Aulse, William Hone late a laie brother of the Charterhouse of London, and an other offendor: which six persons were there hanged and quartered, and had bene attainted of treason by parliament. The same daie also was ore Charles Carew gentleman hanged for robbing of the ladie Carew.

The eight of August was the ladie Katharine Howard nere to the duke of Norfolk, and daugh-

Thomas Cromwell in most authority vnder the king.

ter to the lord Edmund Howard shewed openlie as quene at Hampton court. The eleuenth of September a stranger was hanged in Powe field, named James Minatian, who had slaine his maister, one Capon a Florentine in a garden, for his harlot.
In the latter end of this summer, was uniuersallie through the most parts of this realme great death by a strange kind of hot agues and flures, and some pestilence, in which season was such a drought, that wells and small riuers were cleane dzed vp, so that much cattell died for lacke of water, and the Thames was so thalow, & the fresh water of so small strenght that the salt water flowed aboue London byldge, till the raine had increased the fresh waters.

On the two and twentieth of September, Rafe Egerton, seruant to the lord Audleie, lord chancellor, and one Thomas Harman seruant to one maister flightwood, were dyalune, hanged, and quartered, the one for counterfeiting and antidating of the kings seale in a signet, wherewith he sealed licences for denizens, vnder the name of the clearkes of the chancerie: and the other, that is to saie Harman, for witting them. One Luckefield, being of their faction, robbed the lord Audleies chappell and fled, who being afterward apprehended at Calis, which towne he would haue betraied, he slue himselfe with a dagger. In the end of this yeare, the French king made a strong castell at Ard, and also a byldge ouer into the Engllish pale, which byldge the crew of Calis did beat downe, and the Frenchmen built it vp againe, but the Engllishmen beat it downe againe.
After this, the k. sent about fiftene hundred worke-men to fortifie the towne of Gulesnes, and sent with them fise hundred men of warre to gard them.

It was reported in France, that a mightie armie was come ouer forth of England with great ordnance: which byrte caused the French king to send to the frontiers of Picardie the duke of Wandosme, and other capteins with all speed to defend the same. The king of England hearing thereof, sent the earles of Surrie, and Southampton, and the lord Kusell, high admerall into the marches of Calis, to set order there, and after them he likewise sent two hundred light horsemen of the borders of Scotland, whom the Frenchmen called Stradiots. The lords hauing set order in things, shortly returned. A boie, one Richard Perkins, not past fiftene yeares of age, was burnt in Smithfield, for speaking against the sacrament, and contrarie to the statute of the six articles. The bishop of London was thought in great fault, for procuring that terrible execution, seeing the yong fellow was but an ignorant foole without learning, and gladlie recanted that wherewith he was charged.

About the latter end of this yeare, doctor Samson bishop of Chichester, and doctor Willson, which had bene committed to the towre (as before ye haue heard) were now pardoned of the king, and set againe at libertie. In the beginning of this yeare, fise priests in Wokeshire began a new rebellion, with the assent of one Leigh, a gentleman, and nine temporall men, all which persons were apprehended, and in diuers places put to execution. The said Leigh and two other, the one named Laterfall a clothier, & the other Thojnton a peoman, on the seuententh of Maie, were dyalune through London to Tiburne, and there executed. And sir John Peuill knight, and ten other persons, died for the same cause at Pozke.
The same date, Margaret countesse of Salisburie, that had remained a long time prisoner in the towre, was beheaded there within the towre. She was the last of the right line and name of Plantagenet. The ninth of June for example sake, two of the kings gard, the one named Daniport, and the other Chapman, were hanged at Greentwich by the stiers wall, for robberies which they had committed.

¶ On the tenth of June, sir Edmund Baneet knight, of Posffolke, was arreigned before the kings iustices (sitting in the great hall at Grænewich) maister Coge, comptrollor of the kings household, maister Southwell, sir Anthonie Browne, sir Anthonie Winkesfield, maister Wrisleie, and Edmund Beckham, cosseter of the kings household, for striking of one maister Cleve of Posffolke, seruant with the earle of Surrie, within the kings house in the tenis court. There was first chosen to go vpon the said Edmund, a quest of gentlemen, and a quest of peomen, to inquire of the said stripe, by the which inquests he was found gilltie, and had iudgement to lose his right hand. Whereupon was called to doe the execution, first the sergeant surgion with his instruments appertaining to his office: the sergeant of the woodyard with the mallet, and a blocke whereupon the hand should lie: the maister coke for the king, with the knife: the sergeant of the larder, to set the knife right on the ioint: the sergeant ferrer, with the searing irons to seare the veines: the sergeant of the poultrie, with a cocke, which cocke should haue his head smitten off vpon the same blocke, and with the same knife: the peoman of the chanzie, with seare cloths: the peoman of the skullerie, with a pan of fire to heate the irons, a chafer of water to cole the ends of the irons, and two formes for all officers to set their stiffe on: the sergeant of the cellar, with wine, ale, and bare: the peoman of the peltrie in the sergeants stead, who was absent, with bason, etwee, and towels.

Thus euerie man in his office readie to doe the execution, there was called forth sir William Pickering knight marshall, to bring in the said Edmund Baneet: and when he was brought to the bar, the chiefe iustice declared to him his trespass, and the said Baneet confessing himselfe to be gilltie, humbly submitted him to the kings mercie: for this offense he was not onelie iudged to lose his hand, but also his bodie to remaine in prison, and his lands and goods at the kings pleasure. Then the said sir Edmund Baneet desired that the king of his benigne grace would pardon him of his right hand, and take the left, for (quoth he) if my right hand be spared, I maie hereafter doe such good seruice to his grace, as shall please him to appoint. Of this submission and request the iustices forthwith informed the king, who of his godnesse, considering the gentle heart of the said Edmund, and the good report of the lords, granted him his pardon, that he should lose neither hand, lands, nor goods, but should go free at libertie.]

The lord Leonard Greie being indicted of cer-teine points of treason by him committed, as was alleged against him, during the season that he was the kings lieutenant in Ireland, to wit, for deliuering his nephew Girald Fitzgerald brother vnto Thomas Fitzgerald before executed, and also for that he caused certeine Irishmen to inuade the lands of the kings friends, whome he fauoured not: on the fise and twentieth of June he was arreigned at Westminster in the kings bench, and appointed to be tried by knights, because he was a lord by name, and no lord of the parlement; but he discharged the iurie, and confessed the indictment, whereupon he had iudgement, and on the eight and twentieth of June being saint Peters euen, he was beheaded at tawer hill, where he ended his life verie quietlie and godlie.

This noble man as he was come of high linage, so was he a right valiant and hardie personage, hauing in his time done his prince and countrie good seruice, both in Ireland, France, and other places,

res, greatlie to his commendation, although now his hap was thus to lose his head, as convicted by law, and his renowne (overcast with a cloud of disgrace) banished, as future chances befell, to the abolishing of the present honor which sometime he enjoyed. Whobbeit his estimation he might haue preferred unblemished, had provident circumspection undertaken the direction of his doings, and that he had borne his cries in his forehead, to forsaek all afterclaps, which a wise man will in no case neglect:

Nam sapiens in fronte oculos habet, omnia spectans, Omnia prudenti cum ratione videns.

The same daie that he suffered, there was executed at saint Thomas Waterings three gentlemen: John Pantell, John Frowds, and George Kildon: they died for a murder committed in Suffex (as their indictment imported) in companie of Thomas Fines lord Dacres of the south. The truth whereof was thus. The said lord Dacres, through the lewd persuasion of some of them, as hath bene reported, meaning to hunt in the parke of Nicholas Pelham esquire at Loughton, in the same countie of Suffex, being accompanied with the said Pantell, Frowds, and Kildon, John Cheine and Thomas Aleie gentlemen, Richard Middleton and John Goldwell yeomen, passed from his house of Hurstmonscour, the last of Aprill in the night season, toward the same parke, where they intended so to hunt; and coming unto a place called Pikehate in the parish of Wylingleie, they found one John Busbyg, James Busbyg, and Richard Sumner standing together; and as it fell out through quarrelling, there ensued a fraie betwixt the said lord Dacres and his companie on the one partie, and the said John and James Busbyg and Richard Sumner on the other: insomuch that the said John Busbyg received such hurt, that he died thereof the second of Maie next ensuing.

Whereupon, as well the said lord Dacres as those that were there with him, and diuerse other likewise that were appointed to go an other waie to meet them at the said parke, were indicted of murder: and the seauen and twentieth of June the lord Dacres himselfe was arraigned before the lord Audleie of Chalden then lord chancelor, sitting that daie as chief steward of England, with other peeres of the realme about him, who then and there condemned the said lord Dacres to die for that transgression. And afterward the nine and twentieth of June being saint Peters daie, at eleuen of the clocke in the forenone, the shiriffs of London, accordinglie as they were appointed, were readie at the towler to haue executed the said prisoner, and him to haue lead to execution on the towler hill. But as the prisoner should come forth of the towler, one Heire a gentleman of the lord chancelors house came, and in the kings name commanded to staie the execution till two of the clocke in the afternone, which caused manie to thinke that the king would haue granted his pardon. But neuerthelesse, at three of the clocke in the same afternone, he was brought forth of the towler, and deliuered to the shiriffs, who lead him on foot betwixt them unto Tiburne, where he died. His bodie was buried in the church of saint Sepulchers. He was not past foure and twentieth yeeres of age, when he came through this great mishap to his end, for whome manie fore lamented, and likewise for the other three gentlemen, Pantell, Frowds, and Kildon. But for the sad yong lord, being a right towardlie gentleman, and such a one, as manie had conceived great hope of better prose, no small mone and lamentation was made; the more indeed, for that it was thought he was induced to attempt such follie, which occasioned his death, by some light heads that were then about him.

The true report of the cause whereupon the murder of John Busbyg ensued.

The lord Dacres arraigned before the lord Audleie.

Lord Dacres executed at Tiburne.

The first of Julie a Welshman a minstrell was hanged and quartered for singing of songs, which were interpreted to be prophesies against the king. This summer the king took his progresse to Poike, and passed through Lincolnshire, where was made to him an humble submission by the temporallie, and confessing their faults, they humbly thanked him for his pardon, which he had granted them. The towne of Stanfords gave to him twentie pounds, the citie of Lincoln fortie pounds, Boston fiftie pounds, that part of the shire which is called Lindsey gave three hundred pounds, and Kesteven and the church of Lincoln presented him with fiftie pounds. At his entring into Poike shire, he was met with two hundred gentlemen of the same shire, in robes of velvet, and foure thousand tall yemen and serving men well horsed, which on their knees made their submission, by the mouth of sir Robert Botwe, and gave to the king nine hundred pounds. On Barnet dale the archbishop of Poike, with three hundred priests and more met the king, and making a like submission, gave to him six hundred pounds. The like submission was made by the maiors of Poike, Newcastle, and Hull, and each of them gave to the king an hundred pounds.

After he had bene at Poike twelue daies, he came to Hull, where he deuised certeine fortifications. This done, he passed ouer the water of Humber, and so through Lincolnshire, returned toward the south parts, and at Albalowen side came to Hampton court. About the same time, the king had knowledge that the queene liued dissolute, in vsing the vnlawfull companie of one Francis Dyrham, with whome she had bene too familiar before hir marriage with the king; not meaning to forgo his companie now in time of hir marriage, without regard had either to the feare of God, or the king hir husband, the last summer being in progresse with the king at Pomfret, the seuen and twentieth of August, she retained the said Francis Dyrham in hir service, to the intent she might vse his companie in such vnlawfull sort the more frelie: and not satisfied with him, she also used the vnlawfull companie of Thomas Culpeper esquire, one of the gentlemen of the kings priue chamber, as well at Pomfret as elsewhere, on the nine and twentieth and last of August as aforesaid, and on the first of September, as at diuerse other times and places before and after. Whereupon, the thirteenth of Nouember, sir Thomas Wriothesley knight the kings secretarie, came to Hampton court vnto the said queene, and called all hir ladies, gentlewomen, and seruants into hir great chamber, & there openlie in presence of them all, declared hir offences committed in abusing of hir bodie before hir marriage, & therewith he discharged hir household. The morrow after she was conueied to Sion, the ladie Bainton and certeine gentlewomen and some of hir seruants being appointed to wait vpon hir there, till the kings pleasure might be further knowen. Culpeper, Dyrham, and others were had to the towler. Dyrham in his examination being charged with the familiaritie which had bene betwixt them, before she was married to the king, confessed that he and the said queene had made a precontract together, and that he concealed it for hir preferment in marriage to the king, after he understood the king began to cast a li king towards hir.

The first of December, Culpeper and Dyrham were arraigned at the Guildhall in London, before the lord maior sitting there in iudgement as chief iudge, hauing the lord chancelor vpon his right hand, and the duke of Suffolke vpon his left hand, the duke of Suffolke the lord priue seale, the earles of Suffex and Hereford, with diuerse other of the council.

councell sitting there as iudges in commission that daie: the prisoners in the end confessed the inditement, and had iudgement to die, as in cases of treason.

Culpeper and Diram executed.

The tenth of December, the said Culpeper and Diram were drawn from the tower unto Tyburne and there Culpeper had his head stricken off, and Diram was hanged, dismembred and headed. Culpepers bodie was buried in S. Sepulchers church, but both their heads were set on London bridge. The two and twentieth of December were arraigned in the kings bench at Westminster, the ladie Margaret Howard, wife to the lord William Howard, Katharine Cilneie, & Alice Kestwood gentlewomen, Roane Bulmer, wife to Anthoine Bulmer gentleman, Anne Howard, wife to Henrie Howard esquier, and brother to the late queene, Mable Cilneie widow, Margaret Benet, wife to John Benet gentleman, Edward Walgraue gentleman, William Ashbie gentleman; all these were condemned of misprision of treason, for concealing the queenes misdeemeanour. And the same daie in the afternone, the lord William Howard, and Dampson a gentleman were likewise arraigned, and condemned of the same offense, and as well these as the other were adjudged to lose their goods, & the profits of their lands during life, and to remaine in perpetuall prison.

Parliament.

The petition of the lordes & commons of the parliament to the king.

The firste of Januarie the parliament began at Westminster, in the which the lordes and commons exhibited certeine petitions to the king. First, that he would not vex himselfe with the queenes offense, and that he and the ladie Rochford might be attained by parliament: and to avoid protracting of time, they besought him to giue his roiall assent thereto, under his great seale, without staing for the end of the parliament. Also, that Diram and Culpeper besoye attained by the common law, might also be attained by parliament, & that Agnes duchesse of Suffolke, and Katharine countesse of Bridgewater his daughter, which for concealing the said offense, were committed to the towre, and indicted of misprision, & the lord William Howard arraigned of the same, might likewise be attained. Also, that who soever had spoken or done aught in detestation of his naughtie life, should be pardoned.

The queene and other arraigned by parliament.

The queene sent to the towre.

The king proclaimed king of Ireland.

To these petitions the king granted, thanking the commons, for that it appeared they took his griefe to be theirs: whereupon the queene and the ladie Rochford were attained by both the houses. On the tenth of Februarie, the queene was conveyed from Slon to the towre by water, the duke of Suffolke, the lord priuie seale, and the lord great chamberleine, having the conduction of hir. The next daie after being Saturday, and the eleventh of Februarie, the king did send his roiall assent by his great seale, and then all the lordes were in their robes, and the common house called by, & there the act was read, and his assent declared. And so on the thirteenth daie, those two ladies were beheaded on the greene within the towre with an axe, where they confessed their offenses, and died repentant.

Before this, on the thre and twentieth daie of Januarie was the king proclaimed king of Ireland, as it was enacted both by authoritie of the parlement here, and also of an other parlement holden at Dublin in Ireland, there begun the thirteenth of June last past, before sir Anthoine Saintleger knight, and the kings deputie there, where as till that time the kings of England were onlie intituled lords of Ireland. In the beginning of March died sir Arthur Plantagenet vicount Lisle, bastard sonne to Edward the fourth, in the towre of London beattainted, when he should haue bene deliuered and set at libertie.

The occasion of his trouble for the which he was committed to the towre, rose upon suspicion that he should be priuie to a practise, which some of his men (as Hilpot and Bindholme executed the last yeare as before ye haue heard) had consented vnto, for the betraing of Calis to the French, whilste he was the kings lieutenant there. But after that by due triall it was knowne that he was nothing guiltie to the matter, the king appointed sir Thomas Wriotheslie his maiesties secretaire, to go vnto him, and to deliuer to him a ring, with a rich diamond for a token from him, & to will him to be of good chere. For although in that so weightie a matter, he would not haue done lesse to him if he had bene his owne son; yet now upon thorough triall had, sith it was manifestlie proued that he was void of all offense, he was sozie that he had bene occasioned so farre to trie his truth: and therefore willed him to be of good chere and comfort, for he should find that he would make accompt of him as of his most true and faithfull kinsman, and not onelie restore him to his former libertie, but otherwise forth be ready to pleasure him in what he could. Passer secretaire set forth this message with such effectuall wordes, as he was an eloquent and well spoken man, that the lord Lisle took such immoderate ioy thereof, that his hart being oppressed therewith, he died the night following through to much reioicing. After his deceasse, the twelue of the same moneth of March, sir John Rubeleie sonne and heire to the said lord Lises wife, was at Westminster created vicount Lisle. The seuenteenth of March one Margaret Danie a yong woman, being a seruant, was boyled in Smithfield for poisoning of hir mistres with whome she dwelt, and diuerse other persons.

The occasion of sir Arthur Plantagenets trouble.

The lord Lisle took such immoderate ioy thereof.

George Ferrers a burges of the parlement arrested, and what mischiefe ensued.

In the Lent season, whilste the parlement yet continued, one George Ferrers gentleman, seruant to the king, being elected a burgesse for the towne of Blimmothe in the countie of Denonshire, in going to the parlement house, was arrested in London by a procelle out of the kings bench, at the sute of one White, for the sum of two hundred markes or thereabouts, wherein he was late afoze condemned, as a suertie for the debt of one Weldon of Salisburie: which arrest being signified to sir Thomas Dolla knight, then speaker of the parlement, and to the knights and burgeses there, order was taken, that the sargeant of the parlement, called S. John, should forthwith repaire to the counter in Breadstreet (whither the said Ferrers was caried) and there demand deliuerie of the prisoner.

The sargeant (as he had in charge) went to the counter, and declared to the clearks there what he had in commandement. But they and other officers of the citie were so farre from obeying the said commandement, as after manie stout wordes they forcibly resisted the said sargeant, whereof ensued a frate within the counter gates, betwene the said Ferrers and the said officers, not without hurt of either part: so that the said sargeant was driuen to defend himselfe with his mace of armes, & had the crowne thereof broken by bearing off a stroke, and his man stricken downe. During this hual, the shiriffes of London, called Rowland Hill, and Henrie Shurcliffe came thither, to whome the sargeant complained of this iniurie, and required of them the deliuerie of the said burgesse, as afoze. But they bearing with their officers, made little accompt either of his complaint or of his message, reiecting the same contemptuousslie, with much proud language, so as the sargeant was forced to returne without the prisoner, whereas if they had obeyed authoritie, and shewed the seruice necessarilie required in their office and person, they might by their discretion haue appealed

The speaker of the par-lement declares all the matter to the lords.

The sargeant thus hardlie intreated, made returne to the parlement house, and finding the speaker, and all the burgesses set in their places, declared unto them the whole case as it fell, who took the same in so ill part, that they altogether (of whom there were not a few, as well of the kings priuie counsell, as also of his priuie chamber) would sit no longer without their burges, but rose by whole, and repaired to the upper house, where the whole case was declared by the mouth of the speaker, before sir Thomas Andele knight then lord chancelor of England, and all the lords and iudges there assembled, who iudging the contempt to be verie great, referred the punishment thereof to the order of the common house. They returning to their places againe, upon new debate of the case, took order, that their sargeant should estowies repaire to the shiriffe of London, and require deliuerie of the said burgesse, without anie writ or warrant had for the same, but onelie as afore.

The shiriffes
deliuer the burgesse and are charged to appeare before the speaker.

And yet the lord chancelor offered there to grant a writ, which they of the common house refused, being in a clere opinion, that all commandments and other acts of proceeding from the nether house, were to be done and executed by their sargeant without writ, onelie by the shew of his mace, which was his warrant. But before the sargeants returne into London, the shiriffes hauing intelligence how heinouslie the matter was taken, became somewhat more mild, so as upon the said second demand, they deliuered the prisoner without anie deniall. But the sargeant hauing then further in commandement from those of the nether house, charged the said shiriffes to appere personallie on the morrow, by eight of the clocke before the speaker in the nether house, and to bring thither the clerks of the counter, and such officers as were parties to the said affraie, and in like manner to take into his custodie the said White, which bustlingie procured the said arrest, in contempt of the priuilege of the parlement.

committed to the Tower.

Which commandement being done by the said sargeant accordinglie, on the morrow the two shiriffes, with one of the clerks of the counter (which was the chiefe occasion of the said affraie) together with the said White, appeared in the common house, where the speaker charging them with their contempt and misdemeanors afore said, they were compelled to make immediat answer, without being admitted to anie counsell. Albeit, sir Roger Cholmelcie, then recorder of London, and other of the counsell of the citie there present, offered to speake in the cause, which were all put to silence, and none suffered to speake, but the parties themselves: whereupon in conclusion, the said shiriffes and the same White, were committed to the Tower of London, and the said clerke (which was the occasion of the affraie) to a place there called litle ease, and the officer of London which did the arrest, called Tallo, with foure other officers to Pelugate, where they remained from the eight & twentieth untill the thirtieth of March, and then they were deliuered, not without humble sute made by the maior of London & other their friends.

And for so much as the said Ferrers being in execution upon a condemnation of debt, and set at large by priuilege of parlement, was not by law to be brought againe into execution, and so the partie without remedie for his debt, as well against him as his principall debtor, after long debate of the same by the space of nine or ten daies together, at last they resolved upon an act of parlement to be made, and to reuise the execution of the said debt against the said Whelden which was principall debtor, and to discharge the said Ferrers. But before this came to passe, the common house was diuided upon the question: howbeit in conclusion, the act passed for the said Ferrers, wone by fourtene voices.

The king then being aduertised of all this proceeding, called immediatlie before him the lord chancelor of England and his iudges, with the speaker of the parlement, and other of the grauest persons of the nether house, to whom he declared his opinion to this effect. First commending their wise domes in mainteining the priuileges of their house (which he would not haue to be infringed in anie point) he alleged that he being head of the parlement, and attending in his owne person upon the businesse thereof, ought in reason to haue priuilege for him and all his seruants attending there upon him. So that if the said Ferrers had bene no burgesse, but onlie his seruant, yet in respect thereof he was to haue the priuilege as well as anie other.

For I vnderstand (quoth he) that you not onelie for your owne persons, but also for your necessarie seruants, euen to your cookes and housekeepers, inioine the said priuilege; in so much as my lord chancelor here present hath informed vs, that he being speaker of the parlement, the cooke of the Temple was arrested in London, and in execution upon a statute of the staple. And for so much as the said cooke, during all the parlement, serued the speaker in that office, he was taken out of execution, by the priuilege of the parlement. And further we be informed by our iudges, that we at no time stand so highlie in our estate as head, and you as members, are conioined and knit together into one bodie politike, so as what foruer offense or iniurie (during that time) is offered to the meanest member of the house, is to be iudged as done against our person, and the whole court of parlement. Which prerogatiue of the court is so great (as our learned counsell informeth vs) as all ads and processees comming out of anie other inferiour courts must for the time cease and giue place to the highest.

And touching the partie, it was a great presumption in him, knowing our seruant to be one of this house, and being warned thereof before, would neuertheless prosecute this matter out of time, and thereupon was well worthy to haue lost his debt (which I would not wish) and therefore do commend your equitie, that hauing lost the same by law, haue restored him to the same against him who was his debtor. And if it be well considered, what a charge hath it bene to vs and you all, not onelie in expence of our substance, but also in losse of time, which should haue bene imploied about the affaires of our realme, to sit here twelue or one whole fortnight about this one priuat case, he may thinke himselfe better used than his desert. And this may be a good example to other to learne good manners, & not to attempt anie thing against the priuilege of this court, but to take their time better. This is mine opinion, and if I erre, I must referre my selfe to the iudgement of our iustices here present, and other learned in our lawes.

Whereupon sir Edm. Spontacut lord chiefe iustice, verie grauelie told his opinion, confirming by diuers reasons all that the king had said, which was asserted unto by all the residue, none speaking to the contrary. The act in deed passed not the higher house, for the lords had not time to consider of it, by reason of the dissolution of the parlement, the feast of Easter then appoaching. Because this case hath bene diuerslie reported, and is commonlie alleged as a precedent for the priuilege of the parlement: I haue endeuored my selfe to learne the truth thereof, and so let it it forth with the whole circumstance at large according to their instructions, who ought best both to know and remember it.

This yeare in Aprill the king took a lorde of more of all such as were valued at fiftie pounds and upward in the subsidie booke. The lord priute scale, the bishop of Winchester, sir John Baker, and sir Thomas Wriothesley were commissioners about this lorde in London, where they so handled the matter, that of some head citizens they obtained a thousand markes in prest to the kings use. They that laid forth anie summe in this wise, had priute scales for the repayment thereof within two yeares next ensuing. Divers of the Irish nobilitie came this yeare into England, and made their submission to the king as in the Irish chronicle it is more particularie touched. Also wars fell out betwixt England and Scotland, the causes whereof (as appeareth by a declaration set forth by the king of England at this present) in effect were these. First there were divers of the English rebels, such as had moved the commotion in the north and Lincolnshire, that fled into Scotland, and were there maintained: and although request had bene made that they might be deliuered, yet it would not be granted.

Moreover, where the king of Scots had promised to repaire unto Porke the last yeare, and there to meet his uncle the king of England, whereupon the king of England to his great charges had made preparation for their meeting there; the same was not onelic disappointed, but also at the kings being at Porke, in lieu thereof an invasion was made by the Scots, as it were in contempt and despite of the king of England, who notwithstanding imputing the default of meeting to the aduise of his nephews council, and the invasion to the lewdnesse of his subjects, was contented to giue courteous audience vnto such ambassadoers as the same king of Scots sent into England, which came to the king at Christmas last, and with manie sweet and pleasant words excused that which was done amisse, & sought to perswade kindnesse and perfect amitie in time to come. And for the better accomplishment thereof, they offered to send commissioners to the borders, there to determine the debate betwixt them of the confines, if it would please the king likewise to send commissioners for his part, which to doe he graciouslie consented, desirous to make triall of his nephew in some correspondence of deeds, to the faire and pleasant messages in words which he had received from him.

Whereupon commissioners were sent from either king, the which met and talked. But where the Englishmen chalenged a peece of ground, vndoubtedly usurped by the Scots, being for the same shewed such euidence as more substantiall, or more autentike can not be brought forth for anie ground within the realme; the same was neuerthelesse by the Scots denied and reiected, onelic for that it was made (as they alleged) by Englishmen, and yet was it so ancient, as it could not be counterfeited now, and the value of the ground so little, and of so small weight, as no man would attempt to falsifie a writing for such a matter. But yet this dentall notwithstanding, the English commissioners departed from the Scottish commissioners as friends, taking order, as hath bene accustomed, for good rule vpon the borders in the meane time to be obserued.

After their departure, the lord Sparwell warden of the west marches in Scotland, made proclamation in deed for good rule to be kept: but neuerthelesse added therewith, that the borderers of Scotland shuld withdraue their goods from the borders of England, and incontinentlie after the Scottish borderers, on the fourth of Iulie entered into England suddenlie, spoiled the kings subjects, contrarie to the league, and euen after the plaine maner of warre. Whereupon the king of England greatlie maruelling, was driuen to furnish his borders with a garrison for defense of the same, as mistrusting a further mischief intended by the enemie, whose treacherie & loose dealing became a whetstone to the kings wrath, and set him in a heat of indignation, as the poet saith:

Iam Scotus Henrici iram irritauerat iram

Fadifragus.

Then was James Leirmouth master of the Scottish kings household sent into England with letters deuised in the best maner, offering a good redresse of all attempts: and yet neuerthelesse at the entrie of the said Leirmouth into England, a great number of Scots then not looked for, made a rode into England, to the great annoiance of the English borders, which dealing, though it much moued the king of England to take displeasure against the Scots, yet he gaue gentle audience to Leirmouth at his coming vnto him, and by his faire words and promises was partlie pacified. But in the meane time, the deeds of the Scottish borderers were as extreme as might be. And in a rode made by sir Robert Bowles for reuenge thereof, the same sir Robert, and manie other with him, were taken prisoners, and could not be deliuered, nor admitted to paie their fine and ransom, as hath bene cuer accustomed betwixt them on the borders.

And where at the same time, an assurance was made on both sides for a season, at the sute of the said Leirmouth, the Scots ceased not to make sundrie invasions into England, in such wise, as the king no longer trusting to their faire words, but weighing their deeds, put an armie in a readinesse for defense of his subjects, as the due meane to attaine such a peace, as for the safetie of his people and dominions, he thought it stood with his honour to procure. After which preparation made, and knowledge thereof had, the king of Scots made new sute to haue the matter taken vp by treatie. Whereupon the king caused the armie to staie about Porke, and appointed the duke of Norfolk his lieutenant generall, the lord priute scale, the bishop of Durham, & sir Anthoine Browne master of his horses, to treat & conclude with the ambassadoers of Scotland some friendlie peace, vpon reasonable and indifferent conditions, as should be thought requisite, for the auoiding of warres, than by sundrie invasions of the Scots made open and manifest. But after they had viewed ecy others commissions, and began to propound articles, the Scottish commissioners to propound time, at the first seemed to like such articles as the English commissioners had propounded, and made semblance as if there were no doubt, but that in case their king & ours might meet, all matters shuld be quietlie compounded and ended: and so taking it as for a thing sure and certaine, they onlie desired sir daies to obtaine answer from their master, and our armie for that time to staie: whereunto the English commissioners accorded.

After those sir daies was sent a commission out of Scotland, to conclude a meeting precise, at such a place as they knew well could not in the winter season be obserued nor kept. Wherewith when the English commissioners seemed nothing content, the Scottish commissioners shewed forth instructions, wherein libertie was giuen to them to erect their commission in the appointing of a place, & to consent to anie other by the English commissioners thought meet and conuenient. But when the English commissioners refused to deale with men wanting sufficient commission to warrant their doings, the Scottish lish commissioners required other six daies respite, to send for a larger commission, which being granted, at the end of those six daies, they brought forth a commission made in god forme, and without exception or restraint of place: but therewith they shewed instructions containing a like restraint, as in the former commission was expressed. And thus delaying forth the matter by trifling, upon purpose onchie to win time, they hoped thereby through the winter coming on, that the English armie should not be able much to annoie their countrie for that yeare. And so their talke brake vp without anie conclusion of agreement at all; and forthwith was the armie set forward, a good part whereof had lien all this time of the treatie in Poike, and in the countries thereabouts.

The English
armie entred into Scot-
land.

When the whole power was assembled, the duke of Norfolk then lieutenant generall, accompanied with the earles of Shrewsburie, Derby, Cumberland, Surreie, Hertford, Angus, Rutland, and the lords of the north parts, and sir Anthonie Browne master of the houlles, sir John Coge controller of the kings house, and others, hauing with them twentie thousand men well and warlike appointed, entred Scotland the one and twentieth of October, and tarried there eight daies, without hauing anie battell offered vnto them, in which space they burnt these townes and villages, Parton, Karmfuge, Strine, Gradin, Shilles, lang Conem, Hewton, Skithell, Hewthorne, Smellem spittle, the two Herdens, Sledersche, and the two Worlawes, Floris, and the Faire croft, Conem spittle, Korbrough, Kellsie and the abbey, long Spynsflow, Kiden, and Hadenston. For they had determined with fire and sword to take vtter reuenge, crieng out, as the poet saith;

Vindice ferro opus esse, opus esse & vindice flamma, Accendant omnes.

Now while the duke was at Farnton, the fourth daie after his coming into Scotland, there came to speake with him halfe a mile from the campe, the bishop of Whenele, and James Lermouth sent from the king of Scots to intreat of peace, but they agreed not. Finally, after the Englishmen had lien so long within Scotland as they might recouer vittels, at length for necessitie they returned to Berwick. In all which tourneie the standerd of the earle of Southampton, late lord priue seale (which died at Newcastle before their entring into Scotland) was borne in the foreward, because he was appointed captaine of the same.

The king of Scots, hearing that the English armie was returned, raised a power of fiftene thousand men forth of all parts of his realme, vnder the guiding of the lord Harwell (or rather of Oliver Sinclair, as the Scots affirme) boasting to carrie as long in England, as the duke of Norfolk had tarried in Scotland. And soon fridaie being saint Matharins euen, they passed ouer the water of Esk, and burnt certene houses of the Greues on the berrie border. Thomas bassard Barres, with Iacke of Pusgraue sent word to sir Thomas Wharton lord Warden for the king vpon the west marches, to come forward to succour them. But in the meane while the Scots entring verie fierclie, the aforesaid two vallant captaines, bassard Barres and Pusgraue, manfullie set vpon the Scots with one hundred light houlles, and lest a skale on the side of a hill, wherewith the Scots were wonderfultie dismayed, thinking that either the duke of Norfolk with his whole armie had bene come to those west marches, or that some other great power had bene coming against them, when they saw onchie sir Thomas Wharton with three hundred men marching forward toward them. But so it fortuneth at that time vndoubtedlie, as God would haue it, that the Scots fled at the first hunt, whome the Englishmen follow-wed, and toke prisoners at their pleasure; for there was small resistance, or riene at all shewed by the Scots.

Amongst others that were taken, we find these men of name, the earle of Cassil and Glencarne, the lord Harwell admerall of Scotland, and warden of the west marches, the lord Fleuning, the lord Sumertwell, the lord Oliphant, the lord Greie, sir Oliver Sinclair the kings minion, John Kesse lord of Cragie, Robert Crislin son to the lord Crislin, Carre lard of Gredon, the lord Harwell two brethren, John Lellete bassard son to the earle of Roxburgh, George Hume lard of Hermiton, John Spal-land lard of White castell, James Pringell, James Sinclair brother to Oliver Sinclair, John Carmell captaine of Crafforth, Patrike Hebboine equire, John Seton equire son in law to the lord Crislin, William Seton equire, John Steward cousin to the king, John Porrowe equire, Henrie Droumont equire, James Spittoun equire, John Cornurth equire captaine of Catinforth, James Spittoun equire, and other equires and gentlemen (beside the earles and lords before mentioned) to the number of two hundred and above, and more than eight hundred other persons of meaner calling; so that some one Englishman, yea some women had thre or foure prisoners. They toke also some and twentie peces of ordnance, foure carts laden with speares, and ten paulions, with other things of price; so that this might well be said to be the handie worke of God, and the verbe of the psalme verified:

Contemplans dixi, Et ac est mihi dextera Numinis exelsi mortalia cuncta gubernans.

The king of Scots toke such grieve and inward thought for his ouerthrow, and also for the murder of an English herald that was slaine at Dunbar, by one Lech an Englishman (the which for the rebellion in Lincolnshire was fled into Scotland) that he fell into a hot ague, and thereof died, although manie reported that he was at the bickering, and recovered there his deaths wound, and fled therewith into Scotland. But of his death, and of the birth of his daughter ye may see more in the historie of Scotland.

The death of
Scotland.

Of these prisoners before named, one and twentie of them were brought to London, and on the nineteenth of December entred into the citie by Bishops gate, and so were conueied to the tower, where they remained for the space of two daies: and vpon saint Thomas daie the apostle, being the one and twentieth of December, they were conueied to Westminster, sir John Coge constable of the tower riding before them, and the lieutenant of the same tower riding behind them. They rode two and two together, and eight of them being earls and lords, had new gowns of blacke damaske furred with blacke conie, cotes of blacke veluet, and doublets of sattin, with shirts and other apparell bought new for them at the kings charges.

Thus being solemnelie conueied through the streets of London vnto Westminster, they came before the counsell sitting in the Star chamber, and there the lord chancelor declared to them their vntruth, vnkindnesse, and false dissimulation, declaring further how the king had cause of war against them, both for denieng of their homages, and also for their traitorous inuasions made into his realme without defiance, and for keeping his subjects prisoners without redemption, contrarie to the ancient laws of the marches; for which doings, God (as they might perceiue) had scourged them. Wherby the king more regarding his honor than his princelie power, was was content to shew them kindnesse for vnkindnesse, and right for wrong. And although he might keepe them in streit prison by iust law of armes, yet he was content that they should haue libertie to be with the nobles of his realme in their houses, and according to their estates, they were appointed to dukes, earles, bishops, knights, and gentlemen, which so interteined them, that they confessed themselves neuer to be better vsed, nor to haue had greater there in all their life times.

The earle of Castille was appointed to be with the archbishop of Canturburie, the earle of Glencarne with the duke of Norfolk, the lord Fleming with the lord priue seale, the lord Harwell with sir Anthony Browne, the lord Summerwell with the lord chancellor, the lord Elphinst with sir Thomas Lee, Oliver Sumner with the duke of Suffolke, Robert Erskine with the bishop of Westminster, the lord Mount with sir Antonio Wingfield, the lord Spow with sir Rafe Sadler, George Home with the earle of Hertford, the lord of Gracie with sir Thomas Cheney, the lord of Gredon with master Sallwinke, Henrie Harwell with sir Richard Long, Thomas Crasford with sir Arthur Darcie, Patrike de Bohane with sir Thomas Wriothesleie, James Jernell with sir Richard Rich, John Hatland with sir Edward North, the lord Greie, James Sumner, and John Little, were appointed to men of such credit, as were thought meet to answer for their safe keeping.

The two and twentieth of December, tidings came of the king of Scots death, and vpon S. Johns daie in Christmas weeke the foresaid lords of Scotland were brought to the court, which was then at Greenwich, where they had great cheare, and went before the king to the chappell, and were lodged with in the court. Herevpon ye must consider, that where as the king of Scots had left no issue behind him in life but onlie one daughter, the king and his counsell perceiving a meane now offered, whereby without warre the two realmes might be vnitid, these Scottish lords having first made the motion themselves, for a marriage to be had betwixt prince Edward and their yong queene, the king required their helpe vnto the furtherance of that matter, which might be a great benefit to themselves & their countrie. This they promised faithfullie to do, and aswell by themselves as by their friends, to bring the same to effect, so much as the king could require. Wherevpon the king was not onlie contented to release them home, but also highly rewarded them with rich and costlie gifts of sundrie sorts, in most bountifull wise, as Anglorum praelis notet verie uell, saicng:

Præterea ex auro captivos torquibus ornat, Et sumptibus vestibus argentum donat & aurum.

The thirtieth of December they departed from the court, and the morrow after, eight of them dined with sir John Cotes then lord maior of London, and the rest with the shiriffes, and had verie great cheare. On Newycares daie they departed from London homewards towards Scotland, and rode to Enfield to see the prince, and there dined that day, greatlie reioysing, as by their words and countenance it seemed, to behold so proper and towardlie an impe. From thence they kept on their iourne till they came to the north parts, where they found the duke of Suffolke the kings lieutenant there, and with him remained till such pledges were come forth of Scotland, as it was couenanted they should leaue behind them.

The duke then after he had received the hostages, permitted them to depart, and so they returned into Scotland, where they were gladlie welcomed by their kinsmen and friends. With them went also the earle of Angus, who had bene banished Scotland, and having remained here in England a long time, receiued of the kings fee, a thousand marks by yeare; and likewise his brother sir George Douglas, who had five hundred marks yearelie likewise of the kings gift. They were now both restored home into their countrie, and that (as was said) by the kings last will. The said earle of Angus, and diuers of the lords that had bene prisoners here in England, were made of the priue counsell of the realme by the earle of Arreine; that was chosen gouernour to the yong queene, and of the realme, as next heire apparent: notwithstanding that the archbishop of saint Andrews, and cardinal of the see of Rome, enemy mortal unto the king of England for the popes cause (and partlie set on by the French king) had forged a bill, expelling holo the king had made him gouernour (associat with two earles of his affinitie) as well of the queene as realme, contrarie to the lawes of Scotland. Wherevpon the said earle of Arreine, according to his right (as he pretended) with the helpe of his friends, took vpon him the authority of gouernour, and put the said cardinal in prison, and deliuered sir Robert Bowes, and the other English prisoners, by their bonds, according to the custome of the marches.

All this yeare was neither perfect peace nor open warre betwixt England and France, but the merchants ships were taken and robbed on both parts, and at length merchants goods were seized, and the ambassadors of both realms staid. Holbreit, shortly after the ambassadors were deliuered: but the merchants still were robbed, and no warre proclaimed. In the end of this yeare came from the gouernor of Scotland as ambassadors, sir William Hamilton, and James Leirmouth the secretarie of Scotland, whose message was so meancie liked, that they were faine to send an herald into Scotland for other ambassadors, and so came hither the earle of Glencarne, and sir George Douglas: but what sooner their answer was, sir George returned in post, and within twentie daies came backe againe with an answer that was well liked of. But shortly after they brake promise, and went from that which they had couenanted, greatlie to their reproch.

Woad was sold verie deare in the winter season of this yeare, and likewise bittels both fleshy and fishy grew to an high price towards the spring, by reason (as was thought) of the vntemperate wet summer last past, causing great death among cattell. A quarter of mutton was sold for two shillings, or seven grotes, a lambe at three shillings, or three and foure pence, which afore that time was esteemed scarce worth sixteen pence. Against Easter at a court of aldermen kept in the Guildhall the twentieth of March 1542, it was enacted by the lord maior and his brethren, that the maior and shiriffes should be serued at their tables but with one course at dinner and supper in their houses; the maior to haue but seven dishes at one melle for his owne table, and the shiriffes and euerie other alderman but six dishes, vpon paine to forfeit for euerie dish foure shillings at euerie time when they offended in this ordinance. Also that the sargeants and peomen of their houses should haue but three dishes at dinner or supper, the swordbearers melle onlie excepted, which should be allowed to haue one dish more. It was also enacted, that from the feast of Easter then next ensuing, neither the maior nor his brethren should haue anie crane, swan, or bustard, vpon paine to forfeit for euerie foule by them so bought, twentie shillings, the offence to be tried by oth, if it should be presented.

In the beginning of this yeare, on Trinitie sundae, was a new league swoyne betwixt the

And the twelue of June, Edward Leech his brother, and with him a priest, for the same fact were likewise executed at Tlburne.

This yeare the first cast peeces of iron that ever were made in England, were made at Bucksted in Suffe, by Rafe Hoge, and Peter Watw. ¶ The third of June came to the court from the realme of Ireland, thre Irish lords, Dhrin, Spacke, William a Burgh, and Spacke Gilpatrick. In Iulie the said Dhrin was created earle of Downon, Spacke Wil- liam a Burgh earle of Claunrichford, and sir Dunon Dhrin was made baron of Chiankie, and so with rewards they toke leaue and returned. The same moneth also, the Scottish ambassadoz returned with great rewards. The twelue of Iulie, at Hamp- ton court, the king married the ladie Katharine Dar, widow, late wife unto the lord Latimer deceased, and then she was nominated quene, and so pro- claimed.

In the parlement holden this yeare at Westmin- ster, a subside was granted to the king, to be paid in thre yeares. Euerie Englishman being worth in goods twentie shillings & upward to five pounds, paid foure pence of euerie pound. From five pounds to ten pounds, eight pence. From ten pounds to twentie pounds, sixtene pence. From twentie pounds and upward, of euerie pound two shillings. Strangers as well denizens as other, be- ing inhabitants, doubled this summe: and euerie stranger not being an inhabitant, that was sixtene yerres of age and upward, paid foure pence for eue- ries poll. And for lands, fees, and annuities, euerie one borne within the kings dominions, paid eight pence of the pound, from twentie shillings to five pounds. And from five pounds to ten pounds, sixtene pence. From ten pounds to twentie pounds, two shillings. And from twentie pounds and upward, thre shil- lings; strangers still doubling this summe. The cleargie granted a subside of six shillings the pound, to be paid of their benefices in perpetuities in thre yeares insuing: and euerie priest hauing no perpe- tuitie, but an annuall stipend, paid yearelie (dur- ing the said thre yeares) six shillings and eight pence.

About the same time, the king and the emperour sent Carter and Tolson Dor. kings at armes, to de- mand the performance of certaine articles of the French king, which if he denied, they were commaun- ded then to desle him, but he would not suffer them to come within his land, & so they returned. Whereby- on the king caused the said demands to be declared to the French ambassadoz at Westminister. And in Iulie the king sent ouer six thousand men, under the leading of sir John Mallop, appointed to haue the generall conduction of them, accompanied with di- uerse other knights, esquires and gentlemen right hardie and valiant. Sir Thomas Seimer was mar- shall of that armie, sir Robert Boltes treasurer, sir Richard Cromwell capteine of the footmen, and sir George Carew his lieutenant. There were like- wise sir Thomas Palmer, sir John Keinsforth, sir

John saint John, and sir John Gascoigne, knights, that were capteines of the footmen. They were ap- pointed to iouine with the emperours power, and so to make warre into France. They departed from Calis the two and twentieth of Iulie. The third of August open warre was proclaimed in London be- twixt the emperour and the king of England on the one part, and the French king on the other, as eni- mie mortall to them both, and to all other chistian princes beside, as he that had confederated himselfe with the Turke.

The armie that was sent ouer under the leading of sir John Mallop, passed forth from the marches of Calis, and keeping alongst betwixt the borders of the French and Burgonion pales and confines, and iouining with the emperours forces, Spaniards, Wallons, and Dutch, came at length before Lander- seie, a towne latelie fortified by the French, within the borders of the emperours dominions, to the which they laid a strong siege. At length the emperour ha- uing dispatched his wars against the duke of Cleue, who had submitted himselfe unto him, came now to the siege of Landerseie, with a mightie power of sun- drie nations, so that the towne was fore constrained and in danger to haue bene lost, if at that present the French king had not likewise with an huge ar- mie of Frenchmen, Switzers, Lansquenets, Itali- ans, and others, come to the rescue, pitching downe his campe, making countenance as if he ment pre- sentlie to giue battell: and beelie it was thought that two such powers as were there at that time so nere together, should neuer haue departed without battell. The emperour, thinking suerlie to fight, raised his siege, and drew his people into the field. The Frenchmen thereby espising their aduantage, put as well fresh men as bittels, and all kind of muniti- on necessarie into the towne, and in the meane while kept the emperours people occupied with hot fair- milshes.

But now after the towne was thus releued, which thing the French king onelie wished to accom- plish, the next daie when the emperour was readie with his armie ranged in battell to haue fought with his aduersaries, the French king put his armie also in order, but hauing no mind to come forward, he trilled forth that daie, and in the night following, secretlie departed with as much haste as was possi- ble. When the next morning had discovered the Frenchmens flight (for manie so termed this their sudden retire) it was no need to bid diuerse troops of the emperours armie to hie after them: but some made too much haste. For the French king suspecting what would insue, appointed his eldest sonne Henric the Dolphin to remaine behind with the reuerward, accompanied with diuerse noble capteins, which or- dered their people in their retire with such warincesse and heedfull skill, as the reason of warre required, that such of the emperours campe as aduentured ouer rashlie, and shewed themselves more forward than wise, fell within danger of such ambushments as were by the waite couertlie laid in places of ad- uantage: and so diuerse were taken, as sir George Carew, sir Thomas Palmer knight porter of Calis, Edward Wellingham, and others. But neuertheless a great number of such Frenchmen as could not make waie, and kepe pace with their maine troops, were snapped by, slaine, and taken in no small num- bers by their enemies, who followed them as egre as tigers, and as the describer of that pursute saith:

This was after Alhalowentide, so that now by reason the winter was farre entred, and the weather waring extreme foule, and contrarie to an armie that should lie in the fields, the emperour brake up his campe and licenced the most part of his people to depart home into their countreies, for all hope to win Lanersee at that time was cleane cut off, sith it was vittelled and newlie furnished with fresh men and munition. After that the warres were once open betwixt England and France, sundrie enterprises were attempted by the parties on either side in the marches of Calis and Bullognois, in which, for the most part, the Englishmen got the upper hand of their enemies.

The French king suspecting what would insue, appointed his eldest sonne Henric the Dolphin to remaine behind with the reuerward, accompanied with diuerse noble capteins, which ordered their people in their retire with such warincesse and heedfull skill, as the reason of warre required.

At one time the Frenchmen, to the number of eight hundred, coming in the night season to enter into the English pale by the turne pike at Hammes, in purpose to make some spoile in the countrie there, were assailed upon the sudden by sir George Summerfet, and sir William Algraue, latelie before come over with two hundred men out of Suffolke, to strengthen the English pale against the enemies, and at this time did behaue themselves so valiantlie, that they disappointed the enemies of their purpose. 20 For whereas they were entered into a lane inclosed with hedges on either side, fiftene archers getting into the grounds on the backe side of the hedges lieng alongst the lane, through which the Frenchmen were marching, placed the rafelues as they saw their advantage, and so bestowed their shot, that they galled the Frenchmen in such wise, that they were forced to recule in so great disorder, that other of the Englishmen coming upon them, easilie slue and toke of them no small number.

Beside this, at sundrie times the Englishmen invading the countrie of Bullognois, wasted the towne and villages, brought awaye great booties of goods and cattell, to the great impoverishing of the countrie. They burnt at one time the towne of Audinghen, and toke the steeple of the church there, into the which were fled sir scoze pezzants with their wives and children, whome the Englishmen threw downe headlong out of the steeple, because they had 40 most stubbornlie refused to yield. In this yeare a great death of the pestilence reigned in London, and therefore Michaelmasse terme was adourned to St. Albons, and there kept till the end thereof. The eighteenth of December the archbishop of Canturburies palace at Canturburie was burnt, and therein was burnt his brother in law, and other men.

Embassadors
perour.

In Christmasse weeke came to the king lieng at Hampton court, Ferdinando Gonzaga viceroy of Sicilie, prince of Malfeta, duke of Ruano, the emperours capitaine generall. The chiefest cause of his coming was, to appoint what time the emperours 50 armie should be readie to invade France. He had great chere, and at his departure was rewarded with a hundred and fiftie three ounces of gold in plate, and foure thousand and thre ounces in guilt plate, all verie curiousely wrought, and all the time of his being here, his charges were borne by the king. The sundefte before Christmas, the lord William Parbother to the queene, who had married the daughter & heire of Henrie Bourchier erle of Essex, at Hampton court was created earle of Essex, & sir Will. Par knight uncle to them both, was made lord Par of Hoxton, & chamberleine to the queene.

On New years daie, was sir Thomas Wriotheslie the kings secretarie made lord Wriotheslie of Rishfield. This yeare chanced foure eclipses, one of the sunne the fourteenth of Januarie, and three of the mone. On the seventh of March, Germaine Gardner, and Larhe person of Chelsete were executed at Tiburne, for denieng the kings supremacie, & with whom was executed for other offenses one Singleton. And shortly after Ashbeie was likewise executed for the supremacie. In this yeare sir John Allen (who had bin twice maior of London, & of coun-cell to the king) departing out of this life, did give to the citie of London a rich collar of gold, to be worn by the maior: which collar was first worn by sir William Layton on St. Edwards daie, to the election of the new maior, who gave to euery ward in London twentie pounds to be distributed to the poore householders, besides to one hundred and twentie persons, thre scoze men euery of them a gowne of hyde cloth, and a blacke cap, and thre scoze women, to euery of them a gowne of the like cloth, and a white kerchiefe. In this meane while was the cardinal of Scotland deliuered forth of prison, and shortly after got into his hands againe all such conclusions as were made touching the marriage betwixt the queene of Scots and prince Edward, procuring in manner all the lords and nobles of the realme to renounce that which they had promised to the king of England, as well bluerse of those whome the said king had released home out of captiuitie: as others. Wherewith the king toke such sore displeasure, that he prepared an armie to passe into Scotland by sea, and ordeined the lord Edward Seimer, earle of Hertford to be lieutenant of the north parts, and to haue the leading of the same armie: who went thither in March, as well for defense of the borders, as to foresee all things in order for the armie that should thus go into Scotland, whereof he was appointed generall.

Hertford lieutenant of the north.

When all things were in a readinesse for the nauie which was rigged to set forthward towards Scotland, and that the soldiers were come which were appointed to go with sir John Dupleie lord Lisle, and high admerall of England in that voyage, they were embarked, and so the two and twentieth of March the said lord admerall, with sir Nicholas Pointz, and diuerse other knights and capteins departed from the port of London towards the north parts; and coming to Newcastle, found the erle of Hertford ready with such power as was appointed to be there at a daie assigned, forth of those countreies that lie from Trent northwards. And now wanted nothing to further their iourne, but a conuenient wind; which caused them to take certeine dates at the said towne of Newcastle, and in the villages thereabouts.

The lord ad-
merall Dupleie from London to-

land.

After that the earle of Hertford, and the lord admerall, accompanied with the earle of Shrewesburie, the lords Cobham, Clinton, Couiers, Stinton, the lord William Howard, and manie other right valiant knights, gentlemen, and capteins, had lien with the armie and manie readie at Newcastle a certeine time, looking for a prosperous wind to set forthward on their purposed iourne, at length the same came about verie fit to serue their turne, and then with all speed the soldiers were bestowed aboard, euery companie in their appointed vessels: and here with by went the sailes, and forth they got into the maine seas, making their course directlie towards the Forth, a gulfe or riuer in Scotland, able to beare vessels fiftie mules by within the countrie. There were at the least two hundred saile which the lord admerall had caused to come together, according to his commission, rigged, trimmed, and furnished with all things necessarie for the conduction of such an armie, esteemed to be about ten thousand men.

order of warre, marched on towards the said towne of Litch. The lord admerall led the foreward, the lord lieutenant the battell, and the earle of Shrewesburie governed the reereward. Before they came to the towne of Litch, they found in their waie readie to impeach their passage sir thousand horsemen beside footmen. At the first the Scots made towards the Englishmen, as if they had ment to set vpon the vobward: but being manfullie assailed by the hatquebutters, five hundred in number, and shewoble by them curried and galled, they had no mind to come forward, but perceiving how willing the Englishmen were to incounter with them, after certeine shot on both sides, they made a sudden retreat, and leauing their artillerie behind them, they fled to Edenburgh.

The first man that fled (as the talke went) was the cardinall, who perceiving the deuotion which the Englishmen had to see his holinesse, had no mind to faurie. With him also fled the gouernour, the earles of Huntleie, Spurreie, and Bothwell: as for their soldiers, they were disparted, and feared the English forces as the lambe doth the wolfe, the doe the dog, or the hart the lion: to vse the words of Anglorum prælia beric fittie describing this battell, and lateng:

The Englishmen thus hauing put their enemies to flight, & seized vpon their artillerie, made streight to the towne of Litch, and entred it without anie great resistance, wherein they incamped themselves the same night to their most ease and aduantage, and afterwards landed their vittels and great artillerie. They found also in this towne such plentie of riches as they looked not to haue found in anie one towne of Scotland.

The first of Maie they went towards Edenburgh, and as they approached nere the towne, the prouost of the same towne accompanied with one or two burgesses, and two or three officers at armes, desired to speake with the kings lieutenant, and in the name of all the towne, said that the heies of the towne should be deliuered vnto his lordship, conditionallie that they might go with bag & baggage, and the towne to be saued from fire. Wherevnto answer was made by the said lord lieutenant, that where the Scots had so manifestlie broken their promises confirmed by oaths and seales, and certified by the whole parlement, as was euidentlie knowne to the world, he was sent thither by the kings highnesse to take vengeance of their detestable falschod, to declare and shew the force of his highnesse sword to all such as should make anie resistance vnto his graces power sent thither for that purpose. And therefore he told them resolute, that vntill they would yeld by their towne franklie without condition, and cause man, woman, and child, to issue forth into the fields, submitting them to his will and pleasure, he would put them to the sword, and their towne to the fire. The prouost answered it were better to stand to their defense.

Wherevpon charge was giuen to the said prouost and officer at armes, vpon their perill to depart. And forthwith the lord lieutenant sent to the vobward, commanding that they should march toward the towne, which right hardlie they did, and the English gunners manfullie assailed the gates; namelye sir Christopher Boyce master of the ordinance, inso much that the Scots were beaten from their ordinance, and the gate called Canogate beaten open with shot of the great artillerie, and therewith the Englishmen entering the same gate by fine force, beat doone & slue a great number of Scots, and continuallie without staing was the great ordinance drawne by the street to the castell gates: but those that were within the castell shot so frelie at the Englishmen thus approaching with their great artillerie, that diuerse were slaine, the artillerie of the castell beat so directlie alongest the high street, as the Englishmen came by the same. At length also one of the Englishmens culgerings was stricken, and dismounted, and therevpon they were forced to retire backe and giue ouer their enterprise of making batterie to the castell, wanting pioneers, ballists, and other things necessarie for such a purpose.

This daie the Englishmen set fire in diuerse parts of the towne, but they had not leasure to mainteine it, by reason of the smoke rising and troubling them so extremelie, that no great hurt could be done that daie, for that the night also came on, and so they departed backe againe to their campe at Litch. But the next daie, a certeine number of Englishmen vnder the leading of doctor Leigh, went againe to Edenburgh, and did what they could, vtterlie to destroe the whole towne with fire, and so continued all that daie & the two daies next following. During all this violence offered by the English to the enimie, & nothing left but despoire of life, the women and children beholding this desolation, made such outrageous exclamations and wofull lamentations, that heauen it selfe rang with their noyse, as berie pithilie is described by Chr. O. in his report, lateng:

Femine sexu gemitis ad sidera grandi

Tolluntur strepitus, puerorum clamor in auras,

Nihil nisi triste fuit, faciesque miserrima rerum.

In the meane time, foure thousand light horsemen, vnder the leading of the lord Gners, came from our borders, as order was taken afore, and ioined themselves with the armie thus lying in Litch, where after their comming, they did such exploits, in riding and wasting the countrie, that within fouen miles euerie waie of Edenburgh, they left few places, either pile, village, or house vnburnt. And beside this, they brought great numbers of cattel daile into the armie, and met with much good stuffe, which the inhabitants of Edenburgh had for the safetie of the same conueied out of the towne.

The names of the knights made at Litch after the burning of Edenburgh by the earle of Hertford, generall of the kings armie there, on sundaie the eleuenth of Maie, in the fir & thirtieth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the eight, in the yeare 1544, as they were deliuered to me by sir Gilbert Dethike knight, alias Carter, king of armes, are as folloiweth: The lord Clinton, the lord Coniers, sir William Wroughton, sir Thomas Holcroft, sir Edward Doxell, sir John Luttrell, sir John Jennis, sir Thomas Waterton, sir Charles Howard, sir George Blunt, sir Peter Pelwas, sir Edward Warner, sir Rafe Bulmer, sir Hugh Cholmeleie, sir Thomas Leigh, alias doctor Leigh, sir Richard Leigh, sir Peter Leigh, sir John Leigh of Both, sir Lawrence Smith, sir William Mauabour, sir Richard Shirburne, sir Robert Stapleton, sir Thomas Holt, sir William Dauenport, sir Rafe Leicester, sir Humfre Wadborne, sir Thomas Walluerie, sir Francis Hothome, sir John Passie, sir Leonard Beckwith, sir Thomas Cokaine, sir Peter Freshwell, sir Richard Egerton, sir Anthoine Peuill, sir John Peuill, sir William Katchiffe, sir George Bowes, sir Brian Bereton, sir William Bereton, sir Roger Bereton, sir Edward Waren, sir Brian Letton, sir Robert Wursleie, sir Thomas Talbot, sir Hugh Caluerleie, sir John Cleze, sir Richard Holland, sir Thomas Venables, sir John Constable, sir Edmund Tassard, sir John Atherton, sir Richard Cholmeleie, sir Philip Egerton, sir Hugh Willoughbie, sir Thomas Constable, and sir William Woodhouse, sir Edmund Saunge, and sir Thomas Gerard.

On the fourteenth daie the Englishmen brake doone downe the pirc of the hairen of Litch, and burnt ene-rie sicke of it. This done, and hauing shipped their great artillerie, and taken forth all such Scottis ships as were met to ferrie; appointing them to attend on their ships, they took upon them to returne home by land. Amongst other ships which the Englishmen had in Litch hairen; there were two of notable fauour, the one called the Salamander, giuen by the French king at the marriage of his daughter into Scotland, the other called the Antelope, made by the late Scottis king. The ballast of these two ships was cannon shot, which they found in the rowne, to the number of foure score thousand. The rest of the Scottis ships being taken a waile together with their owne ships, which they brought with them, were for the more part offered with the spoile and booties of the soldiers & mariners. On the fiftenth of Maie, their armie and their fleet departed from Litch both in one hoire, the towne being set on fire and burned to the ground.

The English armie incamped that night at a place called Seaton, seven miles from Litch, where they burnt the castell, and destroyed the orchards and gardens with the more despite, for that the lord Seaton owner of the place, was the chiefe laborer to helpe the lord cardinall out of prison. The same daie was Haddington burnt, with a great nurrie and house of friers there. The next night they incamped beside Dunbar, where they had an alarum giuen them, but in the morning they burnt the towne of Dunbar, and marched forth, though somewhat staie by the waile, by reason of the mist and fog, which was verie thicke, continuing all the forenone, and because also they understood how the lords of Seton & Hume with the lord of Bouchlough, and others, had assembled a power of men of warre, and were minded to impede their passage at a streit named the Deafe.

But after that the mist brake vp, which was about two of the clocke in the afternone, the Englishmen came forthward, and passed the same streit without anie resistance. For the Scottis lords perceiving that they were not of power sufficient to encounter with the Englishmen, minded not to put their people in their danger, but wisely retired, suffering the Englishmen to passe at their pleasure, who that night lodged at Kanton, eight miles distant from our boy-ders, where hauing ouerthrowne a pile which stood there, they dislodged the next morrow, and the same daie being the eightenth of Maie, they entered into Berwick: so ending their voiage with great ioye and gladnesse, not hauing lost past fortie persons in all this iourne.

The names of the chiefe towne, castles, and places burned in this voiage, were these: the burrow and towne of Edinburgh, with the abbey called ho-lie Rood house, and the kings palace adioining to the same. The towne of Litch burnt, and the hairen and pire destroyed, the castle and village of Cragmiller, the abbey of Newbottle, part of Muskelburrow towne, with the chappell of our ladie of Lauret, Berston towne and the castell, Seton castell, Hadington towne, with the friers and nurrie, a castell of liuer Sinclers, the towne of Dunbar, Lancreston with the grange, Dirlaw, Wester crag, Canderligh, the pile, and the towne, Broughton, Chesser fields, Crabwens, Dudlston, Stran house, the Ficket, Beuertown, Tranent, Shenston, Parkie, Crapzen, Kirkland hill, Hatherwike, Belton, east Barnes, Bole-land, Watterdon, Nickelwood, Blackeburne, Kan-ton, Bilde and the Tower, Rankorne, saint Spines, the quenes ferrie, part of Petin Maines, and the burnt Island, were burned by the fleet on the sea.
For during the continuance of the armie at Litch, the ships late notable, but colouing the river, burnt diuerse places, and left neither ship, craier, nor bote belonging to arie village, towne, crake, or hairen, upon either side of the fowd, betwene Sterling, and the mouth of the river, unburned, or brought a waile.

Which space containeth fiftie miles in length. About the same time the earle of Lenox fled out of Scotland into the rebne of England, where he was right gladlie received by king Henrie, and shortly he ob-teined in marriage the ladie Marie Douglas, nece to the king of England, and returned some after into Scotland by sea, accompanied with a good competent crewe of English. But finding no such friendship among his countrie men as he looked to haue done, he was constrained to returne, without attaining the enterprise which he had taken in hand; in hope of such assistance by his friends, as now failed him at need.

In the moneth of Maie proclamation was made for the inhancing of gold to eight & fortie shillings, & siluer foure shillings the ounce. Also the king caused to be coined base monie, which was since that time called dobone, the first yeare of Edward the first, and called in the second of quene Elizabeth. In the same moneth also passed through the citie of London in warlike maner, to the number of seauen hundred Irishmen, hauing for their weapons, darts, and handguns, with bagpipes before them: and in saint James parke besides Westminster they mustered before the king. In June the letanie or procession was set forth in English, with commandement by the king to be generallie vsed in parish churches.
About the same time that the armie before remem-bred, was set forthward into Scotland vnder the guiding of the earle of Hertford, as before we haue heard, the king by aduise of his counsell took order for the leuieing of a mightie armie, to passe ouer into France, according to the appointment taken with his confederate, friend and colleague, the emperor, against the French king, at that present common aduersarie to them both, and not long before had entered in league with the Turks, as Ch. Oc. noteth:

cum diras fœdera Turcis Iunxerat, heu nimium res est indigna relatu, Christicolam facere hoc, qui religionis amantem Se proficiens, titulum pietatis venditat orbi.

There were appointed three battels, the forward vnder the leading of the duke of Suffolke, the battell vnder the guiding of the duke of Suffolke, which also was reckoned to be the kings battell, because his maiestie ment to be present with the same in person, and the reere-ward was led by the lord Russell lord priuie seale. Those of the fore-ward were appare-led in blew cotes garded with red, and had caps and hosen after the same sute, partie blue and partie red, their caps made fit for their sculs, which were put into the same. The battell in cotes, caps, and hosen, after the like fashion, but their colours were red and pelloe.

The duke of Suffolke and the lord priuie seale, accompanied with diuerse other noble men, as the earle of Surreie sonne to the said duke of Suffolke marshall of the field, the earle of Orford, the lord Greie of Wilton lieutenant of Hammes, whose name euen then began to grow famous, the lord Ferrers of Charteleie, and sir Richard Deueren his sonne and heire, that brought with them a great number of Welshmen, sir Thomas Cheinie lord warden of the cinque ports, the lord Mountioie a to-wardlie yong gentleman, well learned, and for his time perfect in all points and qualities fit for a noble others beside, no lesse worthe to be remembered for their valure and merits, if time would permit to rehearse them, passed ouer to Calis about Whitson tide, and from thence marching forward to France, left Bullongne on their right hand, & keeping forth towards Puttrel, joined with an armie which the emperour had raised for that purpose, vnder the leading of the countie de Buren, admerall of the low countries, and so these armies being united in one, came before Puttrel, and there laid siege to that towne, being well manned and furnished with all things necessarie for defense, as well in battels as inmunition. The chiefe captaine of which towne was monsieur de Biez, one of the marshalls of France, and gouernour also in the absence of monsieur de Mandoline of Picardie, who being within Bullongne & hearing how the English armie was passed by, and drew towards Puttrel, he left Bullongne, and with all speed got him into Puttrel, not mistrusting anie thing of that policie which the king of England went about, which was, to send this armie to besiege Puttrel, to the end the Frenchmen might be kept occupied further off, while he with the residue of his power should come and besiege Bullongne, which towne standing most commodious for his purpose, he went by force to bring vnder his subiection.

Hereupon was the duke of Suffolke appointed with the kings armie to passe ouer, accompanied with the earle of Arundell marshall of the field, the lord saint John, and the bishop of Winchester, sir John Cage comptrolloer of the kings house, sir Anthony Browne maister of the kings horse, with diuerse other worthe captaine, all which the nineteenth of Iulie came before Bullongne, incamped on the east side of the said towne aloft vpon the hill, and after for his more safetie removed into a ballie, where after manie sharpe skirmishes they first entered the bafe towne, being left and forsaken by the inhabitants, which hauing set fire on their fishing nets, and other such baggage, vnder couert of the smoke, got them vp into the high towne, before the Englishmen could espie them. After this, the old man, otherwile called Le tour d'ordre, standing without the towne for a direction to them that were to enter the haven, and now being kept by sixtene souldiers, was yielded vp by them, vpon presenting the canon before it.

The Frenchmen within the towne, being despoiled of those two places, yet spared not to shoot off from their walles and bulwokes, doing what damage they might deuise, and namelic from the castle and greene bulwoke they did much hurt to the Englishmen with their shot, whereof they made no spare, till at length they were forced to be quiet: for the Englishmen so applied them with such plentie of their shot, that the Frenchmen had no oportunitie to do them anie great hurt with their artillerie. The fourteenth of Iulie, the king in person, accompanied with diuers of the nobilitie, passed the seas from Dover to Calis; and the six and twentieth of the same moneth incamped himselfe before Bullongne on the north side, within lesse than thre quarters of a mile of the towne, where he remained, till the towne was surrendered into his hands. The king being then in campe, it was a matter of ease to discerne which was he, for none of the rest came nere him in tallness by the head: as for his proportion of lims, it was answerable to his goodlie stature and making: a memorabile description whereof, as also of his artificall armour, I find reported as follooweth:

Rex capite Herculi reliquos supereminet omnes, Heros preualidus seu fortia brachia spectes, Seu furas quas fuluo opifex incluserat auro, Sine virile ducis prestanti pectore corpus, Nulla vi domitum, nullo penetrabile ferro, &c.

Beside the trenches which were cast, and brought in manner round about the towne, there was a mount raised vpon the east side; and diuerse peeces of artillerie planted aloft on the same, the which together with the moeste peeces, soon gauged them within, & battered both the staple of our ladies church. To conclude, the batterie was made in most forcible wise in thre severall places, and the walles, towers, and castle were undermined; and the towne within so beaten with shot out of the campe, and from the mount and trench by the moeste peeces, that there were verie few houses left whole therein. The towne thus standing in great distress, there were two hundred Frenchmen and Italianes, which entered vnder the conduct of Agourto to enter the towne in couert of the night, which exploit they so warlike achieved, that by meanes of a priest that could speake the English tongue, they passed by the scouts, & through the watch, so as the most part of them were got vnder the trenches, per it was knowne that they were: to the number of six score of them got into the towne, but the residue after they were once besieged, being intercepted, were taken or slaine. Although this small succour somewhat relieved them within, and put them in some hope to defend the towne somewhat longer against the kings power: yet at length when a pece of the castle was blowne by, and the breaches made, as was thought reasonable, the assault was giuen by the lord admerall Dudley, that was come thither from the sea, which he had scowged after his returne forth of Scotland.

This assault was couragiously giuen, and to speake a truth, no lesse manfully defended: so that when the assailants had perceiued in what state the breaches stood, and what provision they within had made for defense of their towne, which undoubtedly was great (for nothing was by them omitted, that might either aduantage the defendants, or annoy the assailants) those that were appointed in this sort to giue the assault, were called backe, and so they retired, but not without losse on both sides, and namelic of them within. For during the time of the assault, the great artillerie did beat still vpon them that presented themselves at the breaches to repell the assailants, and so diuerse of their valiant captaine and braue souldiers were slaine at this assault, & among other, captaine Phillip Cose. Shortly after, the captaine within the towne, doubting to be easily assaulted, and perceiving themselves in extreame danger to lose the towne by force, if they provided not the sooner, by rendering it to saue themselves: they sent forth two of their chiefe captaine, monsieur Semblemont, and monsieur de Hales, which declared vnto the king, that monsieur de Cleruine gouernour of the towne, with his retinue, was contented to deliuer the towne vnto his grace, with condition that they might passe with bag and baggage. Which request the king, like a noble and mercifull prince, freely granted: and so the next daie, the duke of Suffolke rode into Bullongne, vnto whom in the kings name the keys of the towne were deliuered, & in the afternone departed out of Bullongne all the Frenchmen with heauie hearts, to the number of six thousand, as C. O. witnesseth, saying:

The number of the men of warre that were strong and able to serue, were of horsemen sixtie seuen, of footmen sixtine hundred, threescore and thre, of the which number eight hundred were harquebutters, of hurt men fourscore and seuen, of women & children ninetene hundred and twentie seuen, beside a great number of aged & sicke persons, not able to depart with the others. The last person that came forth was monsieur de Cleruine himselfe, who vpon

The eight of September, the king hauing the sword borne before him by the lord marques Dorset, like a puissant conqueror rode into Bullongne, and the trumpeters standing on the walles, sounded their trumpets at the time of his entering, to the great comfort of the beholders. In the entering, there met him the duke of Suffolke, and deliuered to him the keyes of the towne, and so he rode forth to his lodging that was prepared for him on the south side of the towne. Within two daies after, the king rode about the towne within the walles, and appointed that our ladie church of Bullongne should be taken downe, and in the place thereof a mount to be made, for the more strengthening of the towne. Finally after he had set things in order for the safe keeping of this his towne of Bullongne, by his princely force thus wonne out of the possession of his aduersaries hands, he appointed the lord Wille high admerall of the seas, to be his deputie of the same towne, and then determining not to staie there any longer, he took the seas, & returned into England, landing at Dover the first of October.

In this meane time, whilst the king of England laie (as ye haue heard) with his siege about Bullongne, and the duke of Suffolke, and lord priuie scale about Butterell, the emperor invaded France by Champeigne, winning diuerse castles and townes, as Comiers, Aigne, saint Desir, Chauteau, Thierie, and others. But at the length, meanes were made by treatie to haue the matter taken vp, as in the end it was, and a peace concluded without content of the king of England, although there was place left for him and other princes to enter into this agreement of peace. But the king of England hauing now defraied no small quantitie of treasure in these warres, beside the trauell of his owne person and his people, and hauing the thing now in a manner sure in his possession, which he chiefly went about to obtaine, that is to wit, the strong towne of Bullongne, he would not agree vnto anie peace, except he might inoy that towne, at that instant redie to be deliuered into his hands. And euen now after it was to him deliuered, hearing that for certaine, the peace was concluded betwixt the emperor and the French king, he determined to breake by his camps: but neuertheless to keepe Bullongne in his possession, in despite of all his aduersaries. But here, before we proceed anie further, we haue thought good somewhat to speake touching the siege which all this while continued afoze Butterell, where the Englishmen and Burgonians inforced themselves by all waies and meanes they could deuise, how to constrain their enemies within the towne. On the other part, monsieur de Biez, and those that were with him in gard of the same towne, lest nothing vndone that might serue for their defense, and make to the annoiance of their enemies.

There were with monsieur de Biez within the towne, an hundred men at armes of the retinue of the constable of France, vnder the leading of the lord de la Guich an expert man of war. There were also with the lord of Genlie, foure ensignes of French footmen. Count Berenger a Neapolitane with a thousand formen Italians. Capteine Francisco de Chiaramont, a Neapolitane also, with the like number of Italian footmen. So that the towne might seeme sufficientlie furnished with men, and they wanted neither shot nor powder requisit, so that there was no spare thereof when occasion serued on either part.

The duke of Suffolke and the lord priuie scale caused a mount to be raised, and aloft thereon were certaine peeces of artillerie planted to shot into the towne. Moreover they compassed the walles so on each hand with their scuerall camps and trenches, that hardlie might anie escape either in or out vncspied. Sir Francis Bryan was appointed with certaine bands, containing about the number of a thousand men, to lodge in a campe fortified by himselfe, ouer against one part of the towne, to stop certaine passages on that side, that no succors should enter by the same to the release of them within. There were skirmishes daile betwixt them that sallied forth of the gates, and the Englishmen that watched and waited in the trenches, and other places, insomuch that diuerse lost their liues, and some were irreconerably wounded, as Anglorum prelia witnesseth, saieing:

Dispersi cerebro, faciei nulla figura.*

On a daie as sir Thomas Poinings solbours were warding in one of the trenches, an Italian secretlie comming forth of the towne, fetched awaie the said sir Thomas Poinings his ensigne; and notwithstanding the pursute that was made after him, he escaped and got into the towne with it, to the great displeasure of the whole campe. But as the enemies sometimes went awaie with the aduantage of their attempted enterprises, so oftentimes againe they paid for their aduenturing ouer rashlie about the common price of the market.

But here I cannot but lament the negligence bled in that season: for there is not one English writer to be found extant, that hath written anie thing effectualle of the exploits atchieued in that forme: so as we are diuened to borrow of the aduersaries that haue written thereof, wanting other helps of our owne nation to furnish our booke herein according to our wished purpose. But neuertheless, to giue occasion to those that yet liue, and can best do it, to set forth hereafter a more perfect discourse thereof, I haue thought it not amisse to recite in part what I haue read and learned of such things as then were accounted worthy of relation, and now like to be buried in the dimme booke of oblivion, vntill some fauourer of notable euent chancing in the assiegement of those two townes, Bullongne and Butterell, will put to his helping hand to report the same to posteritie.

Among other stratagems, one I remember, deuised and put in practise by the lord Mountioie, as thus. The enemies had espied a place of aduantage without the towne, where vnder fauour of the shot of certaine peeces of great artillerie lodged upon some platforms or bulwarks within the towne, they might lie without the walles betwixt the Englishmens trenches and the towne ditches, and there couer themselves within a litle trench or counterscarpe made for the purpose, and out of the same be readie with their harquebusses to shot at the Englishmen, so soon as anie of them should once shew his head out of the trenches, to the great danger of them that warded in the same.

The lord Mountioie perceiuing this, deuised with himselfe how to rouse the enemies out of that lurking place, and withall came to the duke of Suffolke, and desired licence to put the deuise (which he had already forecass in his mind) in practise. But the duke being not willing that he should put himselfe in such danger, was loth to grant thereto, but rather perswaded with him not to attempt it: for (said he) my lord, ye may do the king better seruice than to hazard your life, and cast your selfe awaie, as it is veris like you should, in aduenturing vpon such a desperat peere of seruice, and therefore I would not wish you to meddle therewith, for we shall otherwise prouide for the matter well enough. But the lord Mountiole still persisted in his sute verie earnestlie, declaring that he doubted not (by Gods helpe) but to atchieue his purpose to his good contentation without anye great danger, if that were executed which he toke to be necessarie for the accomplishment of his deuise: and that was to haue certaine peces of the great ordinance shot off that waie forth, at what time the wind stood meet to carrie the smoke full vpon the place where the Frenchmen laie. At length vpon his earnest sute, the duke gaue him licence to trie what he could doe, commanding the great ordinance to be laid and charged ready to shot off as he should appoint it. Wherewith the lord Mountiole taking with him fourtene of his owne soldiers (of the which number one of them forsooke to go through with him when it came to the point) immediatlie vpon the shooting off of the artillerie, & that all the ground about was couered ouer with smoke, he came to the place where those Frenchmen laie vnder couert of their trench, and so displaced them, that they had no liking efflonce to lodge so nere vnto such unfriendly neighbors.

Manye other valiant and politike feats (no doubt) were atchieued during this siege, & happie as was this the rehearfall as this. But sith it was the intention of so noble a young gentleman, I haue esteemed it not impertinent to speake thereof, and withall to lament the losse of the inuentor, who being taken a waie thortlie after in his returne homewards, by vntimelie death, was like (if he had liued to greater yeers of experience) to haue proued comparable in valor to anye of his noble progenitors. But now to speake of other incidents that chanced whilst this siege remained before Sputtrell, you must vnderstand that the most part of the vittells that was spent in the campe was brought to them either from the kings campe at Bullongne, or else from St. Omers, to conueie the same so far off, it was needfull to haue the carriage garded with good troops and bands both of horsemen and footmen: for the French fortresses were strongly furnished with great numbers of men of war, which vpon occasions were ready to take aduantages offered.

And as it fortuned at one time among other, there was a conuoie of certaine wagons laden with vittells appointed to come from saint Omers, the same being garded with diuerse bands of Englishmen and Burgonions, sent thither for that purpose, the which marching forward from saint Omers, kept not so good order as had bene requisite: whereof certaine companies of French horsemen that were abroad being adware, set vpon the Burgonions that were attendant vpon the foremost carriages, and finding them in some disorder, easilie discomfited them, followed, and slue them in the chase, till they came to the hindermost carriages, where six hundred Englishmen that attended on the same, impaled themselves with their wagons, so as the Frenchmen could take no aduantage: but with shot of the English archers were so curried and galled that they were constrained to retire, and that in such hast, as they left diuerse of their companie captiues in the Englishmens hands beside those that were faire laid to take their last sleepe there on the ground. Nevertheless, of the Burgonions there were staine foure hundred, and much good vittells lost, the bottoms of the hogheads and other vessels being beaten out, and manie a good Flemish mare killed or taken. For the Frenchmen found small resistance (as before ye haue heard) till they approached to the Englishmen, by whose accusmed manhood, some part of the vittells of that conuoie was saued to the releefe of the campe, which notwithstanding by losse of the residue suffered great want for the time.

Moreover, somewhat towards the latter end of this siege, the earle of Surreie son vnto the duke of Suffolke and marshall of his field, accompanied with the lord warren of the cinque ports, and thurte other valiant capteins English & Burgonions marched forth into the countrie towards Abulle, where they toke and burnt a proper towne called saint Requiers: and after comming to another towne called Kien, they found no bodie at home but women and children, for the men were departed out of it before their comming thither. When they had taken their pleasure in sacking all such goods as they found there fit to be carried a waie, they spared the towne from fire, and so departed. And thus after they had bene two daies and two nights abroad in the countrie, they returned home to the campe with a great botie of beasts, sheepe, and other things which they had got in that vofage.

But now to conclude with this siege of Sputtrell, after the king had wonne Bullongne, and vnderstood how the emperor had agreed with his aduersarie the French king, he resolved to haue his armie to raise that siege which thus had lien before Sputtrell, and with all couenient speed to drave toward Calis. And because it was signified that the Dolphin of France Henrie was comming forward with a great power, which had bene raised by his father the French king to resist the emperor, and now was sent vnder the conduct of the said Dolphin, to the succours of them that were besieged in Sputtrell, the king sent the earle of Arundell, sir John Gage, sir George Carew, sir John Keinsford, and others, with a chosen number of lustie soldiers vnto Sputtrell, to reinforce his armie there, that in leuening the campe, and withdrawing backe, they might be the better able to withstand any attempt which the enemies might put in execution to their annoyance. And verelie this was done with good aduise and necessarie consideration, for the Englishmen that had lien so long time at the siege before Sputtrell, wanting such behouefull refreshment as those were stored with that late before Bullongne, hauing the seas open, and all things at pleasure brought vnto them forth of England, were soze weakened and decayed by death and sickness, and now in raising their campe had manie things to looke vnto, as well for the conueieng of their ordinance, trusse, and baggage, as their feeble and diseased persons: so that if the Dolphin with his armie might haue made such speed forward as to haue overtaken them with his maine power before they had come to Bullongne, it was to be feared least he might haue put them in danger of a plaine distress. But with such timelie foresight as was vsed the siege was raised, and the armie retired first to Bullongne, and after to Calis without losse, although the French horsemen in great number followed, and sundrie times made proud proffers to giue the charge vpon the hindermost companies; but nothing was done to make great account of, except certaine skirmishes that were procured, and alarms giuen, as in such cases it fortuneth.

The Dolphin notwithstanding that the siege was thus raised from Sputtrell, yet he could come thither, yet he kept forward his iourneie, to proue what he might doe to reconer Bullongne, which towne the king of England (as ye haue heard) had left in the keeping of the lord Aulse high admerall. The same towne being then weake, God knoweth, on all sides through batterie and minings, which by the kings power had been made, to bring it into his subiectors, and Saint Requiers burnt by the Englishmen.

The sieges of Sputtrell broken by.

The Dolphin cometh before Bullongne with his great power.

and the trenches not cast downe, nor the ordnance mounted.

The Dolphin being come before the towne, sent certaine bands of his best soldiers by night to giue a cambrado to the bafe towne. They that thus were sent, entred the same the ninth of October, about two of the clocke in the morning, where they took the stand watches, and slue beside a great number of sicke and weake persons) as well soldiers as other, before they could araiue themselves, or well get out of their beds. But after, the Frenchmen and Italians fell to riding and breakeing up of coffers, scattering here and there aboute, and began to fall to their vittels, which they found there in good plentie. The Englishmen that were drizen up to the gates of the high towne, got weapons that were throlone downe vnto them forth of the same, & assembling together, fiercely entred in amongst the pzease of their enemies. And herewith there sallied forth of the high towne sir Thomas Poynings with a band of two hundred soldiers, the which together with the other so besirred themselves, that they manfully beat backe the enemies, slue to the number of eight hundred of them, and chased the residue out of the towne, which fled ouer the sands vp to the hill, where the Dolphin himselfe stood with a great troupe of horsemen about him, and durst not once come downe to the rescue of his people, for feare of the great artillerie that with plentie of bullets saluted the enemies, after that the breake of the daie had once discourred them in fight. Amongst other that were slaine in this repulse of the Frenchmen, le seigneur de Foqueuolles, another of the marshall de Biez his sons in law, and sene-schall of Bullongne was one.

Thus the Dolphin, perceiuing that it would nothing auail him to make anie further attempt against Bullongne, passed forth toward Guines, & shortly after through want of vittels, and sicknesse which sore infested his campe, brake up his armie, and returned into France: so that the proud enterprises of the vainglorious and most insolent French turned to their owne great shame, as C. O. trulie saith:

Sic Galli in magnam cesserunt dedecus ausi.

But shortly after Christmas came downe an armie of fourtē thousand, vnder the conduction of monsieur de Biez, the which the six and twentieth of Januarie incamped on the west side of Bullongne beyond the haueu, where they laie ten daies: but on the first of februarye, the earle of Hertford, the lord admerall, as then lord lieutenant of the towne of Bullongne, the lord Greie of Wilton, sir Thomas Poynings & others, hauing assembled out of the garrisons on that side the seas, to the number of foure thousand footmen, & seuen hundred horsemen, whereof an hundred or foure score were Albancoises, issued forth of Bullongne about foure of the clocke in the morning, and comming to the place where the king had incamped during the time of the siege, they staid there, and put themselves in order of battell: and about six of the clocke, it being then a low water, capitaine Edward Bacie, with three hundred shot, was appointed to passe ouer, and to giue the enemies an alarm in their campe.

At which instant the trumpets sounded, and the drums stroke up in the English armie, and herewith they being diuised into three battels, and to each one his gard of two hundred horsemen, beside the other hundred that attended as a defense to the residue, they shewed themselves to their enemies. The Frenchmen perceiuing this, packed awaie with all haste possible, marching toward Hardilo in two battels. Whereupon the English captains leauing their footmen behind them, and taking onlie with them the horsemen, followed with all speed after their enemies, and comming to the bridge commonlie called pont de Brique, which certaine English carpenters garded with a number of harquebatters, and foure small field peeces, had forced and repaired the same that night: and so the horsemen finding it sufficientlie repaired, passed ouer, and comming to St. Estienne, they found there five hundred Dutch horsemen, commonlie called Swart ritters, that were lodged there to keepe that passage: but being surprised on the sudden by the English horsemen, and sharpelie assailed, they were wholie distressed, and the most part of them taken prisoners, and therewith left with the followers of the armie, were after slaine, because they knew not where to beholo them.

But now the hill of saint Estienne being thus gained by the English horsemen, they put themselves in order of battell againe, appointing an hundred of their men at armes to follow and keepe aloofe as a scale to relieue their fellows in time of need, when they saw them in anie danger. The lords, to encourage euerie one to do his dutie, rode up and downe about the troops, & vsing manie comfortable words, desired them, that although they were but an handful in comparison to the number of their enemies, they would yet in regard of the honour of the realme of England, make a proffer of an onset to the enemies, that they might perceiue that there they were to giue them battell, and to follow, as they should see them their captains and gouernors to lead them the waie. Herewith forward they make towards the enemy, and overtaking them three miles on the hither side of Hardilo sands, they valiantlie gaue the charge, and thrusting in betwixt the two French battels, ouerthrew their cartages, toke their ordnance and munitions, slue and bare downe manie of them that pzeased forth to defend the same.

Monsieur de Biez being in the fore ward, brought backe the strongest and best armed men he had to resist his enemies, ranging them in order so, as he ment to haue inclosed the English horsemen betwixt his battels and the sea, and so to haue distressed them. But this purpose being espied first of all by the lord admerall, the Englishmen by his valiant encouragement gaue a new charge, and breaking through their ranks by force, came backe againe vnto their hundred men of armes that kept aloofe, and there staid till their footmen might come to them, who by this time were aduanced within sight of them, but distant yet by the space of two English miles, or little lesse.

Monsieur de Biez, perceiuing that the English footmen began thus to appoach, made forward againe with his armie, so fast as was possible for his people to march, drawing still his armed men and best soldiers to the hindermost ranks, there to be readie to withstand the Englishmen, as they should offer to assaile them: and in this order the Frenchmen made away, and rested not till they came to Hardilo sands, being a place of such strength and aduantage, by reason of the streit, that after they were once got thither, they might account themselves out of all danger, and therefore there they staid, and dispatched an herald vnto the chiefeins of the English armie, to signify vnto them, that there they ment to abide and to giue them battell, if they would aduance forward to fight with them: but yet they would not in anie wise come forth of their strength vnto some euen ground, although they were earnestlie required therevnto. Whereupon the Englishmen, to light them a candle that they might see where they were, set all the villages & houses about on a light fire, continuing the same all that afternone, and most part of the night following, and the next morning betwixt this twentie and first yeare) the ships of the west countrie and other coasts of this realme wafted abroad on the seas, and toke to the number of thre hundred & od French ships, so that the Graie friers church in London was laid full of wine, the Austine friars and Blache friers full of herring, and other fish that was taken, as the same should haue bene conueied into France. About the same season the king demanded a beneuolence of his subiects spirituall and temporall, towards the maintenance of the warres against the Frenchmen and Scots. ¶ On the twelue of Januarie, the lord chancellour, the duke of Staffolke, and other of the kings counsell, began to sit at Barnards castell, where they first called before them the maior and aldermen, &c. And because Richard Read alderman would not agree to paie as they set him; he was commanded vpon paine to serue the king in his warres of Scotland, who departed from London the thre and twentieth of Januarie.

Also sir William Roch alderman, for words of displeasure taken by the kings counsell, was by them sent to the fleet, where he remained till passion sundae. ¶ On the six and twentieth of Januarie, there camped on the west side of Bullongne beyond the haue, an armie of French, to the number of eighty thousand, where they laie ten daies, and the first of Februarie were put to flight by the earle of Hertford, and sir John Dumble lord admerall, then deputie of Bullongne. ¶ On the thirteenth of Fe-bruarie, a priest was set on the pillorie in Cheape, and burnt in both chokes with the letters F. and A. and a paper on his head, wherein was written, For false accusing: which iudgement was giuen by the lord chancellour in the Starre chamber, a notable example of iustice. Great cause haue I to wish the like to the like accuser, who neuer yet repented, but contrariwise sweareth and forswearth that he neuer did anie such act against his brother.]

In the beginning of March sir Rafe Cuers lord warden of the marches after manie fortunate rodes and forraies made into Scotland, assembled now about foure thousand men, & entering with the same into Scotland, was incountered at Halidon rig by the earle of Arraine and other Scottisshmen, which so beset the Englishmen with thre battels on ech side, that in the end they slue the said lord warden, with the lord Dgle, and a great number of other gentlemen and commons, beside prisoners, which they toke, so that few escaped the Scottisshmens hands. Among other prisoners taken, Richard Read an alderman of London aforesaid was one. The death of sir Rafe Cuers was greatlie bemoaned: for he had shewed great proue of his valiant prowesse at sundrie times before; namelie in this yeare past, as at the taking and burning of the towne of Redworth, which enter-pryse was atchiued the tenth of June, beside diuerse other exploits fortunatelic brought to passe by his high ballancie and manhood, till his day was at this present to finish his daies: whose life though then it toke end, yet shall not his fame & god report (purchased by martiall courage, policie, and dangerous ad-uentures) perishe or decaie; as the poet trulie saith:

Parta labore volat et astum bona fama per orbem, Hec veluti Phœbus non moritur, et manet.

This yeare on saint Georges daie sir Thomas Wriothesleie lord chancellour of England was made knight of the garter. Also Trinitie terme was adiourned by reason of the warres, but the chichester and the court of the tenths were open, for those that were accountable in either of the said courts. The thirteenth of June Robert Luken seruant to sir Hum-frie Browne one of the iustices of the kings Bench, Anne Askew gentlewoman, otherwise called Anne Kine, wife to one Kine, a gentleman of Lincolneshire, and Jone Sautereie, wife to John Sautereie of London, were arreigned in the Culliball of London, for speaking against the sacrament of the altar (as they tearmed it) contrarie to the statute of the six articles: but because no witnesse appeared against the women, nor against Luken, one onelic crepted, who was thought to accuse him rather of malice, than otherwise, they were by twelue honest substantiall men of the citie (sworne to passe vpon their indictments) clarelie acquitted and discharged.

The same daie also was a pewterer named Thomas Daise discharged, by the pardon granted in the last parlement, after he had remained in prison in Newgate the space of thre yeares now past, condemned long before the date of the same pardon, for the article of auricular confession compelled within the same statute. About the same time, to wit the seuenth of June a great armie of Frenchmen came downe to Bullongne, and nere to the haue incam-ped themselves. In this armie were reckoned to be twelue thousand lanceknights, twelue thousand French footmen, six thousand Italians, foure thousand of legionarie soldours of France, & a thousand or twelue hundred men of armes, beside seuen or eighi hundred light horsemen. After some skirmishes not greatlie to their aduantage, they began yet to build a fort, which at length they accomplished, as after shall appeare. ¶ About the six & twentieth of June, was a great tempest in Derbishire, where thowgh trees were ouerturned, & diuerse churches, chappels, and houses were vncouered. Also in Lancashire, there fell hailstones as big as mens fists, which had diuerse prints in them, some like mens faces, some like gun holes, &c.]

The same moneth also the lord Lisle admerall of England with the English fleet entered the mouth of Saine, and came before Newhauen, where a great manie of the Frenchmen laie, to the number of a two hundred ships, and six and twentie gallies, wher-of the pope (as was reported) had sent twentie well furnished with men and morie, to the aid of the French king. The Englishmen being not past an hundred and threescore saile, and all great ships, determined not to set vpon the Frenchmen where they laie: but yet appochoing nere vnto them, they offered the gallies to come abroad, which changed shot againe with the Englishmen. The gallies at the first had great aduantage, by reason of the great calme.
Twice either part assauled other with shot of their great artillerie, but suddenly the wind rose so high, that the gallies could not indure the rage of the seas, and so the Englishmen for feare of flats were compelled to enter the maine seas, and so sailed vnto

Portsmouth where the king laie, for he had know- ledge by his espials that the Frenchmen intended to land in the Ile of Wight, wherefore he repaired to that coast, to see his realme defended.

After this, the eighteenth of Julie the admerall of France in monsieur Daneballe holled by sailes, and with his whole naue came forth into the seas, and arrived on the coast of Suffer before bright Ham- freed, and set certeine of his soldiors on land, to burne and spoile the countrie: but the beacons were fired, & the inhabitants thereabouts came downe so thicke, that the Frenchmen were dzien to flie with losse of diuerse of their numbers: so that they did little hurt there. Immediatlie hereupon they made to the point of the Ile of Wight, called saint Helens point, and there in good order upon their arrivall they cast am- chors, and sent dailie sirtene of their gallies to the verie haucn of Portsmouth. The English nanie li- eng there in the same haucn, made them readie, and set out toward the enimies, and still the one shot hot- lie at the other: but the wind was so caline, that the kings ships could beare no saile, which greatlie grie- ued the minds of the Englishmen, and made the eni- mies more bold to approach with their gallies, and to assault the ships with their shot even within the ha- uen.

The twentieth of Julie, the whole naue of the Eng- lishmen made out, & purposed to set on the French- men, but in setting forward, thorough too much fol- lie, one of the kings ships called the Marie Rose was drownd in the middes of the haucn, by reason that she was overladen with ordinance, and had the ports left open, which were verie low, and the great artillerie unbraced; so that when the ship should turne, the water entered, and suddenlie she suncke. In hir was sir George Carew knight and foure hundred soldiors vnder his guiding. There escaped not past fortie persons of all the whole number. On the morrow after about two thousand of the French- men landed in the Ile of Wight, where one of their chiefe captians named le cheualier Daur, a Breui- cois was slaine with manie other, and the residue with losse and shame dzien backe againe to their gallies.

The king perceiving the great Armada of the Frenchmen to approach, caused the beacons to be fi- red, and by letters sent into Hamptonshire, Sum- meretshire, Wiltsire, and into diuerse other coun- tries adjoining, gaue knowledge to such as were ap- pointed to be readie for that purpose, to come with all speed to encounter the enimies. Whereupon they repaired to his presence in great numbers well fur- nished with armor, weapon, vittels, and all other things necessarie, so that the Ile was garnished, and all the frontiers alongest the coasts fortified with ex- ceeding great multitudes of men. The French cap- tains hauing knowledge by certeine fishermen, whom they took, that the king was present, & so huge a power readie to resist them, they disanchored and drelv along the coast of Suffer, and a small number of them landed againe in Suffer, of whome few re- turned to their ships: for diuerse gentlemen of the countrie, as sir Nicholas Delham, and others, with such power as was raised, vpon the sudden, took them vp by the waie and quicklie distressed them.

When they had searched euerie where by the coast, and saw men still readie to receiue them with bat- tle, they turned sterne, and so got them home againe without ante act atchieued worthie to be mentioned. The number of the Frenchmen was great, so that diuerse of them that were taken prisoners in the Ile of Wight, and in Suffer, did report that they were three score thousand. The French king aduertised the emperor most vtrulie by letters, that his armie had gotten the Ile of Wight with the ports of Ham- ton, and Portsmouth, and diuerse other places. In August following, the earle of Hertford entered a- gaine into Scotland with twelue thousand men, and destroyed all the towines in the middle marches, bur- ned Colvingham abbey, and passed to the west mar- ches, for annoieng and indamaging the Scots, and yet neither they, nor the Frenchmen that were sent into Scotland this yeare to the aid of the Scots, vnder the leading of monsieur de Loges, Montgome- rie his father, durst once come forth into the field to encounter with him.

Also in the beginning of this moneth the citie of London set forth a thousand soldiors of archers, har- quebutters, pikes, and bills, which went to Douer, and so passed ouer vnto Calis, to serue the king in his wars on that side the seas. In the same moreth that valiant capteine sir Thomas Poinings knight, lord Poinings, and the kings lieutenant of his towne and marches of Wallogne departed this life, after he had to his great honor atchieued manie won- thie enterpises in seruice of his prince against the enimies, so that his death was much lamented. A gentleman vndoubtedlie deserveng to be had in per- petuall memorie: and pittie it is, that diuerse such va- liant feats as he in his life time atchieued, were not committed to writing, to remaine for examples sake to posteritie.

Also in the same moneth at Gullford died the noble and valiant duke of Suffolke Charles Brandon lord great maister of the kings household, a right hardie gentleman, and yet not so hardie, as almost of all e- states and degrees of men, high & low, rich and poore, hartlie beloued, & his death of them greatlie lamen- ted: his bodie was honorable buried at Windsoze, at the kings costs. This man in his daies had done to the king and realme right agreeable seruices, as well in peace, as in wars, both in England, France, Scotland, and Ireland, he died the kings generall lieutenant of his armie then appointed to resist the Frenchmen, if they durst haue landed.

But now, whereas in this meane time we haue spoken nothing of the doings in Scotland, where the warre was still continued, the king of France sent thither certeine bands of Frenchmen, vnder the gouernement of monsieur de Loges, to aid the Scots against the Englishmen; and the king of En- gland waged manie strangers, and sent them with certeine Englishmen to the borders, for defense of the same against the inuasions of the enimies: for after the arrivall of the Frenchmen, a great armie of Scots was raised, and approached nere to the bor- ders, where for a certeine time they incamped, so that manie thought some notable enterpise would haue bene attempted. But after they had laine in campe a certeine time, they brake vp, and departed without attempting anie further exploit.

Shortlie after the earle of Hertford lieng on the borders, as lieutenant of the north parts of Eng- land, calling to him an armie of twelue thousand men, or thereabouts, what of Englishmen and stran- gers, entred Scotland with the same, and burnt a great part of the pers, and Leuldale, as Kellsie ab- bey and the towne; Melrosse abbey & Dribone ab- bey, also Jedworth abbey, and diuerse other places, towines, and villages, to the number of fise score. Kellsie abbey was defended a while by three hun- dred Scots, but in the end the most part of them were slaine, & taken by the strangers and others that gaue the assault. Thus the earle of Hertford for- indamaged the Scots by this inuasion, and yet neither they, nor the Frenchmen their assistants, durst come forth into the field once to encounter with him.

Scots and Frenchmen attempted to enter into England on the east borders. But the Englishmen perceiving them about to passe by a certeine street, set upon them, and slew and take of them to the number of seven score. Among the prisoners that were taken, the lord of Humes sonne, and a French capitaine were accounted chiefe. Also in another rode made into the west borders, the lord Sparwells sonne, and diuerse others were taken. But at an other time about the same season also, certeine Englishmen to the number of five hundred, making their entrie by the west borders into Scotland, were discomfited by the Scots, and the more part of them either taken or slaine. Thus were they occupied as well on the borders betwixt England and Scotland, in this season, as also in the marches of Calis, Guisnes, and Bullognois, where the garrisons lieng in those places, made continuall rodes & forraies into the marches of the enemies cuntry, and oftentimes chanced to encounter with some of their troops.

The capitaine of Ard, monsieur de Dampiere, hauing got for a supplie from the French campe at Bullogne, the companie of the men of armes that belonged to the duke of Orleans, led by his lieutenant monsieur de Launannes, chanced on a daie to encounter with the Englishmen guided by that valiant baron the lord Greie of Wilton, capitaine of the towne of Guisnes, who being accompanied with a number of valiant gentlemen & soldiers, distressed their enemies, & slue the capitaine of Ard the foresaid lord de Dampiere there in field. Diuerse other skirmishes and encounters chanced in that summer, on the further side the seas. And moreover, now after that the French nauie was withdrawn (as ye haue heard) from the coasts about Portsmouth, that martiall chiefe, sir John Dudley, lord Lisle, and high admerall of England, hauing all his ships, men, munition, & furniture readie, set forward from Portsmouth hauen, to haue fought with the Frenchmen, if they had still kept the seas, but they were withdrawn home into harborough.

Whereupon the lord admerall meaning to reuerge their brauados, and presumptuous attempts made at Portsmouth, and in the Ile of Wight, approached to the coasts of Normandie, and landed with sir thousand men at Treport, burnt the suburbs of that towne, with the abbey, and certeine villages and houses thereabouts. Also they destroyed thirtie ships, and a barke there found in the hauen: and after they had wrought their pleasures, they returned to the sea, and so home, not hauing lost past fourtene persons in the execution of this whole enterpryse. Of this great spoile & overthrowe giuen at Treport, by the kings admerall, I find these verses remembred:

In this meane while monsieur de Biez, being incamped nere to Bullogne with such a puissant armie (as before you haue heard) busied about the building of a fort, there was not such diligence vsed therein, as was promised on his part in accomplishing the same, to the French kings great displeasure (as some write) who had meant with that armie (if this fort had bene finished at the appointed time) to haue gaue to besiege the towne and castell of Guisnes: but now the time being prolonged, and not without some suspicion least monsieur de Biez cared not how long the warres indured in that sort, so as he might command ouer so manie princes and great lords as were there vnder his gouernance, at length before the fort were fullie finished, he removed to mount Lambert with the more part of the armie, pretending as though he meant to fight with the Englishmen, the which (as he said) he understood were purposed to come with a conuoy of vittells from Calis to Bullogne.

Whilest he there remained, manie princes and great lords came from the court, that laie at an abbey called forrest Pontier, eleuen leagues from Bullogne beyond Puttrel, on the waie towards Abuille, in hope that battell should haue followed betwixt the English and French armies. Among other that came thither are these remembred as principall, monsieur Danguen, monsieur Daumalle, monsieur le duc de Peuers, monsieur le conte de Launall, and monsieur de la Trimouille. Monsieur Daumalle eldest sonne to the duke of Guise, being lodged in the vanguard that was gouerned by monsieur de Bissac, chanced on a daie to be present at a skirmish, where shewing himselfe verie forward, he was stricken through the sight of his helmet, with a light horsemans staffe, that pearcing in betwixt his nose and his eie, entred halfe a foot into his head, as monsieur de Langeie writeth, and breaking off a two fingers beneath the iron, the same iron remained still within his head: but yet escaping out of the English mens hands, he came backe to the campe, had the truncheon and iron pulled out of his head, and being dressed was conueied in a litter to Biquigne, where he laie for two or thre daies in such danger, that no man looked that he should haue escaped with life.

There were manie of these skirmishes, wherein the Englishmen bare themselves so valiantlie, that the Frenchmen went a waie oftentimes with losse of manie of their noble men and best soldiers. At one time they lost the lord Penaintuille brother to the lord de Tillemont, being slaine with stroke of lance and pike. At another time they lost likewise a yong lord of Picardie called le seigneur de Fretote. At length, after their new fort or bastillon was brought in some strength, they furnished it in most defensible wise with men, munition and vittells, naming it Monpleastre. Herewith monsieur de Biez departing from mount Lambert with part of the armie, came downe towards Calis, and entring into the English pale beside Cranelin, wan certeine bulwarks, and encountering diuerse new bands of Lancerstyre men and others, latelie before sent ouer, distressed them, and after burnt certeine villages, forraied the cuntry almost to Sparke, and afterwards in great hast with their botie and pillage they turned. This enterpryse was exploitied by the French men about St. Matheus daie in September.

There were with monsieur de Biez at this enterpryse the lord of Bissac, who gouerned the vanguard, and had with him his owne companie of men of armes, and the light horsemen of whome he had the generall conduct. There was also the companie of men at armes that belonged to the constable of France, led by the lord Guich, & fiftie men of armes vnder the gouernance of the lord of Belleie, the companie also of the lord of Baille, the companie of the lord Eclars, and that of the lord de la Roch du Maine, & others. There was also monsieur de Laiz generall of the French footmen, and manie yong princes and lords of high estate, as monsieur Francis de Bourbon, duc Danguen, Francis de Launall, duke Daumalle latelie recovered of his hurt, the duke of Peuers, and the earle de Launall that in this voiage was hurt with an harquebus shot in the arme.

Reg. 37.

The king's thanks to his commons.

The thre and twentieth of November, a parlement began at Westminster, in the which was granted to the king a subsidie of the spiritualtie of six shillings the pound, to be paid in two yeares next ensuing; and of the temporallie two shillings and eight pence of the pound in goods, and foure shillings of the pound in lands, to be paid likewise within two yeares. Also in this parlement all colleges, chanteries, and hospitals were committed to the king, to order, by altering or transposing the same as to him should seeme expedient, which at the prorogation of the same parlement he promised should be done to the glorie of God, and the common profit of the realme. The foure and twentieth of December, the said parlement was proroged, on which daie the king coming into the house, to give his roiall assent vnto such acts as were passed, the speaker made vnto him an eloquent oration, to the which although the custome hath ever bene that the lord chancellor should make answer, it pleased the king at that present to make the answer himselfe, which he uttered as here ensueth.

The kings oration in the parlement house.

Although my chancellor, for the time being, hath before this time used verie eloquentlie and substantiallie, to make answer to such orations as hath bene set forth in this high court of parlement; yet is he not so able to open and set forth my mind and meaning, and the secrets of my heart, in so plaine and ample manner, as I my selfe am and can doe. Wherefore I taking vpon me to answer your eloquent oration maister speaker, saie, that where you in the name of our welbeloued commons, haue both praised and extolled me, for the notable qualities that you haue conceiued to be in me: I most hartlie thanke you all, that you haue put me in remembrance of my dutie, which is to indoeur my selfe to obtaine and get such excellent qualities, and necessarie vertues, as a prince or gouernour should or ought to haue, of which gifts I recognise my selfe both bare and barren, but of such small qualities as God hath indowed me withall, I render to his godnesse my most humble thanks, intending with all my wit and diligence to get and acquire to me such notable vertues and princelie qualities, as you haue alledged to be incorporated in my person. These thanks for your louing admonition and good counsell first remembred, I esteeme thanke you. Again, because that you considering our great charge, not for our pleasure, but for your defense, not for our gaine, but for our great cost, which we haue lately sustained, aswell in defense of our and your enemies, as for the conquest of that fortreffe, which was to this realme most displeasing and noisome, and shalbe (by Gods grace) hereafter to our nation most profitable and pleasant, haue fraile of your owne minds granted to vs a certeine subsidie, here in an act specified, which verelie we take in good part, regarding more your kindnesse, than the profit thereof, as he that setteth more by your louing harts than by your substance. Beside this hartie kindnesse, I cannot a little reioice, when I consider the perfect trust and confidence, which you haue put in me, as men hauing vnbonded hope and vnfeined beleefe in my good doings and iust proceedings for you, with out my desire or request, haue committed to mine order and disposition all chanteries, colleges, hospitals, and other places specified in a certeine act, firmly trusting that I will order them to the glorie of God, and the profit of the common-wealth. Surelie if I (contrarie to your expectation) should suffer the ministers of the church to decaie, or learning (which is so great a iewel) to be diminished, or worse and miserable to be intreated, you might saie that I being put in so speciall a trust, as I am in this case, were no trusie friend to you, nor charitable to mine euer christian, neither a louer to the publike wealth, nor yet one that feared God, to whom account must be rendered of all our doings. Doubt not I praise you, but your expectation shall be serued, more godlie and goodlie than you will wish or desire, as hereafter you shall plainlie perceiue.

Now sith I find such kindnesse on your part towards me, I cannot chuse but loue and fauour you, affirming that no prince in the world more fauoreth his subiects than I doe you; nor no subiects or commons more loued and obeyed their soueraigne lord, than I perceiue you doe me, for whose defense my treasure shall not be hidden, nor if necessitie require, my person shall not be vnbadventured. Yet although I wish you, and you wish me, to be in this perfect loue and concord, this friendlie amitie cannot continue, except both you my lords temporall, and my lords spirituall, and you my louing subiects, studie and take paine to amend one thing, which surelie is amisse, and farre out of order, to the which I most hartlie require you: which is, that charitie and concord is not among you, but discord and dissention beareth rule in euerie place. Saint Paule saith to the Corinthians, and the thirtieth chapter: Charitie is gentle, charitie is not enuious, charitie is not proud, and so forth in the said chapter. Behold then what loue and charitie is among you, when the one calleth an other heretike and anabaptist, and he calleth him againe papist, hypocrite, and pharise: Be these tokens of charitie amongst you? Are these signes of fraternall loue betwene you? No, no, I assure you that this lacke of charitie amongst your selues will be the hinderance and allwaging of the feruer betwene vs, as I said before, except this two be salued, and cleerlie made whole. I must needs iudge the fault and occasion of this discord to be partly by negligence of you the fathers and preachers of the spiritualtie: for if I know a man which liueth in adulterie, I must iudge him a lecherous and a carnall person: if I see a man boast and brag himselfe, I cannot but deme him a proud man. I see here daile that you of the cleargie preach one against another, teach one contrarie to another, inueigh one against an other without charitie or discretion: some be too stiff in their old Mumpshus, other be too buisie and curious in their new sumpsimus: thus all men almost be in varietie and discord, and few or none preacheth trulie and sincerelie the word of God, according as they ought to doe. Shall I iudge you charitable persons doing this? No, no, I cannot so doe. Alas, how can the poore soules liue in concord, when you preachers sow amongst them in your sermons debate and discord: If you they loke for light, and you bring them to darkenesse. Amend these crimes I exhort you, and let forth Gods word, both by true preaching and good example giuing: or else I, whom God hath appointed his bicar and high minister here, will see these diuisions extinct, and these enormities corrected according to my verie dutie, or else I am an vnprofitable seruant, and an untrue officer. Although I saie the spirituall men be in some fault, that charitie is not kept amongst you; yet you of the temporallie be not cleare and vnspotted of malice and enuie: for you raille on bishops, speake slanderouslie of prelates, and rebuke and taunt preachers, both contrarie to good order and christian fraternitie. If you know suerlie that a bishop or preacher erreth, or teacheth pruerse doctrine, come and declare it to some of our counsell, or to vs, to whom is committed by God the high authoritie to reforme and order such causes and behaviours, and be not iudges your selues, of your owne fantastick opintions and vaine expostions, for in such high causes you may lightlie erre. And although you be permitted to read holie scriptures, and to haue the word of God in your mother tong, you must vnderstand, that it is licenced you so to do, onelie to informe your owne consciences, and to instruct your children and familie, and not to dispute, and make scripture a railing and a taunting stocke against priests and preachers, as manie light persons do. I am verie soile to know and heare, how vnreuerentlie that most pretious icwell the word of God is disputed, rhimed, song, and sangled in euerie alehouse and tauerne, contrarie to the true meaning and doctrine of the same: and yet I am euen as much soile, that the readers of the same follow it in doing so faintlie and coldlie. For of this I am sure, that charitie was neuer so faint amongst you, and ver-tuous and godlie lining was neuer lesse vsed, nor God himselfe amongst christians was neuer lesse reuerenced, honored, or serued. Therefore (as I said before) be in charitie one with an other, like brother and brother: loue, dread, and serue God, to the which I as your supream head and souereigne lord erhort and require you, and then I doubt not, but that loue and league that I spake of in the beginning, shall neuer be dissolued or broken betwene vs. And to the making of laws which we haue now made and concluded, I erhort you the makers to be as diligent in putting them in execution, as you were in making a furthering of the same: or else your labour shall be in vaine, & your common-wealth nothing releued. Now to your petition, concerning our roiall assent to be giuen to such acts as haue passed both houses, they shall be read openlie that ye may heare them.

Then were they openlie read, and to manie his grace assented, and diuerse he assented not vnto. Thus the kings oration was to his subiects there present such comfort, that the like soie could not be vnto them in this world. And thus the acts read (as the manner is) and his assent giuen, his grace rose and departed. Manie proper seats of armes were expolited and done in this meane while, betwixt the parties English and French about Bullongne. On the morrow after the feast of the Epiphanie, there came a conuoie of vittels towards the French fort, guarded with thre or foure thousand lancequenets vnder their cozonell the Keingraue and certeine French horsemen. The earle of Surreie then lieutenant of Bullongne aduertised thereof, made out with such power as he might conuenientlie spare of them within Bullongne and the Old man, to cut off those vittels: but coming to encounter with the enemies at saint Osiens, he was put to flight: sir Edward Poynings captaine of a band called the kings gard of Bullongne was slaine in that conflict with fiftene or sixtene other captains, beside officers and common soldiers. About the same time the Frenchmen made a volage vnto the Ile of Wasill, with a ship called the barke Ager, which they had taken from the Englishmen before: and in their waite they met with a little craier, of the which one Golving was master, a proper man and an hardie. The barke perceiving the craier to be an Englishman, shot at hir and volaged hir. Whereupon straitwaies the craier drew to the great barke, and sir seauen of the Englishmen leapt into hir. In the meane time while the Frenchmen, without regard of perill towards themselves, looked ouer hatches to behold how the craier sunke there at hand before them, not mistrusting aie thing that the Englishmen might do against them, it soztuned that these Englishmen which got by into the barke, found in the end thereof a great number of lime pots, which they with water quenched, or rather (as the nature thereof is) set them on fire, and threw them so thicke at the Frenchmen which were there aboord, that they blinded them, in such wise as those few Englishmen that entred the ship vanquished the Frenchmen, and dining them vnder hatches, shut the same, and brought the barke alwaie with them home into England. In the latter end of March the bpothell houses called the Sutes on the banke side in Southwoke were conuerted from such filthy vses by the kings commandment, the bawds and ruffians being put out, and other persons of honest behauior placed in their rooms to inhabit in the same houses. This was done by proclamation and sound of trumpet by an herald of armes.

On the seuen and twentieth of Aprill being tuesday in Easter weeke William Forleie pot-maker for the mint of the Tower of London fell asleepe, and so continued sleeping, and could not be awakened with picking, cramping, or otherwise burning whatsoever, till the first daie of the next terme, which was full fouretene daies, and as manie nights or more, for that Easter terme beginneth not before seauenteene daies after Easter. The cause of his thus sleeping could not be knowne, though it were diligentlie searched for by the kings physicians and other learned men, yea the king himselfe examining the said William Forleie, who was in all points found at his waking to be but as if he had slept but one night: he was liuing in the Tower of London in the yere of our Lord God 1579.]

This yere by meanes made by the emperor, commissioners were appointed to meet & treat of some accord betwene the realmes of England & France, so that the king of England sent ouer to Callices, Cuthbert Tunstall bishop of Duresme, sir William Paget his secretaire, and doctor Aragonell: and the French king sent to Ard a bishop, the chiefe president of Rouen, and a notarie, but no conclusion followed of their trauell. Whereupon the king of England hauing perfect knowledge how the Frenchmen intended to build a fortreffe at saint Johns rode betwene Bullongne and Calis, to the great annoyance of both those places, if they might haue compassed their purpose, he meant to preuent that deuise of his aduersaries, sending ouer the earle of Hertford and the lord Aulse high admerall of England, with manie ballant captains, which got the rode but two daies before the Frenchmen had appointed to be there. But when they vnderstood that the Englishmen had so preuented them, they staied about Hardlow, where monsieur de Biez their generall gave order to incampe, and durst not once come forward to assaie the English forces: so that without aie impeachment by land, the Englishmen built certeine fortresses, to wit, two at the same place of saint Johns rode, otherwise called Hamble Thew, and an other about a two miles from thence at a place called Blacke Pesse. There was in the earle of Hertfords campe beside Englishmen diuerse strangers, Almaines, Spaniards and Italians. And because it is not much impertinent to the matter, we haue thought good here to set downe the whole number of all the kings forces at that present in his parte that were there vnder the said earle of Hertford: the kings generall lieutenant. First the earle had two hundred, the lord William Staruton thre hundred, the lord John Greie brother to the marques Dorset two hundred, the lord Bzaie one hundred, sir Thomas Seimer knight marshall of the host one hundred, sir Henrie Waneut captaine of the horsemen one hundred, sir John Harrington treasurer of the armie one hundred, sir Thomas Wat master of the ordinance one hundred, sir Mauris Barkleie three hundred, sir Thomas Holcroft two hundred, sir Clatter Dennis two hundred, sir George Blewet two hundred, sir Richard Greenfield two hundred, sir George Cornwell two hundred, sir John Luttrell one hundred, sir Edmund Husse one hundred, George Thokmorton two hundred, capteine Brough-ton two hundred, capteine Palmer two hundred, capteine Chancie two hundred, capteine Windam two hundred, capteine Stukeleie one hundred, capteine Blewet one hundred, capteine Sidnam one hundred, capteine Biet one hundred, capteine Dier one hundred, capteine Cuans one hundred, Spaniards fiftene hundred, Italians two hundred, Clemeners three hundred, lancequenets vnder the government of their coronell Conrade Henning, common-ly called Courtpenne, three thousand. The summe of all the soldiors in Bullongne & Bullongnois were 13000. Here you must note, that whilest the English armie laie thus in the field till the foits of Hamble Thew and Blache Pesse were in building, the French gallies were on the seas, and now and then came and approached nere to the shore, where the English armie laie in campe, at the which they shot off their ordinance: and the Englishmen answered them againe with the like. They came also before Calis, and shot off at the towne. But the lord admerall being there, made out to encounter them, notwithstanding they did first much hurt, and toke auate diuerse of the English vessels laden with vittels.

The eighteenth date of Maie there were foure of the kings ships, and foure pinafes abroad on the seas afore the haue of Hamble Thew, and there came eightene of the French gallies to set vpon them, and so there was great shooting betwene them: and at length one of their gallies was taken, in the which were aboard fourtene score soldiors and seauen score rowlers: the rest of their gallies packed awaie. Moreover, whilest the campe laie thus at Hamble Thew, it chanced that on a daie a mutinie rose among the lancequenets against their capteine, so that they got themselves into order of battell, seized vpon the great artillerie, and shewed countenance as if they would haue set vpon the residue of the whole campe. Herevpon euerie soldior was commanded to repaire to his ensigne, and the Spaniards came and joined with the Englishmen, readie to take such part as they did. At length by the diligence of the chieftaines, and good countenance of the English soldiors and Spaniards the tumult was staided, and six of the principall beginners were hanged.

The one and twentieth of Maie the French armie came and incamped beyond Bullongne at the church on the hill: and the morrow after the earle of Hertford marched with his power to a place within two miles of them, and certeine footmen and horsemen went forth and skirmished with them; and in the meane time the artillerie ceased not to shot off, as well from the French campe and fortesse as from Bullongne and the Old man. This daie were slaine fouretene Frenchmen and two taken prisoners; and three of the English part were likewise taken, and so the earle of Hertford returned to his campe, and led the lancequenets vpon the hill, incamped before the enemies faces, not two miles distant from them, in which place a fort was begun to be raised, which was after called the fort of Bullongne Berg. The next daie, to wit, the three and twentieth of Maie the soldiors of Bullongne and the lancequenets skirmished with the Frenchmen, slue and toke of them seven score and aboue, of the which there were fortie that were in cotes of velvet, and diuerse also with chaines,

Here you must vnderstand, that now in this meane while by the motion of diuerse princes, a meeting was had of sundrie commissioners, appointed to treat of some peace, to be concluded betwixt the two kings of England and France. Herevpon there came to Guisnes for the king of England the earle of Hertford, the bishop of Winchester, sir John Dupleie vicount Lisle baron of Haupas, and high admerall of England, sir William Paget the kings secretarie, and doctor Nicholas Wotton deane of Canturburie. For the French king there came to Ard monsieur Claude Danebault admerall of France, being also one of the foure marshals of that realme, the bishop of Cureau, monsieur Remund chiefe president of Rone, the secretarie Bonchett. Diuerse times they met betwixt Ard and Guisnes, and after long debating of matters, and diuerse breakings off: yet at length the seauenth of Iune a peace was concluded, and proclaimed as well in the court as in the citie of London on Whitsondaie the thirtieth of Iune, with sound of trumpet, according to the manner: and in like sort the same daie it was proclaimed at Paris and at Rone. The chieffest article of which peace was this, that the French king pateng to the king of England 800000 crownes within the terme of eight peares, should haue Bullongne againe to him restored, which in the meane time should remaine in the hands and possession of the king of England, as a pledge and gage for assurance of the said moneie.

On the seuen & twentieth of Iune doctor Crome recanted at Pauls crosse: which recantation was byged vpon this occasion. When the chanteries & colleges were given by act of parlement into the kings hands (as is aboue remembred) which was about the moneth of December 1545, the next lent following doctor Crome preaching in the mercers chappell, among other reasons and persuations, to rouse the people from the vaine opinion of purgatorie, inferred this, grounding vpon the said act of parlement: that if trentals and chanterie masses could auail the soules in purgatorie, then did the parlement not well in giuing awaie monasteries, colleges, & chanteries, which serued principallie to that purpose. But if the parlement did well (as no man could denie) in dissolving them & bestowing the same vpon the king, then is it a plaine case, that such chanteries and priuat masses do nothing conferre to releue them in purgatorie. This Dilemma of doctor Crome, no doubt, was insoluble: but notwithstanding the charitable prelates (for all the kings late exhortation vnto charity) were so charitable to him that they brought him Coram nobis, and so handled him that they made him recant his words. ¶ On the sixteenth of Iune were letters patents deliuered to sir Thomas Cheinie treasurer of the kings household, and lord warden of the cinque ports, whereby he was authorisid to be the kings agent in chistening the Dolphin daughter of France named Elizabeth. A true copie of which letters patents is here recorded, because the said action hath bene ignozantlie transferred from the said sir Thomas Cheinie to sir Henrie Inceut: as appeareth in Holinsheds chronicle published 1577, pag. 1608.

The king hauing passed ouer the foresaid letters patents to sir Thomas, and he in forwardnesse to execute his charge, to the intent that his retinue and attendants shoulde no waies offensiuely behaue themselves against the French, with whom the king was verie carefull to continue and mainteine the peace interchangeable agreed vpon and concluded, his maiestie to p̄uent and cut off all occasions that might any waie impeach, interrupt, or violate this 50 peace, commanded the lords of his counsell to direct letters withall credition to the said sir Thomas, then vpon his voyage into France, containing a precript forme of deicancor, which the gentlemen & yeomen attendant vpon him in France shoulde vse, during the time of their abode in those foreyn parts: a copie of which letter, being a testimoniall of the king of Englands inclinable mind to peace hereafter followeth out of the verie originall, as the same was subscribed by the lords.

After our right hartie commendations to your good lordship. The kings maiestie hath willed vs to signifie vnto you, that his highnesse expresse pleasure and commandement is, ye shoulde in his maiesties name declare to such gentlemen as accompanie you into France, that they haue in remembrance to to vse & behaue themselves among the Frenchmen as well on the waie as at the court, in such sort as they by communication vpon feats of the warre passed giue no occasion of priuāt displeasure. Wherein therefore it shall be expedient, that either they saie nothing, vnlesse they be prouoked; or in that case call the things happened fortune de la guerre, without comparison of things chanced on our part or on theirs, but turne the communication to reioise in peace. In the conditions whereof they shall pretend ignorance, without speaking of the keeping still of Bullogne, or deliuerance of it againe, but as shall please the princes for the continuance of peace, wherein by Gods grace the crueltie of warre shall be conuerted into extremitie of friendship, to the weale and commoditie of both realmes.

And forsomuch as there want not in the world naughtie men of the state of monks and friers, who for malice of the alteration of their estate here, would gladlie defame our religion towards God, as though we had with them cast out all his highnesse expresse pleasure and commandement is, that considering at this first entrie of you, the behauiour of your compa-20 nie shall be much marked and noted in matters of religion and circumstances: of the same they shoulde therefore haue so much the more regard both to their communications and also behauiors, and not onlie in speech to forbear to dispute or intermedle with the state of their policy there, but also in their diet on the fift daie and deuout hearing of masse, follow the order of the kings maiesties relinē, so as their conuersation & behavior maie be cōfution to such as would defame this realme in the contrarie. Thus fare your 30 good lordship right hartlie well. From Greenwich the nineteenth of Iune 1546. Your lordships assured louing friends, Thomas Wriothesleie can. W. Saint-Iohn. Russell. Cutb. Duresme. Steph. Winton. Anthonie Bienne. William Petres. This letter was thus indorsed. To our assured louing friend sir Thomas Cheinie knight of the order, treasurer of the kings maiesties household, and lord warden of the cinque ports, presentlie in speciall commission from the kings maiestie into 40 France. Hast, post hast for thy life, to Douer, Calis, or where he shall chance to be: hast, hast.

Thus farre of sir Thomas Cheinie, imploied about the kings affaires in France; namelie the chif-50 stening of the Dolphins daughter: wherein we haue bene the more copious in words, because it hath ben published, that sir Henrie Kneuet was thereto personallie deputed: which to be untrue, both the letters patents and the letter missiue do sufficientlie proue: both which we receiued at the hands of an 60 ancient seruitor, attendant vpon the same sir Thomas at his being in France to execute his charge in the kings behalf. Of which word the knight when we come to the yeare and daie of his death, we will deliuer further report to his high commendation, but yet none otherwise than as by warranted intelligence we shall be directed.]

The same time was a combat fought before the French king betwixt two Spaniards, Julian Romero, and one Morow. They both serued the king of England in the last wars against France: but Morow had revolted from his seruice to the French kings, and for certeine speeches which he had vttered, was chalenged to fight the said combat by the said Julian, for whom sir Henrie Kneuet undertooke that he shoulde stand to his chalenge, and trie it with his aduersarie, which he now did, and vanquished him in lists, the fight being appointed on horse-70 backe. Incontinentlie after, sir Henrie Kneuet sickened and died at Corbell, and was buried in Paris within the church of S. Paule. Morow, for the full establishment of the peace, and to receiue the French kings oth, the vicount Aile lord admerall, with the bishop of Duresme, and diuerse other lords, and gentlemen, element, to the number of one hundred and above, all in velvet coates and chaines of gold, with five and forty poyment right seemelie appointed, went into France, departing from Bullogne the tenth of Julie, and came to Spellune a towne beyond Paris, where the French king then laie, by whome and the Dolphin his sonne they were roiallie receiued, feasted, and banquetted: and hauing done that for the which he was sent, the said lord admerall Dupleie the first of Auguste took his leaue of the French king, who rewarded him with a cupbord of plate all gold, valued at 1500 pounds. The lords also and gentlemen had chaines of gold giuen to them, and the poyment had two hundred crownes bestowed amongst them, and so the lord admerall returned into England. This lord admerall, during the time that he had to deale with the French, so valiantlie demeaned himselfe, and was such a terror and astonishment to the enimie, as it is left written of him, that they durst not quench in his presence, but were like a sort of timorous cattell, giuing roome to the raging lion ranging ouer the pastures with his poyntings, and making the berie heauens to ring with his roaring, after the hath filled his selfe with bolles fleshy, and laid his selfe downe to rest being wearie with eating; the comparison verie aptlie followeth:

Solus cum catulis, celum, & ruzitibus implens

Tantus terror erat Gallis Dupleius Heros.*

In the same moneth of Auguste monsieur Dupleie, high admerall of France, accompanied with the bishop of Cures, the earle of Montaigne knight of the order, the earle of Villiers, the chiefe president of Roan, secretaire Bouchetell, monsieur de Canaples knight of the order, monsieur de Sales knight of the order, monsieur de Paillierie viceadmerall of France, monsieur de Delle, the baron de la Gard, with diuerse other lords and capteines of honor, beside two hundred gentlemen well appointed, leised from Dape with twelue gallies and a right faire ship called the Sacre of Dape, and so making saile he staied not anie where to take land, till he came into the Thames, where at Blackewall he was receiued into the kings barge by the earles of Darbie and Essex, who brought him to Grenewich, where he landed, and lodged there that night.

The next daie he came by with all his gallies, and landed at the Tower wharfe. Upon all the banks by the water side were laid peeces of artillerie, which shot off frellie, and so likewise did all the artillerie in the ships, but speciallie from the Tower was shot a maruellous great peale of ordinance. From thence being landed, they rode thorough London in great triumph (the maior and the crafts standing in the streets in verie good order) unto the bishops palace by Paules, where the French admerall lodged till Bartholomew euen, on which daie he was conueied toward Hampton court, where in the wate the prince hauing with him the archbishop of Yorke, the earles of Hertford and Huntingdon, and about two thousand horse, met him and imbraced him in such courteous and honorable wise, that all the beholders greatlie reioiced, and much marvelled at the said princes high wit and great audacitie, and so the French admerall came to the court, giuing the prince the upper hand as they rode. And at the better gate of the court, the lord chancellor, and all the kings counsell receiued him, and brought him to his lodging.

On Bartholomew daie the king admitting him to his presence, welcomed him, and in great triumph went to the chappell, where the king receiued his oath to performe the articles of the league, as it was contained. To speake of the banquettings, huntings, and such like honorable sorts of interteinements, it were much to utter, and hard to beleue. But on Friday following, being the seven and twentieth of Auguste, he being rewarded with a cupbord of plate, to the value of twelue hundred pounds, returned to London, and on the sundaie next ensuing took his gallies and departed. Beside the kings gifts, he had giuen to him by the cite of London two flaggons gullit, and two other that were parcell gullit, valued at one hundred thirtie six pounds, beside wine, war, and torches. There were diuerse of his companie also that went not awaie unrewarded, hauing both plate, and also manie horses, and greihounds giuen them.

Although this peace pleased both the English and French nations, yet suerlie both mistrusted the continuance thereof. And verelie the old prouerbe seemed to be thoroughlie verified, which saith, that what the sie seeth, the hart rueeth: for the Frenchmen still longed for Bullogne, and the Englishmen meant not willinglie to giue it ouer. For during the French admerals being in England, monsieur de Chatillon capteine of Montplaisier began to make a new bastilion euen at the berie mouth of the hauen, naming it Chatillons garden. Whereupon that noble gentleman the lord Greie of Wilton, shortly after appointed to be deputie of the towne and countie of Bullogne, perceiving the great inconuenience that this new building would bring to the towne if it went forwards, did aduertise the king thereof, earnestlie beseeching his grace, that the matter might be thoroughlie considered of. Sir Thomas Palmer was the messenger.

The king vpon the intelligence, asked his counsell aduise, which onelie went wholie, that the conditions of the peace were not in anie wise to be infringed. This resolved, secretaire Paget then brought, and afterwards lord, was commanded accordingly to draw a letter to the lord Greie, the which the king himselfe did signe, willing that the messenger should further know of his pleasure before he departed. Whereupon sir Thomas Palmer, hauing his dispatch at the secretaries hands, did get word to be giuen to the king, who presentlie sent for him into his private chamber, and betwixt them two, vnder these wordes: Palmer, you haue there a letter from us to the lord Greie, that he doe in no wise deale in the matter that he hath by you aduertised us of. Notwithstanding, I will that you deliuer him this message from us.

Wid him call to mind how that his brother and himselfe not a short time, but even from tender yeares, no; farre off, but still nere to our person, we haue brought him by, which (tell him) not vniuallie, if that be in him that we conceiue doth breed in us an od trust of seruencie to serue us of him, more than a common seruant or subiect. By that token will him whatsoeuer I haue written to the contrarie, that he presentlie impeach the fortification of Chatillons garden, and rase it if it be possible: and this my message shall be his clearing therein, & the seruice gratefullie accepted. Sir Thomas Palmer some what astonished herat, considering the weightinesse of the cause, and the contrarietie of the letter and message, began to put the king in mind of the small credit that his bare errand of right was like to haue, so that against that which his maiesties letters imported. But the king cutting off his tale: Deliuere thou the message (quoth he) at his choice when he the executing thereof.

ruied at Bullogne immediatlie vpon the opening of the gates at after none. His letters and message deliuered, the lord Greie straight assembled the counsell, shewed them the kings letters, which read, he caused sir Thomas to pronounce before them the message also. Cuerie man was to saie his aduise: it went roundlie through the boord without anie question, that the letter was to be followed, the message not to be staied on. The lord Greie hauing heard, and not replieng anie thing, willed sir Thomas to be called in againe, had him repeat his message, and therwhilest made a clearkie of the counsell to write the same verbatim. This done, he praised the whole table to set their hands vnto it, which they did, and the lord Greie taking the same into his hands, without further opening, declaring his resolution, brake vp counsell, commanded straight the gates to be shut, gaue priue warning, that certeine bands with armour and weapon, and likewise pioners should that night by an houre be in a readines.

The houre came, himselfe with the warned company issued out, passed ouer the water, and without anie alarm of the enimie, did ouerthrow in three or foure houres, what in two or three moneths had bin raised, and so in great quietnesse returned into the towne. Presentlie he dispatched sir Thomas Palmer backe againe to the king with the newes, whose returne was so sudden, as the king himselfe being in the chamber of presence, & seeing him, said aloud: What? Will he do it or no? Sir Thomas giuing no other answer, but presenting his letters, and saieing, that thereby his maiestie should know. The king againe in earnest mood, saie tell vs I saie, whether he will do it or not: Then sir Thomas told him that it was done, and the whole fortification cleane rased. Whereat the king taking great ioy, presentlie called to certeine of the lords of the counsell that were by, and said: How saie you my lords, Chatillons garden the new fort is laid as flat as this floze. One straight amongst them gaue iudgement, that he that had done it, was worthy to lose his head. The king straight replied, he had rather lose a dozen such heads as his was that so iudged, than one such seruants as had done it: and herewith he commanded, that the lord Greies pardon should presentlie be made, the which with a letter of great thanks, and promise of reward, was returned by the said sir Thomas Palmer to the said lord Greie; but the reward failed, the king not continuing long after in life: the like hap whereof had oftentimes happened vnto diuers of his worthy ancestors vpon their due deserts to haue bene considered of, and therefore the case the lesse strange.

This haue I set downe the more willingly, for that I haue receiued it from them, which haue heard it reported, not onlie by the lord Greies owne mouth, but also by the relation of sir Thomas Palmer, and others that were present: the same not tending so much to the lord Greies owne praise, as to the be-tokening of the kings noble courage; and the great secret trust which he worthilie reposed in the said lord Greie. Here is to be noted also, lest any man should mistake the matter, as if the king dealt indreadlie herein, that his maiestie knowing how the Frenchmen in going about to build this fort, did more than they might by the covenants of the peace; and therefore was resolu'd at the first aduertisement thereof, to haue it rased. But yet for that it might happilie haue bene signified ouer vnto the Frenchmen, before my lord Greie could haue accomplished the feat, he therefore wisely wrote one thing in his letters, wherevnto manie might be priue, and sent secret knowledge by words contrarie to the contents of the same letters, so as if the messenger were trulie, his pleasure might not be discerned to the hindrance or disappointing of the same. But now to our purpose.

The French king after this, because as yet he would not seeme to breake the peace, commanded the trenches and new fortifications made about this forte, called Chatillons garden thus cast downe, to be filled by his owne people, and so it rested during the life of king Henrie: but afterwards it was begun againe, and finished, as after ye shall heare. About Michaelmas in this present yeare, Thomas duke of Norfolk, and Henrie earle of Surrie that was his sonne and heire, vpon certeine surmises of treason, were committed to the tower of London, and immediatlie after Christmas, the thirtieth of Januarie, the king then lieng in the extremities of death, the said earle was arraigned in the Childehall of London, before the lord maior, the lord chancelor, and diuerse other lords and iudges being there in commission. Where if he had tempered his answers with such modestie as he shewed token of a right perfect and readie wit, his praise had bene the greater. Some things he flatlie denied, seeking to weaken the credit of his accusers by certeine circumstances: other he excused with interpretations of his meaning, to proue the same to be far other wise than was alleged against him.

And one speciall matter amongst other where, with he was charged, was, for bearing certeine arms that were said to belong to the king, and to the prince. The bearing where of he iustified and maintained, that (as he toke it) he might beare them as belonging to diuerse of his ancestors, and withall affirmed, that he had the opinion of heralds therein. But yet to his indictment he pleaded not guiltie: and for that he was no lord of the parlement, he was enforced to stand to the trial of a common inquest of his countrie, which found him guiltie, and therevpon he had iudgement of death: and shortly after, to wit, the 19 of Januarie, he was beheaded on the tower hill. In this moneth of Januarie, the church of the late graie friers in London was opened, and masse song there: and that daie preached at Pauls crosse the bishop of Rochester, who declared the kings gift to the citie of London, for the relieving of the poore people, which was by patent vnder his great seale. Saint Bartholome was spittle, the church of the graie friers, and two parish churches, the one of saint Nicholas in the shambles, the other saint Ewine in Fleetgate market, all to be made one parish church of the graie friers church; and in lands he gaue for the maintenance of the same 500 markes by yeare for euer, & this church to be named Christs church, founded by king Henrie the eight.

The duke was attainted by parlement, and the attainder after reuered in the first yeare of queene Marie. The euill hap as well of the father, as of the sonne, was greatlie lamented of manie, not onlie for the god seruice which the duke had done in his daies in defense of this realme, but also for that the earle was a gentleman well learned, and knowne to haue an excellent wit, if he had bene thankfull to God for the same, and other such good gifts as he had indued him withall. The king now lieng at the point of death, made his last will and testament, wherein he not onlie yielded himselfe to almightie God; but also toke order, that during the minority of his sonne prince Edward, his creatures should be counsellors and aiders to him in all things, as well concerning priuate as publick affaires. They were firste in number, whose names were as hereafter followeth.

So soone as the noble king had finished his last will and testament, as afoꝛe is said, he thortlie thereupon yielded by his spirit to almightie God, departing this world the eight and twentieth daie of Janu-arie, in the eight and thirtieth yeare of his reigne, and in the yeare of our Lord 1546, after the accompt of the church of England; but after the accompt which we follow in this booke 1547, beginning our yeare the first of Ianuarie. He reigned thirtie and seuen yeares, nine moneths and od daies. His bodie (according to his will in that behalfe) was conueied to Winndor with all funerall pompe, and in the college there interred. Of this trefnoble and trespudant monarch, I find these few verses, which maie serue in good stead of an epitaph or funerall inscription:

*Henricus princeps prope lustra peregerat octo, Et populum magna prudens cum laude regabat, Ex quo magna solistractus sceptrum Britanni Cum Deus omnipotens morbo obrepente moneret Hinc emigrandum de vita. Proh dolor ingens!
Quae pia plebs lachrymis quam tristibus ora rigant?
Quam grauius regni proceres planctum cubantem?
Anglia tota iacet mœrens, lugubris & anens, Nil opus apportant medici, nil profuit herbas Quae solent humanis membris adferre salutem, Pharmaca nil profunt, praebeatur potius frustra Heu nulla tristis mors est medicabilis arte.*

This noble prince was right fortunate in all his doings, so that commonlie whatsoeuer he attemted, had good successe, as well in matters of peace as of waies. Of personage he was tall and mightie, in his latter daies somewhat grosse, or as we tearme it, bonlie: in wit and memorie verie perfect: of such maiestie tempered with humanitie, as best became so noble and high an estate: a great fauor of learning, as he that was not ignorant of good letters himselfe: he was of great magnificence and liberalitie, inso much that Iohn Leland that worthy antiquarie, hauing tasted of his roiall bountyfulness, so, hath left no lesse testified to the world in a proper epigram, which I will not omit, least I should wil-fullye conceale a manifest protestation of his thankfulness left to witness to the world in writing:

*Ante suos Phœbus radios ostendit mundo Desinet, & clara Cynthia pulchra faces: Ante suet rapidum taciturne piceis regnum Spinifer & nullam sentis habebit aequam Ante facie quercus cessabant spargere ramos, Flondq. sollicita pingere prata manu:
Quam rex ducit triumphatur pectore nostro Nomen quod fudit portus & aura meis.*

And the same Iohn Leland, who deseruedlie had tasted the fruits of the kings largesse, was not vnacquainted with the fame of his renoume, which had made it selfe knowne by restless flight to nations far and neare, some to their smart hauing felt the valor of his forces, and others submitting themselves for fear of utter desolation. Whereupon he became a terroꝝ to his enimies, and yet none moze desirous of peace than he, if by anie other meanes (besides violence) the same might haue bene obtained. Sufficient cannot be said in his high & merited commendation, considering that as his victozies were singular, so were they also manifold; and hard it is for the pen of a cunning rhetorician to paint him out according to his dignitie: howbeit the said Iohn Leland hath left in writing a proper epigram, deuised in praise of this most excellent king, by way of comparison, to his immortall commendation, as here followeth:

Quantum punicis nouo rosetis Cedunt vere suis rubeta spinis: Quantum lilio amenioris horti Gemma omnes alia nitore cedunt: Quantum cetera punicis decoro Malis poma quidem rubore cedunt: Quantum conferis breues myrica Concedunt quog gloria cupressis: Quantum stellis ero repressa tellus Calo mole sua & nigrore cedit: Tantum omnes alij celebritate, Fama, nomine gloriaq. vera (Et mittam ingenij valentioris Lumen, flumina, fulmen atq. vires Rari iudicij tui perennes) Concedunt tibi principes serenis Henrice, o patria tua columna Talis, qualis erat celebris illa Olim quam extulit Henrich triumphans.

Comparatio huius gloriam Henrici octauis regis potensissimi.

The title of protector was created.

After it had pleased almighty God to call to his mercie that famous prince king Henrie the eight, the parlement as yet continuing, and not by his death dissolved, the executors of the said king, and other of the nobilitie, assembling themselves together, did first by sound of trumpet in the palace of Westminster, and so through London, cause his sonne and heire prince Edward to be proclaimed king of this realme by the name of Edward the first king of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, and of the churches of England and Ireland the supreme head, he being yet but nine yeares and od moneths of age: he was thus proclaimed the eight and twentieth of Januarie, in the yeare of the world 5513, and after the birth of our Lord 1547, according to the accompt of them that begin the yeare at Christmasse; but after the accompt of the church of England, in the yeare 1546, about the nine and twentieth yeare of the emperor Charles the first, the thre and thirtieth of Francis the first of that name king of France, and in the fift yeare of the reigne of Marie quene of Scotland.

Shortly hereupon the earle of Hertford with other of the lords resorted to Hatfield, where the young king then laie, from whence they conducted him with a great and right honorable companie to the Tower of London. During the time of his abode there, for the good government of the realme, the honour and suretie of his maiesties person, his uncle Edward earle of Hertford, was by order of the counsell, and the assent of his maiestie (as one most meet to occupie that roome) appointed gouernour of his roiall person, and protector of his realmes, dominions and subiects, and so proclaimed the first of Februarie by an herald at armes, and sound of trumpet through the cite of London in the vsuall places thereof, as it was thought expedient.

The first daie of Februarie the earle of Hertford lord protector, adorned king Edward with the order of knight hood, remaining then in the Tower, and therewith the king standing by, called for Henrie Hubblethorne lord maior of the cite of London, who coming before his presence, the king took the sword of the lord protector, and dubbed the said Hubblethorne knight, he being the first that euer he made. The seauenteenth of Februarie the lord protector was created duke of Summer set, the earle of Essex was created marquisse of Northampton, the lord Lisle high admerall of England was created earle of Warwick and high chamberlaine of England, sir Thomas Wriothesley lord chancelour was created earle of Southampton, sir Thomas

Seimer was aduanced to the honour of lord of Sudleie and high admerall of England, which office the earle of Warwick then resigned, sir Richard Rich was made lord Rich, and sir William Mallowbie was created lord Mallowbie of Barrham, sir Edmund Sheffield was made lord Sheffield of Butterwicke; and as saith a late writer of this action:

Et quisque est ditior potentior, auctus honore, Et noua virtutis sumens insignia fulget.

At the same time great preparation was made for the kings coronation, so that the foure and twentieth of Februarie next ensuing, his maiestie came from the Tower, and so rode through London unto Westminster, with as great roialtie as might be, the streets being hong, and pageants in diuerse places erected, to testifie the good willes of the citizens, reioysing that it had pleased God to deale so fauourable with the English nation to grant them such a towardlie young prince to their king and soueraigne thus to succede in place of his noble father. Now as he rode through London toward Westminster, and passed on the south part of Pauls churchyard, an Argosine came from the battlements of the steeple of Pauls church upon a cable, being made fast to an anchor by the deanes gate, lieng on his breast, aiding himselfe neither with hand nor foot, and after ascended to the middell of the cable, where he tumbled and played manie prettie toies, whereat the king and the nobles had god pastime.]

The morrow after being Shrouesundaie and the five and twentieth of Februarie, his coronation was solemnized in due forme and order, with all the roialtie and honour which thereunto appertained. Shortly after the coronation, to wit, the first of March, the erle of Southhampton, lord chancelour of England, for his too much repugnancie (as was reported) in matters of counsell to the residue of the counsellors about the king, was not onelie depriued of his office of chancelor, but also removed from his place and authoritie in counsell, and the custodie of the great seale was taken from him, and deliuered unto sir William Paulet lord Saint-John, that was lord great master of the kings household.

Also shortly after his coronation, the kings maiestie by the aduise of his uncle the lord protector, and other of his priue counsell, minding first of all to seeke Gods hono: and glozie, and thereupon intending a reformation, did not onelie set forth by certeine commissioners, sundrie intunations for the removing of images out of all churches, to the suppressing and auoiding of idolatrie and superstition within his realmes and dominions, but also caused certeine homilies or sermons to be draue by sundrie goble & learned men, that the same might be read in churches to the people, which were afterward by certeine of these commissioners sent forth as visitors, accompanied with certeine preachers throughout

Rich. Graffon.

All these things done concerning religion (as before is said) the lord protector and the rest of the counsell, calling to mind the euill dealing and craftie dissimulation of the Scots, concerning the matter of marriage betwixt the kings maiestie, and the quene of Scotland (which marriage as ye haue heard, in the five and thirtieth years of king Henrie the eight, was by authoritie of parlement in Scotland fullie concluded) thought it not to stand with the kings honor to be in such manner by them deluded, and withall considering how greatlie it shuld turne to the quietnesse and safetie of both realmes to haue these two princes contained in matrimonie, they did deuise sundrie waies and meanes how the same might be brought to passe, and the rather (as some doo write) for that king Henrie (before his death) had giuen them in speciall charge by all indentures to procure that the said marriage might take place, as wholie wishing by the coniunction of those two yong princes, the uniting of the two kingdoms in perpetuall amitie and faithfull league of loue: as our poet saith:

Optat coniugio duo regna corae fideli, Aeternam pacem hinc aeternaque federa iungi.

But the lords of Scotland were so inueigled and corrupted by the French king, and abused by cardinal Beton, archbishop of saint Andrewes, and other of their clergie, that they not onelie shanke from that which they had promised, but also sought to destroye those that fauored the king of England's part: whereupon a great and puissant armie was now prepared to passe by land into Scotland, and likewise a nauie to passe by sea to attend vpon the same: whereof the great gallie and foure and twentie tall ships were thoroughlie furnished with men and munition for the warres, besides manie merchants ships and other small vessels, which serued for carriage of vittells, and other necessaries.

Chieftaines
in the armie.

But now to shew what noble men and other were ordeined officers, and assigned to haue the conducti- on as well of the armie by land, as of the fleet by sea; ye shall vnderstand, that first the duke of Sum- merfet, lord protector, took vpon him to go himselfe in person, as generall of the whole armie, and cap- teine also of the battell or middle-ward, wherein were foure thousand footmen. The marshall erle of War- wicke appointed lord lieutenant of the same armie, led the fore-ward containing thre thousand footmen. The lord Dacres gouerned in the reere-ward, where in were other thre thousand footmen. The lord Greie of Wilton was ordeined high marshall of the said armie: capteine generall of all the horsemen, being in number six thousand. Sir Rafe Sadler knight treasurer of the armie. Sir Francis Bryan knight, capteine of the light horsemen, in number two thou- sand.

Sir Rafe Lane knight lieutenant of all the men of armes and demilances. Sir Thomas Darcie knight capteine of all the kings maiesties pen- sioners, and men at armes. Sir Richard Leigh knight deuiler of the fortifications. Sir Peter Hewtas knight capteine of the harquebutters, which were in number six hundred. Sir Peter Gamboa knight, capteine of two hundred harquebutters on horse- backe. Sir Francis Fleming knight was master of the ordinance. Sir George Blaag & Sir Thomas Wolcroff commissioners of the musters. Edward Shelleie, the lord Greies lieutenant of the men of armes of Bullongne, who was the first that gaue the onset in the daie of battell, and died most honorable in the same. John Wyenne capteine of the pioners being in number a thousand foure hundred. Thomas Audeleie and Edward Chamberleine harbingers of the field.

The lord Edward Clinton admerall of the fleet: sir William Woodhouse knight his vice admerall. There were in the armie of great ordinance fifteene peeces, and of carriages nine hundred carts, besides manie wagons, whereof the commissarie generall was George Ferrers. As some as the armie by land was in a readinesse, and set forward to come to Ber- wicke at a daie appointed, the nauie likewise took the sea, and by the helpe of Gods good guiding had so prosperous speed in their passage, that they arrived at Berwicke in time convenient, whether vpon the thirtieth of August being tuesday, the lord protector came, and laie in the castell with sir Nicholas Sire- leie knight, capteine there. The next daie com- mandement was giuen that euerie man shoud pre- uide himselfe for foure daies vittells to be caried forth with them in carts.

On thursdaie the first of September the lord pro- tector, not with manie more than with his owne band of horsemen, rode to a towne standing on the sea coast, a six miles from Berwicke within Scotland called Almouth, whereat there runneth a riuer into the sea, which he caused to be founded, and finding the same well able to serue for an haue, caused af- terwards a fortresse to be raised there, appointing Thomas Colwer, that was marshall of Berwicke, to be capteine thereof. On fridaie, all sailing the counsell departed the towne of Berwicke, and in- camped a two night shots off, by the sea side, toward Scotland. And the same daie the lord Clinton with his fleet took the seas from Berwicke, to the end that in case the wind shoud not serue them to keepe course with the armie by land; yet were it but with the driving of tides, they might vpon any need of munition or vittells be still at hand, or not long from them.

The same daie the earle of Warwicke, and sir Rafe Sadler treasurer of the armie, came to Ber- wicke from Newcastell, where they had staid till then, for the full dispatch of the rest of the armie, and the next daie the earle of Warwicke incamped in field with the armie. On which daie a proclamation with sound of trumpet was made by an herald in thre se- uerall places of the campe, signifieng the cause of the comming of the kings armie at that present into Scotland, which in effect was, to aduertise all the Scottish nation, that their comming was not to de- priue them of their liberties, but to aduance the mar- riage already concluded and agreed vpon betwixt the kings maiestie of England and their quene, and no hostilitie ment to such as shoud thei themselves furtherers thereof. On the fourth of September being sundae, the lord protector came from out of the towne, and the armie raised, and marched that daie a six miles, and camped by a village called Ho- stan in the baronie of Boukenhall.

The order of their march was this. Sir Francis Bryan capteine of the light horsemen, with foure hundred of his band, tended to the skout a mile or two before. The carriages kept along the sea coast, and the men at armes and demilances diuided into thre troops, answering the thre wards, rid in ar- rate directlie against the carriages a two night shots asunder from them. The thre foot battells kept order in place betwixt them both. The fore-ward foremost, the battell in the middelt, the reere-ward hindermost, ech ward hauing his trope of horsemen and gard of ordinance, his aid of pioners for amendment of waies, waies, where need should be. The first of September they marched an eight miles, untill they came to the peaths, a clough or ballie, running for a six miles west freight eastward, and toward the sea a twentieth score brode from banke to banke above, and a five score in the bottome, wherein runnes a little river. Strophe is this ballie on either side, and deepe in the bottome.

The Scots had cast trenches overthwart the side waies on either side, in manie places, to make the passage more cumbersome: but by the pioners the same were some filled, and the waie made plaine, that the armie, carriage, & ordinance were quite set over some after sun set, & there they pitched downe their campe. Whilest the armie was thus passing over this cumbersome passage, an herald was sent from the lord protector, to summon a castell, that stood at the end of the same ballie, a mile from the place where they passed downe towards the sea. Matthew Hume captaine thereof, a brothers sonne of the lord Humes, upon his summons required to speake with the lord protector. It was granted, and he came, whom the lord protector handled in such sort with effectuall words, putting him in doubt whether he would yield, or stand to the adventure, to haue the place wome of him by force, that he was contented to render all at his graces pleasure.

And so being commanded to go fetch his companie out of the house, he went and brought them, being in all one and twentieth persons. The captaine and six other were staied and commanded to the keeping of the marshall, the residue were suffered to depart whither they thought good. After this surrender, the lord John Greie brother to the marques Dorset, was appointed to seise & take possession of the house, being captaine of a great number of demilances, as for his approved worthinesse and valiance right well he might, agreeable to the deserved report remaining of him in print in foreyn speech as followeth:

The spoile was not rich sure, but of white bread, or ten cakes, and Scotch ale indifferent good store, and some bestowed among my lords soldiors, for swordes, bucklers, pikes, pots, pans, yarne, linnen, hempe, and trapps of such baggage, which the countrie people there about had brought into that pile, to haue it in more suretie, the soldiors would scarce vouchsafe to stoep and take the same vp.

The castell of Dunglas containing
the English
armie.

In the meane time the lord protector appointed the house to be overthwarted, which by the captaine of the pioners was done, though with some trauell, by reason the walles were so thicke, and the foundation so deepe, and thereto set vpon so craggie a plot. Tuesday the first of September, the armie dislodged and marched forward. In the waie as they should go, a mile and an halfe from Dunglas northward were two piles or holds, Thoznton & Anderwikke, set both on craggie foundations, & diuided a stoness cast a funder by a deepe gut, wherein ran a little river. Thoznton belonged to the lord Hume, and was kept by one Thom Trotter, who upon summons giuen him to render the house, lockt vp a sixtine poye soules like the soldiors of Dunglas fast within the house, toke the keyes with him, commanding them to defend the place till his returne, which should be on the morrow, with munition and releefe: and this done, he and his pickers pickt (as faithy master Patten) quite their waies.

Hambleton.

Anderwikke pertained to the lord of Hambleton, and was kept by his son and heire, whom of custome they call the master of Hambleton, & eight more gentlemen for the most part, as was reported. The lord protector at his coming nigh, sent vnto both these places, which vpon summons refusing to render, were freight assailed; Thoznton by batterie of sounre great peeces of ordinance, and certeine of sir Peter Hewtas hackbutters, and Anderwikke by a sort of the same hackbutters, who so well bestirred them, that where these keepers had rammed by their outer doores, cloied and slipt their staires within, and kept themselves for defense of their house about the battlements, the hackbutters got in, and fired them vnderneath, whereby being greatlie troubled with smoke, they cried for mercie, which the lord protector meant to grant them; but yer the messenger came, the hackbutters were got vp to them, & killed right of them aloft: one leapt over the walles, and running more than a furlong, was after slaine without in a water.

The pile of Anderwikke
wonne.

All this while at Thoznton was the assault on the English part, and the defense by them within stoutlie continued: but at length when they perceived in what danger they stood, and how little able they were to helpe themselves, or to annoie the assailants, they pluckt in a banner which they had hong forth, in token of defiance, and put forth a white linnen clout tied to a stickes end, crying all with one tune for mercie: but hauing answer by the whole voices of the assailers that they were traitors, and that it was too late, they pluckt in their stickes, and set vp againe their banner of defiance, and shot off, hurled stones, & did what else they could with great courage of their side, & small hurt of the assailants. Wherefore perceiving that they could not long keepe out, being on the one side battered, and mined on the other, kept in with hackbutters on ech side, and some of the Englishmen being got into the house below, for they hauing shot by themselves also in the highest of their house, pluckt in againe their banner, and cried effronies for mercie, but being answered generallie by the assailants, that they should neuer loke for it, they fell to make this petition, that if they should needs die, they might rather suffer by hanging, and so reconcile themselves to God, than to die in malice with so great danger of their soules.

This sute was so furthered to the dukes grace by sir Miles Partridge that was nere at hand when they made this sute, that it was granted; and they coming forth, humbled themselves, and without more hurt they were but commanded to the prisonall marshall, who kept them for a time, and were after released. The house was shortly after so blown with powder, that more than the one halfe of it fell freight downe to dust and rubbish, the rest stood all to shakers with rifts and chinks. Anderwikke also was burned, and all the houses of office, and stacks of corne about them both. While this was in doing the dukes grace, in turning but about, saw the fall of Dunglas, which likewise was undermined and blown by with powder.

This done, about none the armie marched, and passing by Dunbar, the castell sent them diuerse shots of artillerie, but all in vaine. The Scotch pickers shewed themselves in the field with proffer of skirmish, but to no great purpose, one of them being killed with a shot of one of Warteulls men an hackbutter on horsebacke. The armie hauing marched that daie a ten miles, lodged at night nere vnto Cantallou, and had a blind alarm. Marching the next morning a two miles, they came to a river called Lin, where there is a stone bridge, named Linton bridge of a towne thereby on the right hand as the armie marched, and standing eastward vpon the same river: the horsemen and carriages passed the rough the water, for it was not verie deepe, and the footmen over the bidge. The passage was strict for an armie, and therefore the longer in setting over.

Dundee castle.

Beyond this bridge about a mile westward upon the same river, on the south side standeth a proper castle called Dundee, pertaining to the earle of Bothwell, but kept as then by the governors appointment, who held the earle in prison. Out of this castle as the lord protector passed forward in following the foreward, there were roundlie shot off (but without hurt) six or seven peeces, the which before that (though some of the armie had bene verie nigh) yet kept they all covert. In the meane time rose a thicke mist, which caused a great disorder in the rere-ward, by reason they could not see about them. The earle of Marwarke therefore doubting least the enemies, who had been picking up and downe nere to the armie, and offered skirmish the same morning, should now by occasion of the mist attempt some feat to the annoyance of the Englishmen in their passage, his lordship himselfe went with firtene hundredes whereof Bartemill, and John de Ribaud Frenchmen were two, seven or eight light horsemen more, and the rest being his owne servants returned toward the passage to see the assault againe.

A subtle piece of the Scots.

The Scottish horsemen perceiving our horsemen to have passed on before, and thinking (as the truth was) that some capitaine of honor did staie for the looking to the order of this rere-ward, they keeping the south side of the river, did call over to some of the armie, to know whether there were any noble man nigh there? They were asked whie they asked? One of them answered, that he was such a one whose name the Englishmen knew to be honorable among the Scots, and would come in to the dukes grace, so that he might be sure to come in safetie. Some young soldiers nothing suspecting the craftie falshood of the Scots, told him that the earle of Marwarke was nigh there, by whose tuition, he should be safetie brought to my lord protectors presence. They had caused their lesson & fell to their practice, which was this. Having come over the water, in the waite as the earle should passe, they had collected about two hundred of their pickers, and had sent some before to search where my lord was, whome when they had found, part of them pickt verie nigh, whose ten or twelve of the earles small companie did boldie encounter, and drove them well-nigh home to their ambush, fleeing perchance not so much for feare as for falshood, to bring them within their danger. But hereby informed that the earle was so nigh, they sent out a bigger number, and kept the rest more secret upon this purpose, that they might either by a plaine onset distress him, or else by fainting of sight to have trained him within danger of their ambush. And thus instructed, they came picking toward his lordship apace. Whie (quoth he) & will not these knaves be ruled? Give me my staffe. The which then with so valiant a courage he charged at one (as it was thought) Dandie Car, a capitaine among them, that he did not onelie compell Car to turne, and himselfe chased him about twelve score together, all the waite at the speares point, so that if Cars horse had not bene exceeding good and wight, his lordship had surely run him through in this race, but also with his little band caused all the rest to flee amaine. After whom as Henrie Clane, a gentleman of the said earles, and one of his companie did fiercely pursue foure or five Scots, suddenly turned, and set upon him, and though they did not altogether escape his hands free, yet by helwing and mangling his head, bodie, and manie places else, they did so cruelly intreat him, as if rescue had not come the sooner, they had slaine him outright. There was Bartemill run at flogging, and hurt in the buttocke, and one of the Englishmen slaine: of Scots againe none slaine, but three taken prisoners, whereof Bartemill hurt.

one was Richard Bartwell, and hurt in the thigh, who had bene long in England not long before, and had received right manie benefites, both of the late kings liberalitie, and of the earle of Marwarke, and of manie other nobles and gentlemen in the court before.

But to conclude, if the earle of Marwarke had not thus valiantlie encountered them, yet they could have warned their ambush how weaklie he was guarded, he had bene beset round about by them ver he could have bin aware of them, or rescued of other. Whereas hereby his lordship undoubtedlie showed his wanted valor, saved his companie, and discomfited the enemy. As Bartemill the Frenchman that daie had right honestlie served, so did the lords right honorable acquite it: for the earle of Marwarke did get him a furlong, and blessed he was, straight after laid and conveyed in the lord protectors owne chariot. The rest that were hurt were here also dyed, 20 Scots and others.

The armie having marched that same daie nine miles, incamped at night by a towne standing on the frith called Lang Muir. The next morning being thursdaie the eight of September, in time of the dislodging of the English campe, signe was made to some of the ships (whereof the most part and chiefest laie a ten or twelve miles in the forth, beyond us, over against Lieth & Edenborough) that the lord admerall should come a shore, to speake with the lord protector. In the meane time, somewhat earlie as our gallie was comming toward us, about a mile and more beyond our campe, the Scots were verie busie, waiking here on those toward them with a banner of saint George that they had, so to traune them to come on land there: but the earle of Marwarke some disappointed the policie, for making toward that place where the lord admerall should come on shore, the Englishmen on the water by the sight of his presence, did some discern their friends from their foes.

The lord admerall hereupon came to land, and riding backe with the earle unto the lord protector, order was taken, that the great ships should remove from before Lieth, and come to lie before Dundee borough; and the Scottish campe which laie there in field already assembled, to resist the English power that marched thus towards them. The smaller vessels that were vittellers were appointed to lie nere to the armie. The lord admerall hereupon, being returned to the water, & the armie marching onward a mile or two, there appeared aloft on a hill, that laie longwise east and west, and on the south side of them, upon a six hundred of their horsemen pickers, whereof some within a sight shot, directlie against the Englishmen, shewed themselves upon the same hill, & more further off.

Toward these, over a small bridge that laie over a little river there, verie hardlie did ride about a dozen haquebutterers on horsebacke, and held them by baie so nite to their noses, that whether it were by the goodnesse of the same haquebutterers, or the badnesse of them, the Scots did not onelie not come downe to them, but also verie courtouslie gave place, and fled to their fellows. The armie went on, but so much the slower, because the waite was somewhat narrow, by means of the forth on the one side, and certeine marishes on the other. The Scots kept allwaies pace with them, till there were shot off two field peeces twise, wherewith there was a man killed, and the leg of one of their horses stricken off, which caused them to withdraie, so that the Englishmen saw no more of them, till they came to the place where they meant to incampe, for there they shewed themselves againe aloft on the fore remembred hill, standing standing as it were to view and take muster of the armie: but when the lord Greie made towards them, marking to know their commission, they wisely went their waie, and would not once abide the reasoning.

Little else was done that date, but that George ferrers, one of the duke of Summersets gentlemen, and one of the commissioners of the cariages in the armie, perceiving where certaine Scots were got into a caue under the earth, stopping some of the vents, and setting fire on the other, smothered them to death, as was thought it could be none other, by consequence of the smoke breacking forth at some of the ether vents. The English ships also taking their leane from before Litch, with a score of shot or more, and as they came by saluting the Scots in their campe also, with as many, came and late according to appointment. The armie hauing marched this date about a fine miles, incamped at Salt Preston by the forth. On the same the ninth of September, the English armie lying in sight & view of the Sco-tish campe, that laye two miles or therabouts from them, had the forth on the north, and the hill last reminded on the south, the west end wherof is called Parade Wate, on the which standeth a forie castell, and halfe a score houses of like worthinesse by it, and had westward before the Englishmen, the Scots lieing in campe. About a mile from the English campe were the Scots horsemen verie busie, prank-ing vp and dawning, & faine would haue bene a compete with the Englishmens doings; who againe, because the Scots seemed to sit to receiue them, did diligentlie prepare that they might some go to them, and therfore kept within their campe all that date.

The lord protector, and the counsell sitting in consultation, the capteines and officers providing their hurdz, store of vittels, and furniture of weapons, for furthurance wherof our vessels of munition and vittels were here already come to the shore. The Scots continued their bauerie on the hill, the which the Englishmen not being so well able to beare, made out a band of light horsemen, and a troupe of demulances to backe them: the Englishmen and strangers that serued among them, got vp aloft on the hill, and thereby of euen ground with the enimie rode straight toward them with good speed and order, whom at the first the Scots did boldly countenance and abide: but after, when they perceived that our men would needs come forward, they began to picke, and would faine haue bene gone, yee they had told their errand. But the Englishmen halted so speedilie after, that euen straight they were at their elbowes, and did so frontlie then bestire them, that what in the onset at the first, and after in the chase, which lasted a thre miles twelue to as far as the furthest of their campe on the south side, they had killed of the Scots within a thre houres, about the number of thirtene hundred, and taken the maister of Hume, the lords Humes sonne and heire, two priests and six gentlemen, wherof one by sir Jaques Cra-nado, and all vpon the highest and welldere might of the hill toward the Scots, within the full sight of their whole campe.

On the English part one Spanishe haquebutter hurt, and taken sir Wase Bulmer knight, Thomas Conner marshall of Berwik, and Robert Cronch, all capteines of severall bands of the English light horsemen, and men of right good courage and approved service, & at this time distressed by their owne to much weariednes, and not by the enimies force.
To conclude, of sixene hundred horsemen for skirmish, and five hundred footmen to lie close in ambush, and to be ready at need, which came that morning out of their campe, there returned not home a bone seven hundred, and diuerse of those sore hurt, and among other, the lord Hume himselfe, for he in the flight, had a fall from his horse, and burst the riell bone of his necke, that he was faine to be caried straight to Edenborough, and finallye there departed this life of that hurt. So that it is true which C. O. saith, that in this skirmitie manie a good rider was dismounted, their horses with emptye saddles and loose bydles running by hill and dawninge dale, as if they had bene ifarke mad, and to conclude (saith he)

Then after this, the lord protector, and the earle of Marlike, and other of the counsell, with a small gard, mounting by the hill where the slaughter had bene made, about halfe a mile southeast from the Scottish campe, toke full view therof, the plot where they laye, so chosen for strength, as in all their coun-trie some thought not a better, saue on the south by a great marsh, & on the north by the forth, which side they fenced with two field peeces, and certaine haquebutterz a croke, lying under a tursle wall, Eden-borough on the west at their backes, and eastward betwene the Englishmen and them stronglie defended by the course of a riuer called Ouse, running north into the forth, which as it was not verie deepe of water, so were the bankes of it so high and steepe, as a small sort of resistants might haue bene able to keepe downe a great number of commers vp.
About a twelue score from the forth, ouer the same riuer, is there a stone bydage, which they did keepe also well garded with ordinance.

When the lord protector, and the earle of Mar-like had viewed euerie thing, as they thought expedient, they returned home towards their campe, alongst before the campe of the enimies, within lesse than two slight shots, entering into a lane of thicke foot bread, fenced on either side with a wall of turffe, an ell of heighth. The Scots did often shot at them in the waie as they passed thus homewards, without hurt, saving the killing of an horse among three hundred, the rider escaping else harmlesse. And as the dukes grace was passed twelue halfe the waie homewards, a Scottish herald with a cote of his princes armes vpon him (as the manner is) and with him a trumpetter, ouertoke them.

The herald declaring this message to the lord protector, pretended to come from the gouernour, to inquire of prisoners taken, and therewith to proffer honest conditions of peace. And after he had told his tale, then began the trumpetter, and said, how he was sent from the earle of Humble: My lord my maister (saith he) hath willed me to shew your grace, that because this matter maie be the sooner ended, and with lesse hurt, he will fight with your grace for the whole quarrell, twentie to twentie, ten to ten, or else himselfe alone with your grace man to man.
The lord protector hauing kept with him the lord lieutenant, had heard them both thoroughlie, and then in answering, spake somewhat with lower voice, than they had done their messages. Wherevpon they that were the riders by, thinking that his grace would haue it no secret, were somewhat the bolder to come nearer, the words wherof were vttered so expeditelie with honour, and so honourable with expedition, that the standers by were moued to doubt whether they might rather note in them the promptnesse of a singular prudence, or the boldnesse of a noble courage: and they were thus.

Your gouernour maie know, that the speciall cause of our coming hither was not to fight, but for the thing that should be the weale, both of vs and you. For God we take to record, we mind no more hurt to the realme of Scotland, than we do to the realme of England, and therefore our quarell being as for peace, he hath refused such conditions at our hands, as we will neuer proffer againe: and therefore let him loke for none, till this waie we make it:

 and thou trumpetter, saie to thy maister, he sameth to lacke wit so to make this chalenge to me, being of such estate, by the sufferance of God, as to haue so weightie a charge of so pretious a ietwell, the governance of a kings person, & then the protection of all his realms, whereby in this case I haue no power of my selfe, which if I had, as I am true gentleman, it should be the first bargaine I would make: but there be a great sort amongst vs his equals, to whome hee might haue made this chalenge without refusal.

 warwicke request and message to the earle of Huntley.

Then quoth the lord lieutenant to them both, Ye sheweth his small wit to make this chalenge to my lords grace, and he so meane, but if his grace will giue me leaue, I shall receiue it: and trumpetter bring me word thy maister will so do, and thou shalt haue of me an hundred crownes. Saie (quoth my lords grace) the earle of Huntley is not meet in estate with you, my lord: but herald saie to the go-uernour, and him also, that we haue bene a good season in this countrie, and are here now but with a sober compaignie, and they a great number, and if they will meet vs in field, they shall be satisfied with fighting inough: and herald bring me word if they will so do, and by my honour I will giue the a thousand crownes. We haue a proud sort amongst you, but I trust to see your pride abated shortly, and of the erle Huntleys too: I wis he is a glorious yong gentleman.

 war touching heralds violated.

This said, the earle of Warwicke continued his request, that he might receiue this chalenge: but the lord protector would in no wise grant it. These messengers had their answers, and therewith leaue to depart. The Scots in midst of this message, doing contrarie to the order of warre, which as it granteth safetie to heralds and trumpeters, to passe betwixt armie and armie: so during the time of anie such message, as this was, hostilitie on both parts ought to cease, but it skilled not. On the morow after, they had their guns taken from them (as saith maister Patten) and put into their hands that could vse them with more good manner. But now concerning the message of the herald, it was thought that he was sent therewith, not for that it was beleued of them, that it might be accepted; but rather that whilst he was doing his errand, he might surueie the English power: or else for that upon refusal of the offer, they might vse the violacie (whereof they accounted themselues assured) with more crueltie.

The haue doubt of the Scots.

If nothing they doubted more, than least the Englishmen would haue bene gone backe, and gotten to the water, before they should haue encountered them, and therefore they had appointed to haue giuen the English armie a cannibado in the night before the daie of the battell: but peraduenture, understanding that the Englishmen had warning of their intention, and were provided for them if they had come, they staied and came not at all. But in the morning, they were by verie timelie, and being put in order of battell, they marched straight towards the English campe, against whome then, though they saw the English horsemen readilie to make: yet could not be perswaded, but that it was for a policie to staie them, till the English footmen and carriages might fullie be bestowed a shipboard, and that for the same purpose the English ships were come backe from before Lich.

Ordinance
 plaied against the enimie.

In the night of this daie, the dukes grace appointed, that earlie in the next morning part of the ordinance should be planted in the lane (whereof men tion before is made) vnder the turre of the wall, next to their campe, and some also to be set vpon the hill nie to Wndzelke church afore remembred: and this to the intent we should with our shot cause them el-ther wholie to remoue their campe, or else much to annoie them in that place where they laie. It was not the least of the Englishmens meaning also to win from them certeine of their ordinance, that laie nereest vnto this church. And herewith the same moning, being the tenth of September, and Saturday, somewhat before eight of the clocke, the English armie dislodged, & marched straight toward the church of Wndzelke, as well for intent to haue incamped nere the same, as for placing their ordinance, and other considerations afore remembred.

Saturday the tenth of September, the daie of the battell.

The Scots either for feare of the Englishmens departing, or hope of their spoiling, were out of their campe comming toward them, passed the riuer, gathered in arae, and well nere at this church, per the Englishmen were halfe waie to it, so quite disappointing the Englishmens purpose. Which at the first seemed verie strange in their eies, as altogether beside their expectation, as they that thought they would neuer haue forsaken their strength, to meet them in the field. But after it was knowne that they did not onelie thus purpose to do, but also to haue assailed them in their campe, as they laie if they had not bene stirring the timelier, and hauing caused all their tents to be let flat downe to the ground, yet they came out, because none should lie lurking behind them in their campe, and as well the nobles as other, leaving their horses behind them (except such as were appointed to serue on horsebacke) marched on with their souldiours on foot.

They came speedilie forwarde on both sides, the one till then no whit aware of the others intent: but the Scots indeed with a rounder pale betwene two hillocks, betwixt the Englishmen and the church, mustered somewhat byn, at whome as they staied, the English galle shot off, & slue the maister of Gretnie, with fise and twentie others nere by him, and therewith so skard foure thousand Irish archers, brought by the earle of Argile, that where (as it was said) they should haue bene a wing to the foreward, they could neuer after be made to come forwarde. Her by on did their armie hastilie remoue, & from thence declinning southward, toke their direct waie toward Faurside braie. Of this, sir Rafe Wane, lieutenant of all the English horsemen, first of all, or with the first, noting it, quicklie aduertised the lord protector, who thereby did readilie conceiue their meaning, which was to win the hill, and thereby the wind and sunne, the gaine of which thae things (as is thought) whether partie in sight of battell can hap to obtaine, hath his force doubled against his enimie.

The English
 men & Scots

 the other.

The galle the Irish archers

In all this enterprise, they vied for haste so litthe the helpe of horse, that they plucked forth their ordinance by draught of men, which at that present began scallie to shoot off towards the English armie, whereby it was perceiued they ment more than a skirmish. Herewith euerie man began to applie him selfe in his charge and dutie which he had to do. And herewith the lord protector, and other of the counsell on horsebacke as they were, fell straight in consultation. The sharpnesse of whose circumspica wisedoms, as it quicklie espied out the enimies intents, so did it among other things promptlie prouide therin remedie, to preuent them (as needfull it was) for the time asked no lesse.

Their deuise was, that the lord Greie of Willton, marshall of the armie, with his band of Bulleniers, and with the lord protectors band, and the earle of Warwicke, all to the number of eightene hundred horsemen, on the left hand on the east halfe, and sir penkions, and men of armes, and the lord Fitzwaters, with his band of demilances, all to the number of sixtene hundred, to be readie and euen with the lord marshall, on the west halfe. And thus all these together afoze to encounter the enemies afront, whereby either to breake their arate, and that waie to weaken their powe by disorder, or at the least to stop them of their gate, and force them to state, while the fore-ward might wholie haue the hilles side, and the battell and rere-ward be placed in grounds next that in order, and best for aduantage. And after this, that the same horsemen should retire vp to the hilles side to come downe in order afresh, and inuest them on both sides, whilest the foot battels should occupie them in fight afront.

The lord
Scots re-

and protecto.

Which enterpryse, though it seemed right dangerous to the assailers, yet was it not moze wiselie de-uised by the counsell, than valiantlie and willinglie executed of the lord marshall, & the others. For euen there taking their leaues of the counsell, the said lord marshall requirung onelie, that if it went not well with him, the dukes grace would be god to his wife & children, he said he would meet those Scots, and so with their hands the foresaid capteins toke their waie, and made towards the enimie. By this time were the fore-wards on either part aduanced within two slight shots in sunder. The Scots came on so fast, that it was thought of the most part of the Englishmen, they were rather horsemen than footmen. The Englishmen againe were led the moze with speed, to shew that they were as willing as the Scots to trie the battell. The master of the ordinance to their great aduantage pluckt vp the hill at that instant certeine peeces, and some after planted two or three canons of them welnigh vpon the top there, whereby hauing so much the helpe of the hill, he might ouer the Englishmens heads shot niest at the enimie. As the lord protector had so circumspectlie taken order for the arate and station of the armie, and for the execution of euerie mans office beside, he being perfectlie appointed in fatte armour, accompanied onelie with sir Thomas Chaloner knight, one of the clearkes of the kings priuie counsell, got him to the hight of the hill, to farrie by the ordinance, where he might best surueie the whole field, and succour with aid where most he saw need, and also by his presence to be a defense to the thing that stood weakest in place, and also most in daunger, the which how much it stood in stead, anon ye shall heare further.

are here vpon
the sudden,

As he was halfe vp the hill, the erle of Warwike was ware the enemies were all at a sudden state, and stood still a good while, so that it seemed to him that they perceiuing now their owne follie in leauing their ground of aduantage, had no will to come ante further forward, but gladlie would haue bin whence they came. The reasons were these. First because at that time, beside the full muster of the English footmen, of whom they thought there had bene none there in field, but all to haue bene either shipt, or a shipping; then they saw plaine that the Englishmen were sure to haue the gaine of the hill, and they the ground of disaduantage out of their hold, and put from their hope: and hereto, for that their herald gaue the lord protector no warning, the which by him (if they had ment to fight it out) who would not haue presumed that for the estimation of their honoz, they would little haue sturke to haue sent; and he againe, and it had bene but for his thousand crowns, would right gladlie haue brought: Well yet both so euer their meaning changed, finallie considering belike the state they stood in, that as they had left their strength to some, so now to be too late to repent, vp-on a change of countenance, they made hastilie forward againe, and as it seemed) with no lesse stoutnesse of courage, than stronglie in order, whose maner, armour, weapon, and order in fight in those daies and also before (though now somewhat changed as well as amongst other nations) was as insueth.

Harquebutters had they few, and appointed their fight most commonlie allwaies on foot. They used to come to the field well furnished, with sacke and skull, dagger, buckler, and swords, all notable brode and thin, of exceeding good temper, and vniuersallie so made to slice, as hard it is to deuise the better: hereto euerie man his pike, and a great hercher weapon twisse or thysle about his necke, not for cold but for cutting. In their arate toward the joining with the enimie, they thrust so nie in the fore-ranke, shoulder to shoul-der, together with their pikes in both hands, streight afoze them, and their followers in that order so hard at their backs, saleng their pikes ouer their foregoers shoulders, that if they dw assaile vn-disseuered, no force can well withstand them.

Standing at defense, they thrust shoulders like, twisse so nie together, the fore-ranks well nie to kniling scope low before, for their fellows behind, holding their pikes in both hands, and therewith in their left their bucklers, the one end of their pike against their right foot, the other against the enimie breast high, their followers crossing their pike points with them before, and thus each with other, so nie as place and space will suffer, through the whole ranks so thicke, that as easilie shall a bare finger pearse through the skin of an angrie hedgehog, as anie in-counter the front of their pikes. Thus provided, they (I meane the Scots) addresed themselves to encounter inflamed with a heat of furious hatred, but not aduised whether the cause were iust or vniust, for the which they were vp in armes: which foolish madnesse the poet pointeth at, and painteth out, saleng:

Arma Scotus poscit, valida contendere vi vult, Is nec habet pensu sit id equum an prorsus iniquum.

The lord marshall notwithstanding, whome no danger detracted from doing his enterpryse, with the companie and order afoze appointed, came full in their faces from the hill side towards them. Herewith waied it verie hot on both sides, with pitifull cries, horrible roze, and terrible thundering of guns, beside the daie darkened aboue head with smoke of the artillerie, the sight and apperance of the enimie euen at hand before, the danger of death on euerie side else, the bullets, pellets and arrowes flieng each where so thicke, and so vncerteinelie lighting, that no where was there anie suretie of safetie, euerie man stricken with a dreadfull feare, not so much perchance of death, as of hurt, which things though they were but certeine to some, yet doubted of all, assured crueltie at the enemies hands, without hope of mercie, death to flie, and danger to fight.

The whole face of the field on both sides vpon this point of joining, both to the eie and to the eare so heauie, so deadlie, lamentable, furious, outragious, terrible, confuse, and so quite against the quiet nature of man, as if to the nobilitie the regard of their honor and fame, to the knights and capteines the estimation of their worship and honestie, and general-lie to them all the naturall motion of bounden du-tie, their owne safetie, hope of victorie, and the fauour of God, that they trusted vpon for the equitie of their quarrell, had not bene a moze vehement cause of courage, than the danger of death was cause of feare, the verie horrour of the thing had bene able to haue made anie man to forget both prowesse and policie.
But the lord marshall and the others, with vresant mind and courage warilie and quicklie continued their course towards them. The enemies were in a falloo

The enimie perceiuing the Englishmen fast to approach, disposed themselves to abide the hunt, and in this order stood still to receiue them. The earle of Angus next to the Englishmen in the Scottish forward as capteine of the same, with an eight thousand men, and foure or fve paces of ordinance on his right hand, and a foure hundred horsemen on his left. Behind him westward, the gouernour with ten thousand Inland men (as they call them) the choicest soldiers counted of their countrie. And the earle of Huntlie in the rere-ward, welnie euen with the battell on the left side with eight thousand. The foure thousand Irish archers as a wing to them both, last indeed in order, & first (as they said) that ran awaile. The battell and also the rere-ward were garded likewise with their ordinance according.

Edward
Shelleie.

John Greie.

Edward Shelleie lieutenant vnder the lord Greie of his band of Bullenars, was the first that passed ouer the slough. The lord Greie himselfe next, with the lord John Greie and others in the foremost ranke, and so then after two or thre rankes of their former bands. But badlie yet could they make their rate, by reason the furrowes laie traucerse to their course. That notwithstanding, and though also they were nothing likelie well to be able thus afront to come within them to doo them hurt, as well because the Scottishmens pikes were as long or longer than their haues, as also for that their horses were all naked without bards, whereof though there were right manie among them, yet not one put on, for as much as at their comming forth in the morning, they looked for nothing lesse than for battell that daie: yet did those worthe gentlemen, the lord Greie of Wiltson, the lord John Greie, and maister Shelleie with the residue, so valiantlie & stronglie giue the charge vpon them, that whether it were by their pswelle or power, the left side of the enimies that his lordship did set vpon (though their order remained vnbroken) was yet compelled to swaie a good waie backe, and giue ground largelie, and all the residue of them beside to stand much amazed.

Beside this, as the Englishmen were welnie at their enimies, they stood verie bane and bragging, shaking their pike points, & crieng: Come lounds, come here tilkes, come heretikes; and such like rhetorike they vsed. But though (saith maister Patten) they meant but small humanitie, yet shewed they thereby much ciuilitie, both of faire plaie, to warne per they stroke, and of sozmall order, to chide per they fought. The English capteines that were behind, perceiuing at eie, that both by the vneuenness of the ground, by the sturdie order of the enimie, and for that their fellows were so nie and streight before them, they were not able to anie aduantage to mainteine this onset, did therefore according to the denie in that point appointed, turne themselves, and made a soft retire vp toward the hill againe. Howbeit, to confesse the truth, some of the number that knew not the prepened policie of the counsell in this case, made of a sober aduised retire, an hastie, rash, and vnadvised flight: howbeit, without capteine or standard, & vpon no cause of need, but of a mere vndercretion and madness. A madness indeed, for first the Scots were not able to pursue, because they were fatuened; and then if they could, what hope by flight to farr from home in their enimies land, where was no place of refuge:

The valiant lord Greie, Edward Shelleie, little Preston, Hampton, and Jerningham, Bullenars, Kitchiffe, the lord Fitzwaters brother, sir John Cleres sonne and heire, Kableie a gentleman of right commendable pswelle, Digs of Kent, Clerker a pensioner, Segraue: of the duke of Summersets hand, Standleie, Woodhouse, Conisbie, Hoggill, Morris, Denis, Arthur, and Atkinson, with other in the fore-ranke, not being able in this earnest assault, both to tend to their fight afore, and to the retire behind: the Scots againe well considering hereby how weake they remained, caught courage afresh, ran sharplie forward vpon them, and without anie merrie, slue the most part of them that abode furthest in pcease a fir band of Bullenars, and other than before are named, in all to the number of twentie fir, and most part gentlemen. My lord Greie yet and my lord John Greie, and likewise my lord Edward Scimer (as some grace was) returned againe; but neither all in safetie, nor without evident markes they had bin there: for the lord Greie with a pike through the mouth was rased a long from the tip of the tong, and thrust that waie verie dangerouse more than two inches in the necke; and the other two had their horses vnder them with swords soze wounded. Like as also a little before this onset, sir Thomas Darcie vpon his approach to the enimies, was stricken glancing wise on the right side, with a bullet of one of their field paces, and thereby his bodie brused with the bowling in of his armour, his sword hilts broken, and the forefinger of his right hand beaten flat. Euen so vpon the parting of this fraie, was sir Arthur Darcie slayd at with swords, and so hurt vpon the wedding finger of his right hand also, as it was counted for the first part of curing to haue it quite cut awaile.

About the same time, certeine of the Scots ran on hastily to the kings standard of the horsemen (the which sir Andrew Flammoche bare) and laicng fast hold vpon the staffe therof, cried, A king, a king, that if both his strength, his hart, and his horse had not bene good, and herewith some what aided at this pinch by sir Rafe Coppinger a pensioner, both he had bene slaine, and the standard lost, which the Scots neuertheless held so fast, that they brake and bare awaile the nether end of the staffe to the burrell, and intended so much to the gaine of the standard, that sir Andrew (as hap was) scaped home all safe, and elfe without hurt. At this businesse also the lord Fitzwaters, both earle of Sufler and lord chamberleine to the quenes maiestie, capteine there of a number of demilances was vnhorsd, but some mounted againe, scaped yet in gre at danger, and his horse all belwen. Hereat further were Caluerleie the stard-bearer of the men at armes, and Clement Paddon a pensioner, thrust each of them into the leg with pikes, and Don Philip a Spaniard into the knee, diuerse others maimed and hurt, and manie horses soze wounded beside.

By this time had the English forward accordingly gotten the full vantage of the hilles side, and in respect of their march stood sideling toward the enimie: who neuertheless were not able in all parts to stand full square in arraie: by reason that at the west end of them vpon their right hand, and toward the enimie, there was a square plot inclosed with turfle (as their manner of fencing in those parts, as well as in diuerse other is) one corner whereof did let the square of the same arraie. The battell in good order next them, but so as in continuance of arraie, the former part thereof stood vpon the hils side, the taile vpon the plaine, and the rere-ward whole vpon the plaine. of the English armie in this wise, they shewed themselves in maner to compasse in the Scots battels, that they should no waie escape them: but how little able they were to do it with power and number, you may easilie coniecture.

Those horsemen that were so repelled, and in their comming backe vnderlie bzake their arraie from the residue, ran so hastily through the ranks of the English fore-ward as it stood, that it did both disorder manie, feared manie, and was a great encouragement to the enimie. The worthie earle of Mar-
twike, who had the guiding of this fore-ward, right valiantlie had conducted the same to their standing, and there did verie noble encourage and comfort them with such cheerefull words, offering to live and die among them, that doubtlesse his presence, be-20 coming himselfe in such manlike sort, stood the whole companie in great stead. Neither wanted there the cheerefull diligence of those capteines, with whome his honor was furnished in that fore-ward likewise to encourage their bands, nor the worthie behaviour 30 of other in the battell and reere-ward, everie one according to his calling, shewing such proofe of his dutie, as the most part certeinlie deserved to have their names registered in the kalender of fame, where no rust of cankered oblivion might fret out the remembrance of their commendable demeanours: and therefore if anie among them should have shewed 40 anie lacke of courage, their dispayse had bene the more, sith by others they saw such worthie example given, and were to stand upon this resolution, to have hearts hardened against all hazards in a iust cause, whereof they hoped almightie God had undertaken the managing and direction, unto whome they had committed the same; as the poet truelie saith:

Iusta Deo commissa Anglorum causa tonanti, Audaces animos fecit impavidosque periculi.

But sith there were so manie that did well, & therefore deserveng a longer processe to be made of their high valiances shewed in that dangerous service, 40 than this volume may permit, I will proceed to the battell. The Scots were somewhat disordered with their comming out about the slaughter of the Englishmen, the which they did so earnestlie follow, that they toke not one to mercie. The dukes grace placing himselfe (as ye have heard) on the hill of Faur-side braie, and therewith perceiuing the great disorder of the stragling horsemen, that had in the retire broken arraie, hemmed them in from further straying, whome sir Rafe Wane, and others of the cap-50
teins some after with great dexterity brought into good order and arraie againe, and with all the rest of the strengths of the whole armie, by the policie of the lords, and diligence of everie capteine and officer beside, were so fitlie and aptlie applied in their feat, that where this repulse given by the enimie to the horsemen was doubted of manie, to turne to the whole losse of the field, the same was wrought and 60 advanced according as it was devised, to the great certeinie of gaine and victorie. For first at this slough, where most of the horsemen had stood, sir Peter Spelmus capteine of all the harquebutters a foot did verie valiantlie conduct & place a good number of his men, in maner hard at the faces of the enimies, whereunto sir Peter Camboa a Spaniard, capteine of two hundred harquebutters, Spaniards, and Italians on horsebacke did readilie bring his men also, who with the hot continuance of their shot in both 70
parts, did so stoutlie staie the enimies, that they could not well come further forward: then the archers that marched in arraie on the right hand of the footmen, and next to the enimies, pricked them sharpelie with arrows as they stood. Therewith the master of the ordinance, to their great annoiance, did gall them with haille shot and other out of the great ordinance, direalie from the hill top, and certein other gunners with their peeces a flanke from the reere-ward, most of the artillerie and mislive engines then wholie thus at once, with great punction and vehemencie occupied about them, here with the full sight of the Englishmen, all shadowed from them before by the horsemen, and dust raised, whome then they were

were in such order to be so nere upon them, and to this the perfect arraie of the horsemen againe coming contragouldie to set on them afresh, miserable men, perceiuing themselves then all to late, how much to much they had ouer-shot themselves, began suddenly to shrinke.

Their gouernour and other the principall capteins that had brought them to the bargaine, toke their horses and fled amaine, which other perceiuing did quicklie follow, and with the foremost of that crue their Irishmen, and therewith turned all the whole rout, cast downe their weapens, ran out of their wards, off with their iackes, and with all that euer they might, betoke them to the race that their gouernour began. The Englishmen at the first had found them (as what could scape so manie eies) and sharpelie and quicklie with an vnioerfall outcrie, They die, they die, pursued after in chase so egerlie, and with 100 such fiercenesse, that they ouertoke manie, and spared indeed but few, that when they were once turned, it was a wonder to see how sone, and in how sundrie sorts they were scattered. The place they stood on like a wood of stanes streiued on the ground, as rushes in a chamber, unpasable (they laie so thicke) for 110 either horse or man. Here at the first had they let fall all their pikes, and after that, euerie where scattered swords, bucklers, daggers, iackes, and all things else that was of anie weight, or might be any let to their course: which course among them, three 120 waies spectallie they made, some along the sands by the frith towards Leth, some streight towards Edinburgh, whereof part through the parke there (in the walles whereof, though they be round about of flint stone, yet were there manie holes already made) and part of them by the high waie that leadeth 130
along by the abbate of Holierood house; and the residue and most part of them towards Dakesh, which waie by means of the marish our horsemen were worst able to follow.

Sundrie shifts, some they used, some soie, made they in their running: diuerse of them in their courses, as they were ware they were pursued but of 140 one, would suddenly start backe, and lash at the legs of the horse, or soine him in the bellie, and sometime did they reach at the rider also, whereby Clement Passon in the arme, and diuerse in other parts of their bodie otherwise in this chase were hurt. Some other laie flat in a furrow as they were dead, there 150 by past by of the Englishmen vntouched, and (as was reported) the earle of Angus confessed he crouched in that sort till his horse hapt to be brought him. Other some were found to staie in the river, crouching 160 downe his bodie under the root of some willow tree, with scant his nose above water for breath. Some for lightnesse cast a waie shos and doublets, and ran in their shirts, and some were scene in this race all breathlesse to fall flat downe, and haue run themselves to death.

Before this, at the time of the onset, which the English horsemen gaue, there came eastward five hundred of the Scottish horsemen by along this Faur-side braie, streight upon the English ordinance and cartage. The lord protector (as ye have heard) most spectallie for doubt hereof, placing himselfe by the same, caused a peece or two to be turned toward them, with a few shots whereof they were some turned

For one parson Heble a chapleine of his graces, and two or three other, by and by discharged foure or five of the carts of munition, and therewith bestowed pikes, billes, bowes and arrowes, to as manie as came; so that of carters and other, there were some weaponed about a thousand, whome parson Heble and the other did verie hant somlie dispose in arraie, and made a pretie muster.

the slaughter.

To retorne now after this notable stretoing of their footmens weapons, began a pittfull sight of the dead corpses, lieng disperced abrode, some their legs off, some but hough, and lest lieng halfe dead, some thrust quite through the bodie, others their necks halfe a sunder, manie their heads clouen, with other thousand kinds of killing. After that, and further in chase all for the most part killed, either in the head, or in the necke, for the horsemen could not well reach them lower with their swords. And thus with blood and slaughter of the enimie, this chase was continued five miles in length, westward from the place of their standing which was in the fallow fields of Widdeske, untill Wendenburgh parke, and well nigh to the gates of the towne it selfe, and unto Lish, and in breadth nie foure miles, from the fforth sands by toward Wakeh southwards: in all which space, the dead bodies laie as thicke as a man may note cattell grazing in a full replenished pasture. The riuier ran all red with blood (a signe of great slaughter) so that in the same chase were slaine to the number of ten thousand men, some saie aboue foureteene thousand, as I doe find by this report concerning the battell:

mens bow.

To conclude, considering the smallnesse of the Englishmens number, and shortnesse of the time (which was scant five houres, from one till well nigh fir) the mortalitie was so great (as it was thought) the like afore time had not bene scene. One great cause why the Englishmen spared so few of them, was thought to be their tyrannous bow by them made (which the Englishmen certainly heard of) that whensoever they fought and ouercame, they would kill so manie, and spare so few: a sure proofe whereof they plainlie had shewed at the first onset giuen, where they killed all, and saued not a man that came within their danger. An other respect was, to reuenge their great and cruell tyrannie shewed at Danter hough, where they slue the lord Cuers, whome otherwise they might haue taken prisoner and saued, and cruellie killed as manie else of our men as came into their hands. An other occasion also was their armor among them so little differing, all clad alike in iacks covered with white leather, doublets of the same, or of fustian, and most cominonlie all white hosen, not one with either chaine, brooch, ring, or garment of silke, vnlesse chains of latten drabine foure or five times along the upper stocks, or to vse maffers Pattens wo:ds, the thighs of their hosen and doublet sleeves for cutting.

The apparell of the Scots.

This lacke for difference in apparell was the chiefest cause that so manie of their great men and gentlemen were killed, and so few saued. The outward shew, the resemblance or signe, whereby a stranger might discerne a poore man from a gentleman, was not among them to be scene: as for wo:ds and godlie profers of great ransoms, were as rise in the mouths of the one as the other. And it came here to passe, that after at the examination and counting of the prisoners, there were found taken aboue twentie of their common countrie people, to one of their gentlemen, whome no man need to doubt the Englishmen had rather haue spared than the other, if they could haue scene anie difference betwene them in taking. And yet verelie considering the case as it stood, the Englishmen shewed more grace, and more to mercie, than the respects before mentioned might seme to haue required. For beside the earle of Huntleie, who in godd armie appointed like a gentleman of anie among them, but could not then escape because he lacked his horse, and hapned to be taken by sir Rafe Dane, and beside the lord of Peter, Hobbie Hambleton capteine of Dunbar, the master of Sanpole, the lord of Wilmings taken by John Bzen, a brother of the earle of Caillie, and besides one Pontrell, taken by Cornelius comptroller of the ordnance in the armie, and one Camals an Irish gentleman, and besides manie other Scottish gentlemen more, taken by diuerse others.

The prisoners reckoned in the marshals booke were numbred to aboue fiftene hundred. Touching the slaughter, sure they killed not so manie, as for the time & oportunitie they might, if they had minded crueltie. For the lord protector moued with pitie at the sight of the dead bodies, and rather glad of victorie than desirous of slaughter, some after (by gesse) five of the clocke, staid the standard of his horsemen at the furthest part of their campe westward, & caused the trumpets to sound a retreat. Whereat also sir Rafe Sadler treasurer (whose great diligence at that time, and readie forwardnesse in the chiefest of the fraie before, did woorthilie merit no small commendation) caused all the footmen to staie; and then with much trauell & great paine made them to be brought in some order againe: which was a thing not easilie done, by reason they all as then were somewhat busie in applying their market, the spoile of the Scottish campe, where was found good prouision of white bread, ale, otencakes, oteneale, mutton, butter in pots, cheese, and in diuerse tents good wine also, and in some tents among them was found some silver plate and chalices, which with good deuotion permaie be sure were plucked out of their cold clowts, and thrust into their warme bosoms.

The plot of their campe called Camnfson edge, nigh Silberton a place of the lord of Wilmings, halfe a mile beyond Winstelburgh, and foure miles on this side Wendenburgh, occupied in largenesse with diuerse tents and tenticles, that stood in sundrie places out of square, about a miles compasse, wherein as the Englishmen vpon the found of the retreat somewhat assembled, they all with a loud and entire outcrie and hallowing, in signe of gladnesse and victorie, made an vniuersall noise and shout, the which noise whereof (as after was reported) was heard vnto Wendenburgh. It was a wonder to see, but (as they saie) make hands make light wo:ke, how some the dead bodies were stripped out of their garments sharke naked, even from as farre as the chase went, vnto the place of the onset, whereby the personages of the enimies might by the waie easilie be viewed and considered, the which for the talnesse of their stature, cleannesse of skin, bignesse of bone, with due proportion in all parts was such, as the beholders, if they had not scene it, would not haue believed that there had bene so many of that sort in all their countrie. Among them laie manie priests, and kirkmen, as they call them, of whome it was bruted that there was a whole band of three or foure thousand, but it was found afterwards not to be altogether so.

Among other banners, standards, and pennons, a banner of litte farsenet was found, vnder which it was said these kirkmen came, whereupon was painted a woman with hir haire about hir shoulders, kneeling before a crucifix, on hir right hand a church, after that written in great Romaine letters, fin. Reg. 1.

Afflicta sponse ne obliuiscaris. It was said that this was the abbat of Dunfermlings banner, but whether it was his or the bishop of Dunkels, the gouernours brother, who (as was said) were both in the field, his meaning was, to signifie that the church made intercession for Christ his husband, not now to forget his spouse, being at that time afflicted and persecuted by the Englishmen. But whose deuile soeuer it was, it made saue, that this church comming thus to battell, full appointed with weapon, and garded with such a sort of deacons to fight, howsoeuer in paine he had set his out, a man might well thinke, that in condition, he had rather framed his like a curst queane, that would plucke his husband by the pate, except she had his will; than like a make spouse, that went about humbly by submission and praier to deserve his husbands helpe, for redresse of things amisse.

But now to leaue this prelud with his Afflicta sponse, and to make an end with this battell. There was upon the south side of the Forth, a little castell or pile, which was herie buile all the time of the battell, as anie of the Englishmen came nigh it, to shot at them, with such artillerie as they had; which was none other than of handgunes and harquebuts, & of them not a dozen neither. A little hurt they did, but as they saw their fellows in the field thus diuised and beaten awaie before their faces, they plucked in their peeces, and couched themselves within all mute: but by and by the house was set on fire, and they for their good wils burned and smothered within. Thus (saith master Patten) though the fauour of Gods bountie, by the ballancie and policie of the lord protector, by the forward indour of all the nobles and counsell there beside, and by the willing diligence of euerie capitaine, officer, and true subiect else, they most ballantlie won the victorie ouer their enemies, of whome such slaughter was made in the field, as ye haue heard, amongst whome (as the prisoners reported) beside the lord Fleming, the lord of Logheware, the master of Greim, the master of Arskin, the master of Oglebie, the master of Aundale, the master of Rouen, and manie other of noble birth amongst them, there were of lards, lards sons, and other gentlemen slain about twentie six hundred, & amongst the prisoners also there were manie gentlemen, speciallie of name these: the earle of Huntlie lord chancellor of the realme, the lord of Pester, Hobbie Hamilton capitaine of Dunbar, the master of Sanpaul, the lord of Wilmnes, and a brother of the earle of Cambray. Two thousand by lurking and lieng (as they had bene dead) escaped awaie in the night all maimed and hurt. Herewith of weapons and armour more was found than the Englishmen did vouchsafe to giue carriage for: & yet were there conueied thence by ship into England, of sacks speciallie and swords, about thirtie thousand.

This night the Englishmen with great gladnesse and thanksgiving to God (as good cause they had) about seauen of the clocke pitched their campe at Edgebuckling brate, beside Pinkersdough, and a mile beyond the place they camped at before. Now after the battell, amongst other questions, one was moued who killed the first man that daie in the field, the glorie whereof one Jeronimo an Italian would gladly haue had, a gentleman sure that had serued that daie right ballantlie: howbeit it was after well tried, that Cutbert Gungraue, a gentleman of the earle of Maricks, deserued the praise of killing the first enemy that died that daie, who right hardilie slue a guner at his pece in the Scots foreward, yeeuer they began anie whit to turne. As for the ordinarie soldiors, it was a pleasure unto them to make rehearfall of their adventures past, and to record what dangers (in manner inevitable) they had escaped, according to the poets report in that case, saying:

res est meminisse laboris

Prateritis incunda: graue effugisse periculum

Summa recordari securamente voluptas.

The next daie being sundae the eleuenth of September, somewhat before none, the armie remained, & marching along the Forth side toward Lieth, about thre of the clocke in the after noone pitched their field, a picke shot on this side that towne on the southeast halfe, somewhat shadowed from Edenburgh by a hill, but yet the most part of it laie within the full sight and shot of the castell there, and in distance somewhat about a quarter of a mile. The lord marshall, and the most part of the horsemen were bestowed and lodged in the towne of Lieth. The dukes grace, the lord lieutenant, and the rest of the armie in the campe. On tuesdaie the thirtenth of September, the smaller vessels of the English fleet burned Binkorne, and a towne of two standing on the north shore of the Forth against Lieth.

In the after none the dukes grace rooed by the Forth a six or seuen miles westward, as it runneth into the land, and toke in his waie an Island there, called saint Comins ins, which lieth foure miles beyond Lieth, and a good waie nearer the north shore than the south, yet not within a mile of the nearest. It is but halfe a mile about, and had in it an abbey, but the monks were gone: fresh water inough, and store of conies, and is so naturalie strong, that but by one waie it can be entred; the plot whereof the lord protector considering, did quicklie cast to haue it kept, whereby all traffike of merchandize, all commodities else comming by the Forth into their land, and bitterlie the whole vse of the Forth it selfe, with all the haueis vpon it, should quite be taken from them.

The next daie the lord protector riding backe againe eastward, to view diuerse things and places, toke Dakerth in his waie, where a house of George Douglas did stand, and comming somewhat nere it, he sent Summer set his herald with a trumpet to know who kept it, and whether the keepers would hold or yeld it to his grace? Answer was made, that there were thre score persons within, whome their maister lieng there saturday at night after the battell, did will that they, the house, and all that was in it, should be at his graces commandement. Whereupon the chieffest came, and in name of all the rest humbled himselfe to the dukes will. From thence his grace passed to the place where the battell had bene stricken, and so by Dunsleburgh returned backe to the campe.

On thursdaie being the fiftenth of this moneth, the lord Clinton high admerall, taking with him the gallie whereof Richard Brooke was capitaine, and foure or five other smaller vessels besides, as well appointed with munition and men, rooed by the Forth a ten miles westward, to an haue towne standing on the south shore called Blacke Pesse, where at toward the water side is a castell of a pretty strength, as nigh whereunto as the depth of the water would suffer, the Scots for safegard had laid the Marie Willoughbie, and the Anthonie of Perucastell, two tall ships, which with extreme inturie they had stolen from the Englishmen before time, when no war was betwixt vs: with these laie there also an other large vessell called the Wolfe, and seauen more, whereof part laden with merchandize. The lord Clinton and his companie with right hardie approach, after a great conflict betwixt the castell and his vessels, by fine force wan from them those three ships of name, and burnt all the residue before their faces.

The sixteenth of September the lord of Wilmston a Scotish gentleman came to the dukes grace from their counsell for cause of communication, and returned againe to them, hauing with him Porreie an herald and king at armes of ours, who founde them with the old quene at Sterling. On saturday the seventeenth of September, sir John Luttrell in the after none departed toward saint Coms ins, hauing with him an hundred barquebutters, fiftie pionsers, & two rowe barks well furnished with munition, and thre score and ten mariners to remaine there, & keepe that from invasion of the enimies, against whom the English were so sharple whetted, that when they came to encounter, they gaue prowse of their manhood by wounds and bloodshed, according to the report of C.O. in these verses following :

*Anglorum pectora Maiors

Bothwell.

In the time whilist the armie laie thus in the campe betwene Litch and Edenburgh, manie lards and gentlemen came in to the lord protector to requyre his protection, the which his grace to whome he thought good did grant. This daie came the earle of Bothwell to his grace, who hauing bene kept in prison by the gouernour, the night after the battell was set at libertie, and comming thus to the lord protector, was friendlie welcomed and interteined; and hauing this night supped with his grace, he departed.

Litch burned.

Litch was set on fire this saturday, whereas it was meant, that there should haue bene but one house onelie burnt, belonging to one Barton that had plaid a slipperie part with the lord protector. But the soldiors being set a worke to fire that house, fired all the rest. Sir great ships also that laie in the haven, which for their age and decaye were not so apt for vse, were likewise set on fire and burnt. On sunday the eighteenth of September, the lord protector for considerations mouing him to pittie, hauing all this while spared Edenburgh from hurt, did so leaue it, but Litch and the ships burning, some after seauen of the clocke in the morning, caused the campe to dislodge, and as they were raised and on foot, the castell shot off a peale, with chambers hardie and all, of foure and twentie peeces. Passing that daie seauen miles, they camped earlie for that night at Craufston by a place of the lard of Wymssons.

The same morning the lord protector made maister Andrew Dupleie knight, brother to the earle of Marwike, dispatched my lord admerall and him by ships full fraught with men and munition toward the winning of an hold in the east side of Scotland called Broughticrag, which stood in such fort in the mouth of the riuer of Taie, as that being gotten, both Dundee, saint Johns towne, and diuerse other townes standing vpon the same riuer the best of the countrie in those parts, set vpon the Taie, should either become subiect vnto this hold, or else be compelled to forgo the whole vse of the riuer, for hauing anie thing comming in or outward. The lord admerall, and the said sir Andrew sped themselves with such good successe and diligence in that enterprise, that on the wednesday following, being the one and twentieth of September, after certeine of their shot discharged against that castell, the same was yelded vnto them, the which sir Andrew did then enter, and after kept, as capitaine to his high praise and commendation.

Lawder.

But now to the armie. On monday the nineteenth of September, they marched ten miles, and incamped a little on this side a market towne called Lawder. Here as they were settled in their lodging, the herald Porreie returned from the Scottish counsell, with the lard of Wymssons, and Rose their herald, who vpon their sute to the lord protector, obtained that siue of their counsell should haue his graces safe conduct, that at anie time and place within fifteen daies, during his abode in their countrie, or at Berwike, the same siue might come and commune with siue of the English counsell, touching matters in controuersie betwene them. Rose the herald departed earlie with his safe conduct, the campe raised, and that daie they went seauen miles till as far as Hume castell, where they camped on the west side of a rockie hill that they call Hare crag, standing about a mile westward from the castell.

Here they did so much by shewing that they meant indeed to win the castell by force, if otherwise they might not haue it, causing a certeine number of barquebutters vpon appointment before to beset the castell, and to watch that none should passe in or out, that in the end, the ladie of the house, and other that were within in charge with it, yelded it vp to the lord protector's hands: for the ladie doubting the losse of hir son that was prisoner with the Englishmen, hauing the first daie bene with the lord protector, and got respite till the next daie at none, in the meane time consulted with hir sonne, and other hir friends the keepers of the castell, returned at the time appointed the next daie, being the one and twentieth of that moneth, and made sute for a longer respite till eight of the clocke at night, and therewith safe conduct for Andrew Hume hir second son, and John Hume lard of Colban Banos, a kinsman of hir husbands, capitains of this castell, to come and speake with his grace in the meane while. It was granted hir. Wherevpon these capitains about thre of the clocke came to the lord protector, and after other couenants (with long debating on both parts) agreed vpon, the and these capitains concluded to giue their assent to render the castell, so far forth as the rest of the keepers would therewith be contented, for two or thre within (said they) were also in charge with keeping it as well as they, for knowledge of whose minds the duke sent Summerfet his herald with this ladie to the castell vnto them; who as the herald had made them priue to the articles, would faine haue had let sure for foure and twentie hours longer, to send to their lord to Edenburgh, where he laie hurt (as before you haue heard) and in danger of death, which followed of the fall that he caught at the fridaies skirmish before the battell, to know his will and pleasure in this point of rendering vp the castell: but being wiselie and sharple called vpon by the herald, they agreed to the couenants afore by their ladie and capitains concluded on: whereof part (as the sequels shewed) were these. That they should depart thence the next daie in the morning by ten of the clocke with bag and baggage, as much as they could carie, leauing all munition and vittels behind them in the castell. Howbeit, to be assured of them, the lord protector prouiding ech towie to be readie for them, caused eight peeces of ordinance sented with baskets of earth to be planted on the southside toward the castell within power of batterie, and the barquebutters to continue their watch and ward.

On thursdaie morning being the two and twentieth of September, the lord Greie was appointed to receiue the rending of the castell into his hands, and sir Edward Dupleie now lord Dupleie after to be capitaine there. They both departed to it, and at the time set Andrew Hume, and foure other of the chiefest there with him came out, and yelding the castell, deliuered the keies to the said lord Greie: his lordship causing the residue to come out then, sauing sir or seuen to keepe their baggage within, who all were in number seuentie and eight, entred the same with maister Dupleie, and diuerse other gentlemen with him. He found there indifferent good store of vittels and wine, & of ordinance two bassard culuerings, one one face, also three falconets of brass, and of iron eight peeces beside. The keeping of this castell the lord Greie betaking unto sir Edward Dupleie accordingly returned to the campe. This done, the next daie being fridaie, and the thre and twentieth of September, they dislodged, and went that morning to Rockesburgh, incamping in a great fallow field, betwixt Rockesburgh and Kelfeie, standing eastward a quarter of a mile off. Here at Rockesburgh they began to build a fort within the compasse of an old ruinous castell, the plot and site whereof standeth naturallie verie strong, upon a hill east and west of an eight score in length, and thre score in breadth, drawing to a narrowness at the east end, the whole ground whereof the old walles did yet inuiron. Beside the heigth and hardnesse to come to, it is stronglie fenced on either side with the course of two great riuers, Tuet on the north, and Tward on the south, both which ioining somewhat nigh together at the west end of it. Tuet by a large compasse about the fields (in which the campe laie) at Kelfeie, doth fall into this Tward, which with great depth and swiftnesse runneth from thence eastward into the sea at Berwikke. Quert this betwixt Kelfeie and Rockesburgh there hath bene a great stone bridge with arches, the which the Scots in times past haue all to broken, because the Englishmen should not that waie come to them.

Some after the lord protector's surueie of the plot, and determination to doe as much in deed for making it defensible, as shynesse of the time & season of the yere could suffer (which was) that one great trench of twentie foot broad with depth according, and a wall of like depth, breadth, and heigth, should be made crosse within the castell from the one side wall to the other, and fortie foot from the west end: and that a like trench and wall should likewise be cast a trauesse within, about a coits cast from the east end, and hereto that the castell walles on either side where need was, should be mended with turffe, and made with loopes, as well for shooting directlie forward as for flanking at hand: the worke of which deuise did make that (beside the safegard of these trenches and walles) the keepers should also be much defended from the enemies force by both the end walles of the castell: the pioners were set a worke, and diligentlie applied in the same.

The lord of Hesseforth, and manie other lards and gentlemen of Tuidall and the Pers, hauing come and communed with the lord protector, and the counsell, made an assurance, as it were a truce for that daie, till the next daie at night; and on the next daie, while assurance lasted, these lards and gentlemen being the chiefe in the whole Pers and Tuidale, came in againe, whome the dukes grace with wisdom and policie without bloodshed did win then unto the kings obediens, for the which they did willinglie then receiue an oth: whose names in part insue. The lord of Hesseforth, the lord of Fernihurst, the lord of Crounehead, the lord of Hymthill, the lord of Humbleie, the lord of Markeston by Perside, the lord of Bonedworth, the lord of Dymelton, the lord of Spalefaine, the lord of Warmsleie, the lord of Linton, the lord of Egerston, the lord of Parton, the lord of Spow, the lord of Reddell, the lord of Keameride. George Crombull, John Holliburton, Robert Car of Greiden, Adam Kirton, Andrew Birton, Andrew Weither, Sander Spur of Erleson, Marke Car of Littledon, George Car of Faldenside, Alexander Makdowell, Charles Koberford, Thomas Car of the Pere, John Car of Denthorne, Walter Holliburton, Richard Hanganford, Andrew Car, James Douglas of Caners, James Car of Perlington, George Hoppingie,

William Dymelton of Enmerden, John Crimston. Manie more there were beside, but ouerpasse by maister Patten, for that they remained in the register with these, as he saith. The duke of Summerlet tended the furtherance of the worke so much, that he forbare not to laie his owne hand to the spade and shouell, thereby to encourage others: so as there were but few lords, knights, and gentlemen in the field, but with spade, shouell, or mattocke did therein their parts.

The five and twentieth of September being Sunday, the Scots began to bring vittels to the campe, & were so well intreated and paid for the same, that during the time of the Englishmens abode there, they wanted not of the commodities which their countrie could minister. The eight and twentieth of September a Scottish herald accompanied with certeine Frenchmen, that were perchance more desirous to marke the armie than to wit of their welfare, came and declared that within a seauen-night after, their commissioners, to whom safe conduct had bene granted, should come and commune with our counsell at Berwikke; whose comming the earle of Marwike, and sir Rafe Sadler with other the commissioners appointed, did so long while there abide. But what the Scots ment by breaking promise I cannot saie, howbeit come they did not, & therefore escaped not the iust note of dissimulation, howsooner else they could colour the matter in their owne excuse.

The same daie after none, the duke of Summerlet adorned with titles of dignitie diuerse lords, knights, and gentlemen, the names and promotions of whom maister Patten hath set downe out of the heralds booke, as followeth: Sir Rafe Sadler treasurer, sir Francis Wyland captaine of the light horsemen, sir Rafe Wane lieutenant of all the horsemen: these knights were made banerets, a dignitie aboue a knight, and next to a baron. The lord Greie of Wilton high marshall, the lord Edward Selmer the duke of Summerlets son, the lord Thomas Howard, the lord Walbrike a Cleuelander, sir Thomas Dacres, sir Edward Hastings, sir Edmund Wyldes, sir John Chin, sir Giles Partridge, sir John Contweie, sir Giles Pole, sir Rafe Wagnoll, sir Oliver Laurence, sir Henrie Gates, sir Thomas Chaloner, sir Francis Fleming master of the ordynance, sir John Gresham, sir William Shipwith, sir John Wuts, sir George Blaag, sir William Francis, sir Francis Inolles, sir William Thornburrow, sir George Howard, sir James Willford, sir Rafe Copinger, sir Thomas Wentworth, sir John Peruen, sir Nicholas Strange, sir Charles Sturton, sir Hugh Askue, sir Francis Salmin, sir Richard Counleie, sir Parmaduke Conestable, sir George Audlete, sir John Holcroft, sir John Southworth, sir Thomas Danbie, sir John Talbot, sir Rowland Clarke, sir John Worsleie, sir John Foster, sir Christopher Dies, sir Peter Negro, sir Alanzo de Wile, sir Henrie Husleie, sir James Cranado Babander, sir Walter Bonham, sir Robert Bandaling mair of Newcastle, and made knight there at the duke of Summerlets returne.

But now that Rockesburgh was sufficientlie made defensible (the which to see it seemed the duke of Summerlet had bowed before he would thence depart) his grace and the counsell did first determine that my lord Greie should remaine vpon the borders there as the kings lieutenant, and then toke order for the forts: that sir Andrew Dupleie captaine of Boughtracrag had left with two hundred soldiers of harquebutters & others, and a sufficient number of pioners for his worke: sir Edward Dupleie captaine of Hume castell threescore harquebutters, D d d d. y. fortie fortie horsemen, and a hundred pionsers: sir Rafe Palmer capteine of Rochester thre hundred soldiers of harquebutters and others, and two hundred pionsers. As things were thus concluded, and warning given ouer night on this wednesday being Michaelmasse euen, on the next morrow being Michaelmasse daie euerie man fell to packing apace and got them homewards, passing ouer the Tweed there with some trouble and danger also, by reason of raine that latelic fell before, & had raised the streame, which being swift of it selfe, and the chanel breuen in the bottome with great stones made the passage cumbersome, so that manie as well horsemen as footmen were in no small perill as they passed thorough, and one or two drowned, and manie cariages ouerthrowne, and in great hazzard of losing.

The duke of Summerset rode freight to Peter-castell, and thence homewards. The earle of Mar-tilke, my lord Greie, and sir Rafe Sadler, with diuerse other rode to Berwik, to abide the comming of the Scottish commissioners. In the meane time of their taring there, the earle of Mar-tilke made sir knights; sir Thomas Penill the lord Penills brother, sir Andrew Cobbet, sir Anthoine Strelleis, sir Arthur Panering, sir Richard Nerneie, sir John Vertenille. After that the earle of Mar-tilke had taried for the comming of the Scots the full terme of the appointment, which was untill the fourth of October, and perceiued they came not, the next daie he departed homewards.

Here ye haue to vnderstand also, that in part of the meane time whilst the duke of Summerset was in doing of these exploits in Scotland (as ye haue heard rehearsed) the earle of Lenor, and the lord Wharton warden of the west marches, with an armie of fise thousand men, entred Scotland on that side, and first passing two miles after a date and a nights defense, they wan the church of Annan, toke seuentie & two prisoners keepers of the same, burnt the spoile for cumber of cariage, and caused the church to be blown by with powder, passing thence a fiftene miles within the land, they wan the castell of Dilke, the which they left furnished with munition and men, and so returned. But of this ye shall find more in the historie of Scotland, by the sufferance of God, where we intreat of the doings there in this yeare.

Thus much haue I collected out of master Pattens booke, or rather exemplified the same, not much digressing from his owne words, except where I haue bin forced to abridge his worke in some places, wishing to haue inserted the whole, if the purpose of this volume would haue so permitted, as well for the full vnderstanding of euerie particular point, by him remembred, as also for his pleasant and apt manner of penning the same. Whilst the lord protector was abroad thus in wars against the Scots, the lords of the counsell that remained at home, chieselie by the good and diligent calling on and furtherance of the archbishop of Canturburie, and others of the cleargie, toke order for the advancement of religion, causing the bookes of homilies and the paraphrase of Erasmus to be set forth and had in churches.

At the comming backe of the lord protector from his iourne into Scotland, the citizens of London determined to haue receiued him with great triumph: but he hearing thereof, forbade them in anie wise so to do: for (said he) if anie thing hath bene done to the honour of the realme, it was Gods doing, and therefore willed them to giue him the praise. Nevertheless the maiors and aldermen, with certaine of the commoners in their liveryes and their hoods, hearing of his approach to the citie, the eight daie of October met him in Finnesburie field, where he toke each of them by the hand, and thanked them for their good wils. The lord maior did ride with him till they came to the pound in Smithfield, where his grace left them, and rode to his house of Shene that night, and the next daie to the king to Hampton court. The fourth daie of November began a parlement, called and holden at Westminster, which continued till the foure and twentieth of December next following, & was then proroged. In this parlement, all colleges, chanteries, and free chapells were giuen to the king, and the statute of the six articles was repealed, with diuerse others tending to the like end. Moreover, during this parlement visiters being appointed to visit in London, the firste of November began to take downe the images in Pauls church: and shortly after all the images in euerie church, not onelie through London, but also throughout the whole realme, were pulled downe and defaced.

The lord protector and others of the counsell, considering now in what sort they had got fothold in Scotland, by reason of such peeces as they had taken and fortified within the realme, did denie for the more suertie of those places, which they had already got, and the better to bring the rest of the countrie vnto reason, to haue some holds also more within the land, and therefore first they caused a fort to be builded at Lowder, where sir Hugh Willoughbie was appointed capteine with a convenient garri-son of soldiers to keepe it. Beside this, it was thought expedient to fortifie the towne of Hadington, whereupon the lord Greie lieutenant of the north parts, with sir Thomas Palmer, and sir Thomas Wolcrosse, were appointed to go thither with a convenient number of men of warre & pionsers to see that towne fenced with trenches, rampiers, and bulwarks, as should seme to his lordship necessarie and behouefull; who therefore entering into Scotland the eighteenth of Aprill, passed forth to Hadington, where he began to fortifie, and there remained to see the worke brought to some perfection. During his abode there, diuerse exploits were both ballantlie attempted and luckilie achieved by his martiall conduct and politike direction, as occasions offered might moue him, which I would gladlie haue set downe at large, if I could haue come to the true vnderstanding thereof; but sith I cannot get the same, in such full manner as I haue wished, that yet which I haue learned by true report (as I take it) I haue thought good to impart to the reader.

The eight and twentieth of Maie, his lordship wan the castell of Pester, after he had beaten it right sore with terrible batterie of canon shot for the time it lasted, and therewith hauing made a reasonable breach for the soldiers to enter, they within yielded with condition to haue their liues saved: which the lord Greie was contented to grant to them all, one onelie excepted, who during the siege uttered diuelish words of the king, abusing his maiesties name with vile and most opprobrious termes. They all comming forth of the castell in their shirts, humbled themselves to my lord Greie (as became them) and vpon strait examination who should be the railer that was excepted out of the pardon, it was knowne to be one Petrona a Scot: but he to saue himselfe, put it to one Hamilton, and so these two gentlemen accusing one an other, the truely could not be decided otherwise than by a combat, which they required, and my lord Greie therevnto assented, and pronounced iudgement so to haue it tried: which he did the rather, because all men doe seme resolute in the triall of truth (as in a verie god cause) by losse of life to gaine an endlesse name; as one saith:

At the appointed time they entered the lists, set by for that purpose in the market place of Haddington, without other apparell saving their doublets and hosen, weaponed with sword, buckler and dagger. At the first entrie into the lists, Hamilton kneeling downe, made his hartie prayer to God, that it might please him to giue victorie vnto the truth, with solemne protestation that he neuer vttered anie such words of king Edward of England, as his aduersarie charged him with. On the other side Newton being troubled (as it seemed) with his false accusation, argued vnto the beholders his guiltie conscience. How were the sticklers in a readinesse, and the combatours with their weapons drawne fell to it, so that betwixt them were stricken six or seven blowes right lustilie. But Hamilton being verie fierce and egre, vpon trust of his innocencie, constrained Newton to giue ground almost to the end of the lists; and if he had giuen him to the end in deed, then by the law of armes he had wonne the victorie. Newton perceiuing himselfe to be almost at point to be thus overcome, slept forwards againe, and gaue Hamilton such a gash on the leg, that he was not able longer to stand, but fell therewith downe to the ground, and then Newton falling on him, incourteously slue him with a dagger.

There were gentlemen present that knowing as they tolke it for certeine, how Newton was the offender (although fortune had fauoured him in the combat) would gladly haue ventured their liues against him man for man, if it might haue bene granted; but he chalenging the law of armes had it granted by my lord Greie, who gaue him also his owne gowne beside his owne backe, and a chaine of gold which he then ware. Thus was he well rewarded how so euer he deserved: but he escaped not so, for afterwards as he was riding betwixt the borders of both the realmes, he was slaine and cut in peeces. On the fourth of June, the towne of Dabketh was burnt, and the castell wone by force, where fourtene Scots were slaine, and thre hundred taken prisoners, amongst whom were these men of name; the maister of Spoxton, son in law to sir George Dowglas, the lord of Blengarvie, the lord of Medderburne, and one Alexander Hume, a man of god reputation among them. The same daie the English horsemen burnt all the mills round about Edinburgh, within the compasse of six miles on each side the towne. The seventh of June they burnt Spuskilburgh. Now after that my lord Greie had fortified Haddington, and furnished it with vittels, and munitions sufficient, the twelue of June he departed from thence home wards, leauing there in garrison about two thousand footmen, and five hundred horsemen.

In this meane time, Henrie the French king succeeding his father Francis the first (who departed this life the last of March in the yere last past, to wit, 1547) made prouision of an armie, with a nauie of ships and gallies, to passe into Scotland to the aid of the quene and other of his faction. And first he had sent thither monsieur de la Chapelle de Viron, a gentleman of god account, to assist the gouernour with his aduise and counsell, which gouernour desirous to recover the castell of Wroughticrag, and loth to see it possessed by the Englishmen raised a power of eight thousand men, and with eight peeces of artillerie came before that fortesse, meaning to win it by siege; but by the valliant prowes of sir Andrew Dudley, and the hardie manhood of such English souldiers as serued there vnder him, the Scots were repelled, and driuen to leaue their siege with dishonour.

Yet not thus contented, the earle of Argyle with an armie of his Irish Scots, or Irishmen (if I maie so call them) after this likewise came and besieged the place, but glad to take truce for a time with sir Andrew. Before the tearme of the same truce was expired, there came new succours to him, and thereupon the earle in the end was constrained to leaue his siege, and suffer the Englishmen to become maisters of a little hill not farre off from the castell, where afterwards they builded a fortesse. But to returne to the French armie which was prepared to passe into Scotland, ye shall vnderstand that when their ships and prouisions were once readie, and the captains with their bands come downe to West in Britaine, where the nauie was rigged to receiue them, monsieur de Delle general of all the armie, reckoned to containe seuen or eight thousand men, imbarcked himselfe with all his people, and sailed forth on his iourne, till they arrived in the Forth, and there toke land at Leith the sixteenth of June.

Shortlie after, hauing got their great artillerie on land, and taken aduise with the lord gouernour & other of the Scottish nobilitie, whom they found at Edinburgh, how to proceed in prosecuting the war against the Englishmen, it was resolved that without delay they shuld trie their forces about the recovery of Haddington, and go to besiege that towne, before they attempted anie further exploit. The gouernour and other of the Scottish lords, hauing with them seuen or eight hundred light horsemen, offered to go with them, to the better aduancing forward of that enterpryse. Hereupon setting forward, and coming to Spuskilburgh, the captains with a certeine number of horsemen and footmen, as well of Scots as Frenchmen, were appointed to go before to view the said towne of Haddington. Upon their approach nere to the towne, there issued forth certeine Englishmen and Italians, that were of Libertos band, which skirmished with them right stoutlie, till at length the Frenchmen and Scots retired backe to Lauret a little from Spuskilburgh (where their armie incamped for that night) and the Englishmen and Italians returned backe to their fortesse.

The next daie the Frenchmen and Scots with their whole power came before Haddington, where they were welcomed with a right sharpe and hot skirmish, in which was slaine with an harquebuse shot, one of the French captains called Willenensue.

In the meane time whilst this skirmish continued, the Reinsgrau with his Almans incamped himselfe on the one side of the towne, where the maister of the ordinance in the French armie, named monsieur Duno, caused trenches to be cast for the safe placing of the artillerie: the Englishmen still kept them occupied on each side the towne with skirmishing, to the annoiance of the aduersaries. So concluded, they incamped before the towne, cast trenches, lodged their ordinance, & laid their siege to the most aduantage, so far as they might be suffered. Shortlie after that this siege was planted, there came to the aid of the French, the earle of Argyle, with a great number of Irish Scots, and monsieur de la Chapelle brought an eight or nine hundred Scottish pioneers, which began a trench on the left hand of the abbeie gate, and likewise a transe to couer their souldiers that should watch and ward, from danger of the shot out of the towne on that side.

The Englishmen with often illues gaue their aduersaries small rest, procuring manie hot skirmishes, as occasion serued. At one of the which skirmishes Piero Strozzi, colonell of thre ensignes of Italians, was stricken with a musket shot. Yet monsieur de Delle enforcing the siege to the uttermost of his power, caused one night with helpe of baskets filled with earth, six peeces of artillerie to be planted in batterie fast at the towne side, which at the beake of daie began to shoot off, and discharged that present daie three hundred and fortie shots. But after they perceived that they did little hurt to the fortifications of the towne in that place where this batterie was laid: the next night, the baskets & peeces of artillerie were removed lower, and not past three score paces from the ditches of the towne, where the next daie two hundred shots were discharged against the rampire. To conclude, they made such breaches in sundrie places for easie entrie into the towne, that it was greatly marvelled vpon they durst not assaie to giue a generall assault.

They lodged so neare within the verie ditches, that there were deuised certaine plummetts of lead, tied with cords to a truncheon of a staffe, like to an handstaffe of a baile, wherewith the souldiours that watched and warded within the towne on the rampire, shue diuerse of the Frenchmen being their lodged within their ditches. Thus notwithstanding that the Frenchmen with their artillerie had broken downe the fortifications, so as the breaches were made verie reasonable and easie for them to enter; yet durst they not presume once to giue the assault: for the Englishmen although their powder was sore spent, and that for want of matches they were constrained to teare their shirts, and vse the same in stead of matches; yet they shewed themselves so valiant in defending the towne thus beaten & made weake on each hand, that there was no hope left to their aduersaries to win it of them by force. Although the French power on the one side, and eight thousand Scots on an other had so inuironed it, that the Englishmen within were driuen to most hard shifts, for want of things necessarie & requisite for their maintenance and defense of that towne.

But yet whilst they remained thus in such distresse and necessitie of things, two hundred Englishmen vnder the conduct of capitaine Wintham, Warham Seintleger, and John Car of Marke, four times one night to passe through all the watchtowers on that side where the Scots lay, and entering the towne, and bringing with them great plenty of powder, and other necessaries, greatly relieved them within, & so encouraged them, that they seemed to make small account of their enemies forces. Whereupon within few daies after, the Scots (five or six hundred light horsemen onelie excepted) brake vpon their campe and returned home. After this, my lord Greie remaining at Berwik, went to make a voyage himselfe in person for the reliefe of them that were thus besieged in Haddington. Now when all things were so farre in a readinesse as the next daie he went to haue set forward, letters were brought that night from the court, willing him to perforce that seruice by a deputie, and to staie himselfe till the comming of the earle of Shrewsburie, who was appointed with an armie to come verie shortly as generall into those parties.

By lord Greie hereupon appointed in his stead sir Robert Bowes, and sir Thomas Palmer, to go thither, who comming to Dunglas, left there certaine bands of footmen, and with the horsemen being in number thirtie hundred (whereof seven hundred lances were appointed vnder the charge of sir Thomas Palmer) they rode forward to accomplish their enterprise: but the French capitaine hauing knowledge of their comming, they prouided the best they could to repell them, appointing foure hundred lances of lanceknights to keepe a standing watch that night in the trenches, and the like number of French ensignes to watch about their campe. All the other of their bands were commanded to take rest, but yet with their armour on their backs.

Their generall monsieur de Delle himselfe, monsieur de Haileraie admerall of their fleet, monsieur Dandelot cozenell of the French footmen, Piero Strozzi cozenell of the Italians, the Reinstrauc cozenell of the lanceknights, and all other the noble men and capitaine of honour among them were all night long in armour, travelling by and downe, some on horsebacke, and some on foot, to visit the watchtowers and scouts, set in places and waies by the which they suspected that the Englishmen ment to come. The lord Hume riding abrode to learne what he might of the Englishmens demeanour, earlie in the morning returned to the campe, and certified monsieur de Delle, that they were at hand. Wherewith were the Scottish and French horsemen that kept the scout called in, and monsieur Dandelot with great expedition ranged his battell of footmen in order, and so likewise did the Reinstrauc his Almans.

The Englishmen diuided into two bands came and shewed themselves in the sight of the towne, and charging such Scots and Frenchmen as came forth to encounter them, gaue them the overthrow at two severall charges: but finally presuming to farre vpon their good lucke thus chancing to them in the beginning, followed in chase those that fled before them, untill at length they were inclosed and shut by betwixt the French footmen on the one side, and the Almans on the other. And herewith the Scottish horsemen vnder the conduct of the lords, Humes & Dune, & the French horsemen led by monsieur de Etanges their generall, being assembled together effronies, after they had bene so repelled, were now ready to come forward againe: and perceiving their footmen so to haue inuironed the Englishmen, that they were not able to recover themselves, nor to get out of danger, but by disordering their ranks to take them to flight, followed againe, so that those which escaped the Frenchmens hands were taken by the Scots that pursued them in chase, so that few were saved that were not either slaine or taken. By lord Greie lost threescore and twelue great horses, and an hundred geldings, with all the men vpon them, armed with his lordships owne furniture, onelie foure or five of his men came home, of the which Thomas Cornwallis now growne porter to the queenes maiestie was one, and Robert Car esquier an other. Then page to my said lord Greie.

The vnadvised rashnesse of sir Thomas Palmer was thought to be the chiefe occasion of this distresse of those horsemen, who after they had done sufficiently for that time, would needs haue them to giue a new charge, and so were discomfited. After this overthrow and chase of our horsemen, the armie that was lenied to passe into Scotland was halied forward with all speed possible: for although before the comming of the English horsemen, the French, by an aduertisement giuen that they meant to come, had plucked backe their great artillerie, and sent the same vnto Edinburgh, keeping onelie with them sir field-pieces, and herewith removed their campe further off from the towne: yet by foresailing vitells and all other necessarie things from them within, they were driuen to such distresse, that they must of force haue left the towne to the enemies, if some power had not come within a while to remove the siege that lay thus to annoie them.

When therefore the armie was come to Newcastell, & the earle of Shrewsburie generall lieutenant of the same was there arrived, they passed forward to Berwik, and from thence marched straight towards Haddington. The number of the Englishmen and strangers was reported at the point of fiftene thousand, whereof three thousand were Almans vnder der the conduct of a right worthy and expert chiefeine, named Conrad Hemming, commonlie called Costpenie. Beside this armie by land, there was also furnished forth a flect by sea, vnder the conduct of the lord Clinton high admirall of England, and other capteins of great experience in affaires and seruice by sea. This flect was appointed so to keepe course with the armie by land, that the one might be euer in sight of the other. Monsieur de Delle aduertised of the comming forward of this armie, durst not abide their comming; but raised his field, and retired with his armie toward Edinburgh: howbeit they were no sooner dislodged, but that a great troope of the English horsemen were got within sight of them, and coasted them all the waie as they marched for the space of feuen or eight miles, in maner to as farr as Hestelburgh, where the Frenchmen staid, and encamped in a place chosen forth to their most advantage.

The earle of Shrewesburie, and the lord Erie with the armie comming vnto Haddington, were restlesse receiued of the capteins and soldours with in: where it might appeare how valiantlie they had defended that towne during the siege, being so destitute of all things necessarie for their reliefe, and the fortifications so weak, that if the noble pprossesse of their worthy generall sir James Willford, and the incomparable manhood of the rest of the capteins and soldours had not supplied all other wants, it was thought impossible that they should haue defended the place so long a time against such forces as had bene there imploied against them. But such was the vndanted valiance of that noble crue and garrison, that euen the verie enemies themselves could not but payd high commendations to the capteins and soldours for the hardie forwardnesse and manhood, which at all times they had found and tried in them at all points of seruice, when they came to deale with them. And verelie their faime deserueth to be had in memorie for euer, not onelie for their worthy achieved exploits, done by force of hand, to the beating backe and repelling of the enemies, but also for their patient suffering of hunger, thirst, continuall watching, nakednesse, sickenesse, and all other such calamities and miseries, as want of things necessarie for the reliefe and maintenance of mans life is wont to bring, to those that are inclosed in such wise by the enimie. All which extremities they were well content to susteine, so that it might turne to the benefit and renowne of their countrie, in comparison whereof they esteemed all things else verie vile and contemptible, were the same neuer so good, as the poet saith:

Natalisque soli, pro quo bona cetera sordent.*

The noble earle of Shrewesburie could not forbear to shed teares, to vnderstand and perceiue that such worthy soldours should suffer such great distresse, whose valiant hearts could not be quailed with any afflictions. Thus with mournfull imbragings intermixed with pittifull regards they met. The earle entering the towne, furnished it with new bands of men, good store of vittells, munition, and all other things conuenient, and as then thought requiuit. Thus hauing refreshed the towne, within two daies after he passed forth towards the enemies, appointing by the aduise of that noble chiefeine the lord Erie, certaine bands of horsemen to keepe themselves close together in ambush, and to send a fet to the French campe, to trie if they might frame the Frenchmen out of their strength. And as they watched, it partlie came to passe: for diuerse of their horsemen issued forth of their campe, and professed the fairnill. The Englishmen suffered themselves to be chased, until they had got their enemies within danger of their ambush, and then whirling about, gaue them the charge, enforcing them to make their career backe, with more than an ealie gallop; so that hauing the Frenchmen thus in chase, they stue and toke diuerse, and among the prisoners were two capteins, Pierre Longue, and one Lucinet. The others that escaped, returned with this losse to their campe.

In the meane time, whilst these things were thus in doing, there came to the aid of the Frenchmen foureteene or fiftene thousand Scots, accounting herewith the Irish Scots which came with the earle of Argile. These Scots were scarce lodged, when suddenly the earle of Shrewesburie & the lord Erie came with their armie diuided into three battels of footmen, garded with two troops of horsemen, presenting themselves before the faces of their enemies in the same place, where their anant curours the daie before had shewed themselves to dayd forth the Frenchmen. Here the armie thus ranged in arraie of battell, staid about the space of an houre, looking if the enemies durst haue come forth to haue giuen battell: but when they perceiued that by no meanes the Frenchmen meant to forsake their strength, they returned backe to their campe. The English nauie being entered now into the fforth, was not idle: for comming to Bzent Island they set fire on foure ships, which they found there, and after passing by Lieth saluted them within the towne with cannon shot, and after intending to burne saint Pinets, were repelled from thence by the lord of Dune, and after returned to attend on the armie. The earle of Shrewesburie, and my lord Erie hauing executed so much as their commission would beare, and refreshed Haddington with all things needfull, departed homewards; and comming to Dunglas, began there to build a fortresse. The English Almans as the armie passed by Dunbar, burned the towne. These Almans also, and certaine bands of Englishmen, as well horsemen as footmen, were left at Dunglas, untill the fforth there begun was in some strength. The earle of Shrewesburie with the rest of the armie came backe into England. My lord Erie remaining on the borders lieutenant of the north parts, after the earle of Shrewesburie was returned home, assembled all the horsemen then lieng on the borders, and being backed with the Almane footmen, entered againe with the same horsemen into Scotland, burning and wasting in the countries of Tindall, and Liddelall, for the space of twentie miles, both house, corne, hate, and all other things that came within their reach, and after returned without encounter.

The ninth of October being tuesday, monsieur de Delle, with his Frenchmen and Almans, came in the morning long before daie to Haddington, meaning to haue wonne the towne by stealth. And verelie the enterprise was gouerned in such secret maner, that the Frenchmen had killed the English scouts, and were entered the base court, yer any alarm was raised: and hauing laine the watch, some of them ran to a place behind a church, where the Englishmen had their vittells and munitions, and some thrust vp to the towne gate, enforcing with great violence to bzeake it open, crieng with noise and shouts, Victorie, victorie, whereof in deed they accounted themselves then assured. And questionles the Englishmen being thus awakened out of their sleps on the sudden, were in some great disorder; so that manie of them came running forth without either armour or apparell, their shirts excepted; & others ran they wist not well whither, nor where to take heed. But yet as the Frenchmen were thronged together at the gate to bzeake it open, a Frenchman (as the it

The Englishmen herewith passed through a priuie posterne into the base court, and comming vpon them with their halberds, and blacke bills, slue of them great plentie, and above the rest that escaped ouer the wall in such hast, that happie was he that could tumble ouer first. Monsieur de Delle yet gathering them together againe, gaue that morning three sharpe assaults to the towne, but was repelled with great losse, for they caried awaie with them fiftene carts and wagons laden with hurt persons and dead carcasses, besides three hundred that were found in the base court, which they could not come to, after they were beaten out, to take awaie with them. And thus was monsieur de Delle constrained to retorne, repenting himselfe of that his bold attempted enterprise, hauing lost no small number of his Frenchmen and Almans, being slaine in the place. In this meane time, the kings maiestie summoned his high court of parliament, to be holden vpon prorogation at Westminster the fourth of Nouember, where it continued till the fourteenth of March next ensuing.

Dundee spoiled.

In the meane time, the proceedings for the Scottish wars was not forgotten, wher vpon in the deepe of the winter, there were conuied certeine bands of the English lancequenets, and some number of Englishmen, both horsemen and footmen by sea vnto Broughtierag; and passing from thence vnto Dundee, a twa miles from thence, entred the towne, and began to fortifie it; but shortly after by the comming of the French armie with monsieur de Delle, they left it, first spoiling the houses, and after set them on fire at their departure. The Reinsgrau coronell of the Almans, and monsieur de Etanges, being sent by monsieur de Delle before, entred Dundee, and lodged within it. Within two daies after their comming thither, they toke certeine of their bandes, and going forth did vield and surueie the new fort, which the Englishmen had begun to make on the hill, a small distance from the castell. But the Englishmen and their Almans issuing forth against them, were at their elboutes yer they were halfe well aduised that they were got to neare them, whereby being driuen hastily to retire, they hardlie escaped out of danger, being so hotlie pursued, that if the Reinsgrau had not helued his approued ballancie, guided with no lesse policie than manhood, the whole troupe had bene (as was thought) bitterlie distressed.

The Reinsgrau constrained to retire.

In Christmasse this yere the castell of Dunne was recovered out of the Englishmens hands, through treason of certeine assured Scots, that vsing to bring bittels to the Englishmen that kept it, had marked all the manner of the scouts and watches, with the places of the wall where the cline was most easie. Wher vpon in the night season, certeine of the Scots secretly comming into the ditches, got vp to the heighth of the wals, and entring the place, slue and toke vpon the sudden all that were within it. The fiftenth of Januarie, sir Thomas Seimer baron of Sudleie, lord admerall, and brother to the duke of Sommerfet lord protector, was arrested and sent to the tower, and after by authoritie of parliament he was attainted, and the twentieth of March next ensuing, in the third yere of this kings reigne beheaded at tower hill. Wherouer in this parlement, the use of the masse was clealie prohibited, and a booke for the vniuersitie of diuine seruice, and right administration of the sacraments, was set forth and established.

As haue heard how the Frenchmen fortified the towne of Dundee, where monsieur de Etanges, with his companie of horsemen lieng in garrison chanced in a skirmish to be taken by the Englishmen that late in Broughtierag, to the great relieving of them that toke him, and no lesse greefe of the French and Scots, for the tried ballancie that was thoroughlie knowne to rest in him. Wherouer, the Englishmen that kept the towne of Waddington all this while against the enimies, could not come by anye bittels, but onelie by a conuioie of some conuent, ent powder to gard the cariages that brought the same from the borders. And as it fortunied at one time when the conuioie came and passed by Dunbar, a skirmish was proffered by the French which late within that castell in garrison. And as sir James Wilford that was there amongst other vpon this occasion (according to his wonted ballancie) shewed himselfe verie forward and egre against the enimie, he was inclosed by an ambush, which the Frenchmen had laid on ech side the street within the towne, that he could by no means escape out of their hands, but hauing his horse there slaine vnder him, was taken prisoner euen by a Cascoigne of the countrie of Balque named Pellicque, that toone no small commendation for that his god hap, in taking such a prisoner, whose name for his often approued prowesse was verie famous euen among the enimies, who saw well inough a resolutenesse in the man rather by perillous aduentures to purchase the perpetuitie of renowne, than by defect of courage or negligent seruice to lose both life and fame. Which persuasion should enter into the hart of euerie seruitor in the field, if they will be counted right ballant in deed, considering that he which in his life time doth performe nothing worthe memorie, is like a plaier entring vpon the stage, but shewing nothing either in speech or in action, as the poet verie fittlie saith:

Ediderint, obscuri homines migrare videntur Hinc, ut qui structa nil dixerit his troia sena.*

Some haue written that he was taken through default of those that were appointed to follow him, sith he undertooke to charge the enimie, in hope that by them he should haue bene assisted. But suchie those that had the charge of this conuioie, doubting by aduenturing too far, to put all in hazard, thought it wisdome rather to suffer the losse of one, than to ieopard the whole; not perceiuing which waie to remedie the matter at that present. Now after that the generall of Waddington was thus taken prisoner, to the great greefe vndoubtedlie, not onelie of all the garrison there, but also of all such as tendered the aduancement of the kings maiesties seruice, sir James Crosse was thought a man most meet to supplie the place, and therefore by the lord protector and others of the councill was ordeined generall of that towne of Waddington, and the garrison there, in which roome he bare himselfe so worthilie, as if he should not be suspected of Batterie, for that he liueth yet, and in such credit (as the world knoweth) might moue my selfe matter to saie rather much than sufficientlie inough in his due and right deserved commendation.

The king by the aduise of his counsell meaning to prosecute the wars in Scotland, with great forces retained a new power of lancequenets, and other strangers, vnder the conduct of diuers sundrie capitaines: but in the meane time the French king meaning ning to breake with the king of England, thought to have stolen the fortreffe of Bullognberg, so that a chosen power of men of warre, to the number of seven thousand, vnder the conduct of monsieur de Chatillon, being sent downe about that exploit on Gaie daie at night, came forward with their ladders, and all other furniture meet for the purpose, approaching about the houre of midnight nere to the fort, with in the which were not at that time manie about three hundred and fiftie soldiers, vnder the gouernement of sir Nicholas Arnalt knight generall of that pace, a capteine of great courage, and no lesse diligence in his charge.

And as it chanced, there were among the Frenchmen three or foure Englishmen, which hauing matched themselves in marriage with women of that countrie, after the peace was concluded betwixt France and England, were discharged out of the king of Englands wages; and remaining with their wiues, got interteinement among the Frenchmen, and were with monsieur de Chatillon, now comming towards this enterpryse. Whereupon one of the same Englishmen named Carter, that had a foretelling giuen intelligence to the said sir Nicholas of the Frenchmens doings, so farre as he might learne and vnderstand the same, would gladlie haue aduertised sir Nicholas Arnalt of the Frenchmens purpose at this time: but monsieur de Chatillon kept the matter so secret, that Carter nor any of the other Englishmen had knowledge thereof, till they were now marching forward, so that Carter could not get awaie from them, till they were approached within lesse than a quarter of a mile of Bullognberg, and then slipping aside from among them, came running so fast as he might towards the fort, crying; Wolves, wolves, as lowd as his voice would serue, & so gaue the alarm to them within the fort.

One of the soldiers called Morgaine Deaton, that chanced to be there at hand in scout with three or foure other, straight knew him, and brought him to the draw-bridge, where sir Nicholas Arnalt caused him to be drawen by betwixt two pikes, vnto whome he declared how the Frenchmen were at hand, meaning to assaile his fort now vpon the sudden, in hope so to surpise it. Herewith, it needed not to will sir Nicholas to bestirre him, to cause euerie man to make readie, and place themselves as was thought most expedient. And vndoubtedlie the noble courage of that worthy gentleman, furthered much, to cause euerie capteine and soldier vnder him, to put awaie all feare, and to haue a regard to do his dutie, for the receiuing of the enemies; so as they seemed glad of the occasion, whereby they might shew proofe of their accustomed manhood against the enemy, that thus came to scale on them without warning, in purpose to kill euerie man that fell into their hands, if their intention had taken place, making now such hast forward, that before the Englishmen could be well readie with their armour and weapons in their appointed places, the Frenchmen were got to the ditch, and appointing three thousand of their numbers, the most part gentlemen and double payes, with targets, battell ares, and pistols, to haue the first scale, saluted them within vpon their verie approach, with seven hundred harquebuts shot at the first volée.

The Englishmen by order giuen by sir Nicholas, kept themselves close, till the Frenchmen by their scaling ladders, which they brought with them, and had quicklie raised against the walles, began to mount by, and enter vpon them; at which instant, off went the flankers. Those of sir Nicholas Arnalts mons discharged verie well at the first, but at the second volée the morters burst. Albeit there were two brasse peeces that were planted aloft on the same mont, of the which the one discharged five & twentie shot by the maister, and the other seven and twentie by his maistie. Sir Nicholas Arnalt here being accompanied with his capteins and soldiers about him, stood at defence so stoutlie as was possible, doing so balliantlie, that their fame deserueth to liue for euer. There were burst vpon the faces of the enemies (ouer and beside the shot that was bestowed among them) to the number of fiftene hundred pikes and blacke bills. The Frenchmen verelie stucke to it to the uttermost, and did what laie in the verie last point of their powers to enter vpon the Englishmen, supplying still the places of their dead and wearie men with fresh succors.

Carter that came to bring word of their coming, with a pike in his hand, stood at the place of the bulworne where they thus gaue the assault, & fought right balliantlie, giuing manie wounds, and receiuing some againe: for he was hurt both in the thigh and arme, who suerlie of a privat soldier (if he were privat and ordinarie) seemed verie seruicable at all assaies, considering into what desperat adventures and hazards he did as it were cast himselfe, esteeming lesse the losse of life and lim, than the reproch and dishonour of his countrie, the glorie & renoume wherof (about all worlde things which are but temporary) all men are naturallie bound with might & maine both to seeke and saue; as one verie well saith:

Sir Nicholas Arnalt himselfe was hurt with a pike in the nose. Capteine Warren standing on the same bulworne with sir Nicholas, receiued two shots in his coscelet, and one of them drove two or three links of his chaine into his necke. Capteine Broughton had there fiftene of his armed men, & uerie of them hauing their coscelets perced through. The number of the Englishmen that were slaine, was reckoned to be five and twentie, and hurt eight and fiftie. Of Frenchmen there were slaine a great number, beside those that were hurt, and at length through shot, casting downe of stones and timber vpon their heads, scalding water and handblowes they were repelled, retiring out of the trenches shortlie after the breake of the daie, hauing continued the assault from midnight till that time, still renewing their forces, in hope to achieve their wished prize: but being thus beaten off, they gathered together their dead men, and lading fiftene waggons with their carcasses, they returned backe, without making anie further attempt at that time.

And so by the high balliance of sir Nicholas Arnalt, and the other capteins that serued in that fort vnder him, and chieflie by the assistance of almighty God, the giuer of all victories, the enemies were repelled, to their great dishonour, and the peece referred to the immortall renoume of the defendants. Within a daie or two after, the generall of the Frenchmen sent to know of prisoners taken; but sir Nicholas Arnalt answered the messenger, that he knew of no warre: and therefore if anie had attempted to make a surpise of his peece by stealth, they were serued accordingly to their malicious meanings. Indeed (said he) we haue taken none of your men, but we haue got some of your braue guilt armour & weapons. Well (said the messenger) it is not the cowle that maketh the monk, and no more is it the braue armour or weapon that maketh the man of warre: but the fortune of warre is such, sometime to gaine, and sometime to lose. Sir Nicholas receiuing him into the fort, made him good chere, and gaue him fiftie crownes in reward, and so he departed.

But concerning the liberaltie of sir Nicholas, I might here speake further thereof, how bountifullie

he rewarded the souldiers for their great manhood shewed at that time, in defending so sharpe an assault, to their great honour and no lesse confusion of the aduersaries. The daie after the said assault, there came to Bullognberg from Gines, a supplie of three or foure hundred men, vnder the leading of sir William Cobham, now lord Cobham and others. Within a while after, sir Nicholas Arnalt sent forth three hundred footmen, and fise and twentie horsemen, conducted by the said sir William Cobham, capteine Putton of the Old man, & capteine Hore of Bullognberg, with certeine cariages, to go by to a wood not farre off, called the North wood, to fetch fagots and brush, to repaire and mainteine the rampires.

These capteins with their bands being passed forward, about two miles in distance from the fort, met with certeine of their scouts that were sent forth that morning, who told them that they had discovered the tract of a great number of horsemen. Whereupon the Englishmen now being almost come to the wood side, retired with all speed: and herewith the French horsemen brake out of the wood, and following them, fell in skirmish with them. The Englishmen casting themselves in a ring, kept them off with their pikes, wherewith they impaled themselves, and hauing their small troope lined with shot, they also galled the Frenchmen right fore therewith, as they still approached them. Neuertheless, those horsemen gaue three maine onsets vpon the Englishmen, with the number of a thousand horse at two of the first onsets, and the third they gaue with all their whole power, being esteemed a fiftene hundred horsemen in all.

defiance of the

duct of their noble capteins

But such was the valiant prowesse of the English souldiers, encouraged with the comfortable presence of sir William Cobham, and other their capteins, that conducted them in such order as stood most for their safeguard, exhorting them with such effectual words as serued best to purpose, that the enimie to conclude was repelled with losse of seuentie of their great horses that laie dead there in the field, within the space of halfe a mile. There were also foure thousand French footmen that came forward, but could not reach, and so marching about the fort, returned in vaine, after they once perceived that the Englishmen were safely retired within their fort. The counsell thus perceiuing the French kings purpose, which he had conceived to worke some notable damage to this realme, as well in support of his friends in Scotland, as in hope to recouer those peeces which the English held at Bullongne, and in those marches, doubted also of some inuasion meant by him to be attempted into this realme, because of such great preparation as he had made, for leuieng of his forces both by sea and land.

The preparation for warre
as well in England as France.

The counsell therefore made likewise provision to be readie to resist all such attempts, as anie waie forth might be made, to the annoiance of the realme. But as things fell out, the same stood in good stead, not against the forren enimie, but against a number of rebellious subiects at home, the which forgetting their dutie and allegiance, did as much as in them laie (what founer their pretense was) to bring this noble realme and their naturall countrie vnto destruction. But first, for that it maie appeare, that the duke of Summerfet then protector, and other of the counsell, did not without good ground and cause mainteine the warres against the Scots, I haue thought good to set downe an epistle exhortatorie, as we find the same in the great chronicle of Richard Grafton, sent from the said protector and counsell vnto the Scots, to moue them to haue consideration of themselves, and of the estate of their countrie, by ioining in that friendlie bond and vnitie with England, as had bene of the kings part and his fathers continuallie sought, for the benefit of both realmes, the copie of which exhortation here insueth.

Edward by the grace of God, duke of Summerfet, earle of Hertford, vicount Beauchampe, lord Seimier, vncle to the kings highnesse of England, gouernor of his most roiall person, and protector of all his realmes, dominions, & subiects, lieutenant generall of all his maiesties armies, both by land and sea, treasurer and earle marshall of England, gouernor of the Iles of Gernefeie and Ierfeie, and knight of the most noble order of the garter, with others of the counsell of the said most high and noble prince Edward, by the grace of God of England, France, and Ireland king, defender of the faith, and in earth vnder Christ the supreme head of the churches of England and Ireland. To the nobilitie and counsellors, gentlemen and commons, and all other the inhabitants of the realme of Scotland, greeting and peace.

The lord
Cobham with a new supplie of soldiers.

Considering with our selues the present state of things, and wrieng more deepe, like the maner and tearmes wherewith you and we do stand, it maketh vs to marvel, what euill & fatall chance both so disceit your hearts, and maketh them so blind and vnmindfull of your profit, and so still conciliate and heape to your selues most extreame mischiefs, the which we thomepe will needs haue your enimies, go about to take awaie from you, and perpetuallie to ease you therof. And also by all reason & order of necessitie, it should be rather more conuenient for you to seeke and requite moderate agreements of vs, whome God hath hitherto according to our most iust, true, and godlie meanings and intents, prospered and set forward, with your affliction and miserie, than that we being superiours in the field, maisters of a great part of your realme, should seeke vpon you yet to the intent that our charitable minds and brotherlie loue should not cease, by all meanes possible to prouoke and call you to your owne commoditie and profit, even as the father to the son, or the elder brother to the younger; and as the louing physician would doe to the mistrustfull and ignorant patient: we are content to call and crie vpon you to looke on your estate, to auoid the great calamitie that your countrie is in, to haue vs rather brothers than enimies, and rather countrimen than conquerors. And if your gouernors or capteins shall retaine and keepe from you this our exhortation, as heretofore they haue done our proclamation, tending to the like effect, for their owne priuat wealth & commoditie, not regarding though you be still in miserie, so they haue profit and gouernance ouer you, and shall still abuse you with feined and forged tales: yet this shall be a witness before God, and all christian people, betwene you and vs, that we professing the gospel of Iesus Christ, according to the doctrine thereof, do not cease to call and prouoke you from the effusion of your owne blood, from the destruction of the realme of Scotland, from perpetuall enimitie and hatred, from the small destruction of your nation, and from seruitude to forren nations, to libertie, to amitie, to equalitie with vs, to that which your writers haue alwaies wished might once come to passe.

England, the Scottish kings some taken prisoners, some slain in battell, some for verie sorrow and discomfort upon losse, dieng and departing the world: and shall perceiue againe, that all nations in the world, that nation onelie beside England, speaketh the same language: and as you and we be annered and ioined in one Island, so no people are so like in maners, forme, language, and all conditions as we are: shall not be thinke it a thing verie vnmet, vn- naturall, and vnchristian, that there should be betwixt vs so mortall war, who in respect of all other nations, be and should be like as two brethren of one Island of great Britaine? And though he were a stranger to both, what should he thinke more meet, than if it were possible one kingdome to be made in rule, which is one in language, and to be diuided in rulers, which is all one in countrie?

And for so much as two successors cannot con- curre and fall into one, by no other maner of meanes than by marriage, whereby one blood, one lineage, one parentage is made of two, and an indefensible right giuen of both to one, without the destruction and abo- lishing of either. If God should grant that whatso- ever you would wish, other than that which now not by fortune hath chanced, but by his infinit mercie and most inscrutable prouidence, as carefull for you he hath giuen vnto you. The which thing that you should also thinke to come of his disposition, and not by blind fortune, how unlike hath it bene, and how suddenlie hath it turned, that the power of God might be shewed: your last king being a prince of much excellencie and young, whom you know after a promise broken contrarie to his honor, & misfortune by Gods iust iudgement following vpon it, God ei- ther by sorrow or by some meanes otherwise at his inscrutable pleasure, did take awaye from you, had three children, did not almightie God (as it were) to shew his will and pleasure to be, that the long conti- nued warre and enimitie of both the nations should be taken awaye, and knit in perpetuall loue and amitie, take the two men-children of those babes being distant the one from the other, and in diuerse places, both as it were at one time, and within the space of foure and twentie houres, leauing but one maiden- child and pynesse?

When the most wise and victorious prince late our king and maister, king Henrie the eight, in o- ther of his marriages not most fortunate, had by his most lawfull and most vertuous wife, quene Jane, his other two wiues before that marriage departed this world, and neuer surmise nor question made of that marriage, since that time to this date, nor so much as all his life time, name or motion to or of a- nie other wife, one prince of so high expectation, of so great gifts of God, the right and vndoubted heire of the realme of England and his maiestie onelie of male issue left behind him to succedd the imperiall crowne. If nothing else had bene done, what can anie wise or anie christian man that thinketh the world to be gouerned by Gods prou- dence and not by fortune, thinke otherwise, but that it was Gods pleasure it should be so, that these two realmes should ioine in marriage, and by a godlie sa- crament, make a godlie, perpetuall and most friend- lie vnitie & concord, whereby such benefits as of vni- tie and concord cometh, may through his infinit grace come vnto these realmes. If anie man of you or of anie nation doubteth hereof, except you looked for miracles to be done herein, and yet if ye marke all the possibilities of the natures of the two princes, the children already had, the doubtfull chance, least each of them should haue a sonne, or both daughters, or not of meet ages, with other cir- cumstances both of the partie of this realme of England, and that of Scotland, which hath not chan- ced in eight hundred yeares, it must needs be rec- koned a great maruell and a miracle.

But let it be no miracle, seeing that God doth not now speake in oracles, as amongst the Iewes he did: and present prophesies now aduaies be but ei- ther not certeine, or else not plaine: what more cer- teine can be had of Gods will in this case, than the before rehearsed doth bring? But if God himselte should speake, what could he speake more, than he speaketh in these? Call you them prouidences or chances, if you be still afflicted and punished? Haie he not said: I of mine infinite mercie and loue to your nation, had prouided a right heire and a prince to the one, and a right heire and pynesse to the o- ther, to be ioined in my holie lawes, and by the lawe of nature and the world to haue made an vni- tie, concord and peace, in the which I see of both the realmes you refused it; you loued better dissention than vnitie, discord than agreement, warre than peace, hatred than loue and charitie. If you do then therefore smart for it, whome can you blame but your owne election?

But because some of those, who make therevnto impediments, cannot but confesse, that there ap- peareth Gods prouidence herein, and oportunitie and occasion giuen to vnitie of both the realmes, yet may hereafter say, and heretofore haue said, that the fault herein is, that we seeke not equalitie, nor the marriage, but a conquest: we would not be friends but the lords. Although our proclamation at the last warres doth inough declare the contra- rie, yet here we protest and declare vnto you and all christian people, to be the kings maiesties mind our maisters, by our aduise and counsell not to con- quer, but to haue in amitie; not to win by force, but to conciliate by loue; not to spoile and kill, but to saue and keepe; not to disseuer and diuorfe, but to ioine in marriage, from high to low both the realmes, to make of one Isle one realme, in loue, amitie, concord, peace and charitie, which if you refuse, and vnto vs to conquer, who is guiltie of the bloodshed? Who is the occasion of the warre? Who maketh the battels, the burning of houses, and the deuasta- tion which shall follow?

Can it be denied but that we haue the great scale of Scotland granted by the parlement of Scotland, for the marriage which should be made, with assuran- ces and pledges, untill the performance? And thus in the time that the late king of most famous me- morie our soveraigne lord king Henrie the eight did reigne, and in the time of the same your gouer- nour, who now is the earle of Arrane, who then be- ing a chiefe doer and laborer therein, for the high and inestimable benefit of that realme, so soon as he was by the late cardinall of saint Andrews and o- thers, with certeine vaine feares and hopes & gre- dinesse of dignitie peruerter, reuoluted from his first agreement, and put all the realme to the losse of such holds and fortresses as are now taken from you, and to the losse of a foughten field, for the which we are sorie, if other wise peace might haue bin conclu- ded, for his owne priuat lucre and retchlesnesse of that noble realme. And what end can you loke for of these manner of proceedings, but such successe as heretofore hath bene experiented & assayed? We offer loue, we offer equalitie and amitie, we over- come in warre, and offer peace: we win holds, and offer no conquest: we get in your land, and offer England.

What can be more offered and more proffered, than intercourse of merchandizes, and interchanges of marriages, the abolishing of all such our lawes, as prohibitheth the same, or might be impediment to the the mutuall amitie. We haue offered not onlie to leaue the authoritie, name, title, right or challenge of conquerour, but to receiue that which is the shame of men cuerconquered, to leaue the name of the nation, and the glorie of anie victorie (if anie we haue had, or should haue of you) and to take the indifferent old name of Britains againe, because nothing should be left on our part to be offered, nothing on your part vnrefused, whereby ye might be inexcusable. And all the world might testifie all other meanes, not being able to do anie thing, after manie other waies and remedies attempted, battell of vs to be taken as an extreame refuge, to attaine right and reason among christian men: if anie man may rightfullie make battell for his espouse and wife. The daughter of Scotland was by the great seale of Scotland promised to the sonne & heire of England.

If it be lawfull by Gods lawe to fight in a good quarrell, and for to make peace, this is to make an end of all warres, and to conclude an eternall and perpetuall peace; which to confirme, we shall fight, and you to breake, is it not easie to discern who hath the better part: God and the sword hath already, and shall hereafter (if there be no remedie) trie it. Who so willet the marriage to go forward; who so mindeth the peace and tranquillitie of both the realmes; who willet no conquest to be had, but amitie and loue to go forward, we refuse no man: let him bring his name and his pledge of good seruice in this quarrell, he shall not onlie be receiued to the amitie; but shall haue sufficient defense against the aduersaries, and recompense of his lining, if he susteine anie losse. We neither do nor intend to put anie man from his lands, tares, or offices, vnlesse he will needs resist, and so compell vs thereunto.

What face hath this of conquest? We intend not to disherit your quene, but to make hir heires inheritors also to England. What greater honour can ye seeke vnto your quene, than the marriage offered: What more meeter marriage than this with the kings highnes of England? What more sure defense in the nonage of your quene for the realme of Scotland, than to haue England your patrone and garison? We seeke not to take from you your lawes nor customes; but we seeke to redresse your oppressions, which of diuerse ye do susteine. In the realme of England, diuerse lawes and customes be according to the ancient vsage thereof. And likewise, France, Normandie, and Gascoigne haue sundrie kind of orders. Haue all the realmes and dominions that the emperor now hath, one custome and one sort of lawes: These daime feares and fantasies of expulsion of your nation, of changing the lawes, of making a conquest, be driuen into your heads, of those, who in deed had rather you were all conquered, spoiled, and slaine, than they would lose anie point of their will, of their desire of rule, of their estimation, which they know in quietnesse would be scene what it were, as it were in a calme water.

Now in this tumult of disorder, when the realme is tossed by and downe with waues and surges of battell, famine, and other mischiefs which the warre bringeth, they thinke they cannot be espied; but loke on them you that haue wit and prudence, and consider the state of your quene and realme, you will not keepe hir sole and unmarried, the which were to you great dishonour. If you married hir within the realme, that cannot extinguish the title which we haue to the crowne of Scotland. And what dissention, enuie, grudge, and malice that shall breed among you, is easie to perceiue. You will marrie hir out of the realme, our title remaineth, you be subiects to a foreign prince of another countrie, and of another language, and vs ye haue your enemies, even at your elbow, your successors farre off from you: and be we not in the bowels now of the realme? Haue we not a great part thereof, either in subiection or in amitie and loue? Who shall come into your realme, but he shall be met with, and fought with, if neede be, even of your owne nation, who be faithfull and true to the realme of England in the waie of this most goodlie vniion by marriage.

And if anie foreign power, prince, or potentate, or whosoener be your aduer to nourish still discord, send you an armie also; how shall they oppresse you, fill your houses, waste your grounds, spend and consume your vittells, hold you in subiection, & regard you as slaves, which without them could not liue, & will take your quene to bestow as they lust, & speciallie if their ruler or king (as perchance he may be) in other warres be other wise occupied, to be a prey to vs, & a true conquest, then it should be too late to saie; We will haue a marriage and no conquest, We will with peace & amitie, We are wearie of battell and miserie. The stubborne ouerconquered must suffer the victors pleasure, and pertinacitie will make the victorie more insolent, whereof you your selfe haue giuen the cause, if they send monie and captiues, but no souldiers. First if they be captiues, who ruleth and whodoth obeie? Who shall haue the honor of the enterpryse, and if it be well archiued? But whether it be well archiued or no, which number is that which shall be slaine? Whose blood shall be shed? Their monie peraduenture shall be consumed, & their commandements obeyed. But whose bodies shall smart for it? Whose lands shall be wasted? Whose houses burned? What realme made desolate? Remember what it is to haue a foreign power within you, a strong power of your enemies vpon you, you (as it were) the campe & plaine betwixt them to fight on, & to be troden vpon, both of the victor, and of the ouerconquered. And imagine you see before your eyes your wiues & daughters in danger of wantonnesse & insolencie of the soldiors, the proud looks of the captiues & soldiors, whom you call to helpe you, the contempt you shall bring your nation in, then take heed least indeed that follow which you feare, that is, that you shall be by them conquered, that ye shall be by them put from your holds, lands, tares & offices, that your lawes by them shall be altered, that your nation shall be by them destroyed. Consider in this realme, did not the Britons call in the Saxons for helpe, & by them were put out: Where be the Britons, once a great nation betwixt you and vs? How did the nation of France put out the Galles out of all France: How got the Turk first all Grecia, & now of late all Hungarie, but being called in for to aid & helpe? And did not the Goths by like meanes get all Italie, and the Lombards one part thereof now called Lombardie? What looke you for more? Reddie soldiors, & hauing their weapons in their hands, and knowing that you cannot liue without them, what will not they command you to do? What will they not inuade vpon you? What will they not thinke they may doe? And what will they thinke that you dare doe? This foreign helpe is your confusion, that succour is your detriment, the victorie so had is your scruttade: what is then to be thought of losse taken with them? The strangers and foreign soldiors shall oppresse you with in, our power and strength without; and of your owne nation, so manie as loue quietnesse, goodlines, and wealth of your realme, shall helpe also to scourge and afflict you. Is it not better to compose and acquiesce all this calamitie and trouble by marriage, to end all sorowes and battels by such and so honorable a peace? Hath not the emperor Spaine & Burgundie by title of marriage? How holdeth the French king Britaine now latelie annexed to that crowne, but but by title of marriage? How have all the great princes of the world happily and with quiet made of two kingdoms one, of diverse lordships one, of nations alwaies at warre with themselves, or else in doubtfull peace, one well governed kingdom, rule, and dominion, but by that gospie, most quiet, and most amiable composition of marriage? Two meanes there be of making one rule, whereto title is pretended, and perfect agreement betwixt two nations, either by force or superiortie, which is conquest; or by equalitie and love, which is by parentage & ma-riage: you hate the one, that is, conquest; and by refusing the other, you infuse upon you hatred & malice.

You will not have peace, you will not have ali-ance, you will not have concord; and conquest commeth upon you whether you will or no. And yet if all things were considered, we feare it will appeare that it were better for you to be conquered of us, than succoured of strangers, lesse losse to your goods, lesse hurt to your lands, lesse dishonour to your realme; this nation which is one in tongue, one in countrie and birth, having so little diversitie to occupie the whole, than other powers come in to you, neither like in language, nor yet like in behavio: who should rule over you, and take you to be but their slaves. But we effrons and finally declare and profess unto you, that although for the better furtherance of this god-lie purpose of uniting the realmes, and for the sure defense of them which favour the marriage, we are compelled for the time to keepe holds, and to make fortifications in your realme: yet the kings maiesties mind and determinat pleasure is, with our advice and counsell to be as before is declared, that where favour may be shewed, not to use rigour, if by conditions you will receive this amitie offered, not to follow conquest: for we desire love, unitie, concord, peace and equalitie. Let neither your go-verners nor your hirkemen, nor those, who so often have falsified their faith and promise, and by treache-rie and falshood be accustomed to prologe the time, sed you forth with false words, and bring you into the snare from whence they cannot deliver you. They will peradventure provide for themselves with pensions in some other realme, and set soldiers strangers in your holds to keepe you in subjection, under the pretense to defend them against us. But who proudest pensions for you? How are you defended when they are fled away? Who conquereth you when the strange captives have your holds, when your land is wasted, and the realme destroyed, and the more part kept from you? Who will let by the marriage of the quene to give a title with the war of England, to marrie the name, an other rightie king holding the land? If we two being made one by amitie, be most able to defend us against all nations, and having the sea for wall, the muttall love for garrison, & God for defense, should make so noble and well agreeing monarchie, that neither in peace we may be ashamed, nor in war afraid of anie worldlie or foren power: whie should not you be as desirous of the same, and have as much cause to rejoice at it as we? If this honor of so noble a monarchie do not move you to take and accept amitie, let the griefe and the danger of the aforenamed losses feare you to attempt that thing which shall displease God, increase warre, danger your realme, destroy your land, undo your children, wast your grounds, desolate your countries, and bring all Scotland either to famine & miserie, or to subjection and servitude of an other nation. We require but your promised quene, your offered agreement of unitie, the joining of both the nations, which God of his infinite clemencie and tender love that he hath declared to beare to both the nations, hath offer-red unto us both, and in manner called us both unto it, whose calling and piouscation we have, and will follow to the best of our powers, and in his name, and with his aid, admonition, exhortation, requests, and ambassages, not being able to do it, and to find stabilitie in promises, we shall not willing, but com-strained pursue the battell, chastise the wicked & malicious by the angrie angels of God, fire and sword.

Wherefore we require and exhort you all, who have love to the countrie, pitie of that realme, a true hart to your quene and mistress, regard of your honors and promises made by the great scale of Scotland, and who favour the peace, love, unitie, and concord, and that most profitable marriage to enter and come to us, and declaring your true and god-lie harts therunto, to aid us in this most godlie purpose and enterprise. To be witness of our dowings we refuse no man, temporall nor spirituall, lord ne lady, gentleman nor other, who will aid this our purpose, and minish the occasion of slaughter and destruction, to whom we shall keepe the promises heretofore declared, and further see reward and recompense made according to the desert.
And for a more sure proofe and plainer token of the good mind and will which we beare unto you, that which neuer yet was granted to Scotland in anie league, truce, or peace betwixt England and Scotland, because yet shall have proofe of the beginning of love and amitie of both the realmes: the kings highnes considering the multitude of them which are come to his maiesties devotion, and of them that be well-willers and aiders of this godlie enterprise, hath by our advice and counsell granted, and by these presents doth grant, that from henceforth all manner of merchants and other Scottishmen, who will enter their names with one of the wardens of the marches, & there profess to take part with us in this before named godly purpose, to his owne commoditie, & to serve all such as be of the same agreement, may lawfullie and without anie trouble and beration enter into anie port, creeke, or haven of England, and there use their traffike of merchandize, buye and sell, bring in the commodities of Scotland, and take and carrie forth the commodities of England, as liberallie and as fralle, and with the same and none other custome or payments therefore, than Englishmen and the kings subiects do at this present: min-ding further upon the successe hereof to gratifie so the furtherers of this most godlie enterprise and union, that all the world may be witness of the great zeale and love which his highnes doth beare toward you and your nation. And all this the kings high-nesse, by our advice and counsell, hath willed to be declared unto you; and given in commandement unto us, and all his lieutenants, wardens, rulers, and other head officers, ministers, and subiects, to see executed and done, according to the true purport, effect, and meaning thereof. Fare you well.

Although this admonition and wholesome exhortation might have moved the Scots to have regarded their owne state, yet it little availed, as by the sequels it appeared. For having both great promises made by the French, and now considering therewith the hurle burlles and tumults that sprung up in England, they continued in their obstinat purposes, not to yeeld unto such reasonable motions as had bene offered, if they would have shewed themselves conformable thereto, and not have so stubbornlie denied to submit themselves to that which of right they were bound unto. So that herein they shewed themselves verie peruerse and willfull, rejecting not one lie the good advice that the duke gave them, but also not so much as once thinking what might insue to their great mischance upon their refusal, and what be-

A proclamation for the laying open of inclosures.

But now to let the Scots alone for a time, we will returne to the rebellion which followed in this yære, to the whole disappointing of the plot laid by the councell, for the present subduing of the Scots, as it was verie like that it should haue so come to passe, if none other let had come. So it was, that the kings maiestie, by the aduise of his vncke the lord protector, and other of the councell, thought good to let forth a proclamation against inclosures, and taking in of fields and commons that were accustomed to lie open, for the behoofe of the inhabitants dwelling nere to the same, who had greivously complained of gentlemen and others for taking from them the vse of those fields and commons, and had inclosed them into parks and severall pastures for their priuat commodities and pleasures, to the great hinderance and vndoing of manie a poore man.

The meaning of the forscard proclamation.

This proclamation tending to the benefit and relæse of the poore, appointed that such as had inclosed those commons, should vpon a paine by a daie assigned late them open againe. But how well sweuer the letters forth of this proclamation meant, thinking thereby perabundance to appeale the grudge of the people that found themselves grieued with such inclosures; yet verelie it turned not to the wished effect, but rather ministred occasion of a foule and dangerous disorder. For whereas there were few that obeyed the commandement, the vbadvised people presuming vpon their proclamation, thinking they should be bozne out by them that had set it forth rashlie without order, toke vpon them to redresse the matter: and assembling themselves in vniuersall wise, chose to them capteins and leaders, brake open the inclosures, cast downe ditches, killed by the deare which they found in parkes, spoiled and made hauocke, after the manner of an open rebellion. First they began to plaie these parts in Summersetshire, Buckinghamshire, Northamptonshire, Kent, Essex, and Lincolneshire.

In Summersetshire they brake by certeine parks of sir William Herbert, and the lord Sturton: but sir William Herbert assembling a powler together by the kings commission, due and executed manie of those rebellious people. In other places also, by the good diligence and policie vsed by the councell, the rebels were appeased and quieted. But shortly after, the commons of Devonshire and Cornwell rose by waie of rebellion, demanding not onelie to haue inclosures laied open, and parkes disparted: but also thorough the instigation and pricking forward of certeine popish priests, ceased not by all sinister and subtil meanes, first vnder Gods name & the kings, and vnder the colour of religion, to persuaide the people to assemble in routs, to chose capteins to guide them, and finally to burst out into open rebellion. Their chiefe capteins were these, Humfrie Arundell esquier, gouernour of the Mount, James Kofogan, John Kofogan, John Daine, Thomas Amberhill, John Soleman, and William Segar. Moreover, of priests which were principall stirrers, and some of them chiefe gouernors of the camps, and after executed, there were to the number of eight, whose names we find to be as folloze: Robert Wocham, John Thompson, Roger Barret, John Wolcocke, William Alfa, James Pourton, John Barrow, Richard Benet, besides a multitude of other priests which ioined with them.

The whole companies of these rebels amounted little lesse than to the number of ten thousand stout and valiant personages, able indeed (if their cause had bene good and favoured of the Lord and giuer of victories) to haue wrought great feats. But being (as they were) ranke and malicious traitors, the almightie God confounded their deuises, and brought them to their deserued confusion. A strange case, that those mischeuous and wicked traitors could not be warned by the emill successe of their diuclish attempted outrage, in the yære last past: at that time certeine seditious persons in Cornwell fell vpon one of the kings commissioners named master Boole, sent thither with others for the reformation of matters in religion, in like manner as other were sent at the same time into other shires of the realme, for the which murder a priest being apprehended, arraigned, and condemned, was byatone into Smithfield, and there hanged and quartered the seauenth daie of Iulie, in the said last yære before mentioned, to wit, 1548. Other of his complices and associates were executed and put to death in diuerse other parts of the realme.

But now touching these other that rose in this present summer. At the first they were in great hope that the other disordered persons, which stirred in other parts of the realme, would haue ioined with them, by force to haue disappointed and vndone that which the prince by law and act of parlement, in reformation of religion, had ordeined and established. But afterwards perceiving how in most places such mischeuous mutinies and diuclish attempts, as the commons had begun, partlie by force and partlie by policie were appeased, or that their cause being but onelie about plucking downe of inclosures, and enlarging of commons, was disuised from theirs: so that either they would not, or could not ioine with them in aid of their religious quarrell: they began somewhat to doubt of their wicked begun enterpryse. Notwithstanding now, sith they had gone so farre in the matter, they thought there was no thinking backe: and therefore determining to proceed, they fell to new deuises, as first before all things to bring into their hands all such places of force, wealth, and defense, as might in anie respect serue for their aid and furtherance. Here vpon the second of Iulie, they came before the citie of Excester, incamping about the same in great numbers, and vsed all waies and meanes they could deuise how to win it by force, sometimes assaulting it right sharplie, sometimes firing the gates, otherwhiles undermining the wals, and at other times (as occasions serued) procuring skirmishes.

Finally, nothing was left vndone which the enimie could imagine to serue his purpose for the winning of that citie. And albeit there wanted not lastie stomachs among the citizens to withstand this outward force of the enimie: yet in proceesse of time, such scarcitie of bread and bittels increased, that the people waxed wearie & loth to abide such extremitie of famine. Whobeit the magistrats (though it grieued them to see the multitude of the citizens in such distress) yet hauing a speciall regard of their dutie toward the prince, and lone to the common-wealth, left no waies vnsought to quiet the people, & stae them in their dutifull obedience to resist the enimies: so that comforting the people with faire promises, and releuing their necessities verie liberallie, so farre as their power might extend, did in such sort vse the matter, that euerie of them within resolved with one generall consent to abide the end, in hope of some speedie relæse. And in the meane while, when their corne and meale was consumed, the gouernors of the citie caused bzain and meale to be moulded by in cloth, for other wise it would not sticke together. Also they caused some excursions to be made out of the citie, to take and fetch into the citie such cattell as were found pasturing abroad nere to the walls, which being brought in, were distributed among the poore. To conclude, into such extremitie were the miserable citizens brought, that albeit mans nature can scarcely abide to feed upon anie vnaccustomed food; yet these sille men were glad to eat horse flesh, and to hold themselves well content therewith. Whilste the siege thus remained before Excester, the rebels spoiled and robbed the countrie abroad, and laying their traitorous heads together, they consulted upon certeine articles to be sent by to the king. But herein such diuersitie of heads and wits was among them, that for euery kind of bzaine there was one manner of article: so that neither appeared anie consent in their diuersitie, nor yet anie constancie in their agreement. Some seemed more tollerable, others altogether vnreasonable, some would haue no iudices, some no state of gentlemen. The priests ever harped upon one string, to ring the bishop of Rome into England againe, and to halloow home cardinall Pole their countreinman. After much a do, at length a few articles were agreed upon, to be directed vnto the king, with the names of certeine of their heads set therevnto, the copie whereof here in such.

The articles of the commons of Devonshire and Cornewall, sent to the king, with answers afterward following vnto the same.

Item, forsomuch as man, except he be borne of water, and the Holie-ghost, can not enter into the kingdome of God, and forsomuch as the gates of heauen be not open without this blessed sacrament of baptism; therefore we will that our curats shall minister this sacrament at all times of need, as well on the wake daies, as on the holie daies.

Item, we will haue our chyliden confirmed of the bishop, whensoever we shall within the diocesse resort vnto him.

Item, forsomuch as we constantlie beleeue, that after the priest hath spoken the words of consecration being at masse, there celebrating and consecrating the same, there is verie reallie the bodie and blood of our sauour Iesus Christ God and man, and that no substance of bread and wine remaineth after, but the verie selfe same bodie that was borne of the virgin Marie, and was giuen vpon the crosse for our redemption: therefore we will haue masse celebrated as it hath bene in times past, without anie man communicating with the priests, forsomuch as manie rudelie presuming vntoworthilie to receiue the same, put no difference betwene the Lords bodie & other kind of meat; some saing that it is bread before and after, some saing that it is profitable to no man except he receiue it: with manie other abused termes.

Item, we will haue in our churches reservation.

Item, we will haue holie bread and holie wafer in the remembrance of Christs precious bodie and blood.

Item, we will that our priests shall sing or saie with an audible voice, Gods seruice in the quier of the parish churches, and not Gods seruice to be set forth like a Christ masse plaie.

Item, forsomuch as priests be men dedicated to God for ministering and celebrating the blessed sacraments, and preaching of Gods word, we will that they shall liue chaste without marriage, as saint Paule did, being the elect and chosen vessel of God, saing vnto all honest priests, Ye you followers of me.

Item, we will that the six articles, which our soveraigne lord king Henrie the eight set forth in his latter daies, shall be vied and so taken as they were at that time.

Item, we praise God saue king Edward, for we be his both bodie and goods.

For the pacifying of these rebels, were appointed by the king and his counsell, sir John Russell knight lord priue seale, the lord Greie of Wilton, sir William Herbert after earle of Penbroke, sir John Paulet, sir Hugh Paulet, sir Thomas Speake, and others, with a conuenient power of men of warre both on horsebacke and foot. Amongst others, there were certeine strangers that came with my lord Greie, as captaine Germane an Hennover, with a band of horsemen, most part Albanoises and Italians. Also captaine Paule Baptiste Spinola an Italian bozne of a noble house in Genoa, with a band of Italian footmen. But now the lord priue seale that was ordeined by the king and his counsell, general of that armie, vpon his first approaching towards them, sent vnto them the kings maiesties proclamation: the effect whereof was, that all such persons as were vnlawfullie assembled, and did not within thre daies next after the proclaiming thereof, yield and submit themselves to the lord priue seale (the kings lieutenant) they should from thenceforth be deemed, accepted, and taken for rebels against his roiall person, and his imperfall crowne and dignitie.

And further, the kings maiestie, for a more terror to the rebels, and the incouragement of such other his louing subiects, as should helpe and aid to apprehend anie of the said rebels, he by his said proclamation granted and gaue all the offices, fees, goods and possessions, which the said rebels had at and before their apprehension. This proclamation notwithstanding, the rebels continued in their wicked deuises & traitorous purposes, hastening to the hazards of their owne deaths & bindings, as the poet saith of the woltish fish swimming to the hidden hook:

Whereupon yet once againe the kings maiestie, for the auoiding of the shedding of christian blood, sent vnto them a most gentle and louing message in writing, thereby to reduce them againe to their dutifull obedience: but all would not serue nor auail to moue their obstinate minds to leaue off their desperate and diuelish enterpryse. The message was as followeth.

The kings message to the rebels of Cornewall and Deuonshire.

Although knowledge hath bene giuen to vs, and our dearest vncle the duke of Summerset gouernor of our person, and protector of all our realms, dominions, and subiects, and to the rest of our priue counsell, of diuerse assemblies made by you, which ought of dutie to be our louing subiects, against all order of law, and otherwise than ever anie louing or kind subiects haue attempted against their naturall and liege soueraigne lord: yet we haue thought it meet, at this verie first time, not to condemne and reiect you, as we might iustlie doe; but to vse you as our subiects, thinking that the diuell hath not that power in you, to make you of naturall borne Englishmen, so suddenlie to become enemies to your owne native countrie of our subiects, to make you traitors, or vnder pretense to relieue your selues, to destroye your selues, your wiues, children, lands, possessions, and all other commodities of this your life. This we saie, that we trust, that although ye be ignorantlie seduced, ye will not be vpon knowledge, obstinate.

And though some amongst you (as euer there is some cockle amongst god corne) forget God, neglect their prince, esteeme not the state of the realme, but as carelesse & desperat men delite in sedition, tumults & wars: yet neuertheless the greater part of you will heare the voice of vs your naturall prince, and will by wisdom and counsell be warned, and cease your euils in the beginning, whose ends will be euen by God almighties order your owne destruction. Wherefore as to you our subiects by ignorance seduced, we speake and be content to vse our princelie authoritie like a father to his children, to admonish you of your faults, not to punish them; to put you in remembrance of your duties, not to auenge your forgetfulness. First, your disorder to rise in multitudes, to assemble your selues against our other louing subiects, to arraie your selues to the war, who amongst you all can answer for the same to almighty God, charging you to obeye vs in all things: How can anie English god hart answer vs, our lawes, and the rest of our verie louing and faithfull subiects, who in deed by their obedience make our honour, estate, and begre:

Disorder in subiects.

Abusing of the kings name.

Ye vse our name in your writings, and abuse the same against our selfe. What iniurie herein do you vs, to call those which loue vs, to your euill purposes, by the authoritie of our name? God hath made vs your king by his ordinance and prouidence, by our blood and inheritance, by lawfull succession, and our coronation: but not to this end, as you vse our name. We are your most naturall soueraigne lord & king, Edward the sixt, to rule you, to preferue you, to saue you from all your outward enemies, to see our lawes well ministered, euerie man to haue his owne, to suppress disordered people, to correct traitors, thieues, pirats, robbers, & such like, yea to keepe our realmes from other princes, from the malice of the Scots, of Frenchmen, of the bishop of Rome. Thus god subiects, our name is written, thus it is honored and obeyed, this maiestie it hath by Gods ordinance, not by mans. So that of this your offense we cannot write too much. And yet doubt not but this is enough from a prince to all reasonable people, from a roiall king to all kindharted & louing subiects, fro the pious saint H. of England, to euerie naturall Englishman.

False causes.

Your pretense, which you saie, moueth you to do thus, and wherewith you seeke to excuse this disorder, we assure you is either false, or so vaine, that we doubt not, that after that ye shall hereby vnderstand the truth thereof, ye will all with one voice acknowledge your selues ignorantlie led, and by error seduced. And if there be anie one that will not, then assure you the same be ranke traitors, enemies of our crowne, seditious people, heretikes, papists, or such as care not what cause they haue to prouoke an insurrection, so they may do it, nor in deed can war so rich with their owne labors & with peace, as they can do with spoiles, with wars, with robberies and such like, yea with the spoile of your owne goods, with the lining of your labors, the sweat of your bodies, the food of your owne households, wiues and children: such they be, as for a time vse pleasant persuasions to you, and in the end will cut your throtles for your owne goods.

Baptisme.

You be borne in hand, that your children, though necessitie chance, shall not be christened but vpon the holie daies: how false this is, learne you of vs. Our booke which we haue set forth by free consent of our whole parlement in the English tong teacheth you the contrarie, euen in the first lease, yea the first side of the first lease of that part which intreateth of baptism. God subiects for to other we speake not like & be not deceived. They which haue put this false opinion into your eares, they meane not the christening of children, but the destruction of you our christened subiects. Be this knowne vnto you, that our honor is so much, that we may not be found faultie of one tote or word: proue it, if by our lawes you may not christen your children when ye be disposed vpon necessitie, euerie daie or houre in the weeke, then might you be offended: but seeing you may do it, how can you beleue them that teach you the contrarie? What thinke you they meane in the rest, which moue you to break your obedience against vs, your king & soueraigne, vpon these so false tales & persuasions in so euident a matter? Wherefore all you which will acknowledge vs your soueraigne lord, and which will heare the voice of vs your king, may easilie perceiue how you be deceived, and how subtiltie traitors and papists, with their falschod seeke to atchiue and bying their purpose to passe with your helpe. Euerie traitor will be glad to dissemble his treason, and feed it secretlie: euerie papist his poperie, and nourish it inwardlie, and in the end make you our subiects partakers of treason and poperie, which in the beginning was pretended to be a commonweale and holiness.

And how are you seduced by them, which put in your heads the blessed sacrament of Chyestes bodie, should not differ from other common bread? If our lawes, proclamations, and statutes be all to the contrarie, whie shall anie priuat man persuade you against them? We do our selfe in our owne hart, our counsell in all their profession, our lawes and statutes in all purposes, our god subiects in all our doings most highlie esteeme that sacrament, and vse the communion thereof to our most comfort. We make so much difference thereof from other common bread, that we thinke no profit of other bread, but to mainteine our bodies: but this blessed bread we take to be the verie food of our soules to euerlasting life. How thinke you, god subiects, shall not we being your prince, your lord, your king by Gods appointment, with truth more peneuile, than certeine euill persons with open falschod? Shall anie seditious person persuade you that the sacrament is despised, which is by our lawes, by our selfe, by our counsell, and by all our god subiects esteemed, used, participated, and daily receiued? If euer ye were seduced, if euer deceived, if euer traitors were beleued, if euer papists poisoned god subiects, it is now. It is not the christening of children, nor the reuerence of the sacrament, nor the health of your soules that they shat at, god subiects: it is sedition, it is high treason, it is your destruction they seeke. How craftie, how pitiouslie, how cunninglie so euer they do it, with one rule iudge ye the end, which of force must come of your purposes.

Almighty God forbiddeth vpon paine of euerlasting damnation, disobedience to vs your king, and in his place we rule in earth. If we should be slow, would God erre? If your offense be towards God, thinke you it is pardoned without repentance? Is Gods iudgement mutable? Your paine is damnation, your iudge is incorruptible, your fault is most euident. Liketwise are ye euill informed in diuerse other articles, as for confirmation of your children, for the masse, for the maner of your seruice of mattins and euentong. Whatsoeuer is therein ordered, hath bene long debated, and consulted by manie learned bishops, doctors, and other men of great learning learning in this realme concluded, in nothing so much labour and time spent of late time, nothing so fauile ended. As for seruice in the English tong hath manifested reasons for it, and yet perchance seemeth to you a new seruice, and yet in deed is none other but the old. The selfe same words in English which were in Latine, sauing a few things taken out, so fond that it had bene a shame to haue heard them in English, as all they can iudge which list to report the truth.

The difference is, that we ment godlie, that you our subiects should vnderstand in English, being our naturall countrie tong, that which was heretofore spoken in Latine, then seruing onelie them which vnderstand Latine, & now for all you that be borne English. How can this with reason offend anie reasonable man, that he should vnderstand that anie other faith, and so to consent with the speaker? If the seruice in the church were good in Latine, it remaineth good in English: for nothing is altered, but to speake with knowledge, that before was spoken with ignorance: and to let you vnderstand what is said for you, to the intent you maie farther it with your owne deuotion, an alteration to the better, except knowledge be worse than ignorance. So that whosoever hath moued you to mislike this order, can giue you no reason, nor answer pourses, if ye vnderstand it.

Wherefore you our subiects, remember we speake to you, being ordeined your prince and king by almighty God, if anie wise we could aduance Gods honour more than we do, we would do it, and see that ye become subiects to Gods ordinance. Obie vs your prince, and learne of them which haue authoritie to teach you, which haue power to rule you, and will execute our iustice, if we be prouoked. Learne not of them whose fruits be nothing but wilfulnesse, disobedience, obstinate, & destruction of the realme. For the masse, we assure you, no small studie & trauell hath bene spent by all the learned clergie therein, and to auoid all contention thereof, it is brought enen to the verie use as Christ left it, as the apostles used it, as holie fathers deliuered it: indeed somewhat altered from that which the popes of Rome for their lucre brought to it. And although you maie heare the contrarie of some popish and euill men, yet our maiestie, which for our honoz maie not be blemished nor stained, assureth you, that they deceiue you, abuse you, and blow these opinions into your heads for to furnish their owne purposes.

And so likewise iudge you of confirmation of children, and let them answer you this one question. Thinke they that a child christened is damned, because he dieth before bishopping? Marke good subiects, what inconuenience hereof cometh. Our doctrine therefore is founded vpon true learning, and theis vpon shamelesse errors. To conclude, beside our gentle manner of information to you, what fouler is contained in our booke, either for baptisme, sacrament, masse, confirmation and seruice in the church, by parlement established, by the whole clergie agreed, yea by the bishops of the realme deuised, & further by Gods word confirmed. And how dare you trust, yea how dare you giue eare without trembling, to anie singular person to disallow a parlement; a subiect to persuaide against our maiestie, or anie man of his single arrogancie against the determination of the bishops, and all the cleargie, anie intimated argument against the word of God?

But now you our subiects, we resort to a greater matter of your unkindnesse, a great vnnaturalnes, and such an euill, that if we thought it had not bene begun of ignorance, and continued by persuation of certaine traitors amongst you, which we thinke set on number, but in their doings busie, we could not be persuaaded but to vse our sword and do iustice: and as we be ordeined of God for to redresse your errors by auengement. But lone and zeale yet our cometh our iust anger, but how long that will be, God knoweth, in whose hand our heart is; and rather for your owne causes, being our christened subiects, we would ye were persuaaded than vanquished, taught than ouerthrowne, quietlie pacified than rigorously persecuted. We require to haue the statute of six articles reuiued. And know you what ye require? We know ye what ease ye haue with the losse of them? They were lawes made, but quicklie repented; so bloudie they were to be borne of our people, yet at the first in deed made of some necessitie. Wh subiects how are ye trapped by euill persons? We of pittie, because they were bloudie, toke them awaie, and you now of ignorance will aske them againe. You know full well that they helped vs to extend rigour, and gaue vs cause to draw our sword verie often.

And since our mercie moued vs to write our lawes with iustice and equitie, how are ye blinded to aske them in bloud? But leauing this manner of reasoning, and resorting to the truth of our authoritie, we let you wit, the same hath bene adnulled by parliament with great reioice of our subiects, and not now to be called in question. And dareth anie of you with the name of a subiect, stand against an act of parliament, a law of the realme? What is our power if lawes should be thus neglected? What is your suertie if lawes be not kept? Assure you most sincerely, that we of no earthlie thing vnder the heauen make such reputation as we do of this one, to haue our lawes obeyed, & this cause of God to be thoroughly maintained, from the which we will neuer remoue a heares brydth, nor giue place to anie creature liuing: but therein will spend our whole roiall person, our crowne, treasure, realme, and all our state, whereof we assure you of our high honoz. For herein resteth our honoz, herein do all kings know ledge vs a king. And shall anie one of you dare bryeth or thinke against our kingdom and crowne?

In the end of this your request (as we be giuen to vnderstand) ye would haue them stand in force till our full age. To this we thinke, that if ye knew what ye spake, ye would not haue vttered the motion, nor neuer giuen bryeth to such a thought. For what thinke you of our kingdom? We of lesse authoritie for our age? We we not your king now as we shall be? Shall ye be subiects hereafter, and now are ye not? Haue we not the right we shall haue? If ye would suspend and hang our doings in doubt untill our full age, ye must first know, as a king we haue no difference of yeares, but as a naturall man and creature of God we haue youth, and by his sufferance shall haue age. We are your rightfull king, your liege lord, the soneraigne prince of England, not by our age, but by Gods ordinance; not onelie when we shall be one and twentie yeares of age, but when we were of ten yeers. We possesse our crowne not by yeares, but by the blood and descent from our father king Henrie the eight. If it be considered, they which moue this matter, if they durst vtter their selues, would denie our kingdom.

But our god subiects know their prince, and will increase, not diminish his honoz, enlarge his power, not abate it, know ledge his kingdom, not deferre it to certeine yeares. All is one, to speake against our crowne, and to denie our kingdom, as to require that our lawes maie be broken vnto one and twentie yeares. We we not your crowned, anointed, and established king? Wherein be we of lesse maiestie, of lesse authoritie, or lesse state, than our progenitors kings of this realme, except your unkindnes, your vnnaturalnesse will diminish our estimation?

Six articles.

The authoritie of a parliament.

We haue hitherto since the death of our father, by the good aduise and counsell of our deare and intire beloued uncle the duke of Summerſet, and gouernor and protector, kept our eſtate, maintained our realme, preſerued our honour, defended our people from all enimies. We haue hitherto bene feared and dread of our enimies, yea of princes, kings, and nations. Yea herein we be nothing inferiour to anie our progenitors, which grace we acknowledge to be giuen vs from God, and howe else, but by god obedience, god counsell of our magiſtrates, and by the au-thoritie of our kingdome?

England hitherto hath gained honour during our reigne: it hath wonne of the enimie, and not loſt. It hath bene maruelled that two of ſo yong yeares haue reigned ſo noble, ſo roſallie, ſo quietlie. And how chanceth that you our louing ſubiects of that our countrie of Cornewall and Deuonſhire, will giue occaſion to ſlander this our realme of England, to giue courage to the enimie, to note our realme of the euill of rebellion, to make it a yſe to our old enimies, to diminish our honour which God hath giuen, our father left, our good uncle and counsell preſerued vnto vs? What greater euill could ye commit, than euen now when our foreen enimie in Scotland, and vpon the ſea ſecketh to inuade vs, to do our realme diſhonour, than to ariſe in this maner againſt our law, to prouoke our wrath, to aſke our vengeance, and to giue vs an occaſion to ſpend that force vpon you, which we meant to beſtow vpon our enimies, to begin to ſlaie you with that ſword that we drew forth againſt Scots, and other enimies, to make a conqueſt of our owne people, which otherwiſe ſhould haue bene of the whole realme of Scotland?

Thus farre we haue deſcended from our high maieſtie, for loue to conſider you in your ſimple ignorance, and haue bene content to ſend you an inſtruction like a father, who of iuſtice might haue ſent you your deſtructions like a king to rebels. And now we let you know, that as you ſee our mercie abundantlie, ſo if ye prouoke vs further, we ſwear to you by the liuing God, ye ſhall ſeele the power of the ſame God in our ſword, which how mightie it is, no ſubiect knoweth; how puſſant it is, no priuat man can iudge; how mortall, no Engliſhman dare thinke. But ſuerlie, ſuerlie, as your lord and prince, your onlie king and maiſter, we ſaie to you, repent your ſelues, and take our mercie without delaie: or elſe we will forthwith extend our princelie power, and execute our sharpe ſword againſt you, as againſt infidels and Turks, and rather aduenture our owne roſall perſon, ſtate, and power, than the ſame ſhould not be executed.

And if you will proue the example of our mercie, learne of certeine which lattie did ariſe, as they perceiving pretended ſome griefes, and yet acknowledging their offences, haue not onelie moſt humble their pardon: but ſeele alſo by our order, to whome onelie all publike order apperteineth, preſent redreſſe of their griefes. In the end, we admoniſh you of your duties to God, whome ye ſhall anſwere in the daie of the Lord, & of your duties towarde vs, whom ye ſhall anſwere by our order, and take our mercie whileſt God ſo inclineth vs, leaſt when ye ſhall be conſtrained to aſke, we ſhall be too much hardened in heart to grant it you. And where ye ſhall heare now of mercie, mercie, and life; ye ſhall then heare of iuſtice, iuſtice, and death. Written the eight of Iulie, in the third yeaere of our reigne.

Although the rebels received this princelie meſſage, & wholeſome admonition from the kings maiſtie, yet would they not reforme themſelues, as dutifull ſubiects ought to haue done, but ſtood ſtill in their wicked begun rebellion, offering to trie it at the weapons point. There wanted not priuees and other buſie bodie among them, ſuch as by all waies and meanes poſſible ſought to kindle the coles of malice and hatred betwixt the king and his ſubiects; which as the maner is among all the like wicked diſpoſed people, contriued to riſe and ſtrew abroad falſe forged tales, and feined rumors, giuing it out, that the people ſhould be conſtrained to paie a ratable taſke for their ſhepe and cattell, and an excuſe for euerie thing that they ſhould eate or drinke. Theſe and ſuch other ſlanderous brutes were ſped abroad by thoſe children of Beliall, whereby the cankered minds of the rebels might the more be hardened and made ſtiſſe from plieing vnto anie reaſonable perſuaſion, that might be made to moue them to returne vnto their dutifull obedience, as by the lawes both of God and man they were bounden: and ſo it came to paſſe. For the rebellious rout were growne to an obſtinacie, ſeeming ſo far from admitting perſuaſions to ſubmiſſion, that they became reſolute in their peſſilent actions; fullſolie following the worſt, which they knew full well would redound to their detriment; and auoiding the beſt, which they doubted not might turne to their advantage, agreeable in ſenſe and meaning vnto that of the poet:

Qua nocere ſequar, fugiam qua proſpere credam.

Herevpon when no hope was left to procure them by anie quiet meanes to laie downe armes, the lord priuie ſeale, and the lord Greie, with their forces, although not comparable with the rebels in number, about the latter end of Iulie ſet vpon them, and by great manhood put them from their ground, notwithstanding they fought berie ſtoutlie, & gaue it not ouer for a little: and although they were thus driuen to giue place at this firſt onſet, yet they got togither againe, and abroad a new charge, defending their ground, & doing what they could to beat backe and repell thoſe that came to aſſaile them. But neuertheleſſe through the power of the almighty God fauouring the rightfull cauſe, the rebels were diſtreſſed, and followed in chaſe with great ſlaughter for the ſpace of two miles. This was about the beginning of Auguſt.

Their chiefe captiues, to wit, Humfreie Arundell, Whinſland, Holms, and Burie, were taken and brought hy to London. There were taken alſo others of their captiues, as Thomas Underhill, John Soleman, William Segar, Templon, and Barret, which two laſt were priuees; alſo Woier and Henrie Le, two maiors, all the which were executed in one place or other, as they had well deſerued. The ſaid Woier being maior of Bodmin in Cornewall, (as Grafton reporteth) had bene a buſie fellow among the rebels, to ſet them forward in miſchiefe: howbeit ſome that loued him ſought to excuſe him, as if he had bene forced hereto againſt his will by the rebels, who would haue killed him, and burnt his houſe, if he had not contented to them. But how ſoener it was, ſir Anthoine Kingſton that was priuie ſeale, wrote his letter vnto the ſaid maior, ſignifieng to him, that he and other with him ſhould come and dine with him ſuch a daie. The maior ſeeming to be glad thereof, made the beſt purueſance he could to receiue them, and at the time appointed, ſir Anthoine Kingſton came with his companie, and were right hartilie welcomed of the maior. But before they ſat downe to dinner, calling the maior aſide, he told him that there muſt be execution done in that towne, and therefore willed him that a paire of gallowes might be framed and ſet by with ſped, ſo that they might be readie by that time that they ſhould make an end of dinner.

The maior with all diligence caused the same to be done: so that when dinner was ended, sir Anthonie calling the maior to him, and asking whether the gallies were set up accordinglie as he had willed, the maior answered that they were readie. Wherewith sir Anthonie taking the maior by the hand, desired him to bring him to the place where they stood, and comming thither and beholding them, he said to the maior; I thinke you maister maior that they be strong enough: Pea sir, quoth he, that they are. Well then said sir Anthonie, get you euen up vnto them, for they are prouided for you. The maior greatlie astonied herewith, said; I trust you meane no such thing to me. Sir said he, there is no remedie, ye haue bene a busie rebell, and therefore this is appointed for your reward: and so without respect or state, there was the maior hanged.

At the same time, & nere the same place dwelled a miller that had bene a great doer in that rebellion, for whom also sir Anthonie Kingston sought: but the miller being thereof warned, called a good tall fellow that he had to his seruant, and said vnto him: I haue businesse to go from home, if anie therefore come to aske for me, saie thou art the owner of the mill and the man for whom they shall so aske, and that thou hast kept this mill for the space of three yeares, but in no wise name me. The seruant promised his maister so to do. And shortly after came sir Anthonie Kingston to the millers house, and calling for the miller, the seruant came forth, and answered that he was the miller. How long, quoth sir Anthonie, hast thou kept this mill? He answered three yeares. Well then said he, come on, thou must go with me, and caused his men to laie hands on him, and to bring him to the next tree, saieing to him; Thou hast bene a busie knaue, and therefore here shalt thou hang. Then cried the fellow out, and said that he was not the miller, but the millers man. Well then, said sir Anthonie, thou art a false knaue to be in two tales, therefore said he, hang him by: and so incontinentlie hanged he was. After he was dead, one that was present, said sir Anthonie; Surely sir this was but the millers man. That then said he, could he euer haue done his maister better seruice than to hang for him?

Manie other were executed by order of the marshall law, & a great part of the countrie abandoned to the spoile of the soldiers, who were not slouthfull to gleane what they could find for the time their libertie lasted. Thus far the report of this rebellious boile, whereupon it first kindled, by what meanes the same sparkled and became a flame, and what deuises were used to extinguishe & quench it. Wherein we see how prone the people are to rise by routs upon occasions of discontentments; how hastic and headie to undertake dangerous enterprises, how willfull and obstinate to persist in their pernicious proceedings, how cold-hearted and hopelesse when they see the course of their plots of perillous policie either interrupted, undermined, or ouerthrowne; and finallie, what a reprochfull reward redoundeth both to the ringleaders in rebellions, as also what falleth to the shares of all such as shake hands and become confederats to the furthering and strengthening of riots, mutinies, insurrections, commotions, and burlesquies. Whereby the state is disquieted, & that more is) the prince drakene into a conceipt of suspecting his subjects loialties; besides a wicked president to posterities, without feare of shame, remorse of conscience, regard to allegiance, or foresight of afterclaps, to attempt the like. Now it resteth, that for the further truth and knowledge hereof, we adde a new report (new I meane, in respect of the publication, having not heretofore bene printed) though old enough, and sufficientlie warranted by the reporter, who upon his owne notice hath deliuered no lesse in writing, than himselfe upon verie good and infallible grounds obserued, and hath left testified in the discourse following; wherein there is not one word either added, or inuerted: but all things (from point to point) agreeable to the written copie.

The description of the citie of Exces-ter, and of the sundrie assaults giuen to the same: collected and gathered by Iohn Howell (alias Hooker) gentleman and chamberleine of the same.

Excester or Excester is a famous and an ancient citie, being the metropole and Emporium of the west parts of England, situated and lieng in the p<sup>ro</sup>uince sometime called Dumnonia, that is to saie, the countrie of ballics: for whereas are manie hilles (as that countrie is full of hilles and mountains) there are manie ballics. But ne-ruptlie it is named Deuonia, or Deuonshire, and not Daneshire of the Danes, as some would haue it.
Of the first foundation thereof, by reason of the sundrie inuasions of foreyn nations, who with their hostilities and cruell warres did burne and destroye the same, there remaineth no certaine memorie, neither among the records of the said citie, ne yet in anie one other writer.

But most certaine it is, that it was first builded and founded by the Britons or Brites. For the names which they gaue and used, are yet at this present had in remembrance, as well among the chronographers of this land, as also among the Cornish people, who were sometimes one with this prouince; but now in a countie of themselves, and next bordering to this, and in the same diocesse. And they are the remanent of the blond of Brutus. For when Cadwallader king of this land, by reason of a great famine and pestilence was driven to forsake the same, & to flie into little Britaine named Armorica, which is now under the dition of the French king: diuers & the most part of his people fled, some into Wales, and some into Cornwall, where euer since they and after them their posteritie haue remained and continued.

The old chonographers, searchers, and writers of antiquities do find, that this citie was called Co- rinia, and thereof the cathedrall church of the same was (as Bale saith) named Ecclesia Coriniensis: which name, if it were first giuen by Corinus (as Leland writeth) who after the arrivall of Brutus into this land, was made the first duke of this whole west countrie of Deuon and Cornwall, which were both comprised vnder the name of Corinia, and wherof this citie euer hath bene and is the metropole, and alwaies parcell sometime of the kingdome, then of the duchie, and after of the earledome, and now againe of the duchie of Cornwall: then out of doubt this citie is of no lesse antiquitie than the said names do import. It was also called Augusta. Of this name there were diuerse cities, so named by the Romans; but this onelie was named Augusta Britannorum, and so called (as some thinke) by the Romans at the conclusion of the peace made at the siege of this citie be-twene king Arminius and Vespasian coronell of the Romane armie vnder Claudius Augustus. The Britons in their tong or language do call this citie by sundrie names; the first and eldest in remembrance is call Penhulgoſſe, that is to saie, the pro-petous perous chiefe towne in the wood, as doth appere by Geffreie of Monmouth, and Ponticus Virunnius. It was also called Dennechaltescaire, that is, the chiefe citie or towne vpon the hill; as doth appere in a trauerse betwene the bishop, deane, and chapiter of this citie of the one partie; and the maior, bailiffe, and communitie of the other partie, concerning their liberties. But the names which the Cornish people do at these presents remember & rekeine, are special-lie three, Dennecaire, Caieruth, Caieriske. Dennecaire signifieth, and is to saie, the chiefe citie. Caieruth signifieth the red or reddish citie, so called and taking the name of the ground and soile wherevpon it is situated, which is a red earth. Caieriske is the citie of Ilike, being so called of the river, which the Britons name Ilike, and doth fast by the same. And of this name Houeden in his chronicle maketh mention, saieing thus: Anno Domini 877 exercitus Dana-rum ab Wareham nocte quadam, federe disrupto, ad Exan-cestre diuerterunt, quod Britannice dicitur Caieriske.

Ptolomeus the famous astronomer, who was about the yere of our Lord 162, doth being king of this land, nameth this citie Isea; and the river Isea.
And Bale the searcher of antiquities following the same opinion, doth also name the citie Isea, and the inhabitants therein Iseans. But vnder correction be it spoken, a man maie well thinke that Ptolomeus being in Alexandria, and so farre distant from this land, was misinformed, or the print mistaken. For it is most likelie that the river should be named Isea according to the British speech, wherein it was called Ilike; and which name by transposing of the two middle letters, doth at this present re-maine being now named Isea or Exa. But whatsoever the censures and opinions of Ptolomeus and of Bale, who wrote onelie vpon report, be herein, it is certeine, that the names which the Brites or Bri-tons gaue, were of longest continuance. And this citie was called by their denominations, by the space of fiftene hundred yeres, vntill the coming of the Saxons, the Dicks, and the Scots into this realme, which was about the yere of our Lord foure hundred and fiftie. For they, where, and whensoever they prevailed in any place, did for the most part alter and change the names of all places & towres, accounting it a great renoume, as also a perpetuall memoiall of their chualtrie, to geue new names, either of their owne deuises, or of their owne native countrie; for so is it written of them: Picti, Scotti, An-gli, Dani, & Normanni in hac insula rerum potius, cuncta im-mutant, pro trophæis habentes, loca de deictis noua impone-re nomina. The Saxons therefore as of all other cities & towres (few excepted) so of this also they changed and altered the old names and called it Spunketon; and by which name it was so called by the space of three hundred and od yeres, and vntill the time of king Athelstane: for he about the yere of our Lord nine hundred thirtie and two, being much grieved and iniquited with the rebellion of the Cornish people, because they refused and denied to acknowledge him for their lawfull king, did bend his force, & conduct his armie against them. And hauing subdued and prevailed ouer them, he returned to this citie: and while he rested here, he repaired the same; and the walles which before were but mightie ditches of earth, and the banks set with great poles of timber now destroyed, he builded all of square stone, as it is recorded: Hanc urbem primus Athelstanus in potestatem Anglorum fugatis Britonibus reducit, turribus muni-uit, & murum ex quadratis lapidibus tandem cinxit. And then he altered and changed the former names, and called it after the name of the river Effetora or Exeterra, that is to saie, Exeter. For so is it written, Est Exonia vrbis Deuonie comitatibus, sedo praeclara ad occiden- tem versus posita: abluuntur flumine Exi, à quo nomen habet.

Others name it of the river flowing by it, which they saie is named Excesfirum, & thus they write: Clarissima urbium est Excesiria, quia ab anni Excesiro qui eandem pre-terfuit est sic nuncupata. I find it also written in an old chronicle, that it is named Exancestria or Exancestrie: which shuld seme to be so called by the Saxons. For the most part of the cities, towres, & forts, which they builded or reedified, did end in cestre: as Glocestre, Lecestre, Banchestre, Winchestre, Dorcestre, Worcestre, Colcestre, Cicestre, Alcestre, Bicestre, & this citie of Excestre, with others. For Caie in British & Cestre in Saxonish are one thing, & do signifie in Englisch a fort, towre, or castell. This citie (as is before said) being walled about with stone by king A-thelstane is not altogether square, but decli-neth somewhat toward a roundnesse, and containeth in circuit or compasse sixtene hundred whole pa-ses, after siue foot to a palse; which accounting after the Italian maner one thousand pases to a mile, it is a mile and halfe about, & somewhat more. The situation of this citie is verie pleasant and delicate, being set vpon a little hill among manie hilles. For the whole countrie round about is mounteinous and full of hilles. It is pendent towards the south and west parts, after and in such sort, that be the fiers nener so soile or stibie, yet with a shoure of raine they are cleansed and made sweet. And albeit hilles are commonlie drie, yet nature is so beneficiall to this little hill, that it is in euerie quarter full of water springs: & by that meanes the whole citie is throug-lie furnished with welles and stirps; the great god benefit and commoditie thereof hath well appeared in sundrie times of necessitie, and especiallie in the time of the late commotion, which was in the yere of our Lord 1549. For albeit the enimie, by beeking and spoiling of the pipes or canales, whereby water was conueied to the founteins of the citie, from cer-teine springs distant not a mile from the same, did abridge them of that water: yet most comfortable they did intoy without impeachment the welles and stirps within the walles, which abundantly flosed with waters to the satisficing of all people therein.

There are also within this citie certeine founteins or conduits, wherevnto, throug certeine canales or pipes of lead, the waters from certeine springs, rising in the fields not far from the citie, are brought and conueied. And these waters are of most pryce, because by the carriage thereof they are purified, and made lighter than are the other waters springing within the citie: and by that means more meet for dressing of meats. Of these conduits two are speciall, the one of them standeth and is within the cemiterie or churchyard of the cathedrall church of the said citie, and is called saint Peters conduit: the other being of great antiquitie standeth in the middle of the citie, at the meeting of foure principall streets of the same, and wherof sometimes it toke his name, being called the conduit at Quatrefoies or Carfor; but now the great conduit.

At the higher end of this citie is a verie old and ancient castell, named Rugemont, that is to saie the red hill, taking that name of the red soile or earth wherevpon it is situated. The site or situation of it is eminent and aboue both the citie and countrie adioining: for they do all lie as it were vnder the lee thereof. It hath a goodlie and pleasant prospect towards the seas: for betwene that and it is no hill at all. It is stronglie ditched round about, and was first builded (as some thinke) by Iulius Cesar: but rather and in truth by the Romans after him when they had their reuerse to it for their defense, refuge, and abode, manie yeares. The same was sometimes dome of Westfex or Westfarons was allotted unto: and after them, it was the habitation of the earles of Cornwell, and last of all of the dukes of Excester. It was alwaies parcell and of the inheritance of the earledome, but now of the duchie of Cornwell: it is in great ruine and decaye, and not easilie to be gotten with force, if it were reedified and inuironed.

At the lower end and part of this citie, without the walls, floweth a goodlie and a pleasant riuer, which the Britons called Iska; Ptolomeus by misinformation named it Esse, Exe, Exa, or Exesum: and these names be retained at these presents. It hath his head or spring in a certeine moze or desert distant from the citie nere about foure and thwentie miles, called Ermore. It floweth into the maine seas about eight miles from the citie, at a place named Ersmouth, and by the waie it is increased with sundrie riuers, brooks & lakes, the chiefe of which are Crædie and Collome. It is well stozed and is plentifull of samon, trout, peale, dace, pike, and other like freshwater fishes: which albeit they be verie good and delicate, and especially the samon and pike: yet they are the lesse esteemed, because the seas being so nere do furnish the citie & countrie verie abundantlie with sundrie kinds of sea fishes most delicate.

The maine seas are not distant from the citie above eight miles, out of which commeth an arme serving for the port of the same: which (as doth appeare by certeine old and ancient recozds) did sometimes flow vp to the verie walls of the citie, where boats and vessels were wont to be laden and unladen of all kind of wares and merchandizes, at a proper place appointed for the same: which at these presents keepeth his old and ancient name, and is called the watergate. The decaye thereof hapned about the yeare of our Lord 1312, by one Hugh Courtneie the third of that name, and earle of Devon: who being offended and incensed against this citie, his wrathfull humor could not be satisfied, untill by some meanes he did impaire and annoie the state of the commonwealth of the same. And seeing that among other commodities, the use of the haven and watercourse to the citie to be one of the chiefest, he was neuer quiet untill he had destroyed the same: wherefore minding to performe what he had conceived, he did in the yeare of our Lord 1313, the fifth yeare of king Edward the second, enterpryse & begin his pretended deulle and mischief.

And first whereas the ladie Isabella de Fortibus, countesse of Armerle and of Devon, his ancestre had builded certeine waers upon the riuer of Cre (the proprietie and seignorie whereof did appertene to the citie) the one of the west side of the riuer of Cre in Erminster pariss, and the other of the east side of the same riuer in the pariss of Topesham; leauing betwene the said two waers a certeine aperture or open space of thirtie fot, thozough which all boats and vessels without let or hinderance might haue and had their vsuall passage and repassage, to and from the citie vnto the seas: the said earle to abridge and destroye this great benefit and commoditie, did leuie and build a new waer in the said aperture or open come, stopping, filling, and quirtting the same, with great trees, timber, and stones, in such sort, that no vessel nor vessels could passe or repasse.

After him Edward Courtneie earle of Devon, and nephew to the said Hugh, did not onelie mainteine and continue the doings of his ancestre, by his daileie reparing and defending the same: but also to worke an other destruction for euer, of anie passage or repassage to be had thenceforth to and from the said citie; under pretense to build and make certeine mils, did erect two other waers, the one at saint James ouerthwart the whole riuer, and the other at Lampfeyd: by meanes whereof not onelie the citie did susteine the whole losse of the haven, but the whole countrie also was surrounded about it, and in process of time altogether, and as it is at these presents couered with salt waters. For which grieues and iniuries vpon complaints made thereof, diuerse sundrie writs and commissions of inquirie were awarded and granted by the king; and the said earles by sundrie inquisitions and verdicts found gilty. And yet notwithstanding, such was their power and authority, and such was the iniquitie of those daies, as no iustice could take place, nor law haue his due course against them.

Furthermoze also the foresaid Hugh, to increas the gaine and commoditie of the lading & unlading of merchandizes within the port & riuer to himselfe, did build a keie and a crane in the riuer at his towne of Topesham, distant from the citie about thre miles: and by power did enforce and compell all manner of merchants arriving within that port to unlade & lade all their wares and merchandizes brought within that port (to be laden and unladen) there onelie. And from thence, euer since, all wares and merchandizes haue bene caried and recaried to and from the citie by horse, cart, and waine, though to the gaine of the earle and his tenants, yet to the great trouble and hinderance of the citie and merchants of the same. Neuerthelesse, the port hath euer moze and yet doth keepe his old and ancient name, being called the port of the citie of Excester: and alwaies hath bene and presentlie is paid a tribute vnto the citie, by the name of the towne custome, for all kind of wares and merchandizes, discharged within that port or riuer, or the members thereof.

And although the watercourse thus being destroyed can hardlie be restored to his old pristinate and naturall estate; for that thozough long continuance the old coure can not be discerned: yet now at length after manie attempts and with great expences, a watercourse and passage begun in the yeare 1564, is recovered, and by certeine sluices, boats, and vessels of fiftene or sixtene tuns are conueied and brought vp to the citie, and there discharged at the old and ancient place, called the watergate: & there is builded a verie faire large keie or wharfe, as also an engine called a crane fit for the purpose. Within the citie were sometimes but few parish churches, untill the time of Innocentius the third: who when in the yeare 1198 he had established the doctrine of transubstantiation, and had made it an article of the symbole, as appeareth in the decretals, Titulo de summa trinitate, canone Firmiter: then his next successor Honorius the third, in the yeare 1218 did not onelie confirme the same, but also by decre did establish reseruacion, candlelight, and praier for the dead, as doth appeare, Decret. tit. de celebratione missarum, canone Sane cum, & Sane cum creatura: by which means the number of sacrificing & massing priests did not onelie increase, but churches also and chapels began in all places and euerie where to be builded and erected.

And among others in this citie in the yeare 1222 and the first yeare of king Henrie the third, the parish churches were limited, and increased to the number of nineteene churches within the citie and suburbs, and were called by the name of the christianitie euen to this daie. Euerie of which in times past was a sufficient and competent living to mainteine a massing sacrificer; for such and so great was the blind deuotion of the people then in that Romish religion: but the same now being abolished, and the gospel preached, the liuelihoods are so small, as not sufficient for the most part to mainteine a poore clerke or scholar, & by reason thereof, the most part of them doe lie void and vacant, without incumbent.

Besides these parish churches, there was also a monasterie, sometimes of monks of saint Benets order, but since a cathedrall church, being of a verie faire and sumptuous building of freestone and with beautifull pillars of grate marble. It standeth and is situated in the east part of the citie; and (as some report) was first founded and built by king Ethelred, the third sonne to king Ethelwolphus. Some thinke that king Edgar did it. True it is that euerie of them builded a house for religious persons within this citie, of which the one was spoiled and burned by the Danes, and the other in procelle of time was built to the monasterie, which is now the cathedrall church. But the cathedrall church it selfe was founded & builded by king Althelstane, the sonne to king Edward the elder: for so is it recordeed in the historie of the same church, the words whereof are these: Althelstanus subingatis Cornigualensibus, reuersus est ad ciuitatem, qua antiquitus Monketon vocabatur, nunc autem Exeter: ac ibi sedens, anno Dom. 932, non tam lacerata eiusdem ciuitatis membra reparabat, quin & mansum quoddam dedit ad fundandum monasterium pro monachis, Deo & sancto Petro famulantibus.

This king besides his great charges and expenses in building of this church, which at the first was but small, and that part which is now called the Ladie chapell, he placed therein monkes of S. Benets order, provided liuelihoods for them, and appointed a ruler or gouernour ouer them, and who was called by the name of an abbat, towards whose diet and liuelihood he gaue spozhefull and Refusours bare: and which at these presents doe remaine to the said church and are annexed to the dignitie of the tresuroship of the same. The church being thus begun, kings, princes, & noble men were from time to time gladlie and willinglie verie liberall contributozs to the aduoluing and finishing of the same. For about foure score years after king Althelstane, king Kanoght who was also named Canutus or Canutus, at the earnest suite of one of his dukes named Athelred, did confirme and grant to Athelred then abbat of the said church, and to his successors manie and sundrie priuileges and liberties, vnder his letters patents, dated the second yeare of his reigne, Anno Domini, 1019.

After him about thirtie yeares, king Edward the confessor remoued the monkes into Westminster, and made this church a cathedrall church, and remoued the bishops see which was then at Crediton into this citie, making Leofricus bishop thereof, and whom he and his wife quene Edith did put in possession of the same, as appeareth by his letters patents dated the eight yeare of his reigne, Anno Dom. 1050, whobeth the monke of Burie, Polydorus, and others doe affirme and write, that this should be done about the twelue yeare of William the conqueror, for thus they doe write: Habitum est Londini, sub Lanfranco, antistitu & sacerdotum comitum, in quo decretum est, quod aliquot sedes episcopales, que in oppidulis & pagis antea fuerant, in uribus & locis celeberrimis collocarentur, unde factum est ut Bathonia, Lincolnia, Sarisburia, Exonia, Cestreria, & Cicestria urbes, huiusmodi nouis episcoporum domicilijs sunt nobilitate.

But the reuerence of these writers reserued, this cannot be true concerning this church, because the words of the charter thereof doe witnesse the contrarie, and declare expresselie, how that king Edward and quene Edith his wife did put Leofricus the first bishop in possession, the one by the one hand and the other by the other hand, leading him betwene them vp to the high altar, and there put his hands vpon the same: And yet it may be true, that at the foresaid counsell, this remouing and placing of this bishop might be ratified and confirmed. Likewise William the conqueror, in the third yeare of his reigne 1069, did not onelie confirme the former charter, but also at the instance and request of William Warewell, then his chapleine, but afterwards bishop of the same see, did giue vnto it the feignories of Plumpton, Hampton, and S. Stephens in Crediton, which the said William Warewell being afterwards bishop did distribute, giuing Plumpton to the religious canons, whome he placed there: Hampton was annexed to the deanerie, but S. Stephens was reserued alwaies to the bishop, and to his successors, whereby they are barons, and so lords in the parliament house.

It was also enlarged from time to time with great possessions, reuenues, buildings, riches, priuileges, and sundrie other commodities, by kings, princes, prelates, bishops, and sundrie others. And this one thing is to be noted, that albeit there were about foure hundred yeares distant from the first foundation and building thereof, vnto the ending and finishing of the same; yet it is so vniuersellie and decentlie compact and builded in one mould, as though it had bene done at one instant. The bishop is distinct from the chanons both in house and reuerue: his liuelihoods being no part nor parcell of that which apperteineth to the deane and chapter. It was sometimes of great reuenues and large possessions, but the more part thereof hath bene consumed and exhausted by a wastfull bishop. The bishop and chanons haue verie faire houses, which are situated about the church & cemeterie, and are inclosed euerie night by shutting fast of certeine gates, by which occasion it is called a close, A claudendo: and which gates are to be shut euerie night (except at certeine times) and to be opened euerie morning at certeine hours appointed, as it appeareth by a composition made for the same betwene the communalitie of Excester, and the bishop and deane of the same. In the middle of the cemeterie or churchyard is a verie faire fontaine or conduit of water conueied by certeine pipes of lead from out of the same felos, as is the cities conduit. And albeit the springs of both waters are in the same field, and not farre distant: yet this doth excell the other. Out of this well or fontaine waters are conueied to sundrie of the chanons houses, as also of late vnto the bishops house, and yet it serueth besides the whole close and citie. The citie it selfe is verie populous, and was sometimes chiefele inhabited with clothiers & clothworkers of broad clothes, seruing much for the Spanish and south countries; and which in those daies were of such goodnesse & substance, that the names of them doe remaine in those countries: but now it is chiefele inhabited with merchants, kerrie-clothiers, and all sorts of artificers, among whom the merchants are the chiefe & welthiest.

The gouernment of this citie was sometimes by foure bailiffes, which before the conquest were called portgreues, that is, the chiefe lords or rulers of the towne: for porta is taken for a towne, and greue in Saronie is Dominus or maior: but after the conquest they were after the French tong named Præpositi, that is to saie Prefects or rulers, and now stewards. Not long after the conquest there was ordered and constituted a senate of six and thirtie persons, but of later yeares by king Henric the seventh of foure & twentie persons, out of which number yearelie there was and is chosen one to be the chiefe governor for the yeare following; and is called by the name of a maior, whome the barons called Speregreue, that is, Mayor domini, or the chiefe ruler. or bailiffes, hath the hearing, decerning, and determining in all ciuill causes betwene partie and partie, and for which they keepe wækelie upon euerie mondaie a court in the Guildhall of the said citie: but the bailiffes retaining their old and ancient custome, doe keepe the like courts, and in the like causes distinalie from the maior: by themselves, at all time and times (the mondaies and festiual daies excepted) as it shall please them to assigne, and with their court is called by the name of the prouost court.

Thus the maior and bailiffes both iointlie and seuerallie haue iurisdiction to decerne and determine in ciuill matters. But if the matters doe touch and concerne the prince, the crowne, the common peace, any criminall matter, or the publicke state of the citie and common-wealth of the same, then the same are decided by the maior and iustices, or by the maior and common counsell, or by the maior himselfe, or by some other officer or officers, according to the nature and qualitie of the cause and offense. But because it requireth a large and speciall course, to describe the gouernement of this citie and common-wealth of the same, the charge of euerie officer, the diuersitie of officers, their seuerall iurisdiccions, and a number of other things incident vnto their charges: there is a particular booke imprinted, and at large the same is set out, in such order as is requisite, and appertaining to the gouernement: whereby euerie man may know his office and charge, and what to him dooth appertene. And let it suffice, that partlie through god gouernement, and partlie of a god inclination, the people of this citie haue bene alwaies dutifull and obedient to the king and the lawes: and haue in great awe and reuerence their gouernours and magistrats for the time being. And this one thing is not so strange as wothie to be noted, that euen from the beginning, from time to time they haue bene carefull for their common-wealth, and vigilant for the preservation of the same. And as in times of peace and quietnesse the same hath bene well gouerned: so in times troublefome and vniquiet, it hath bene most valiantlie defended against the innasions and assaults of the enimies, as by sundrie histories it may appeare: whereof for example

1 First Aruragus king of this land, then named Britaine, minding to staie the land in his ancient estate, freedom and libertie, did withowt law and denie to paie vnto the Romans the tribute which they did requite and demand: wherefore Claudius the emperor sent Vespasian then duke of the Romane armie, into this realme with a great host, either to recover the tribute, or to subdue the land. This Vespasian is he, who in the foure and twentieth yeare after this his iourneie, did despoile Jerusalem. Wherefore this duke landing in Dorsetbaie, then named Totonefium littus, came to this citie, laid siege vnto it, and gaue continuall assaults therevnto, for eight daies continuallie together. Aruragus the king, being then in the east parts of the land, and hearing of this, with a great armie and power marcheth towards this citie to remove the siege, and incountereth with the enimie. The Romane after long fight, and not able to preuaile, is contented to come to parle, and in the end a composition was concluded, as if dooth appeare, and is set downe and written by sundrie historiographers. The chronicle of the cathedrall church of the said citie hath these words: Anno Domini 49, Vespasian cum Romano exercitu ciuitatem nunc vocatam Exeter, octo diebus obsedit, sed minime preualuit, Arurago rege ciuibus auxilium prestante.

Geffreie of Monmouth hath these words: Vespasianus a Claudio missus est, ut Aruragum vel pacificaret, vel romane subiectioni restitueret. Cum igitur in portu in Rutapi applicare voluisset Vespasianus, obuius ei Aruragus, atque prohibuit ne portum ingrederetur. Retraxit itaque se Vespasianus a portu illo, retortisque velis in littore Totonefio applicauit. Nactus deinde tellurem Caier Penbulgoite, que nunc Exonia vocatur obsecratur, eandem adiuit, cumque octo diebus eandem obsedit, superuenit Aruragus cum exercitu suo, preliumque commisit: die illa, valde laceratus fuit utrorumque exercitus, sed neuter est victor: potius, mane autem facto, mediante Geniussa regina, concordie effecti sunt. Matthew of Westminster writeth: Aruragus Britannorum rex in tantam preliis est superbiis, quod Romana potestatis noluit diutius subiectionem parere. Vespasianus igitur a Claudio missus cum in Rutapi portu applicare incepisset, Aruragus illi obuius prohibuit ne ingrederetur. At Vespasianus retortisque velis in Totonefio littore est applicatus, et ciuitatem qua Britannice Caier Penbulgoite, nunc autem Exonia appellatur obsedit: clapsis inde septem diebus Aruragus superuenit, preliumque commisit, et utrorumque exercitus valde lacerato, mediante Geniussa Claudi filia, duces amici facti sunt.

In the historie intituled, Noua historia de gestis Anglorum a Britonibus vsque ad Henricum sextum, is written the like in effect: Vespasianus a Claudio missus est ut Aruragum pacificaret, vel Romana ditioni restitueret, cui obuius Aruragus, prohibuit ne terram suam ingrederetur, timens Vespasianum armorum cohortem, retraxit sese, retortisque velis in Totonefio littore est applicatus, atque urbem Exonia obsedit, post septem dies superuenit Aruragus, prelium committitur, laceraturque utrorumque exercitus, sed neuter potitur victoria, demum mediante Geniussa regina, reconciliati sunt. It was also in manie troubles and great perplexities, in the vncertaine and troublefome states of this realme, when sometimes the Romans, sometimes the Brits, sometimes the Scots, sometimes the Saxons, and sometimes the Danes made their incursions and warres within this land, by reason whereof the records and memorials in those daies for the most part were lost and consumed.

40 And yet Matthew of Westminster writeth that it was besieged by Penda king of Mercia, in the yeare of our Lord 632, in the time of Cadwallin one of the last kings of the Britons. The historie is this, Edwin the Saxon king of the Northumbers, having wars against Cadwallin: Cadwallin, did he preuaile and had such conquests over him, that Cadwallin was driven to forsake his realme of Wales, and to flee into Ireland, where he being, was bene carefull and pensifull how to recover his countie againe. Wherefore he repareth his armie and gathereth a new force, and gaue sundrie attempts to achieve to his purpose: but all was in vaine, for he could neuer set foot on land in his countie. Edwin was alwaies at hand and in a readinesse to uop and resist the same, for this Edwin had about him in his seruice a man named Pellitus, who was a magician and verie skilfull in necromancie, and who by his art and science did foretew and declare vnto Edwin what things were a doing and attempted against him.

60 Cadwallin hauing continuallie euill successe, was in utter despaire and distrust to preuaile against Edwin, and therefore as one giuing ouer all, saileth ouer the seas into Armozica now called little Britaine, vnto Salomon the king thereof, and vnto him dooth disclose his miserable estate and fortune, as also greatlie complaineth of Pellitus and of his sorceries. When these two kings had thoroughlie consulted and debated the matter, it was at length concluded and thought best, that some one man being bold and witty should be sent ouer to the court of king Edwin, to giue the aduenture to kill Pellitus. Whereupon the matter being discovered to Wilenus nephew to king Cadwallin, he taketh vpon him to enterpryse terpise the matter, and to couer himselfe from all suspicion, apparelleth himselfe in a poze beggers weed, and so sailleth ouer into England, and traueleth forthwith towards king Edwins court, who then laie at Poike, and there ioineth and accompanieth himselfe among the poze people, whose custome and maner was, to lie about the kings gates at dinner and supper times, waiting for the almesse usuallie giuen and wont to be distributed amongst the poze.

Pellitus being the kings almoner, and hauing the charge to distribute the said almesse, commeth forth and setteth the poze folke in order. Wilemus being there and amongst them, watcheth his time to worke his purpose, and thrusting himselfe in the middle of the presse of the people, suddenly with his poldado or weapon which for the purpose he had prepared, thrusteth Pellitus into the bodie, & gaue him a deadlie wound whereof he died, and forthwith (the thing in such a thrust not perceived) thrusteth himselfe awaie priuillie, and through woods, hills, thickets, and dales out of the common waie, commeth to this citie of Excester, & declareth vnto the citizens (who were then Britons) what he had done: whereof they were verie glad and iollull, and in good hope that their king Cadwallo should yet againe returne; and therefore vpon good aduise doo prepare and make readie both themselves and the citie, aswell for the resisting of the enimie, as for the receiuing, succouring and aiding of their king.

King Wenda aduertised of this murder, and vnderstanding the whole course of the matter and practice, taketh in grieffe the iniurie thus done to his neighbor and countreiman king Edwin. And therefore to reuenge the same mustreth his subiects and gathereth a great armie; and vnderstanding that Wilemus was come to this citie marcheth towards the same, and in the end laieth his siege round about it, minding the bitter subuersion thereof. But the citizens manfullie withstanding his force, did defend and keepe both themselves and their citie, untill that king Cadwallo, who before was aduertised both of the fact of Wilemus and of this preparation of Wenda, did with his force and armie come to the citie, who did not onelie rescue the same; but also toining the battell with his enimie gaue him the ouerthrow, and so deliuered his countrie, and recouered himselfe and his kingdome.

It was also in greater troubles in the time of king Alured or Alfred the fourth sonne to king Ethelwulfus. For Polydorus and others doo write, that in the first yeare of the said kings reigne, the Danes concluded a peace with the said king, and gaue hostages for the true keeping thereof. And yet notwithstanding most perfidiouslie and falselie contrarie to the same, they assembled themselves, and vpon a sudden marched to this citie, and perforce entered and toke the same: Daci etenim qui religionem & fidem pro suo commodo postponendam ducebant, Londino se mouent, & maximis itineribus Exoniam proficiscuntur, urbemq; per vim capiunt. But long they inioied not the same, for after that winter passed, the king to be reuenged marcheth with a great power to this citie, which the Danes vnderstanding and thinking themselves too weake to withstand the k. as also bitterlie distrusting the citizens, thrust themselves awaie, of which some fled vnto Dartmouth and there toke shipping, and who for the most part were drowned in a tempest at the seas. Some fled to Chipenham or (as some saie) to Bisslow, but the king folloied and pursued these so sharplie, that he neuer left nor gaue ouer, untill he had overcome and slaine the capitaine Hubbert and Hungar.

Likewise in the ninetenth yeare of the reigne of the said king, the Danes contrarie to their faith, pledges, and promises, did againe come to this citie, and laid siege to the same: Danorum exercitus anno 877, ab W. reham nocte quadam federe disrupto, ad Exoniam, quod Britanni dicitur Caerike, directum, at audito regis aduentu, ad puppes fugerunt, & in mari praedones manebant.

It was also besieged by the said Danes in the ninetenth yeare of king Egelfred, in the yeare of our Lord 1001. For the Danes, which were in Romanie, being aduertised of the good lucke, successe, and great spoiles which their companions and countreimen in England had, and their feet set on edge therewith, suddenly prepared shipping, and came ouer the coasts and landed in Denon, and forthwith marched and toke their course towards the citie of Excester, thinking to haue found the citizens napping & to haue taken them suddenly and vnawares; Sed ciuitas viriliter resistens resistit. The people & commons of Denon, Cornewall, Sumner set & Wode set, aduertised hereof, assembled themselves, & minding to rescue the citie, as also to encounter & aduerture the field with the Danes, met with them at a place neere the citie called Pimicho, and ioined battell with them, betwene whom the fight was cruell and the slaughter great. And thus doth Houeden testifie, whose words be these: Memoratus paganorum exercitus de Normannia in Angliam reuocatus, ostium suum Exe ingreditur, & mox ad extinguendam urbem Exoniam egreditur, sed dum murum illius destruere moliretur, ac ciuibus urbem viriliter defendentibus repellitur, unde nimis exasperatus more solito villas succendendo, agros depopulando, hominesque cadendo per Dommoniam vagatur, quare Dommonenses in unum congregati in loco qui dicitur Pimha certamen cum eis iniquit.

King Sweno being in Denmarke, and aduertised hereof, as also giuen to vnderstand how king Egelfred alias Ethelred or Egelfred had caused all the Danes in the realme to be suddenly slaine in one night, being much grieued therewith, did prepare and prouide a great armie for the reuenge thereof. And in the yeare of our Lord 1002, he landed in sundrie and diuerse parts of this realme, vng great hostilitie, and making great spoiles, and brought the whole land to an vnspokeable miserie and distresse: but at length, receiuing a tribute for a peace, he returned home into his owne countrie. Whomebeit the citizens of Excester hearing of this crueltie used in the east parts, made themselves strong: and doubting of so mightie an enimie, did make themselves readie, and prepared the citie to withstand him, if he should haue attempted anie force or hostilitie against them.

But the Dane being gone and returned home, and knowing nothing of this preparation, one Hugh then earle of Denon (as princes lacke no fawners) sent his letters into Denmarke to king Sweno, certifieng him both of the state and wealth of this citie, as also of the great preparation which had bene made to withstand him, persuading him not to suffer such an iniurie. And as coles will be some kindled: euen so the Dane vpon this aduertisement was in a great heat, and forthwith arreareth his armie, and repareth all things in readinesse to crosse the seas aneu to worke his will against this citie. And accordingly when time serued, in the yeare following, being the yeare of our Lord 1003, he toke the seas and landed vpon the coasts of Denon and Cornewall, and marched forthwith to this citie, and laid his siege against the same in the beginning of the moneth of August, and continued the same untill the kalends of September: during which time were sundrie sharpe, fierce, and cruell assaults giuen by the Dane, and as valiantlie resisted by the citizens.

But in continuance of time, when they saw them-solues daile more and more to be weakened, bivells to faile, the fire round about them, their walles beaten downe, themselves slaughtered and murdered, and the enimie to increafe and be strong, and in all these distresses, their king Eldred being fled into Normandie, to have no care of them, nor to prepare anye rescue, aid, or helpe for them: it was not to be marvelled, if in so heante a distresse they were amazed and astonished. And yet considering with themselves that Sweno was a Dane, a cruell enimie, a bloudie murderer, an usurping tyrant, having no other title to the crowne of England, but the sword, did with one consent agree and conclude, never to yeld nor give over whilste anye were left living able to withstand the same, wishing rather to die manfullie for their common wealth, than to live in reproch and infamie; and by death to reape an immortal fame, than by life to become ignominious & infamous, and in the end also to be the miserable slaves of a cruell and usurping tyrant.

Then therefore after manie assaults, all the most part of the ablest men were spent and consumed, and none or few left alive to withstand so mighty and so manie enimies: the Dane on the seven and twentieth daie of August, with force entered the citie, And after that he had ferued and satisfied his bloudie appetites, in deflowring the women, murdering the quiden, and making bayocke of all the people, he spoiled the citie, burned the houses, rased the walles, bet downe the temples, and left nothing to be done which might by fire, sword, and spoiles be consumed: and this is so witnessed by sundrie writers. Reinolph of Chelster writeth thus: Daci cum suo rege Sweno Excefrum venerunt, & vrbem funditus destruxerunt, nullare incolum relicta, que aut ferro aut igni vastari poterat: & omnia spolia cineribus tantum relicta secum deportauerunt. Hungarion hacthese vocat: Daci in a exarserunt sicut ignis quem velit aliquis sanguine extinguere: aduolantes igitur quasi multitudo locustarum, quidam Excefrum venerunt, & vrbem funditus destruxerunt: & omnia spolia cineribus tantum relicta secum deportauerunt.

Houeden thus saith: Rex Danorum Sweni peritium & pradiationem Normannie comitis, quem Emma Domnania profecerat, civitatem Exon infregit, spoliauit, & murum ab orientali vsq; ad occidentalem portam destruxit, & cum ingenti prada naues reperijt. It was also besieged by William the Conquerour in the first yeare of his reigne Anno 1068. For when he first entered this land, and by dint of sword sought the conquest thereof; the citizens of this citie, and the noble and gentlemen of all the countrie about, entered into one common league, conclusion and promise, to loine together and to withstand the enimie to the uttermost. And this confederacie being confirmed by a publike oth, preparation on all parts was made accordinglie, for the accomplishing of the same. But the conquerour hauing preuailed, and subdued in a maner the whole land, was aduertised that this citie stood upon their gard, and would not yeld nor submit themselves vnto him. Whereupon he sent his armie from London and besieged the same: and persecuting the siege to continue, marched and came himselfe vnto the same, but rather came no further than Salisbury. In the meane time the citizens were aduertised how the whole realme had yielded, and seeing also how their confederats did daile thinke awaie from them, and by that meanes they to grow weaker & weaker, and therefore the lesse able to withstand so great a force, and to keepe out so puissant an armie as was round about them; and considering also, that small mercie or fauor should they find if the citie by force were taken: did by way of intreatie offer submission, and desire peace, which in the end they obtained: and so passing a grieuous fline, they and the citie were restored.

But yet in token of his conquest, the king altered and changed the gates of the castell, and took an oth of all the citizens to be his liege and true subiects.

Houeden in his historie maketh mention, that Githa king Harold's mother should be within this citie, during the time that this siege and assault lasted: and persecuting the bent of the people to submit and yeld themselves, secretlie conuied herselfe awaie. For these be his words: Hyeme minuent, & vix Wilhelmus de Normannia in Angliam redijt, & Anglis importabile tributum imposuit: deinde in Dunmoniam hostiliter profectus est ad ciuitatem Excefrum, quam cines & nonnulli Anglici ministri contra illum retinebant: & obsedit, & infregit. Githa vero comitissa, mater scilicet Haroldi regis Anglorum, & soror Swani regis Danorum, cum multis de ciuitate fugiens, euasit & Flandriam petijt, cines autem dextris acceptis regi se dederunt. Also in the second yeare of king Stephen Anno 1137, the lords and pierces of the realme, remembering the oth which they had before made to king Henrie the first, to whom they swore to be true to Halw the kings onelie daughter and heire, and to hir heires, and yet contrarie to the same had sworn themselves to king Stephen, began to repent themselves, & consulted how to restore Halw the emperesse, and to expell Stephen. Wherefore they assembled themselves in armie, & diuided themselves into sundrie cities, towne and castles.

Among whom one Baldwin Biduers then erle of Deuon, with force entered and took this citie. But the king so sharpelie followed and pursued him, that he dyaue him from hence into the Ile of Wight, which was then his lordship. But the king when he had receiued the citie into his faith, marched with his armie to the said Ile, & took the same, as also the earle himselfe, whom he forthwith banished. But Halw the emperesse afterwards remembering this citie for such their seruice as she well liked, did enlarge the liberties of this citie, for whom yearelie euer after was an annuallie kept at the charges of the citie.

It was also in great troubles in the eleuenth pere of king Richard the second, Anno 1387. For a controuersie being fallen betwene the king & his two vnckles, the dukes of Yorke & Glocester, none were then so highlie in the kings fauour, as were Robert Here marques of Dublin, and Michaell de la Pole earle of Suffolke, & others of their faction. So these the king gaue in commandement, to collect and muster an armie, as it were for his defense, against his said vnckles: which when they had partlie done, whether it were because they mistrusted their owne parts, or whether they doubted of the sequelle of their doings, they left their iourneie towards London, as it was first appointed, and came towards this citie. The two dukes who stood upon their owne gard and defense, hauing aduertisement hereof, followed and persuaded them with all haste and speed: and hauing overtaken them at this citie, they ioined the fight with the marques and the earle. But they trusting more to their feet than to their hands, secretlie gaue the slip and fled awaie, making no staie before they came to Scotland; and from thence into Flanders, where they died.

It was moreover in troubles in the tenth pere of king Edward the fourth Anno 1469, when the states of this king, and of king Henrie the first were doubtfull, and the whole realme diuided: some following king Henrie, and some king Edward. In time of which troubles the dukes of Clarence, the lord Dineham, the lord Fitzwarren, and the baron of Carew, who followed and took part with king Henrie, came to this citie, being accompanied and stipated with a thousand fightingmen. The dukes was great with child, and lodged in the bishops palace, but the lords were in other houses within the close among the chanons, and here staied themselves. But sir Hugh Courtneie knight, who then fauoured and was on the part of king Edward, hearing of this assembly, raiseth an armie of his friends and allies, approacheth therewith vnto this citie, besiegeth it, beareth the bridges, and stoppeth all the waies leading to the same, and by which means no vittels could be brought to the markets: and being thus incamped about this citie, sendeth to the maior, requiring him either to open the gates and to giue him entrie, or to deliuer vnto him the gentlemen that were therein. On the other side, the gentlemen which were within, they either mistrusting the maior and citizens, or not willing to stand to his courttesie, and be vnder his gouernement, required the keies of the citie gates to be deliuered vnto their custodie, and that all things to be done by their order and appointment.

In these doubts and perplexities consulting what were best to be done, they did at length resolue & conclude neither to yeld to the requestes of them who were without, nor yet to satisfie the demands of them which were within the citie: but pacifieng both parties with such good words, and in such good order as they might, did reserue to themselves the keeping and safe custodie of the citie, being the chamber of the king, & parcell of the reuenues of the crowne, to the onlie vse of the king and crowne, as to them in dutie and allegiance did apperteyne. And therefore forthwith they rampired vp the citie gates, fortified the walles, appointed souldiers, and did set all things in such good order as in that case was requisite, leauing nothing vndone which might be for the preservation of the state & commonwealth of the citie.

But yet for want of forescasting, in proccesse of time the provision within the citie waied short, and vittels to be scant; whereof it was doubted there would insue some famine, which the common people neither could nor would indure, if some remedie were not in due time had and prouided. The magistrats did their best indeuor euerie waie, as well by diligence in following, as by counselling, in perswading euerie man to continue firme and true to the publike state, and their owne priuate commonweale. And albeit the common people were impatient to abide troubles, and loth to indure the present state of want and famine; yet they had that respect to their owne truth, faith, and safetie, as euerie man yelded himselfe contented to abide and indure the time of their deliuerance: and by the good will of God it followed, and the same toke good effect.

For about twelue daies after this sturre begun, by waie of intreatie and mediation of certaine chanons of the cathedrall church of this citie, the siege was remoued and raised; whereupon verie shortly after did insue the field of Edgecourt, where the duke of Clarence and the earle of Warwicke being put to the worst, did flee vnto this citie, and made their entrie into the same the third daie of Aprill, 1470, and laie in the bishops palace for a few daies, vntill they had caused to be prouided ships at Dartmouth for their passage ouer into Calis.

The king being aduertised which waie his enemies were gone, followed and pursued them with an armie of fortie thousand men, and came to this citie the fourteenth of Aprill 1470, hauing with him in his companie sundrie & diuerse great lords and estates, as namelie the bishop of Ely lord tresuror of England, the duke of Suffolke earle marshall of England, the duke of Suffolke, the earle of Arundell, the earle of Wiltshire son to the duke of Buckingham, the earle of Shrewsburie, the earle Rivers, the lord Hastings, the lord Greie of Codner, the lord Audleigh, the lord Saie, the lord

Sturton, the lord Dacres, the lord Mountie, the lord Stanleie, the lord Ferris, & the baron of Dudley, with a number of knights and gentlemen. But they all came too late; for the duke and the earle were both departed and gon to the seas before their comming.

Wherefore the king, after that he had rested and reposed himselfe here three daies, he departed and returned to London. It was also in great troubles, being besieged in the twelue yeare of king Henrie the seventh: by one Perkin Warbecke, 1470, who in the beginning of the moneth of September came to this citie, and incamped about it with his whole armie with ordinance battered the walles, fired the gates, vndermined it, and with mightie ladders scaled them, and left nothing vndone which might be to compass their attempt: thinking and supposing that small would be the resistance against them. But such was the noble courage and valiant stomach of the citizens, that they manfully resisted and defended those forces, and indured the same to the bittermost, vntill that the king being aduertised thereof, did send the lord Edward Courtneie, earle of Denon and the lord William his sonne, with sundrie others well appointed, who came and rescued the citie: but in certeine conflicts the said earle and others were hurt; notwithstanding the enimie had the repulse, and was obliged to raise his campe and to depart.

Finallie & last of all, it was besieged in the third yeare of king Edward the sixt, 1549, by the commons of Denon and Cornewall: the historie whereof, so much as hitterto it hath not bene fullie and at large set forth by anie man, & wherat I John Hooker the writer herof was present, and I Iohn Iacobus of things then done, I will somewhat at large discourse & set downe the whole course & manner of the same. It is apparant and most certeine, that this rebellion first was raised at a place in Denon named Sampford Courtneie, which lieth west wards from the citie about sixtene miles; vpon mondaie in the Whitson weeke being the tenth daie of June 1549. The cause thereof (as by the sequelle it did appeare) was onelie concerning religion; which then by act of parliament was reformed, and to be put in execution on Whitsondaie the ninth of June. The which daie being now come, and the statute made for the same to be put in execution throughout the whole realme: it was accordingly with all obedience receiued in euerie place, and the common people well inough contented therewith euerie where; sauing in this west countrie, and especiallie at the said Sampford Courtneie.

For albeit at the daie appointed by statute, they had heard and were present at the diuine seruice said, and had according to the new reformed order, and could not in anie respect, find fault, or iustlie repprehend the same: yet (as old bottels which would not receiue new wine) would rather wallow in the old dreggs and puddels of old superstition, than to be fed and refreshed with the wholesome and heauenlie manna. Wherefore they confederated themselves, bitterlie to renounce, reiect, and cast off the same, not onelie to the great offense of God, whome they ought in all truth and veritie to reuerence and hono; and to the great displeasure of the king, whome in all dutifullnesse they ought to haue obeyed: but also to the raising of open rebellion, the cause of the spoile of the whole countrie, and the vndoing of themselves, their wiues, and children; as in sequelle and in the end it fell out and came to passe.

And here doth appeare what great detriments do come and insue to the church of God, and what great troubles trouble to the publike and commonweale: when as learned preachers doe want to teach and instruct the people; and well persuaded magistrats to gouerne the common state. For these people lacking the one, & not stored with the other, were left to themselves, and to their owne dispositions: and thereby partlie of ignorance, but more of a froward and a rebellious disposition, they doe now bitterlie condemne to accept, and doe openlie resist to receiue the reformed religion, now put, and to be put in vze and execution. For vpon the said mondaie, the priest being come to the parish church of Sampford, & preparing himselfe to saie the seruice according to the booke & reformed order set forth, & as he had done the daie before: some of the parishioners, namelie one William Underhill a tailor, and one Segar a laborer, and others who had consulted and determined before of the matter, went to the priest, and demanded what he ment to doe, and what seruice he would saie: Who answered that according to the lawes set forth, he would saie the same seruice as he had done the daie before. Then they said, that he should not so doe, saing further, that they would keepe the old and ancient religion, as their forefathers before them had done; and as king Henrie the eight by his last will and testament had taken order, that no alteration of religion should be made, untill king Edward his sonne were come vnto his full age. And therefore, for so much as he was now but a child, and could doe nothing, they also would not haue any change.

In the end, all the parishioners joining and taking parts together, were all of the same mind, willing and charging the priest that he should vse and saie the like seruice as in times past he was wont to doe: who in the end, whether it were with his will, or against his will, he relied to their minds, and yielded to their wills: and forthwith ransheth himselfe in his old popish attire, and saith masse, and all such seruices as in times past accustomed. These newes, as a cloud caried with a violent wind, and as a thunder clay sounding at one instant through the whole countrie, are caried and noised euen in a moment through out the whole countrie: and the common people so well allowed and liked thereof, that they clapped their hands for ioye, and agreed in one mind, to haue the same in euerie of their seuerall parishes.

The iustices of peace dwelling not far from Sampford, being aduertised how disorderlie, & contrarie to the lawes, things had bene done in the church of Sampford; and how that the common people were clustered and assembled together, to continue and to mainteine their lewd & disordered behaviour: such of them, namelie, sir Hugh Polard knight, Anthonie Harvie, Alexander Wood, and Marke Slader esquires came & met at Sampford, minding to haue had conference with the chiefe plaiers in this enterlude, aswell for the redresse of the disorder already committed, as also to persuaade and pacifie the rest of the people. But they partlie vnderstanding before hand of the iustices coming, were so addited and wholie bent to their follies, that they fullie resolved themselves, to fullie to mainteine what naughtilie they had begun. And therefore, when the iustices were come to the place, and requested to talke with them, they refused it; vntil the said gentlemen would leaue all their men behind, and go with them into a certaine seuerall close not far off; and so they would be contented to conferre with them.

The gentlemen, albeit they and their men were the greater number, and sufficient to haue repressed the small companie of the commoners then & there assembled: yet whether it were because they thought in such a case to vse all the best & quietest waie for the pacifying of them; or whether some of them being like affected as they were, did not like the alteration, as it was greatlie suspected: they yielded, and according to the motion made, they left their men in the towne, & went into the foresaid close, & there hauing had conference a pretie while together, did in the end depart without anie thing done at all. Whereof as there appeared some weaknesse in the said iustices which were so white liured, as they would not, or durst not to repress the rages of the people (which they might haue done) so therof also ensued such a scab as passed their cure, and such a fire as they were not able to quench. For the commons hauing now their willes, were set vpon a pin, that the game was theirs, and that they had wone the garland before they had runne the race; nothing forcailling what might ensue, nor yet accounting what follie it is to triumph before the viduie. Wherefore they assemblie & confederat themselves throughout the whole shire in great troops and companies, and doe associat and flocke vnto them the Cornish people, minding to ioyne together, and fullilie to mainteine what rashlie they had begun.

The king and counsell then occupied in the weightie causes concerning the state of Scotland, being aduertised of this towards rebellion, & respecting the speedie redresse thereof, sent forthwith for sir Peter Carew knight, who then was in Lincolne shire, and for sir Calwen Carew, who was then attendant at the court: and to them commandement was given, that forthwith, and with all speed they should hasten and depart into Deuon, and there to vse, by the aduise of the iustices, all the best meanes and waies that they might for the appeasing of this rebellion, quieting of the people, and pacifying of the countrie; and to cause euerie man quietlie to returne to his home, and to refer the causes of their griefs and complaints (if they had anie) vnto the king and counsell: and if they then refused so to doe, they to vse such other good means and waies as might be for the suppressing of them. And the counsell being daile more and more aduertised, that these begun rebellions did more and more increase; and doubting of the sequels thereof, by reason that in other places of the realme the like tumults were begun, though not for the like causes; doe direct and give an order to the lord Russell, then lord priue seale, and after earle of Bedford, that he also should follow and dispatch himselfe into Deuon; and he had a commission to deale in such order as he might best doe for the pacifying of the said tumults and disorders.

The foresaid two knights, hauing receiued their commission vnder the kings hand, came in post into the countrie, and making their repaire to this citie, doe forthwith send for sir Peters Courtneie then shiriffe and the iustices of the peace of the countrie, and vnderstanding, that a great companie of the commons were assembled at Crediton, which is a towne distant about seauen miles from Excester, and that among them were the Sampford men: & who were the chiefe of them toke counsell & aduise what was best to be done, and what waie meetest to be taken. In the end it was concluded, that the said sir Peter Carew and sir Calwen with others should ride to Crediton, & there to haue conference and speeches with the said commons, and to vse all the good waies and meanes they might to pacifie & appease them, they then supping, and being persuaaded, that by good speeches and gentle conferences they should haue bene able to haue compassed and persuaaded the said commons. But the people being by some secret intelligence aduertised of the coming of the gentlemen towards them, and they fullie resolved not to yeld one iote from their determinations, but to mainteine their cause taken in hand, do arme and make themselves strong, with such armors and furnitures as they had; they intrench the high waies, and make a nightie rampire at the towne end, and fortifie the same, as also the barns next adjoining to the said rampires with men and munition, hauing peried the wallies of the barns with loopes and holes for their shot.

The foresaid gentlemen knowing nothing hereof, rode on their tourneie, and being come almost to the towne, they were aduertised how the waies were stopped and rampired, and that they could not ride into the towne. Whereupon they alighted from their horses, and after a little conference had, they agreed to go into the towne on foot, nothing thinking lesse that they should be stopped or denied to go in on foot. But when they came to the rampires they found the contrarie: for they not onelie were denied to come nere the rampire, but utterlie were refused to be talked to: withall no offers of persuasions nor motions of conference at all could be allowed. For the sun being in cancer, & the midsummer mone at full, their minds were imbued in such follies, and their heads caried with such vanities, that as the man of Athens they would heare no man speake but themselves, and thought nothing well said but what came out of their owne mouths.

The barns at the townes end at Kirkton are set on fire.

The gentlemen vpon such checks, taking the matter in euill part, to be so vnuercentlie and discourteouslie intreated, with one consent do agree to make waie ouer the rampire. But in the aduenture thereof they were so galled both by them which kept the rampires, and speciallie by such as were within the barnes, that they were faine to retire and giue place, with the losse of some, and the hurt of manie. In which distresse, a certeine seruingman named For, and referring to sir Hugh Pollard, suddenly set one of the barnes on fire: whereupon not onelie such as were therein, but all they also which were in the rampires fled and ran awaie. And then the gentlemen hauing recovered the rampire went into the towne; but there they found none except a few poore and old people, the residue trusting better to their heels than to their armes were fled to a further place: and then they returned againe to Excester without anie thing done.

In assemble
at Clift & Ha-ric or bishops Clift.

The noise of this fire and burning was in post hast, and as it were in a moment caried and blazed abroad throughout the whole countrie; and the common people vpon false reports, and of a gnat making an elephant, noised and spread it abroad, that the gentlemen were altogether bent to ouer-run, spoile, and destroy them. And in this rage, as it were a swarme of wasps they cluster themselves in great troops and multitudes, some in one place, and some in an other, fortifieng and intrenching themselves as though the enimie were readie to invade and assaile them. And among other places one was at a village belonging to the lord Russell named St. Marie Clift distant from Excester about two miles, where the commons of the countrie thereabout had begun to fortifie the towne for their defense & safetie.

A cause whie they rose at bishops Clift.

The cause and pretense of their doings herein, was not onelie the burning of the barnes at Crediton aforesaid, which all the commons generallie did vse for a cloke of this their rising and rebellion: but this one thing also increased their disposition. It happened that a certeine gentleman named Walter Raleigh dwelling not far from thence, as he was vpon a hie holie daie riding from his house to Excester, ouertooke an old woman going to the parish church of saint Marie Clift, who had a paire of beads in hir hands, and asked hir what she did with those beads? And entring into further speches with hir concerning religion, which was reformed, & as then by order of law to be put in execution, he did persuade with hir that she should as a good christian woman and an obedient subiect yeld the rebvnto; saying further, that there was a punishment by law appointed against hir, and all such as would not obcie and follow the same, and which would be put in execution vpon them.

This woman nothing liking, nor well digesting this matter, went forth to the parish church, where all the parishioners were then at the seruice: and being vnpatient, and in an agonie with the speches before passed betwene hir and the gentleman, beginning to vpheld in the open church verie hard and vnseemlie speches concerning religion, saying that she was threatened by the gentleman, that except she would leane hir beads, and giue ouer holie bread and holie water, the gentlemen would burne them out of their houses and spoile them, with manie other speches verie false and vntrue, and whereof no talke at all had passed betwene the gentleman and hir. Notwithstanding she had not so soon spoken, but that she was beleued: and in all hast like a sort of wasps they sing out of the church, and get them to the towne which is not far from thence, and there began to intrench and fortifie the towne, sending abroad into the countrie round about, the news aforesaid, and of their doings in hand, flocking, and procuring as manie as they could to come and to ioinie with them.

And they fearing or mistrusting, least the gentlemen which were then at Excester, would come vpon them, they first fortified the bidge, which lieth at the end of the towne towards the citie, and laid great trees ouerthwart the same, as also planted certeine peeces of ordnance vpon the same, which they had procured and fetched from Topsham a towne not far from thence. But before they came into the towne, they ouertooke the gentleman maister Raleigh aforesaid, and were in such a choler, and so fell in rages with him, that if he had not shifted himselfe into the chappell there, and had bene rescued by certeine mariners of Ermouth which came with him, he had bene in great danger of his life, and like to haue bene murdered. And albeit he escaped for this time, yet it was not long before he fell into their hands, and by them imprisoned and kept in prison in the towne and church of saint Sidwelles, without the east gate of the citie of Excester, during the whole time of the commotion, being manie times threatened to be executed to death. But to the matter.

These the doings of the commons being aduertised to sir Peter Carew, who then was in Excester, assembleth all the iudices & the gentlemen, & conferreth with them what were best to be done; and in the end, concluded & agreed that he, sir Salwen Carew, sir Thomas Denis, sir Hugh Pollard, and sundrie others should ride to Clift, and there to vse all the best meanes they might, for the pacieng and quietting of them. And accordingly in the next morning being sundae they all rode thither: and being come almost to the bidge, they perceived the same to be rampired, & no waie to be open for them to passe into the towne. Whereupon sir Peter Carew alighted from his horse, and mistrusting nothing, was going on foot toward the bidge. But such was the rancoz and malice conceiued against him, partlie for religion, and partlie for the burning of the barnes at Crediton, which was laid altogether to his fault, that the gunner whose name was John Hamon an alien and a smith, and dwelling then at Tawdurbie, not far from Clift, by the procurement and abetting of

of some there, hauing charged his pace of ordinance there lieng, leuelled the same, to haue shot and discharged it at him: which he had done, if one Hugh Whorne servant then to forgeant Wydeor had not let him and staied his hand.

The gentlemen perceiuing they could not passe into the towne, doo send in a messenger vnto the towne, aduertising them that they were come to talke friendlie with them, as also to satisfie them if they had anie cause of grieffe, or were by anie bodie misused. They at this message and motion staggered a while and cast manie doubts: but in the end they sent word that they were contented, that if sir Thomas Denis, sir Hugh Pollard, and Thomas Pard esquier, would come into the towne to them and leaue their men behind them, as also would take order, and giue their faith and promise that no hurt should be done or offered to be done vnto them, whyles they were thus in conference together: that then vpon these conditions they would be contented to talke with them. Vpon which promise made and assured vnto them, the foresaid three gentlemen went into the towne about ten of the clocke in the forenoone, and there taried and spent the most part of the daie in much talke and to no purpose: as in the end it fell out.

The other knights and gentlemen, which in the meane while taried without, and waited a long time euen vntill the daie did draw toward night, began to mislike of the matter, some speaking one thing and some an other: yea and some of them in plaine speeches said they would ride ouer the water and issue into the towne. But the friends and seruicemen of the two knights, respecting the promise made before their entrie into the towne, but especially their masters safetie, which by breach of promise might be put in perill, did vtterlie mislike and were grieved with those speeches, and whereof began a little quarrelling among themselves, but forthwith pacified and quieted. And yet some one or two of the companie rode to the waters side, & with their slaues searched the depth thereof: for at that byldge the water at euerie tide (by reason that the seas are so nere) swelleth vp and reboundeth. Which thing when they in the towne did see, forthwith cried out alarm, and made much a doo; and some of them began and grew into such rages, that the gentlemen within the towne began to distrust their safetie.

Nevertheless the conference and talke herewith ended, and they came auaile: who as soone as they were come to sir Peter Carew, they were demanded what they had done, and how they had sped: who answered; Well enough: & giuing no other answer they rode all together to Excester, deferring the discouerie of their doings vntill their comming thither. The same night they supped all together, & after supper ended, and all the seruicemen auoided out of that come, sir Peter Carew demanded of them what they had done, and what agreement they had made: who answered that the commons had promised, and were contented to keepe themselves in god & quiet order, and to proceed no further in their attempts: so that the king and the counsell would not alter the religion, but suffer it to remaine and stie in the same state as king Henrie the eight left it, & vntill the king himselfe came to his full age. Sir Peter Carew and all the residue nothing liking this answer, being farre from their expectation, were for the time in a great dumpe or studie; but in the end misliked and discommended both the matter and the manner of their dealings: inso much that sir Peter Carew, and sir Pierce Courtenie, then shriffe of Devon, openlie, sharpe, and in plaine termes inueiled against them for their slouder, or rather sinister dealings in so weightie a cause: wherein they all ought rather to haue used all meanes to haue suppressed their outrages, than to haue maintained their follies: and therefore as there was a blame in them, so was there a plaine rebellion in the other.

But though the two knights would haue crested the matter, and haue purged their sinceritie herein; yet on ech side words were so multiplied, that they brake asunder without anie further dealings, and euerie man shifed for himselfe, some one waie some an other waie. The commons vnderstanding hereof stop all the high waies, casting great trenches, and laying great trees ouerthwart the same, and do watch & ward the same: and by that meanes sundrie gentlemen suspecting no such matter, and making waie to their appointed places, were intrapped, taken, and put in prison; and manie of them kept in durance, during the whole time of the commotion, & abode great hardnesse, and were in perill of life and limme: manie were taken because they would be taken, & found fauour; & manie for taking their houses and home, were driven to sequester and hide themselves in woods & secret places. In the citie none or verie few remained or taried, saving sir or seuen persons then knowne of: for by conference had before with the maior, it was knowne that the citie was vnprouided of sufficient vittels, meet for such a companie as the foresaid gentlemen were.

The gentlemen which taried and remained in the citie; namely, sir Roger Blewet knight, John Beauchampe, Bartholomew Fortescote, John Courtneie, & John Peter customer, esquiers, and others, did verie good seruice as well in their persons, as in their good aduises and counsels, saving such as secretlie kept themselves close in certeine houses then vnknotone. Sir Peter Carew verie earlie in the next morning took his horse, and the high waies being then not stopped he escaped and rode vnto George Denton, a place of sir Hugh Daules in Summersetshire: where was the lord Russell, being then newlie come from London, and vnto him he gaue to vnderstand, how all things had passed: who forthwith dispatched and sent him auaile to the king and counsell to aduertise them of the same. The king at the first hearing of the matter, was verie much grieved, & in great perplexitie in two respects; the one because at this instant the like tumults and rebellions (though for an other cause) were now raised and begun in other places; the other was because he was enforced to leaue and giue ouer the appointed attempt for the conquest of Scotland, and to implore now those soldiers and strangers, whome he had retained for that seruice, for the quenching of this fire kindled at home.

Nevertheless minding to follow the first, and to appeale the last, he sent verie courteous letters, gracious proclamations, and manie mercifull offers vnto all the commons of these parties, to haue pacified and satisfied them, if they had had so much grace so to haue accepted it. The commons being now entered in their follies, and hauing by then the gentlemen to the sight, doo openlie shew themselves traitors & rebels: and therefore assembling themselves doo appoint out capitains to direct & order both themselves, and all their proceedings; and as the common piouserbe is, Like lips like lettice, as is their cause, so are the rulers; the one being not so bold and euill, as they wicked or worse. The capitains then are these: Underhill a tailor, Gaunter a thowmaker, Seager a labourer, and Aylmeredge a fisher, with sundrie other such like, the worst men and the refuse of all others, thought most meet in this seruice. Vnto what it was not long before, that certeine gentlemen and peomen of god countenance and credit both in Deuon and Coznewall were contented, not onelie to be associats of this rebellion: but also to carrie the crosse before this proceſſion, and to be captains and guiders of this wicked enterpriſe, as namelie in Deuon ſir Thomas Pomeroie knight, John Burie and one Coffin gentlemen: & in Coznewall Humfrie Arundell and Willelme deſquiers, & Holmes a yeoman, with ſundry others, who for the moſt part were in the end created and put to death: and their facts to the memorie of their perpetuall infamie recorded in chronicles.

The principall & chiefe captains in Deuon being fullie reſolued by their owne power and authoritie to mainteine & continue the religion, according to the Romiſh church, & utterly to impugn the reformation therof, eſtabliſhed by act of parlement; & to ſupport the authoritie of the idoll of Rome (whome they neuer ſaw) in contempt of their true and lawfull king, whome they knew and ought to obeie: theſe ſaie ſent their meſſengers vnto the maior of this citie, whoſe name was John Blackaſler, to moue and praie him to ioyne with them, they thinking that they hauing by theſe meanes the libertie to haue free acceſſe to and from the citie, and the helpe of the citizens, ſhould not want monie or armoz, or anie thing elſe to ſerue their turne: the maior ſo with aduertized vnto his brethren this motion. And albeit ſome and the cheifeſt of them did like & were well affected to the Romiſh religion: yet reſpecting their dutie to God, their obedience to the king, their fidelitie to their countrie, and ſafetie of themſelues, gaue their full reſolute and direct answer, that they would not ioyne nor deale with them at all.

This answer was nothing liked, and therefore ſent they their ſecond meſſenger, requiring and commanding them to mainteine the old catholike religion with them, and to do as they did; or elſe they would beſiege them, and perforce compell them therunto. The maior and his brethren returned their former answer, adding moreover that they in their dwellings were wicked & bad men; & they did & would repute them for enemies and rebels againſt God, their king, and countrie: and ſo renounced them. The one ſide therefore as they prepare to beſiege the citie, and to worke all the extremities they can, by force to take that which by words they can not obtaine: ſo on the other ſide the maior and his brethren vpon good aduiſe, garbed and watched the citie with ſufficient men, armed both by daie and by night. The rebels (according to their determination) relying themſelues vpon a vaine hope, thinking that notwithstanding the answer before made; yet becauſe the moſt part of the citizens were of their opinions, and of the like affection in religion, would not reſiſt them: as alſo that they had manie friends within the citie, more ready to ioyne with them, than to follow the maior; if they might haue the choiſe what to do: they came being in number about two thouſand perſons, to the citie, vpon the ſecond of Julie 1549, firſt making proclamation that if the citie would not yeld, and ioyne with them, they would enter with force and take the ſpoile of it, & ſo then they vpon the deniſall compaſſed the ſame round about, and gained vnto them at the firſt all the ſuburbs.

And hereof they conceived ſuch a vaine hope to haue their full deſire vpon the citie, that not onelie the number in hope did daile more & more increaſe, but alſo manie of them brought their wines, hozles, and paniers; perſuading themſelues, and promiſing them, by ſuch a daie and vpon ſuch a daie to enter into the citie, and then to meaſure veluets and ſilks by the bow, and to lade their hozles home with plate, monie, and other great riches. The maior and his brethren forecaſting the perils which might in ſuch

a caſe iſſue, doe provide all things neceſſarie and meet therewith to defend themſelues, and to annoy the enemy. The citie therefore is viewed for armoz, men are muſtered, ſoldiers are retained, captains in euerie ward appointed, warders for the daie and watchmen for the night aſſigned, great peeces of ordinance laid in euerie gate, and placed in all conuenient places of the walls; mounts in ſundry places created, as well for laſeng of ordinance, as for ſauiug of the ſoldiers & watchmen from the enemies ſhot: and nothing was left vndone, which in anie reſpect that preſent ſtate and neceſſitie required.

The rebels likewiſe intrench the high waies, plaiſh downe trees, breake downe byldges, keepe watches and wards in euerie place; ſo that no man could paſſe to or from the citie without their ſufferance. The markets are ſtopped, vittels are kept from it, and all dealings and intercourſes ſhut and cut off: and hauing (as they bragged) penned and ſhut by the towneſmen in a cope or metw, they plant their ordinance againſt euerie gate, and in all other ſuch places as beſt to ſerue their turne, and to hurt them within: they burnt the gates, they brake by the pipes and conduits, aſwell for the taking auaie of the water comming to the citie, as alſo to haue the led to ſerue for their ſhot and pellets. But for the burning of the gates, there followed rather a benefit than a hurt thereof: for ſo with there were made certeine rampiers within the gate, which were farre ſtronger and of more deſenſe than the gates, as alſo there were ſiers continually kept euerie night betwix the rampiers and the gates: and as for water, the citie ſo ſtandeth vpon a little hill, that it is full of ſprings in euerie quarter within the ſame, and by that means full and plentiful of euerie good and ſweet waters. Alſo they in ſundry places did undermine the walls, minding thereby with gunpowder and with other matters fit for ſier to haue blowne by the walls, and ſo to haue entered in that waie: but herein they were alſo preuented by this means and in this manner.

The citie it ſelfe (as is before ſaid) is ſet vpon a little hill, and lieth berie ſteeping towards two of the gates. And at one of theſe named the weſt gate, the ſaid rebels had undermined on the one ſide, and filled the place with certeine barrells of powder, pitch, and other ſuffe, meet and apt to receiue ſier, and had appointed the night when the ſame ſhould be ſet on fier, and ſo to haue blowne the walls by. At the ſame time there was a certeine tinner in the citie, whoſe dwelling was at Teingemouth, named John Belcombe, who depended much vpon the goodwill and frendſhip of maſter William Hurſt one of the aldermen of the citie; and he vnderſtanding of ſuch an undermining to be in working, aduertized the ſame to maſter Hurſt, and maketh him priuie how he would preuent the ſame, which was done in this manner. For whereas he by a noiſe vnder the ground did ſuſpect the undermining to be in working, he took a pan of water, & did put the ſame on the ground, & by ſhaking of the water in the pan, he by removing the pan from place to place, came at length to the berie place, whereas the miners were working, and ſo with he countermined againſt the ſame, and brought ſo nere vnto it, until that he might and did ſee & loke into it. What done, he cauſed all the walls and ſtirs in the citie towards euerie ſtreet, hauing a fall that waie to be drawne at one time, and euerie man to fill therewith a great tub of water at his forcedore; which being done, he cauſed them all at one inſtant to be caſt out and emptied, which water running in great abundance towards the ſaid weſt gate, was conuerted into the place countermined, & ſo entered and drowned the place, which before was mined : at which time also by the godnesse of God, there fell a great thowze, as the like for the time had not bene seene manie years before, and which at that instant greatlie serued this turne.

The rebels perceiuing themselves disappointed of their purpose, gaue ouer to deale anie further in those attempts : howbeit otherwise they left nothing vndone which might be to annoie the citizens. For sometimes they made alarmes, as though they with all might and maine would haue giuen the scale : and indeed they had prouided ladders for the same purpose. Sometimes they by policies would seeke to come to the gates to burne them, and herein they vsed this stratagem. They prouided carts laden with old haie, & diuining the wheeles before them would come to the gate without danger, and so set fier in the gate. But notwithstanding they escaped not scotfree, for both at the west gate and at the south gate, their commings being perceiued, the great port peeces were charged with great bags of flint stones and haile shot : and as they were approaching vnto the gates, the gates were secretlie opened, and the said port peeces discharged; and so they were spoiled diuerse of them, & by that means they had small pleasure to follow those deuises; as also the citizens to prevent the same, did from thenceforth keepe the gates open. Likewise they would keepe themselves close in sundrie houses, in the suburbs nere the wals, and would so watch the garrets, that if anie within the citie would looke out at the garrets, was in the danger of their shot, and some thereby were killed, and manie hurt. Upon which occasion the citizens set some part of the suburbs on fier, and some part which was next to the wals they beat and brake downe, and so drave the rebels out of those holes. Besides this, they had in sundrie places their great ordnance, so set and placed, that in certeine streets and places none could go but in perill and danger of their shot, which their deuises were choked, by making of certeine mounts to shadowe the streets from the same. Diuerse other deuises they practised to the continuall annoiance of the citie, which though they were greivous and dangerous, yet not to be compared vnto the perills which were within the walles among themselves, and whereof had insued the confusion of the whole citie, had not the Lord God of his godnesse kept and preferred the same. For the serpent of diuision, and the fier of malice, was entered into the citie, manie being inuicened with the one, but more scoulden with the other.

In the citie there were two sorts of people, the one and the greater number were of the old stamp, and of the Romish religion. The other being of the lesser number were of a contrarie mind and disposition, for they wholie relied themselves to the reformed religion, and to the kings proceedings, and inuicened themselves to obey and follow the same. The first were so addicted to their owne fantasies, and their bottels were so farre seasoned with the old wines, that they cannot abide to heare of anie other religion, than as they were first rayled in. Wherefore to keepe and obserue that, was their onelie endeuor, and in respect whereof they regarded not king nor kelsar, passed not for kin nor friendship, regarded not countrie nor commonwealth, but were wholie of the opinion of the rebels, and would haue no reformation in religion; and how so ever all other things sared, that must needs remaine as in times past had bene vsed.

The magistrates and chiefe persons of the citie, albeit they were not as yet fullie resolved and satisfied in religion, yet they not respecting that, but cheselie their dutifullnesse to the king and commonwealth, nothing like the rebellion, nor beare with the same, but they do all things to defend the citie and themselves against their rebellious attempts, and likewise do their best indenuor to keepe their owne citizens in peace and quietnesse. Whereupon the fauourers of the old Romish religion, being inwardlie grieued, that they could not haue their will, nor obteine to haue the gates to be opened, that those good and religious men (as they termed them) might come in, they vsed priuat conferences with them, sometimes by secret conferences ouer the wals, sometimes by priuat letters priuillie conueied to and fro, by messengers lurking and attending for the same, sometimes by open speeches in times of truce, and manie times by bills and letters bound fast about arbotwies, and so shot to and fro: and by these and other such like means they discovered ech one to the other their purposes and wicked deuises and practises: all which tended to this effect, to betraie the citie, and to set vp the religion.

Howbeit, these things were not so secretlie done, but the same were knowne, & manifest arguments and proofes thereof did appeare. And among sundrie some one of them being one of good credit and countenance, and of the number of the common council, whose name was John Wolcot a merchant, was so farre enchanted herein, that vpon a certeine daie he being (as his course came about) a capteine for the daie, and to ward one of the gates that daie, presuming that partlie by reason of his charge that daie, and partlie for that he was one of the common council, he might do more than in deed did appertene to him, he vpon his first comming to the west gate in the morning met with certeine of his confederats, and after conference had with them, went suddenlie out at the wicket of the gate (which gate as then was not rampired) and carrieng the keyes with him, went vnto the rebels, and had a long conference with them. But it toke small effect, for he promised (as it after appeared) more than he could performe, which turned to his great discredit: both for that he himselfe verie hardlie escaped their hands who were bent to haue kept and reteined him, as they did the two others, who went out with him: as also when he came in, was both checked and blamed for his doings.

At an other time the maior vpon an occasion assembled all the commoners vnto the Guildhall, & merie man being in his armor, and the papists being then the greater number, some one of them named Richard Tailor, a clothier, thinking by making of a tumult or an vniuersal they should be too hard for the others, and so attaine to their purposes, hauing his bowe bent, did nocke his arrow, minding to haue stricken the man to whom he leuelled the shot: but gaing his hand, and missing his marke, he strooke his owne and best friend John Peter the kings cosin, a gentleman of good countenance and credit, who had died thereof, had not the arrow lighted vpon one of his rib bones: a great muttering was like to haue byed a tumult, but the matter knowne it was appeased. Also at an other time there was a practise made with the souldiers, who had the charge and custodie of the castell, that they should receiue in at the posterne of the said castell, a certeine number of the rebels; wherevnto the said souldiers through corruption had giuen their consent. The daie and time were appointed for the same: but whether the same by secret aduertisement were discovered, or whether the matter were mistrusted, or whether it pleased God to moue the hearts of certeine men to take the view of the castell, & of the maner of the souldiers charges there: it is most certeine that by the repaire & refozt of certeine men, vnder the colour to walke and see the trecherie, it was espied, and the practises discovered.

red, and their whole deuises preuented. Likewise manie times and often there were truces made, and sundrie parles and conferences had with the rebels, which were procured to the onlie end that they might compass their deuises. And this was a common practise with them, that when soeuer the parles was appointed, there should be hostages or pledges put in on both parties: and they as men vpon whom the greatest weight of the matter did depend, would require to haue the best and most chosen citizens, to be hostages with them, in stead and for the safetie of those which they would send to the parles for them, who for the most part were the refuse, the scumme, and the rascals of the whole countrie, and yet such they were in this case, as who ruled the roose and bore the whole or chiefest swaie; and the worse the man, the greater his authoritie among them, which was good enough for so wicked a matter taken in hand, according as the common adage is: Dignum patella operculum, Like lips like lettice.

But during the time of these truces and parles, there being then a time and scope of libertie to talke and conferre with them euerie man at his pleasure, there wanted no deuises vnder colour of friendly conferences, to deuise how to compass their intents: howbeit it pleased the eternall God, so to carrie and rule the hearts of the magistrats, that albeit being nuzled in the Romish religion they were affected therewith, yet they so much respected their dutie to their prince, and the safetie to their commonwealth, that they openlie professed they would neuer yeild the citie so long as they liued, and were able to keepe and defend the same.

For the maior himselfe maister William Hurst, maister John Buller, maister John Writnall, maister William Periam, & others of the ancientest of the citie, were by sundrie means, waies, deuises, and reasons, perswaded to conioine themselves in this rebellion with the commoners. They all with one mind and one voice gaue a flat answer that in the citie they had bene brought by, where they had gotten their livings, there they had sworne their fidelitie and allegiance to their king and prince, there they had faithfully hitherto serued him, and there would so continue so long as they could to the uttermost of their powers, all which their promises & anowyses (the Lord be praised) they performed.

But to the matter. Sundrie other trecheries & deuises were practised, which particularlie to recite were verie tedious & to no purpose. The last but the most perillous practise was this. When these malecontents saw themselves to be preuented in all their deuises, which before they had but secretlie and pyuatie practised, now they conioining themselves together did openlie shew and declare themselves, being perswaded that because they were the greater number, and that also the most part of the poore people were wearie, and for want of vittels would not indure to be pinned in anye longer, that therefore manie would ioyne against a few, and that the game would go on their side.

And so on a sundrie being but two dayes before the deliuerie of the citie, about eight of the clocke in the forenoone, a compaignie of them in euerie quarter of the citie, hauing their consorts in a readines to ioyne & serue with them (if need so required), get into the streets, walking with their weapons about their anour, as to fight with their enemies, and cry out, “Come out these heretikes and thowpaine bohemyn; “Where be they? By Gods wounds & blood we will “not be pinned in to serue their turne; We will go out “and haue in our neighbors, they be honest, god, and “godlie men. Their pretense and meaning being then, that if anye of the contrarie side had come out, they would haue quarrelled with them, and haue taken occasion to set vpon him and so raise a new tumult.

But by the providence and goodnesse of God it so fell out, that some being in their houses, and some at their parish churches, the maior and magistrats were first aduertised herof, before the others heard anie thing of the matter: and they according to their wisdoms pacified the matter, and sent John Thre-cent, John Sharke, and others the belovdedders of this flocke into their houses. Wherby in the south gate street and at the south gate, there was a little stir, which being some stopt; there ensued no hurt therof, other than a broken pate or two: for as it fell out, the wardens of that gate at that time were against them and of the greater compaignie. These and manie other like practises were daily and continually used on the one side, which in the end came to no effect, because the Lord kept the citie.

The others on the other side being altogether bent to honor God, obeye the king, and to serue in their commonwealth, were fullie resolute to keepe and defend the citie, whose cause being iust and god, was sufficient of it selfe to keepe them in that mind: and yet their courage was the more, for that they saw the good bent of the maior and magistrats; who, howsoeuer they were affected otherwise in religion, yet they were wholly bent and determined to keepe and defend the citie: and therefore they seeing the industrie, carefulnesse, service and painefulnesse, of these men, did fauour, incourage, and countenance them, and (to saie the truth) by the industrie and god service of them, the citie was chieflie kept and preserved.

For there was no seruice to be done within, nor exploit to be aduentured without vpon the enimie (as manie times there were sallies giuen) but these were the chiefest and commonlie the onlie doers: for which cause the contrarie side maruelouslie maligned at them, and sought by all means how to impeach and indanger them. Which thing being daily perceived more and more by sundrie arguments, and as wise men seeking how to preuent the same, did manie and sundrie times confer among themselves herein, and in the end made a covenant and a faithfull promise among themselves (being then about the number of one hundred persons) that they would stand firmelie and faithfullie to the defense and keeping of the citie to their uttermost powers.

And if it so fell out, that the rebell and enimie should haue access and entrie into the citie, that then they should all meet at the lord Rasseles (now the earle of Bedfordes) house, and there to issue out at the poierne of the garden, and to giue the adventure to passe and to escape auaire, as also if they were trisited that then they to stand together to their defense. And for this purpose they had then named some one man to be their capitaine for this enterprise. And in the meane time, to do all things xtrinspectie for the preservation of the citie, & by a particular covenant among themselves, did take order, that during the whole besieging of the citie and their aboad therein, a certaine number by course and besides the ordinarie set watch, should watch, ward, and walke about continually both by daie and night, by which means no sleight nor treacherie could be practised, but that they should haue an inkeling and vnderstanding thereof, and which indeed stood and came to such effect that it was the chiefest (if not the onlie) cause of the preservation of the citie for that time. For there was no seruice, no diligence, no care, nor anie thing wanting or left vndoone, which by these men was not done.

among these men, wherof had insued a great detriment to the common state, and an ouerthrow to themselves, had it not in due time bene presented.
There were two gentlemen within this citie, and both of this companie, the one was borne of a honorable house and parentage, named John Courtneie a younger sonne to sir William Courtneie of Bozeberham knight, and a man of verie good knowledge and experience in seruice. The other also was a man of verie good seruice, practise, and experience, his name was Barnard Duffeld, & servant to the lord Russell, and keeper of his house in Excester. Both of these were verie forward and carefull in this present seruice against the rebels. But there fell an emulation betwixne them, which albeit it be verie commendable in good things, & he praiseworthy who can best excell therein: yet when the same shall tend to a diuision of a publike state, the dissolution of a commonwealth, the breach of common societie, or the maintenance of anie euill, it is utterly to be hunned and lamented.

It happened vpon an occasion offered, that certaine of this companie vpon a time issued out at the fo; said posterne and made a sallie vpon the enimies, and had such good successe, that some of them they slew, some they tooke prisoners, as also spoiled them of their goods, and brought a brate with them some of their ordnance, namelye basses and slings: holobest they all escaped not scotfree, for some of them were taken, some also were hurt, as namelye John Drake, who the yeare before was the receiuer of the citie was shot through the cheekes with an arrow, which he brought into the citie with him, and one John Simons a coke was so hurt that he died thereof.

But among them all one John Goldsmith being of that companie and servant to Richard Helierd of the same goldsmith, and a Fleming borne, had the best successe: for in the same skirmish he was taken prisoner by one of the rebels, who offered in taking of him with his bill to haue slaine him. With that this John Goldsmith fell downe & yielded himselfe, hauing then in his hand his peece of handgun charged, & suddenlye the other not mistrusting nor marking the same, he discharged into his verie bellie and so slew him, toke the spoile of him, and brought the same into the citie with him.

This skirmish though it were not clere gaines to this companie, yet it so encouraged them, that from time to time they consulted, and in the end determined to make a fresh sallie and to giue a new aduenture: wherupon there fell and grew a disagreement betwixne the two foresaid John Courtneie & Barnard Duffeld, the one affirming that the same was not to be permitted in anie fort or citie, which stood vpon defense or gard, without a verie speciall order of the generall or chiefe capitaine, or some vrgent ne-cessitie, especiallie in that present distresse and extremitie, wherein the citie as then did stand. But Barnard Duffeld being verie loth to lose anie part of his credit, or to desist from that he with others had determined, could by no meanes be persuaded to the contrarie, but plainelie affirmeth that what he had determined should be performed.

the Wherupon the foresaid John Courtneie reso-lued to the maior, aduertiseth vnto him the matter, & dealeth so fullie and with such perswasions with him, that the maior assembleth his brethren, and sendeth for the foresaid Duffeld: who being come, the matter was at full debated and discoursed, and in the end concluded that it was verie hurtfull and dangerous to that present state, that anie such issuing out should be granted or permitted: and the refoze praied the said Duffeld to staie his determination, and to be contented. But he being impatient, & thinking his credit to be stained, if he should be debarred or denied to do that which he had faithfullie promised, did utterlie refuse to yield to this the maiors request, as also by continuing of talkes, fell out in foule and dis-ordered speeches. Wherupon to auoid a further in-conuenience, he was commanded to ward. The daughter of this Duffeld, whose name was Francis, hearing that hir father was in ward, and taking in greafe that so great an iniurie (as she feared it) should be done to hir father, came more hastily than aduisedlie vnto the maior, somewhat late in the euening, & required to haue hir father out of the ward.

Which thing being denied vnto hir, shee waied so warmed, that not onelie she vsed verie vnseemlie tearmes and speeches vnto the maior, but also contrarie to the modestie and shamesfastnes required in a woman, speciallie young and unmarried, ran most violently vpon him, and strake him in the face. This was taken in so euill a part, and fearing that it had bene a set match of some further inconueniences, the common bell was forthwith rung out: and also a rumour spread that the maior was beaten, or killed.

daughter of Barnard Duffeld strake
the maior in the face.

The whole commons immediatlie in great troops, & the most part in armes, ran to the Guildhall, where the maior was, who though he was safe, yet were they so greued with this iniurie, that they would in all hast haue run to the lord Russells house, where the was then gone, and haue fetched hir out: but the maior forecalling what inconueniences might insue, and respecting the necessitie of the present state, was not onlie contented patientlie to wray by these iniu-ries, but also earnestlie requested the commoners to do the like: who being so pacified, he went home, and they conducted him into his owne doores. The chanons of the cathedrall church which at that time were resident in their houses within the close there, name-lie archdeacon Dollard, treasurer Southron, chan-cello; Alson, and master Holwell, with others of the said church, who joined with the maior and citizens in this seruice for the safegard of the citie, and did keepe both watches and wards, and their men readie at all times to serue in euerie alarm and skirmish: they at the hearing of this disordered part were verie much greued therewith, and they likewise forthwith assembled all their men, and being well armed and appointed, they went to the maior, who was then gone home to his house, and then and there verie friendlie did comfort him, and offered to stand by him and to assist him in all the best seruice they were able to do for his defense, and safetie of the citie.

The said archdeacon offered, that in proper person he would herein stand in his behalfe against all persons whatsoener, that would attempt or offer to do him anie wrong. And in the end, after sundrie friendlie and good speeches, they departed to their homes. And the said archdeacon, euerie daie after, would either come or send to the maior. This maior being a merchant, and onelie exercised in that trade, had small reach in matters of policie or marshall affaires: he was maior of the citie three times, and in euerie yeare there grew some troubles in the citie, but he had such a speciall care & regard to his charge and gouernment, that he would neuer attempt nor do anie thing therein, but by the aduise and counsell of wise, graue, and expert men: and God so blessed him that he prospered and had good successe in all his doings.

Besides these and sundrie other former perils, the which the citie manie and oftentimes stood in, and by the goodness and prouidence of God still ouercome, there befell and happened a third one, which exceeded all the rest, and wherof the greatest danger and peril was feared: and this was famine, or penurie, which of all other furmolls and perils is most dangerous, & no other plague to be compared to it. For no force is feared, no lawes observed, no magistr ate o-beied, nor common societie esteemed, where famine ruleth. For as the poet saith: Nescit plebs ieiunia timere. The store of vittels within the citie, for want of prouision in due time, and by reason of the restraint of the markets, vpon a sudden was verie slender and small, and the same in verie short time spent and consumed. And albeit there were good store of drie fish, rise, prunes, rafins, and wine, at verie reasonable prices, yet bread which as the prophet saith, Confirmat cor hominis. Strengtheneth mans hart, that wanted: neither was arie to be had. And in this extremitie the bakers and householders were drunen to seeke by their old store of puffs and bzian, wherewith they in times past were wont to make housebread, and to feed their swine and poultrie, and this they moulded by in clothes, for otherwise it would not hold togther, and so did bake it by, and the people well contented therewith. For (as Plutarch writeth) Fames reddidit omnis dulcia, nihilq. contemnit esurians. Hunger maketh all things sweet, and the hungrie bellie thunneth nothing.

But when this also was spent, and nothing now left, and the common people being not acquainted with so hard a diet as famine prescribeth, were ve-rie impatient to indure the continuall barking of their hungrie bellies, and therefore they were verie sore & easie to be perswaded, or rather of themselves contented to yeld vnto the enimie, to be fed for a time with the stollen fat of his fleshy pot, than to abide for a short time a little penurie in hope of a deliuerie, and then to be filled with saturitie and plentie. But the magistrats and graue senators, who in all other causes had shewed themselves wise, carefull and discreet; and who hauing receiued sundrie iniuries, did yet without rigour, reuenge or malice, wrap the same by, respecting rather the common state than their owne priuat cause; so in this matter also being of a great importance doo verie wiselie & politikelie deale with the said people: who the pozer they were, the better they were considered, and the more carefullie prouided for. First, there was a generall collection set and rated throughout the whole citie for their reliefe, and thereby they were liberallie euerie weeke considered: which thing being some increase to their stocke and store, was the better to their content. When all such vittels as were to be had within the citie, they either had it gratis, or for a verie small price.

Besides this, manie times when anie cattell came nere vnto the wallles of the citie, some thiff was made to haue them, or by skirmishing & issuing out for them, or by some other means. And this also what so euer it was, was altogether diuided among them.
And as for the prisoners fast fettered in the gaols, they had also their portions, as farre as it would stretch: notwithstanding in the end, for want they were fed with houseflesch, which they liked and were well contented withall. For as the prouerbe is, Hunger findeth no faults but all things are sweet. Besides, if anie wrong were offered or iniurie done to anie of them, it was forthwith vpon complaint re-dressed: but if anie of them did disorder themselves, it was borne withall, and they in all gentle and cur-teous meanes intreated: as also from time to time perswaded with good words patientlie to abide and be contented: not mistrusting but that God shortly would send a deliuerance.

And thus, and by these means, in hope almost against hope, they continued dutifull and obedient, from the second daie of Iulie 1549, vntill the first daie of August then following, the same being fifte whole weekes, vpon which daie they were deliue-red by the coming and entrie into the citie of the lord Russell: and which daie in memorie for euer to endure is kept for a high and holie feast amongst the citizens yearelie vpon the first daie of August. Im-mediatlie vpon which deliuerance of the citie, the first care that euerie man had, was to thift and to make prouision for vittels, wherof some hungrie bellies were so grædie, that ouercharging their emptie stomachs too hastily, they died therewith.

Thus hauing declared something of the state of the citie, and of the doings therein during the time of this rebellion, though much more might be therein said, let vs now returne to the lord priuie seale, who after the departure of sir Peter Carew to the court, remoued from George Henneron, and came to Honiton, minding from thence to haue passed vnto Excester, if waie had bene open. But being aduertis-ed that the citie was besieged, and that all the waies leading thitherwards were stopped, he remained still in Honiton. Sir Peter Carew in the meane time, according to the former order betwene them taken, was ridden to London, and being before the king, declareth the whole matter at large. Which the king, not liking the distolaltie of his people, promised to seeke a speedie remedie: and so commanded him to the counsell for the same: and being before them, and hauing at full discoursed the state of the matter, the duke of Somerset being much grieved with the matter, would haue reiected the whole on sir Peter, charging him that by reason he had caused the houses to be burned at Crediton, it was the onelie cause of the commotion. But therevnto he answered the ne-cessitie of that seruice, as also declared that he had done nothing but by a good warrant, and therewith shewed forth the kings letters vnder his hand and priuie signet.

The lord Rich then lord chancelor replied and said, that the kings letters were no sufficient warrant, vnlesse he had his commission vnder the brode seale: and therefore if he had right, he should by the lawes be hanged for his doings. But to this sir Peter answered so stoutlie, and charged the duke so daupelie, that in the end he was willed to returne into the countrie, being promised that sufficient helpe both of men & monie should be with speed sent downe into the countrie. And to this effect he had both the kings and the counsels letters vnto the lord priuie seale, and so toke his iournaie backe againe into the coun-trie, and deliuered his letters to the said lord Russell, who in hope of the supplie promised, staid and remained sometimes at Hophonotore, but most common-lie at Honiton, still looking for that supplie and furniture that was promised. But hauing long looked for the same in vaine, he was daillie more and more forsaken of such of the common people, as who at the first serued and offered their seruice vnto him. And hauing but a verie small gard about him, he liued in more feare than he was feared: for the rebels daillie increased, and his companie decreased and thynke abate, and he not altogether assured of them which remained.

Wherefore distrusting himselfe, & by a false rumor being aduertised that the citie was taken, & in the possession of the rebels; as also how that there was a new surre or rebellion begun about Sarisburie; he toke aduise and counsell of the gentlemen and such as were with him that were best to be done. The gentlemen of Dorsetshire were of the mind, and gaue him aduise, that it were best for him to returne into Dorsetshire, and there to remaine for a time; because it was a place of a more safetie, vntill such time as he were better prouided. And accordingly the next daie following he toke his iournaie, & rode backe againe with the said Dorsetshire gentlemen.
Sir

Writeth
with the citie being first of Aug.
and deliuered
the same.

Sir Peter
Carew aduertiseth the king & coun-
sell of the rebells.

The duke of Somerset charged sir Peter Carew
of the rebells.

The kinges letters vnder his priuie seale counte-
be no sufficient warrant.
The duke of Somerset charged
sir Peter Carew being promised of helpe returne home.

The lord Russell is almost left forsaken.

*For the said
Peter Carew
was admitted hereof, toke
his horse
and came against
the said
lord Russell,
met
him upon Blacke
downe,
where
was
a long conference betwene
them both;
and
in
the end
he so persuaded
the
lord,
and
with such pithie reasons
he caried
him,
that leaving
his former determination,
he doth returne
againe
into Honiton;
where
he continued thenceforth, saying
one night spent at Orie
Saint
Marie,
where
as it fell out
he
was
in more feare than perill.
his being
in Honiton,
and dailie waiting
and looking for
the promised helpe
and supplie
which came not:
he
was
in an agonie,
of
heauie
chere:
not onely
for
the want
of
the men
&
monie
which
he had long
in vaine
looked
for,
but also because
he had spent all
that
he had brought
with
him,
and could not tell how otherwise
to helpe
and prouide
to supplie
his present need:
but
as it
fell
out
all happened
for
best.*

as
it chanced
that there
were then three merchants
of
the citie,
following
and attending vpon
him;
Thomas
Wesswood
not long before maior
of
the citie,
John
Wodlie,
and John Berlam,
men
great wealth.
These
men vnderstanding
of
the heauinesse
and griefe
of
his lordship,
make their resort vnto
him,
and promise
to
helpe
and relieue
his agonie
and
want:
and forthwith
did procure
vpon
their credit
from
the merchants
of Wiffow, Linne,
Watonton,
and elsewhere,
such
a masse
of
monie,
as
when
he had receiued,
his griefe
was eased.
For
forthwith
he
so prouided
and furnished himselfe
with
such necessaries,
and
with
a greater number
of
men;
that
he
was now
in
the better safetie,
as
also
the better able
to incounter
with
the enemie:
and
it
was not long after,
but
that
he had
a further
supplie
from
the king, euen
to
his content.
And
being now somewhat reuiued, newes
was brought
vnto
him,
that
the rebels
vnderstanding
of
his distressed state,
were comming,
and marching toward Honiton
to assaille
him;
and
were come
far
as Ffenington bridge,
which is about
three miles.
Wherevpon,
he toke advice
with sir
Peter Carew,
sir
Calven
Carew
&
others
that
were best
be done.
And
in
the
end,
after manie speeches,
it
was concluded
that they should march
towards
them,
and giue
the onset
vpon
them;
accordinglie,
without further
delayes or much talkie,
it
was done
out
of hand.
For
vpon
next morning
being
a holie daie,
they set forth,
and
came
to
the bridge aforesaid,
where
the rebels
were indeed:
some
at
the bridge,
but
the greatest compante
in
a medow beneath
the bridge:
who,
as sone
as they percelued
the lord Russell
and
the gentlemen
with all
their trope
to be come,
they make themselves readie
to
the fight.
But
the rider
&
the bridge
being betwene
them,
the lord Russell
blest
all
the policies
that
he can,
how
to reconuer
the bridge;
which by bold aduenturing
he did
in
the
end:
but
with
the hurt
of sundrie
his
compante, amongst whome
sir
Calven
Carew
was
one,
being hurt
with
arrow
in
the arme.*

*And
having reconuered
the bridge,
and
the rider,
all
the rebels (such
as
were escaped)
were gathered together
in
a medow nere adjoining
in
the lower side
of
the bridge,
vpon
whome
they so fiercelie followed,
and gaue
the onset;
that though
not without good swoie
of blowes
and bloodshed,
they
in
the
end
gaue
the enemie
the ouerthrowe,
and
had
the upper hand.
And thinking
that
the victorie
was clere
with
them,
and
that
the enemie
was cleane gone,
the souldiers
and seruingmen
gaue themselves
all
to
the spoile;
and being
in
the middle
of
their game,
and they nothing
thinking
lesse
than
of anie
more
enemies
to be comming
towards,
euen suddenly march
towards
a new crue
of Cornishmen,
to
number
of two hundred,
or two hundred
and fourtie persons,*

*under
the conduct
of
one
Robert
Smith
saint Germans
in Cornwall
gentleman;
and
who taking
these spoilers napping,
manie
of them paied deuelie
for
their wares.
The
lord Russell
forthwith
sette
all
his
compante
in god araye,
as
the others
did
the like,
and gaue
the onset
vpon
them:
betwene
whome
the fight
for
the time
was verie sharpe
and cruell.
For
the Cornishmen
were verie lustie
and fresh,
and fullie bent
to fight
out
the matter:
ne-uerthelesse
in
the
end
they
were ouerthrowne,
and
their capteine,
whose combe
was cut, shewith
a faire paire
of heeles
and fled
a-uaie.
In
these two fights,
there
were reposed
to be slaine
about
hundred
rebels,
which
were
verie tall
men,
lustie,
and
great courage;
and
who
in
a
god
cause might haue
done
seruice.*

lord Russell's
compante
followed
the chase
nere
three miles,
&
he
himselfe
then thoroughlie minded
and bent
to haue passed thorough
to
the
citie.
But
one Joll
his sole,
who
was then
in hast
come
from Honiton,
and
where
he had heard,
as
also
by
the waie
as
he came did heare bels ringing
in sundrie parish churches,
and supposing
the same
to be alarum,
came
with
a foule mouth
to my
lord,
and cried
that all
the countrie behind
him
were vp,
and comming
vpon
him.
his report (considering
the cruell
fights
past)
was credited,
and thought
that
a
new
compante
was
in preparing
to follow
the
former
quarrels.
Wherevpon
they
all retired
and returned
againe
to Honiton;
and
from thence
his lordship sent
his comfortable letters secretlie
by
a boy apoin-ted
and accustomed
for
the
same,
vnto
the
maior
his successe,
as
also aduertising
him
of
his determination
that
he would be shortlie
with
him
for
the de-liuerance
of
the citie.
Which
letters
(the citie
being then
but
in
a doubtfull
and dismayed estate)
came
in verie
god season;
and
yet
in
the
end scarcelie credited
by some
men,
his comming
was not so spedie
as
was
for.*

*Within
verie
short time
after this ouerthrowe
was giuen,
the lord
Greie
of Wilton
with
a
crue
of horsemen,
and one Spinola
an Italian
with
hundred
shot,
came
to my
lord;
who
being aduertised
of
the ouerthrowe
of
the enemie,
and
that there
were slaine
about
three hundred
persons
of
them,
they
were
in
great chafe,
and
much beliailed
their euill lucke,
that they had not come
soner
to haue bene partakers
of
that seruice.
lord
being now
of
a
verie
god
comfort
&
courage, aswell
for
the god
successe
which
he had ouer
the enemie,
&
that
his long looked supplie
was come, sendeth
his other letters
to
the maior,
comforting
him,
as
also
before
promising
him
to be
with
him
verie shortlie;
will'ing
him
that
he should now
take but
a littell patience
for
a littell
time.
And
accordinglie
about six daies
after,
on saturday
the thirde
of August,
in god
order
he set
out
of Honiton,
and marched towards Excester,
his
compante
being about
a thousand
of
god fightingmen;
and leaving
direct high waie, draweth
ouer
the downs towards Wobburie,
and there lodged
and pitched
his campe
that night;
at
a windmill appertaining
to one Gregorie
Carle
gentleman.
when
the rebels
saint Marie
Cliff
heard
of,
forthwith,
with all
their force
and power
came forth,

before all was ended, there began a new alarm; and forthwith euerie man to horse & to harnesse againe. The rebels which remained in the towne of saint Marie Cliff, hearing of the euill successe befallen to their neighbours, and they doubting that their turne would be next to receiue the like; do spread abroad the newes, and request to be aided and assisted. Whereupon, forthwith in great troopes resorted vnto them a number of their companions out of euerie quarter, to the number (as it was said) of sir thousand men: and in all hast, they make themselves and all things in a readinesse to abide the brunt. Upon the next morning being sundae, my lord minding to follow on his course, commandeth the trumpet to sound, euerie man to make readie to march forwards. And about nine of the clocke in the same morning, they come to Cliff: where the armie is diuided into thre parts, and in thre seuerall places do appoint to make entrie into the towne. For in so manie places they had fortified the towne, and made great rampires for their defense.

These rampires were after some bickering recovered, and sir William Francis of Summeretshire was named to be the first that gaue the aduerture, & made the entrie. The commons being driven from the said rampires, ran all into the towne; and there ioine themselves together to abide the pulse. And as the kings armie was in good order marching into the towne, one of the chiefe captains of these rebels, named sir Thomas Bomeroie knight, kept himselfe in a furze close, and perceiving the armie to be past him, and hauing then with him a trumpeter, and a drumme, commanded the trumpet to be sounded, and the drumme to be stricken vp. At which sound, the lord priue seale, and his companie were amazed, supposing verelie that there had bene an ambush behind them to haue intrapped and inclosed them. Whereupon, they forthwith retire backe in all the hast they may: which when they in the towne perceived, they follow after, and neuer staid untill they came to the wagons then being in the high waie; & which now by fleeing and retiring of the armie, are the foremost and next to the towne. And these being laden with munition, armour, and treasure, they take and bring into the towne, where they rife as much as they could, saving the peeces of the ordinance, which with the shot and powder they bestowed in places conuenient, and employed the same against my lord and his companie.

The armie hauing recovered the hill, did there pause a while, and finding themselves to be deceived, march backe againe towards the towne: but before they came thither, it was aduertised vnto my lord, that the towne and euerie house therein was fortified and full of men, and that it was not possible for anie to passe that waie without great perill and danger, except the towne were set on fire. Whereupon order was giuen, that as they passed and entered into the towne, notwithstanding it was my lords owne, they should set the houses on fire. Sir William Francis being in the foreward was foremost, and leaving the waie which he took before, took now an other waie: which waie was both deepe and narrow. The rebels being vpon the banks vpon euerie side of the waie, with their stones to beat him, that they stroke his headpiece fast to his head and thereof he died. The armie being come into the towne, they set fire on euerie house as they passed by. But the rebelles conioining themselves in the middle of the towne, do stand at their defense, where the fight was very fierce and cruell; and bloudie was that daie: for some were slaine with the sword, some burned in the houses, some flying for themselves were taken prisoners, and manie thinking to escape ouer the water were drowned: so that there were dead that daie one with an other about a thousand men.

The towne thus being recovered, and the order giuen, the lord Greie desireth to passe ouer the riuer, and to be in the open field, which is a great heath named Cliff heath: & this he could not do, but that he must passe ouer either the water or the bridge, both which were somewhat dangerous, for the water was somewhat murie and muddy, as also at that time verie deepe, by reason of the flowing of the seas, which causeth the same at euerie tide to swell. Whereof one John Pard a gentleman, and who had dwelled thereabouts, knowing the said water, gaue the first aduerture ouer, and found waie nere vnto a mill aboue the bridge; and after him others do folow. But this was not for all the rest of the armie, who must needs passe ouer the bridge, which as then they could not do, by reason that the same was so overlaid with great trees and timber, as also there stood the gunner with his peece readie charged. Whereupon proclamation was made, that whosoever would aduerture and make waie ouer the bridge, should haue foure hundred crownes for his labo. Then one forthwith more respecting the gaine, than forerunning the perill, gaue the aduerture: but the gunner rewarded him, for he discharged his peece vpon him, and slue him. And then before he could againe charge his peece, one of the companie, who before was passed ouer the water, came and entered the bridge at the further end, and comming behind him slue him: who forthwith calleth companie vnto him, and causeth aside all the trees and timber, and maketh the bridge cleere, and so the whole armie passeth ouer the bridge into the heath.

The lord Greie as soone as he was passed ouer the water, he rode forthwith to the top of the hill, which is in the middle of the heath; and from thence did make a view of all the countrie about him: and looking backe towards Woodburie, he saw and espied vpon Woodburie hill a great companie assembled; & marching forward, & suspecting that they were a new supplie appointed to follow and come vpon them, and aduertised the lord Russell thereof. Whereupon it was concluded, that the prisoners whom they had before taken at the windmill and in the towne, who were a great number, and which if they were netulie set vpon, might be a detriment and a perill vnto them, should be all killed: which forthwith was done, euerie man making a dispatch of his prisoners; and then the night approaching, there they incamped themselves for that night.

The rebelles, which were and laie about Grexter, were aduertised out of hand of this the euill successe of their neighbours, wherefore they with as manie as they could get, in all hast came to Cliff heath: and in the lower side thereof next to the high waie, do intrench and fortifie a place fast by a hedge, and so crettie there, in the night, do place their ordinance, & make themselves in readinesse to abide the brunt: and as soone as the daie light serued, discharge and shot off their peeces vnto the armie incamped about the top of the hill. The lords and captains to end the quarrell, do determine to giue the onset vpon them, and according to the nature of warres, do politike divide themselves into thre parts, and euerie one hath his place assigned and order appointed vnto him.

The lord Russell, hauing no waie open before him, causeth his pioneers to make waie ouer the hedges & inclosed grounds, and by that means doth at length recover vpon the backe of the enimies: and they were so intrapped on euerie side, that they could not by any means escape, but must peris or fight. The one they would not, and in the other they prevailed not. For notwithstanding valiantlie and stoutlie they stood to their tackle, and would not give over as long as life and lim lasted: yet in the end they were all overthrowen, and few or none left alive. Great was the slaughter, and cruell was the fight; and such was the valor and stoutnesse of these men, that the lord Greie reported himselfe, that he never in all the wars that he had been in did knowe the like.

This fight being done, and all things set in good order, the whole armie marched unto Topsham, which was about a mile off, and laie in that towne all that night, and carried with them in a hoyster the bodie or corps of sir William Francis, and from thence carried it to Excester, where it was buried in marshall manner verie honorable in the bodie of the cathedrall church of saint Peters. When the rebels who laie about the citie heard how their neighbors had sped, and from time to time had the worse side, and were still overthrowen: then as men despairing to prevail, secretly gave over the siege and ran awaie euerie man his waie. The gentlemen, which were kept prisoners in the churches and in other places about the citie, being now at libertie, came straight to the walles about midnight, & gave knowledge thereof to the watch; and they forthwith did the like unto the maior. The ioie and comfort thereof was so great, and the desire of fresh vittells so much pressed, that manie not abiding till the daie: light, gat and shifted themselves out of the gates, but more for vittells than for spoile, and yet they were glad of both: howbeit some did not long enioie the same, for manie being more greedy of meat than measurable in feeding, did so overcharge themselves in surfeiting, that they died thereof.

The next morrow being tuesdaye and the first of August, the lord pryncie scale thinking it long before he came to the citie, commanded the trumpets verie earlie to sound, and euerie man to make readie and to prepare awaie. And accordingly all things being done, he marcheth towards Excester, and about eight of the clocke being tuesdaye the first of August 1549 he came to the same, to the great ioy & comfort of the long captivated citizens, who were no more glad of their delivrie, than was his lordship and all good subjects ioyfull of his victorie. But at his coming he entred not into the citie: for being advertised from the maior that the citie was altogether furnished of vittells, order was taken that no stranger, nor one nor other should enter into the citie, but lie in the campe for a time. Then his lordship pitched his tents without the wals in S. Johns fields, next to Southing haie, & upon the cities wals next to the posterne of his house was the kings standard of the red dragon set up. As soon as he was entred into his tent, the maior & all his brethren in most seemlie & decent order went unto him, who most lovinglie embraced them, most thankfullie accepted them, and most highlie commended them for their trust, dutie, and service, which upon his fidelitie and honor he did promise should be well considered by the kings maiestie, and which in the end was performed. For the king being advertized thereof, he did not onelie thankfullie accept and highlie commend their services, but also rewarded and considered the same, both by confirmation of their charters, enlarging of their liberties, and augmenting of their revenues, in giving unto them the manor of Crilond, which as was said was sometimes their ancient inheritance, but by power of the earles of Devon by force taken, and by wrong and iniurie kept from them.

Immediatlie after his coming, sir William Herbert then master of the kings horses, and after earle of Penbroke, came with a thousand Welshmen: who though they came too late to the fraie; yet some enough to the plaie. For the whole countrie was then put to the spoile, and euerie soldier fought for his best profit: a lust plague of the Lord upon rebels and dissolall persons. But the citie being as yet altogether destitute of vittells, and the Welshmen at their first coming seeing the same, they did by their speciall industries & travels fraught & furnish the same within two daies with corne, cattels, and vittells, verie plentifullie, to the great reliefe and comfort of the people therein, & to the benefit of themselves. The lord pryncie scale remained and continued in this citie about twelue daies before he remoued: setting all things in good order, rewarding the good & punishing the euill. To sir Peter Carew he gave all Wineslades land, to sir Gaben Carew Humfrie Arundels lands, to William Gibbes esquier Weries lands, and to manie others which had done good services he gave prisoners, both bodie, goods, and lands.

On the other side he commanded forches and galloves to be set up in sandie places, as well within the citie as also in the countrie; and did command and cause manie to be executed and put to death, & speciallie such as were noted to be chiefe and busie doers & ringleaders in this rebellion. Among them all there was no one so exalted as was Welsh the vicar of saint Thomas nere the Erbridge at Excester, who was preferred and presented to that benefice by the lord Russell patrone thereof. This man had manie good things in him, he was of no great stature, but well set and mightilie compact: he was a verie good wrestler, shot well both in the long bow as also in the crollebow, he handled his handgun and peece verie well, he was a verie good woodman and a hardie, and such a one as would not give his head for the polling nor his beard for the walhing, he was a companion in anie exercises of activitie, & of a courteous and gentle behauiour, he descended of a good honest parentage, being bozne at Penurin in Cornewall; and yet in this rebellion an archcapitaine and a principall doer. He was charged with three principall crimes. The first was, that he did not onelie persuade the people to the contemning of the reformed religion, according to the kings proceedings, and to keepe and obserue the Romish and popish religion: but also did erect, keepe, and use the same in his parish church. Secondarie, he was a capteine and a principall dealer in the cause of the rebellion, which was chieflie directed by him, his order, & aduise. Thirde, he caused one Kingwell a tinner of Chazford, and servant to master John Charcls of Laueshoke to be hanged, because secretly he had conveyed letters betwene my lord and his master, and was earnest in the reformed religion, which was then termed the kings proceedings, & an enimie to the popish state. And being a sharpe inueter against the one, and an earnest mainteiner of the other, it procured unto him great hatred and malice: when the rebellion was begun he sought by all the means he could how to escape awaie: but he was so narrowly watched, that he could neuer haue anie opportunity so to do.

They used all the deuises they could to recouer him to their opinions, sometimes with faire words, sometimes with threatenings, and sometimes with imprisonment: but still he inuied against them, calling them rebels and traitors both against God and the king, and foreprophesied unto them that destruction and confusion would be the end & reward of their doings. Thus when they could not reclaim him to their disposition, then by the order and iudgement of this vicar Welsh, he was fetched out of the prison, and forthwith brought forth before Caiphas and Pilat, and condemned to be hanged: which was executed upon him forthwith, and he brought to an elme tree in Crilond, without the west gate of the citie, before the house of one Nicholas Caue, and there hanged. The like crueltie or rather tyrannic was done at Sampford Courtenie, where when a certeine Frankelin a gentleman, named William Heltons, who coming to Sampford to haue some communication with them for the staie of their rebellion, and for the pacifying of them in their due obedience, was at the towne end taken prisoner, & carried to the churchhouse, where he so earnestlie reproued them for their rebellion, & so sharplie threatened them an euill successe: that they all fell in a rage with him, and not onlie with euill wordes reviled him: but also as he was going out of the churchhouse & going downe the staires, one of them named Githbydige with a bill strake him in the necke, and immediatlie notwithstanding his pittifull requestes and lamentations, a number of the rest fell vpon him, slue him, and cut him into small peeces: and though they counted him for an heretike, yet they buried him in the church-yard there, but contrarie to the common manner, laing his bodie north and south.

These things being called to remembrance and objected against this vicar, although some men in respect of his vertues and good gifts did pittie and lament his case, and would haue gladlie bene tutors for his pardon: yet the greatnesse of his lewdnesse and follies considered, they left him vnto his deserts: & so was by order of the marshall law condemned to death. And yet this one thing by the waie I must speake in his commendation. There was among the rebels a stranger and an alien, who was a verie skilfull gunner, & could handle his peece verie well, and did much harme vnto the citie, & among others slue one Smith standing at a doore in northgate street with a great shot from saint Dauids hill. This fellow toke vpon him, that he would set the whole citie on fire, and it should be cleane burned within foure houres, do they what they could. This his offer was so well liked, that the daie and time was appointed when this should be done.

The vicar hearing thereof, assembleth vnto him as manie men as he could make and haue, & came to this companie when this fire should be kindled, and was so hot and earnest against their attempts, that he would in no wise suffer so lewd an act and wicked a thing to be done. For (saith he) do you that you can by policie, force, or dint of sword to take the citie, I will loine with you, and do my best: but to burne a citie which shall be hurtfull to all men and good to no man, I will neuer consent thereunto, but will here stand with all my power against you. And so stout he was in this matter, that he stopped them from their further enterprising of so wicked a fact. But to the matter. The execution of this man was committed to Barnard Duffeld, who being nothing slacke to follow his commission, caused a paire of gallowes to be made, and to be set vp vpon the top of the tower of the said vicars parish church of S. Thomas: and all things being ready and the stage perfected for this tragedie, the vicar was brought to the place, and by a rope about his middell dyaline vp to the top of the tower: and there in chains hanged in his popish apparell, and had a holie water bucket and sprinkle, a sacring bell, a paire of beads, & such other like popish trash hanged about him, and there he with the same about him remained a long time. He made a verie small or no confession, but verie patientlie toke his death, he had bene a good member in his common-wealth, had not the words ouergroene the good royme, and his soule vices ouercom-med his vertues.

The lord priuie scale remaining still in Excester was continually occupied in setting things in order, he was verie seuerer and sharpe against such offenders as were chiefe and principall ringleaders of this rebellion: but to the common sort who were led and carried, and who did humble themselves, he was pittifull and mercifull, and did daile pardon infinite numbers. And his lordship thinking verie that all things were now quieted, & the rebels pacified, suddenlie newes were brought vnto him that there assembled at Sampford Courtenie, both Devonshire men and Cornishmen, and who were fullie bent to mainteine their quarrell and abide the battell. These newes so troubled and tickled my lord, that all businesse set apart, he commaundeth forthwith the trumpet to be sounded, and the drumme to be stricken vp, and all his armie to be forthwith mustered: which was then the greater, by reason of the Welshmen and gentlemen of the countie and of the commoners, who vpon submission had obtained pardon, and increased to the number of eight or ten thousand men, and forthwith he marcheth towards Sampford Courtenie, where sir William Herbert requested to haue the foze-ward for that daie, which was granted him.

And being come thither, albeit the great companie of so manie good soldiers and well appointed might haue dissinated them, being nothing no: in order, no: in companie, no: in experience, to be compared vnto the others: yet they were at a point they would not yeeld to no persuasions, no: did, but most manfullie did abide the fight: and neuer gaue ouer, untill that both in the towne and in the field they were all for the most taken or slaine. At which time one ap Owen a Welch gentleman, more boldlie than aduisedlie giuing the aduenture to enter the rampier at the towne end, was there slaine by the rebels, and after carried backe to Cron, where after the manner of wars he was honorable buried in the bodie of saint Peters church, few of the kings side besides him then slaine: and so of a traitorous beginning they made a shamefull ending. Fewer thelesse manie escaped and they fled towards Summerstshire: after whom was sent sir Peter Carew, and sir Hugh Paulet then knight marshall: with a great companie attending vpon them, and followed them as far as to King Weston in the countie of Summerst: where they ouertoke them and ouerthrew them, and also toke one Coffin a gentleman their captaine prisoner and brought him vnto Excester.

The lord Russell himselfe minding to make all things sure, taketh his iourneie, and marcheth into Cornetwall; and following his former course, causeth execution to be done vpon a great manie, and especially vpon the chiefe belweddors and ringleaders: but the chiefe and principall captains he kept as prisoners, and brought them with him to Excester. And when this lord had set all things in good order, he returned to Excester, & remained there for a time; but after departed towards London, where he was received with great ioy and thanks: and being come before the king, he forgot not to commend vnto his maiestie the good serueice of this citie in this rebellion, which (as is before said) was liberallie rewarded and considered. After his departure, and according to his order and appointment, the chiefe captains and principall heads of this rebellion, whom he left in prison in the kings goale at Excester, were carried to London and commaunded to the tower, and in their due time were afterwards executed to death, namelye Humfreie Arundell esquier, Willmes esquier, John Bertie and Coffin gentlemen, and Holmes yeoman; which Coffin and Holmes were seruants to to sit John Arundell knight. Of the number of them who were slain, there is no certaintie knowne, but manie more be founde lacke then numbred: howbeit it was accounted by such as continued in the whole service of this commotion to be about foure thousand men. But what number was of the contrarie side dispatched, nothing is reported, albeit it be well knowne that they escaped not scotfree, and especiallie the Burgonians, who were abhorred of the one partie, and nothing favoured of the other. Thus much concerning the description of the cite, and of the sundrie inuasions and assaults against the same, and especiallie of the last rebellion or commotion in the yeare of our Lord 1549, wherein much more might be spoken, but this may suffice for this matter. And for as much as the cathedrall church of this cite, called by the name of S. Peters, is a parcell of the cite, and compassed within the walls of the same, though in respect of certaine priuileges distinct from the iurisdiction thereof; I thought it good to subiect hereunto the description of the said church; and of the antiquitie of the same.

The antiquitie, foundation, and building of the cathedrall church of saint Peters in Excester.

After that corrupt religion and superstition was crept and receiued into the church, and the people become deuout therein, then began the erecting of religious houses and monasteries in euerie countie. And as this was vniuersall throughout all christendome under the gouernement of the Romane bishop: so also was it generalitie done throughout all England, in which generalitie this cite was of a particularitie; for in this cite from time to time as opportunitie serued sundrie religious houses and monasteries were erected and builded, of which there were thre within the cite, circuit, and place now called the close of S. Peters, and which in time accrued and were vnited into one. The first was a house for women called moniales or nuns, which is now the deanes house or halendar haie. The other was a house of monks, supposed to be builded by king Ethelred, the third sonne to king Ethelwolp, and these two were vnited by bishop Leofricus vnto the cathedrall church. The third was a house for monks of the order of S. Benet, which was builded and founded by king Athelstane, about the yeare of our Lord 932: and this is that part of the cathedrall church now called the ladie chappell. For the said king, hauing driuen out of this cite the Britons then dwelling therein, and minding to make a full conquest both of them and of this their countie which they then inhabited, did so fiercelie follow and pursue them euen into Cornuwall, that in the end he conquered them, and had the victorie. After which he returned to this cite, and here staing and sojourning for a time, did reedifie the cite, incompassed it with a stone wall, and founded the cathedrall church, which he then appointed for a monasterie for monks of S. Benets order. For so is it writtten: Hanc urbem rex Athelstani primus in potestatem Anglorum, effugatis Britonibus redactam turribus munit, & muro ex quadratis lapidibus cinxit, ac antiquitus vocatam Munketon nunc Excester vocari voluit: ac ibi sedens manum quoddam dedit ad fundandum monasterium pro monachis Deo & sancto Petro famulantibus. Besides the charges which he was at the building of the said church, he gaue also lands and revenues vnto them sufficient for maintenance and liuelihoods, whereof Hokehull and Treasurors beere are parcell, and which now are appendant and appertaining to the treasurer of the cathedrall church.

After the time of king Athelstane, the Danes with great hostilitie and crueltie hauing ouerrun this whole land, they also came to this cite, and in spoiling the same, did also ransacke and spoile the said church, whose continuall inuasions the monks being not able to indure, fled and forsoke their house and home, and sought places of better safetie. By which means this monasterie for sundrie yeares was left desituted, vntill the time of king Edgar; who on a time made a progresse into these west parts, to visit his father in law Odogarus then earle of Deuon, and founder of the abbey of Tauntonke, whose daughter he had married. And being come to this cite, did here rest and staie himselfe, where when he saw the distressed state of the said church, & pitieng the same, caused search and inquirie to be made of the monks which were scattered and yet left; and when he had gotten them together, he restored them vnto their house and liuelihoods, and appointed Sidemannus who was afterwards bishop of this diocesse to be abbat of the same. And from thensforth they continued together (though sometimes in troubles) vntill that king Swanus or Sweno the Dane, with a mightie and a huge armie came to this cite, besieged, toke, spoiled, and destroyed it with sword and fier. Whereupon not long after it was restored againe by king Canutus or Canutus, who being aduertised of the great cruelties which his father Sweno had done to the said monasterie, did at the request of Athelredus one of his dukes, make restitution vnto Athelwoldus then abbat of all their lands, liuings and priuileges: as doth appeare by his charter dated in the yeare of our Lord 1019.

After this, about thirtie yeares, king Edward the Confessor came to this cite, and he by the aduise and at the motion of Leofricus bishop of Crediton, and who sometimes was lord chancellor of England vnder the said king, and one of his priue counsell, partlie for the better safetie of the bishop and his successors, who lieng and hauing their houses in the countie, were subiect to manie and sundrie perils, and partlie to provide a more conuenient place for the monks, did remove the bishops see from Crediton, and removed the monks vnto Westminster: and he the king in his owne person, together with quene Edith his wife, did insall the said Leofricus in possession of this his new church and see. The bishop thus removed from the old, and placed in the new see and church, doth endow the same with all those lands and liuelihoods which he had of the gift of the said king, and which before did appertene to his former church, and to reduce and make his sanctuarie to his mind, pulleth downe the two monasteries nere adioining, the one being of monks and the other of nuns, and addeth and vnitheth them vnto his owne church, and hauing brought all things to effect according to his mind, deuileth and maketh lawes, orders, and ordinaunces for the good gouernment of his church and cleargie.

After the death of Leofricus, all his successors for the most part procure the augmentation and increase of this their new created see and church, some in liuelihoods, some in liberties and priuileges, some in buildings, and some in one thing, and some in another. William Warewell the third bishop of this church, who had sometimes bene chapleine to the Conqueror, and to his two sonnes William and Henrie, was in such fauor and god liking with the Conqueror, that at his request he gaue vnto him and to this his church, Plimpton, Rampton, and S. Stephens in Excester, which gift his said sonnes being kings of England did ratifie and confirme. And then the said bishop, hauing the ordering and distributing thereof, thereof, giueing Blimpton to the regular monkes there, for whom he had founded and builded a mona-strie, and wherein he himselfe shortly after leauing and yeiding up his bishoprike, became and was a monke. Blimpton was referred to the church, and which afterwards was annexed to the deanerie. And S. Stephens with the fee to the same appertaining, he referred to himselfe and to his successors, & whereby they are barons and lords of the parlement. This bishop in the yeare of our Lord 1112, first began to inlarge his cathedrall, and laid the foundation of that part, which is now the choire or quier: for before that time it was no bigger than that, which since and now is called the ladie chapell. After him William Bower the bishop made and established in the yeare of our Lord 1235, a deane and a chapter of foure and twentie prebendaries; and for the deane (whome he appointed, and whose name was Serlo) and for his successors, he gaue and impropriated Blimpton and Coliton Kewleigh, and for the pre-bendaries he purchased lands, allotting and assigning to euery of them Pro pane & sale the like portion of foure pounds.

Peter Quirell the bishop finding the chancell of his church to be fullie builded and ended, beginneth to found and build the lower part of the bodie of his church, in the yeare of our Lord 1284, from the chan-cell of his church vnto the west end of the said church.
His man first appointed a chanter and a subdeane to be in his church. To the one of them he impropriated Paineton and Chudleie, and to the other the personage of Egloschaille in Cornewall. After him John Crandison, in the yeare of our Lord 1340, did increase the length of the bodie of the church from the sant westward, as also vaulted the rofe of the whole church, and did fullie end and finish the same. And albeit from the time of king Athelstane the first founder in the yeare of our Lord 932, vntill the daie of the death of this bishop Crandison, which was in the yeare 1369, there were about 437 yeares distant, and in the meane time this church was continued in building by sundrie persons: yet it is so decentlie and vniformelie compacted, as though it had bene builded at one verie time and instant.

The successor of this Crandison, who was named Thomas Brentingham, finished and ended the north tower of the church. After this, about the yeare of our Lord 1400, and in the time of bishop Stof-ord, the cloister was added to the church, and builded at the most part of the charges of the deane and cha-piter. And not long after Edmund Lacie bishop began to build the chapter house, which being not ended in his time, his next successor George Jenell, in the yeare of our Lord 1456, did fullie end and absolue the same: and which is a verie faire, beautifull, and a sumptuous worke. And thus much concerning the antiquitie, foundation, and building of this cathedrall church. Thus far John Hooker.

About the same time that this rebellion (whereof all the foresaid discourse tendeth) began in the west, the like disordered hurles were attempted in Dr-fordshire, and Buckinghamshire: but they were speedilie appeased by the lord Greie of Wilton, who commending downe that waite to ioine with the lord paine seale, chased the rebels to their houses, of whome two hundred were taken, and a dozen of the ringleaders to him deliuered, wherof certeine afterwards were executed. Moreover, in diuerse other parts of the realme, namelie in the south and east parts, did the people (as before ye haue heard) assemble themselves in rebellious maner, committing manie soule disorders: but yet by god policie and holefome perswas-ans they were appeased, except in Dorsetshire, where after there was a rumour spread, that at the cen mons in Kent had throwne downe the diches and hedges, wherewith certeine pasture grounds were inclosed, and had laid the same open. Diuerse seditious persons and busie fellows began to complaine that the like had not bene done in Dorsetshire, and ceased not to praicise how to raise the people to an open rebellion; meaning not onelie to laie open parkes and inclosures, but to attempt other reformations, as they termed them; to the great danger of ouerthrowing the whole state of the common-wealth.

They chieflie declared a spitefull ranco: and hate-red conceiued against gentlemen, whome they maliciously accused of inordinat couetousnesse, pride, rapine, extortion, and oppression, praicised against their tenants and other, for the which they accounted them worthy of all punishment. Hereupon diuerse of them, namelie the inhabitants of Atilborough, and other of their neighbors, conceiuing no small displeasure, for that one Greene of Allbie had taken in a parcell of the common pasture, as was supposed, belonging to the towne of Atilborough, and adioining to the common pasture of Wartham, riotously assembled together, and threw downe certeine new diches made by the said Greene, to inclose in the said parcell of commons.

This was done before Midsummer, and so it rested till the first of Iulie, at which time there should be a publike plate kept at Wilmondham, a towne distant from Dorchester miles, which plate had bene accustomed yearelie to be kept in that towne, continuing for the space of one night and one daie at the least. Whereupon the wicked contriueres of this unhappie rebellion, took occasion by the assembling of such numbers of people as resorted thither to see that plate, to enter further into their wicked enterprise: and vpon conference had, they immediatlie assembled at Dorchester a mile from Wilmondham, & there they cast downe certeine diches of maister Hub-bards on the tuesday, and that night they repaired to Wilmondham againe, where they praicised the like feats. But as yet they took no mans goods by violence.

Hereupon one John Flowerdew of Wetherset John flowgentleman, finding himselfe grieved with the casting downe of some diches, came vnto some of the rebels, and gaue to them forty pence to cast downe the fences of an inclosure belonging to Robert Ket, alias Knight, a tanner of Wilmondham, which pasture lieth nere to the faire Moungie at Wilmondham also: which they did. And that night consulting together, the next morning they took their iourneie to Wetherset, by the procurement of the said Robert Ket, in reuenge of the displeasure which he had con-ceiued against the said Flowerdew, and set them in hand to plucke vp and cast downe hedges and diches, wherewith certeine pasture grounds belonging to the said Flowerdew were inclosed.

Here was somewhat adoe. For maister Flowerdew did what he could to haue caused them to desist from that attempt, in somuch that manie sharpe words passed betwixt Ket and the said maister Flowerdew.
But Ket being a man hardie and forward to anie desperat attempt that should be taken in hand, was streight entered into such estimation with the commons thus assembled together in rebellious wise, that his will was accomplished: and so those hedges and diches belonging to the pasture grounds of maister Flowerdew were throwne downe and made plaine. Hereupon was Ket chosen to be their captaine and ringleader, who being resolved to set all on fir and seuen, willed them to be of god comfort, and to follow him in defense of their common libertie, being readie in the common-wealths cause to hazard both

both life and goods.

Herewith they passed the water betwixt Crin-gelford and Eton, and coming to Wolthorpe, cast downe certeine hedges and ditches in that place, and their number being now greatly increased, they in-camped there that night. Here sir Edmund Wilmdani knight, being high shiriffe of Norfolk and Suffolke, came and proclaimed them rebels, commanding them to depart in the kings maiesties name. With which proclamation they were greatly offended, and attempted to haue got him into their hands: but he being well horsed, valiantlie brake through them that had compassed him in: wherewith he escaped from them and got into Norwich, being not past a mile off. The same night there came a great number of lewd people vnto them, as well out of the citie of Norwich as out of the countie, with weapon, armour, and artillerie.

The citizens of Norwich.

The daie before that Ket came to this place, a great number of the meaner sort of the citizens of Norwich had thowne downe a quickset hedge, and filled up the ditches, wherewith the foresaid commons were on the one side inclosed, to keepe in the cattell of the citizens that had the same going before their common neatherd: and so that fence which by god and prouident aduise of their forefathers, had bene raised and made for the common profit of the whole citie, was thus by a sort of lewd persons defaced and cast downe at that present. And scarce had they thowne downe the ditch in the upper end of this pasture, but that a companie of euill disposed persons stale out of the citie, and got them to Kets campe.
The maior of the citie named Thomas God aduertis-ed hereof, doubting what might follow of this michievous begun rebellion, thought god to trie if he might perswade the rebels to glue ouer their traitorous enterprises: and therfore taking certeine of the aldermen with him, he went to Kets campe, vising what perswasions he could to reduce them vnto their dutyfull obedience, & to depart home to their houses.
But his trauell was in vaine, and therfore returned backe to the citie without hope to doe anie good with that brauie rout.

Thomas
God.

After whose departure, they considering in what danger they stood to be surprisid, if they should scatter abroad in such sort as till then they had done, seeking to wast and spoile the countie about them, without keeping together in anie warlike order, thought it stood most with their suertie to draw into one place, and to fortifie the same for their further strength. Upon this resolution they determined to go with all speed vnto Houlehold, a place as they toke it meet for their purpose, and therfore sent to the maior of Norwich, requesting him of licence to passe through the citie, because it was their nearest waie, promising not to offer anie iniurie or violence to anie person, but quietly to march through the citie vnto their place appointed. But the maior did not on-lie denie them passage, but also with sharpe and bitter speech reproving their rebellious doings, told them what should follow thereof, if they came not ouer in time from further proceeding in such wicked attempts.

The rebels

wich.

For Roger Wolthorpe.

The next daie being thursdaie, sir Roger Wolthorpe with seven or eight of his household seruants, came to them, bringing with him two carts laden with beere, and one cart laden with other vittels: for a recompense whereof he was stripped out of his ap-parell, had his horses taken from him, and whatsoeuer else he had, the rebels accounting the same a good price, he himselfe was cruellie tugged and cast into a bish of one Spores of nether Arleham by Wei-kesdonbridge: where the same daie the rebels, being disappointed of their purpose to passe through Norwich, found meanes to passe, and coming to mat-ger Corbets house of Sprowston, intended to haue burnt the same house. But yet being perswaded to spare it from fire, they spoiled his goods, defaced a bouchouse of his, which had bene a chappell, and afterwards got them to Houlehold, and coming to S.

Leonards hill, on which the erle of Surrie had built a stately house called mount Surrie, they inkennelled themselves there on the same hill; and in the woods adioining that lie on the west and the south side of the same hill, as the commons or pasture called Houlehold heath lieth on the east side, which conteineth foure or five miles in length, & thre or foure in breadth.

Mount Sur-
rie.

Houlehold.

They put sir Roger Wolthorpe, and other prisoners whom they had caught, in strict ward within the foresaid house of mount Surrie, on the which they seized, and spoiled whatsoeuer they found within it. In the meane time, the maior of Norwich taking aduise with his brethren the aldermen, what was best to doe in this case, whether presentlie to issue forth, and distresse the rebels now in the beginning, lest time might giue them meane to increase their power: or rather to staie till they had aduertised the councell of the whole matter. In the end they agreed that this last aduise was most surest, and so they dipatched a post with all speed to the court. Beside this great campe (as they termed it) at Houlehold, there was a lesser at Kissing chafe neare to Lin: but the rebels there, by the good diligence and circumspect po-licie of the iustices and gentlemen of those parts, were speedilie repressed, and driven from thence.
Notwithstanding afterwards they assembled together at Watton, & there remained about a fortnight, stopping also the passage at Thetford and Brandon ferrie, within nine miles of the said Watton: and at length came and joined themselves with these other at Houlehold, by appointment of their generall capteine (as they toke him) the foresaid Robert Ket.

Kissing chafe.

Watton.

Whereafter, there came flocking from Suffolke and other parts, a great multitude of lewd disposed persons, raised by firing of beacons, and ringing of bells. Also a number of rascals & naughtie lewd persons stale out of the citie of Norwich, and went to campe. And thus being got together in great multitudes, they added one wickednesse to another, as hauing no staie of themselves after their downefall, nor holding them content with the committing of one villanous trespasse and horrible transgression, according vnto the poets words to the like purpose:

Quisquam hominum est quem in contentum videris uno Flagitio?

Now to cloke their malicious purpose with a conterfeit shew of holinesse, they caused one Coniers vicar of saint Martins in Norwich to saie sermone morning and euening, to praise to God for prosperous speed in that their vngodlie enterprise. Whereafter they went about to ioine to their cause diuerse honest men, and right commendable for religion, doctrine, vertue, and innocencie of life; amongst whom were Robert Watton a preacher, Thomas God maior of Norwich, and Thomas Alderich of Spangreene hall.
These thre, although sore against their willes, were constrained to be present with them in all matters of counsell, and to take vpon them (as associates with capteine Ket) the administration and order of euerie thing: which happened well for manie. For when either Ket himselfe, or anie other of the captains, through setting on of the outrageous multitude, pur-posed anie mischance (as often it came to passe) in one place or other, through their graue aduise, and approued industrie, their furie was sundrie times staied and calmed. Although Ket bent to all vngodlinesse, would diuerse times grant forth commissions, abusing now and then the names of honest men thereby, appointing his vnchristie mates to fetch in bittels to furnish their campe withall. The tenor of one of the which commissions here insueth.

The forme of a warrant granted out by the rebels to take vp bittels.

W E the kings friends & deputies, doo grant licence to all men, to prouide and bring into the campe at Houshold, all manner of cattell, and prouision of bittels, in what place soeuer they may find the same: so that no violence or iniurie be done to any honest or poore man. Commanding all persons as they tender the kings honor and roiall maiestie, and the release of the common welth, to be obedient to vs the gouernors, and to those whose names insue.

Signed

Robert Ket.

Then followed in order a long list of names, for the number of the gouernors was great, as they that beside the these captiues had chosen out of euerie hundred two, and there were fir and twentie hundred. By vertue of such commissions, manie that were of good worship and credit in the countrie, whom the rebels in their rage had condemned, were fetched from their houses, and other places where they might be found, and being brought to the campe, were committed to prison. Also the ditches and hedges, wherewith the commons abode in the countrie, were inclosed, were throwne downe, & manie were warned and called forth from sundrie parts, to come and take part with them in these tumultuous vyrozes. And all these things were done, the maior, maister Aldrich not onlie holding their peace and winking thereat, but also sometime after a manner giuing their consent to the same. For to haue resisted them had bene but follie, and the waie to haue put themselves in danger of destruction, and their countrie too.

The honest citizens of Norwiche in this meane while remained in great perplexitie, hearing nothing from the king nor his counsell. They therefore being vncerteine what to do, abode in the citie, till they might vnderstand what order it should please the king to take for the quieting of these troubles. The cause why the counsell was thus slacke in prouiding remedie against the Norfolke rebels, was: for that they were busie in quieting the troubles in the inner part of the realme about London, and other places (as before ye haue heard) by meanes whereof the power of these Norfolke rebels still increased, so that there were assembled together into Kets campe, to the number of sixtene thousand vngracious vnchristis, who by the aduise of their captiues fortified themselves, and made prouision of artillerie, powder and other abillments, which they fetched out of ships, gentlemens houses, and other places where any was to be found, and withall spoiled the countrie of all the cattell, riches and come, on which they might laie hands.

But because manie (as in such case is euer seene) did prouide for themselves, and hid that which they got, lateng it by for their owne store, and brought it not forth to further the common cause, Ket and the other gouernors (for so would they be called) thought to prouide a remedie, and by common consent it was decreed, that a place should be appointed, where indignements might be exercised, as in a iudiciall hall.

Whereupon they found out a great old oke, where the said Ket, and the other gouernors or deputies might sit and place themselves, to heare and determine such quareling matters as came in question. Afore whom sometime would assemble a great number of the rebels, and exhibit complaints of such disorders, as now and then were practised among them; and there they would take order for the redressing of such wrongs and iniuries as were appointed, so that such greedy bagabounds as were ready to spoile more than seemed to stand with the pleasure of the said gouernors, and further than these commissions would beare, were committed to prison. This oke they named the tree of reformation.

The maior, maister Aldrich and others, whome they had receiued into the number of their gouernors, would oftentimes go vp into this tree, and make diuerse pithie orations to perswade the outrageous multitude to giue over their riotous rapines and spoilings. There were also certeine diuines which did vse all waies possible to withhold them from their wicked attempts, and to reduce them to peace and quietnesse, although this was not done without danger of their liues. Neuertheless, these in the due time used to preach in the churches, and in the night to watch with armour vpon their backs, leauing nothing vndone that might seeme to appertene vnto the dutie of godlie and vertuous diuines, or faithfull and obedient subjects. Among these was doctor Mathew Parker, afterward archbishop of Cantuarrie, whose wisdom, faithfulness, and integritie was most apparant.

He coming on a daie into the campe with his brother Thomas Parker, that was after maior of Norwiche, found them before the tree at common praier, the foreremembred Coniers bicar of saint Martin in Norwiche saing the Litanie. Whereupon doctor Parker thinking the time to serue for his purpose, went vp into the tree, where he made a sermon, diuiding it into thre seuerall parts. In the first he exhorted them to vse with moderation those bittels which they had prouided & brought into their campe, and not riotouslie nor lawleslie to wast and consume them. In the second he aduised them in no wise to seeke reuenge of priuat displeasures, and not to chaine or keepe in irons those persons whom they held in ward, nor to take anie mans life from him. Lastlie, he wished that they should haue regard to themselves, & leaue off their rash begun enterprisse, giuing eare to such heralds or other messengers as came from the king, and to shew such honour vnto his maiestie now in his yong and tender yeares, as they might inioy him hereafter being growne vp in vertue, to their great ioy, comfort, and gladnesse. As he was handling this matter, with manie good and effectuall reasons, hauing the auditozie attentive to his words, one lewd fellow among the rest cried out and said; How long shall we suffer this hireling doctor, who being waged by gentlemen, is come hither with his tong, which is sold and tied to serue their appetite? But for all his prating words, let vs bide them, and bring them vnder the orders of our law.

Then began the multitude to stir and make a noise, threatening the preacher. Some of them saing; It were well, that for his faire told tale we should bring him downe with a mischiefe, with arrowes and lanclings. This speech brought doctor Parker in no small feare, and the more, for that he heard a noise and clattering of weapons vnder him, so that he looked for present death among them. But herein he was deceiued: for there was not a man that stood next him within the compasse of the tree, would him anie harme. And immediatlie the foreremembred bicar of

The contragious dealing against gentlemen.

Dr. Martins that executed the office of the minister, began with helpe of some singingmen that were present, the canticle Te Deum, wherewith the vnruele multitude seemed partie to quiet themselves. Whiche occasion doctor Parker perceiuing to serue his turne, thought not longer to tarie amongst them, but quietly got him downe from the tree, and with his brother made haile towards the citie. But before he came to Rockthorpe gate, there were of the rebels that came to him, and began to question with him about his licence, whereby he was authorisid to preach: but he perceiuing that there was no reason to be conceined of them, slipt his waies, and left his brother to argue the matter with them.

Yet the next daie he entering into saint Clements church, toke occasion to expound somewhat out of one of the lessons that was read that daie, concerning these wicked heresies; manie of the rebels comming about him; but not interrupting him a whit, hearing the end of his exhortation, although they seemed greatlie therewith offended. But as he came out of the church, they followed him, and told him that (as they vnderstood) he had there some able geldings to serue the king: and therefore charged him that after dinner they might be readie for them to occupie. But doctor Parker made them no great answer, but calling to him his horsekeeper, commanded him to plucke off the shoes from some of his geldings, and to pare their hounes vnto the quicke; and that he should annoint the other with neruall, as if they had bene lamed with trauell. The rebels perceiuing this, when they saw the same geldings had forth as it had bene to pasture, made no further businesse. Whereupon doctor Parker shortly after, feining as if he went abroad to walke two miles off from the citie, at Crinkleford bridge found his horses readie as he had appointed, with his seruants, and mounting vp, toke his iournete towards Cambridge, with as much speed as was possible, escaping thither out of all danger, although by the waie they met with and saw diuerse of the rebels plaieng their parts in their wanted outrageous manner. Thus did doctor Parker escape the hands of the wicked rebels, who despising his wholesome admonitions, did afterwards by Gods iust iudgement proue his words to be most true.

But in the meane time proceeding from one mischief to another, after they had practised to spoile the gentlemen of the countrie of their goods, they began to attach their bodies, and by force to bring them into their campe: so that such as escaped their hands, were glad to flee, and hide themselves in woods and canes, where they might best keepe themselves out of their aduersaries reach and intended dangers. But to speake of all the horrible praactises by these vngenerous people exercised, it would be too long a procelle. That which they found to cloake their doings, and that euen vnder the kings authoritie, it is wonderfull. For whereas there were certaine commissions directed vnto diuerse gentlemen in the countrie, to take order for the appeasing of these tumults; they getting the same into their hands, toke vpon them the authoritie committed to the gentlemen, vnto whome the same commissions were sent; and taking off the scales from the other, altered the same vnto their counterfeited writings. To conclude, they grew to such vnrueleable disorder, that they would not in manie things obeye neither their general capitaine, nor anie of their gouernors, but ran headlong into all kind of mischief, & made such spoile of vittels which they brought out of the countrie adioining vnto their campe, that within few daies they consumed (beside a great number of beies, twenty thousand muttons, also swans, geese, hens, capons, ducks, & other foules so manie as they might laie hands vpon. And furthermore, they spared not to breake into parks, and kill what deere they could. Such haucke they made of all that came in their waie, and such number of sharpe spectallie they brought into their campe, that a good fat weather was sold for a groat. The woods, groues, and trees that were destroied I passe ouer, and make no mention thereof. Herewith, what crueltie was shewed by them in fettering and manacing such gentlemen as they caught, and committed to prison for some unliking they had conceiued of them, it was a miserable case to behold. Some there were whom they brought forth, as it had bene to iudgement before the tree of reformation, there to be tried afore the gouernors, as if they had bene guiltie of some heinous and greuous crime. And when it was asked of the commons, what should be done with those prisoners, they would crie with one voice; hang them, hang them. And when they were asked why they gave so sharpe iudgement of those whom they neuer knew, they would vniuersally answer, that other cried the same crie; and therefore they ment to giue their assent with other; although they could yeld no reason, but that they were gentlemen, & therefore not worthy to liue.

Whilest the rebels thus raged abroad in the countrie at Bingham eleuen miles from Norwich, sir Edmund Knevet knight, with a small companie of his owne meniall seruants, set vpon the night-watch of the rebels that were placed there, & brake through, ouerthrowing diuerse of them: and hauing some of his owne men also vnderled by the rebels, and in danger to be betwen in peeces among them, yet he recovered them, & escaped their hands through great manhood. After which good nights seruice, as they would haue it esteemed, they repaired to their great capitaine Bet, to shew their hurts receiued, & to complaine of their griefes. It was talked among them, that they would go to sir Edmund Knevet's house called Buchenham castell, to assault it, and to fetch him out of it by force. But it was doubted of some, least it were too strong for them; and other feared sharpe stripes, if they should attempt that exploit, being at the least twelue miles from their maine campe: and so that enterpryse went not forward, the most part thinking it best to sleepe in whole skins.

Sir Edmund Knevet's seruice.

There was at London the same time a citizen of Norwich, one Leonard Southerton fled from thence for feare of his life, whome the counsell sent for, to come to speake with them: and being asked what he knew touching the state of the rebels, he declared to them from point to point the maner of all their outrageous proceedings: but yet that as he vnderstood, there were manie among them that would laie aside their armour, if they might be assured of the kings pardon: and therefore if it would please the king to set forth a proclamation, that all such as would depart from the campe and be quiet, should haue their pardon for all that was past, he doubted not but that those routs should be dispersed. His advice was allowed, and thereupon was an herald sent with all speed in companie with the said Southerton vnto Norwich; & comming into the campe the last of Julie, and standing before the tree of reformation, appareled in his cote of armes, pronounced there before all the multitude, with loud voice, a free pardon to all that would depart to their homes, and laieing aside their armour, giue ouer their traitorous begun enterpryse.

Leonard Southerton.

Pardon proclaimed by an herald at armes.

After he had made an end of his proclamation, in maner all the multitude cried, God saue the king. And manie of them falling downe vpon their knees, could could not forbeare with feares gushing from their eyes, but commend the kings great and vnspokeable mercie thus freely offered vnto them, which vndoubtedlie they had at that time all of them receiued, if the wicked speech of some of the rascall sort, and namelie the traitorous persuasions of that wicked carter that himselfe, had not staied them from their dutifull inclinations. But after that he had with lowd voice before declared, that kings & princes were accustomed to grant pardons to such as are offenders, and not to others; he trusted that he needed not anie pardon, sith he had done nothing but that belonged to the dutie of a true subiect: and herewith he besought them not to forsake him, but to remember his promise, sith he was readie to spend his life in the quarrell. The herald hereupon called him traitor, and commanded John Petibone the swordbearer of the king to attach him for treason. Then began a great hurle burle among the multitudes, so that the herald, perceiuing they began to shrinke from their former purpose of receiuing the kings pardon, departed from them with these words; All ye that be the kings friends, come auaile with me. The maior & maister Alderich, with a great number of other gentlemen & honest yeomen that were readie to obey the kings commandement, followed him.

The citizens
fauouring the
rebels.

The maior being thus returned to the citie, caused the gates to be shut, and such gentlemen as had been committed to prison within the castell, or other places in the citie, he caused to be set at libertie, & with their aduise took order how the rebelles might be kept out. But as he was busie about such matters, certeine of the citizens that fauoured the rebelles had receiued a great multitude of them into the citie, which did put the citizens in such feare, that it was thought the most suretie for the gentlemen that had bene now released out of prison, to be shut vp againe, leaue the rebelles finding them abroad, should haue murdered them. Yet after this, when the rebels were departed out of the citie againe, the maior & aldermen fell in hand to rampire vp the gates, to plant ordinance, and to make all necessarie provision that for them was possible.

At length they fell to shooting off their artillerie as well from the citie as from the campe, doing their best to annoie each other. But when the rebelles saw that they did little hurt to the citie with their great ordinance lieng vpon the hill, they remoued the same downe to the foot of the same hill, and from thence began to beat the walles. Notwithstanding, shortly after they made sute for a truce to indure for a time, that they might passe to and fro through the citie, to fetch in vittells, whereof some want began to pinch them in the campe. The maior and aldermen flatlie denied their request, protesting that they would not permit anie traitors to haue passage through their citie.

The rebels soze kindled in wrath with this answer, and deniall of their sute, came running downe from the hill, and assaulting the gates, were beaten off with shot of arrowes and other weapons. And yet such rage appeared among the rebels, that the boies and young lads shewed themselves so desperat in gathering vp the arrowes, that when they saw and felt the same striking in some part of their bodies, they would plucke them forth, and deliuered them to their belov'd men, that they might be slow the same againe at the citizens. In all this boile (a thing noteworthy) the seditious sort minding nothing more than the compassing of their purpose, had as little faie of themselves in this their outrage, as a bull at the sight of a colow, or a stoned horse at the view of a mare; according vnto the old saying of the poet:

Fortis equum visa semper adhibuit equa.*

In the meane time, whilst they were thus busie vpon one side of the citie, an alarm rose at the defendants backs, crying that the rebels were entred the citie on the contrarie side: and so euery man shrinking awaie, and running thither to repell the enimie there, that part was left void of defendants where the first assault began. Whereof the rebels being aduised, rushed into the river that runneth before bishops gate, got to the gates, and breaking them open, entred without anie great resistance. For all the citizens were withdrawne to their houses and other places, where they hoped best to hide themselves from the furie of their enemies.

The rebels having thus entred the citie by force, conueied all the guns and artillerie, with other furniture of warre out of the citie into their campe. The herald that was yet abiding in the citie, to see if the rebels would before the date prefixed for their pardons, being not yet expired, giue ouer their enterprize, came with the maior into the market place, and in the hearing of a great multitude of people that were come forth and stood about him, he calsions gaue commandement in the kings name, that they should laie armes aside, and get them home to their houses: which to so manie as did, he pronounced a generall pardon, and to the rest extreme punishment by death.

The rebels that stood by and heard him, when he had once made an end of his proclamation, bade him get him thence with a mischiefe: for it was not his faire offers, nor his sweet flattering words that should beguile them, sith they made no account of such manner of mercie, that vnder a colour of pardon, should cut off all their safetie and hope of preservation. The herald perceiuing how obstinate they were bent, and set on all mischiefe, and that it was impossible to bring them from their outrageous treason, either through feare of punishment or hope of pardon, departed; without hauing brought that to passe for which he was sent. Immediatly after his departure, the rebels sought for Leonard Southerton, purposing to haue apprehended him, and committed him to prison, for accompanying the herald thitherwards. But he hauing knowledge of their meaning, hid himselfe from them.

After this, there were by the kings commandement apprehended diuerse persons, as the maior, Robert Watton, William Rogers, John Homerston, William Hampton, and manie others, which were brought out of the citie, and committed to prison in mount Surrie. Yet perceiuing well that he must either now obtaine a bloodie victorie by force against his countrie, or else to tast such an end as his vngenerous attempts did well deserue, got together so manie wicked persons as he might procure to come vnto him from each side, with great rewards and faire promises: so that it was a strange matter to consider what a multitude of brawny and rascall came to him vpon the sudden.

The citizens of Dorchester were soze displeased, that their maior (being an honest man, and one greatly beloued among them) should be imprisoned, and so remaine in danger of life among the rebels: for they threatned him soze, & telling at his name, would saie one to another; Let vs all come together to morrow, for we shall see a * coos hed sold in the campe for a penny. Whereupon the citizens fearing least through the malice and rage of the rebels, their maior might chance to be made awaie among them, procured maister Thomas Alderich (whose authoritie was great among them) to be a meane for his deliuerance: who comming to him with sharpe and bitter words words reprimed him for his cruell dealing, by imprisoning so honest a man as the maior was, and withall commanded him to release him: which either for shame, or rather through feare of a guiltie conscience that pricked him, he caused incontinentlie to be done: who thereupon might now and then go and come at his pleasure to and fro the citie. But because he could not still remaine in the citie, but was constrained to continue for the most part in the campe, he appointed Augustine Steward to be his deputie, who with the assistance of Henrie Bacon, and John Atkinson thiriffes, governed the citie right orderlie, and kept the most part of the citizens in due obedience.

The counsell advertised now upon the heralds returne, that there was no waie to reduce these Dorsethe rebels unto quiet otherwise than by force, appointed the marquisse of Northampton with fiftene hundred horsemen to go downe unto Dorseth to subdue those stubborne traitors that so vndertulie refused the kings mercifull pardon, freely offered by his officer at armes, and others. Here went with the lord marquisse diuerse honorable and worshipfull personages, as the lord Sheffield, the lord Wentworth, sir Anthonie Dennie, sir Henrie Parker, sir Richard Southwell, sir Rafe Sadler, sir John Clere, sir Rafe Kowlet, sir Richard Lee, sir John Gates, sir Thomas Daffon, sir Henrie Bedingfield, sir John Suliard, sir William Malgraue, sir John Cuts, sir Thomas Cornwallis knights, together with a great manie of other knights, esquires and gentlemen, and a small band of Italians, vnder the leading of a capteine named Palatessa.

The lord marquisse being approached within a mile of Dorseth, sent sir Gilbert Dethicke knight, now Carter, then Dorrie, king at armes, vnto the citie, to summon them within to yeld it into his hands, or vpon refusal to proclame warre against them. Hereupon Augustine Steward the maiors deputie sent to the maior that was in the campe with let, advertising him what message he had receiued from the marquisse. The maior sent word againe, that nothing was more greuous vnto him, than to see into what miserie the citie and countrie about were brought by the rage of these commotions; and declaring in what case he stood, being kept by force among the rebels, whereas otherwise he would according to his dutie haue come to his honor. But as for the citie, he had committed the gouernance vnto Augustine Steward, who should be readie to surrender it into his lordships hands: and that if let would giue him leaue, he would come himselfe to his honor, submitting all things wholie to his lordships order and disposition.

This message being brought backe by the said Dorrie, Augustine Steward the maiors deputie with the thiriffes, and a great number of the citizens, came to the lord marquisse campe, and deliuered by the sword to his lordship, declaring how the maior himselfe would gladlie haue come, if he could haue got from the rebels: and that although a great rowt of the lewd citizens were partakers with the rebelles, yet a number of the substantiall & honest citizens would neuer consent to their wicked doings, but were readie to receiue his lordship into their citie. The lord marquisse giuing good words to the citizens, and willing them to be of good comfort, sith he trusted to appeale these troubles verie shortly, deliuered the sword vnto sir Richard Southwell, who bare it before the lord marquisse as he passed forth towards the citie, entreing the same by saint Stephens gate. And incontinentlie was proclamation made that they should all resort into the market place, where they consulted together how they might best defend the citie against the enimies, and to repress their furie. Hereupon was order giuen for the placing of watch and ward about the gates and the walls, as might seeme expedient. The lord marquisse supped that night and lodged in the maiors deputies house; but his lordship as well as other kept their armour on their backs all that night, for doubt of some sudden assault to be made against the citie by the rebels. Here it chanced that the strangers, either by appointment or otherwise, went forth, and offered faithfully to the rebels vpon Pagdalen hill.

The rebels came forth with their horsemen: but it seemed that they were better praised to fetch in bottles, than to make their manage or careire, and therefore not able to match the strangers, which being perceiued of their fellowes that were footmen, they put forth their archers before their horsemen, and such numbers herewith came swarming forth of their campe, meaning to compasse in those strangers, that they perceiuing the maner and purpose of the enimies, cast themselves in a ring, and retired backe into the citie againe. But they left one of their companie behind them, a gentleman that was an Italian, who more balliantlie than warlike ventured to farre among the enimies, and through euill hap being ouerthrowne beside his horse, he was inuironed about with a great multitude of those rebels, that took him prisoner, and like vile wretches spoiling him of his armor and apparell, hanged him over the walls of mount Surrie. Which as well shewed that courtesie might be looked for at such cruell traitors hands, that would thus vnmmercifullie put such a gentleman and worshipfulle souldior to death: for whose ransom, if they would haue demanded it, they might haue had no small portion of monie to haue satisfied their greedy minds. But it seemed that their beastlie crueltie had bereft them the remembrance of all honest consideration and dutifull humanitie.

The marquisse of Northampton causing (as before we haue heard) diligent watch to be kept vpon the walles, and at the gates, appointed the same to be visited right often, that through negligence no mishap should follow. Moreover, besides the watch at the gates and walles, the residue of the souldiors making a mightie huge fire in the market place, so as all the streets were full of light, they remained there all that night in their armour, readie vpon anie occasion to resist the enimies if they should make anie attempt. Sir Edward Warner marshall of the field gaue the watch-word, sir Thomas Daffon, sir John Clere, sir William Malgraue, sir Thomas Cornwallis, and sir Henrie Bedingfield were appointed to the defense of other parts of the citie. And now when euerie thing was thought to be safelie provided for, and that the lord marquisse and other were laid to take their rest, the rebels about the middle of the night began to shot off their great artillerie towards the citie, so thicke as was possible: but the bullets passed ouer their heads that were lodged in the citie, without doing anie great hurt at all.

The lord marquisse, by reason of the often alarms that were giuen, whilst the enimies thus ceased not to rage with continuall shot of ordinance, was called vp by the marshall sir Edward Warner; and coming into the market place, accompanied with the nobles and gentlemen of the armie, fell in counsell with them, how to foreshew that the citie in such danger might be safelie defended against the enimies with such small power as he had there with him. It was therefore determined, that all the gates which were on the contrarie part of the towne from the rebels campe, and likewise the ruinous places of the walles should be rampired vp, that if the enimies should chance to giue an assault to the citie, citie, they might more easilie be repelled.

But as these things were in doing, and almost brought to end, in a manner all the whole multitude of the rebelles came out of their cabins, running downe in most furious maner to the citie, and with great shouts and yelling cries went about to set fire on the gates, to cline ouer the walles, to passe the river, and to enter the citie at such places where the walles were throught age decayed and ruinous. The soldiers that were there with the lord marquisse, did shew their bittermost induror to beat backe the enemies. This fight in most cruell wise continued for the space of thre houres without ceasing, the rebels forcing themselves to the bittermost of their powers to enter perforce vpon them, and they within the citie shewed no lesse courage to repell them backe. The hardie manhood of diuerse knights, and other men of worship was here right apparant. It was strange to see the desperat boldnesse of the rebelles, that when they were thrust through the bodies of thights, and some of them hough-sinewed, would yet seeke reuenge in striking at their aduersaries, when their hands were scarce able to hold by their weapon; thinking themselves somewhat satisfied if the humor of their enuie and deadlie spite might be fed but with a drop of their aduersaries blood; with such a malignant spirit (tending wholie to vengeance) these desperat rebels were possessed, according to the poets speech in the like sense and meaning:

But such was the baliance of the gentlemen and soldiers, which were there with the lord marquisse, that in the end the enemies which were already entered the citie, were beaten out againe, and driuen backe to their accustomed kennell holes with losse of thre hundred of their numbers. They within the citie hauing thus repelled the enemies, & accounting themselves in more safetie than before, for the rest of the night that yet remained, which was not much, they gaue themselves to refresh their wearied bodies with some sleepe. The next daie, the lord marquisse was informed by some of the citizens, that there were no small number in Lets campe that would gladlie come from him, if they might be sure of their pardon; and that at Dochethorpe gate there were foure or five thousand, that wished for nothing more than for pardon: and that if the same were offered them, there were no doubt (as they belened) but that they would submit themselves to the kings mercie.

The marquisse was glad to vnderstand so much, & incontinentlie dispatched Horreie king at armes, with a trumpet, to assure them on the kings behalfe, that they should be pardoned for all offenses past, and that had bene committed in time of this rebellion, if they would lay armes aside. Horreie and the trumpet comming to the gate, found not a man there: but the trumpet sounding his trumpet, there came running downe from the hill a great multitude of their people, & amongst other as chiefe, one Flotman, whom Horreie commanded to staie. Whereupon the said Flotman asked him what was the matter, and wherefore he had called them together by sound of trumpet: So thy waies (said he) tell thy companie from my lord marquisse of Northampton, the kings maiesties lieutenant, that he commandeth them to cease from committing anie further outrage: and if they will (saith he) obey his commandement, all that is past, shall be forgiven and pardoned.

Flotman hauing heard Horreies declaration, as he was an outrageous and busie fellow, presumptuouslie made answer, that he cared not a pins point for my lord marquisse, and withall, like a rebellious traitor, railed vpon his lordship, and maintained, that he and the rest of the rebels were earnest defenders of the kings roiall maiestie, and that they had taken weapon in hand not against the king, but in his defense, as in time it should appeare, as they that sought nothing but to mainteine his maiesties roiall estate, the libertie of their countrie, and the safetie of their commonwealth, &c. To conclude, he venterlie refused the kings pardon, and told Horreie certeinelic, that they would either restore the commonwealth from decaye, into the which it was fallen, being oppressed throughtly the couetousnesse and tyrannie of the gentlemen; either else would they like men die in the quarrell.

Scarcelie had he made an end of his tale, when suddenlie a fearefull alarum was raised throughtly out the citie: for whilst Flotman was thus in talke with the king of armes at Dochethorpe gate, the rebels in great rage entring the citie by the hospitall, went about to bying all things to destruction: but being incountered nere to the bishops palace, by the lord marquisse his men, there ensued a bloudie conflict betwixt them, which continued long with great fiercenesse and eger reuenge on both parts. There died about seuen score of the rebels, and of the soldiers that serued against them some number, beside a great multitude that were hurt and wounded on both parts. But the pitifull slaughter of the lord Sheffield, who hauing more regard to his honor than safetie of life, desirous to shew some proofe of his noble valiancie, entering amongst the enemies, as he sought right hardilie, though not so warlike as had bene expedient, fell into a ditch as he was about to turne his horse: & here with being compassed about with a number of those horrible traitors, was slaine amongst them: although he both declared what he was, and offered largelie to the villains, if they would haue saued his life. But the more noble he shewed himselfe to be, the more were they kindled in outrageous furie against him. And as he pulled off his head peece, that it might appeare what he was, a butcherlie knaue named Fulks, who by occupation was both a carpenter & a butcher, slat him in the head with a club, and so most wretchedlie killed him. A lamentable case, that so noble a young gentleman, indued with so manie commendable qualities, as were to be wished in a man of his calling, should thus miserablie end his daies by the hands of so vile a villan.

Diuerse other gentlemen and worshipfull soldiers came to the like end among those outrageous rebels, and amongst other, Robert Woluaston, that was appointed to keepe the doore of Christs church, was killed by the same Fulks, who took him for sir Edmund Kneuet, against whom the rebels bare great malice, for that he sought to annoie them so farre as by anie meanes he might, as partly ye haue heard. But the slaughter of that noble man the lord Sheffield, soze discouraged the residue of the soldiers that were come with the lord marquisse. And on the other part, the rebels were aduanced thereby, in greater hope to preuaile against them, and thereupon pressed forward with such hardinesse, that they caused the lord marquisse and his people to giue place, and to forsake the citie, euerie man making the best thiff he could to saue himselfe. But yet diuerse gentlemen of good account and worship remaining behind, and abiding the hunt, were taken prisoners, as sir Thomas Cornewallis, and others, whom the rebels afterwards kept in strict durance, untill the daie came of their overthrow by the kings power, vnder the conduction of the earle of Warwick.

The lord marquisse and the residue that escaped, made the best thiff they could to get out of danger: and at length, he and the most part of them that went went forth with him, came to London. The rebels having thus repelled the lord marquisse & his power, set fire on the citie, whereby manie faire buildings were consumed and burnt. It happened yet well the same time, that there fell great abundance of raine, the which holpe in part to quench the rage of the fire. Pennerthes, all the houses on either side of Helmes street, and the hospitall of the poore; also Bishops gate, Pockthorpe gate, Magdalene gate, and Bearestreet gate, with manie other houses in other parts of the citie, were burned, and so much defaced with fire. The citizens were brought into such extreme miserie, that they knew not which waie to turne them. Some there were that fled out of the citie, taking with them their gold and silver, and such thort ware as they might conueie awaie with them, abandoning wife and children, to rest at the mercie of the rebels. Other hid their goods in wells, priuies, and other such secret places out of the waie.

The rebels entering into the houses of such as were knowne to be wealthie men, spoiled and bare awaie all that might be found of anie value. But to speake of all the cruell parts which they plaied, it would be tedious to expresse the same, their doings were so wicked and outrageous. There was shooting, holding, and wringing among them, weeping, and crying out of the citie at that present was most miserable. The maiors deputie kept himselfe close in his house, and might behold all this mischiefe and destruction of the citie, but durst not come abroad, nor go about to staie them: at length, a great multitude of the rebels that were come downe fro their campe, entering by saint Augustines gate, came straight to his house, and stroue to breake open the doores: but when they could not easilie bying their purpose to passe that waie forth, they began to fire the house. Whereupon for feare to be burned within his owne lodging, he set open the doores, and in came those vnmannerlic ghosts, toke him, plucked his gowne before his backe, called him traitor, and threatened to kill him, if he would not tell them where the lord marquisse of Northampton had hidden himselfe.

And when he had told them that vndoubtedlie he and all his companie were gone, they were in a great rage, and with terrible noise and rambling they sought euerie corner of the house for him, and taking what they found, they departed. But yet manie of them afterwards partlie pacified for a peece of monie, and other things which they receiued of the maior, and partlie reproued for the wrongfull robberies by some that were in credit among them, they brought againe such packs and fardels as they had trussed vp together, and threw them into the shops of those houses, out of the which they had taken the same before: but yet there were diuers of the citizens that were spoiled of all that they had by those rebels, that entered their houses under a colour to seeke for the marquisse of Northampton's men. Namelie, the houses of those citizens that were fled, were spoiled and ransacked most miserable, for they reputed and called them traitors and enemies to their king and countrie, that thus had forsaken their houses and dwellings in time of such necessitie: yet manie of the citizens bying forth bread, beere, and other victuals vnto the rebels to refresh them with, somewhat calmed their furious rage, and so escaped their violent hands, although no small number were so starved (as before we haue heard) that they haue lined the waie for it all the daies of their life since that time.

But now the rebels hauing thus got possession of the citie, & chased awaie the kings people, they toke order to haue the gates kept houselike with watch and ward of the citizens themselves, thyrting them with most shamefull death, if they omitted the same. These vnrulie persons were so farre slept into all kind of beaustie outrage, that when it rained, they would kenell by themselves in the churches, abusing the place appointed for the seruice and worshipping of the almighty God, in most prophane and wicked manner, and neither prayer nor yet threats of men or women that aduised them to modestie could take place. The kings maiestie aduertised therefore, that there was no waie to tame their diuelish and traitorous outrage, but by force: with the aduise of his counsell caused a power to be put in a readinesse, as well of his owne subjects as of strangers, namelie lancequenets, which were come to serue his maiestie against the Scots.

But now it was thought expedient to vse their seruice against these rebels, whose power and desperate boldnesse was so farre increased, that without a maine armie, guided by some generall of great experience, and noble conduct, it would be hard and right dangerous to subdue them: wherein violence and force was to be used, sith they had shewed themselves in an extremitie of stubbornesse, like buls that by baiting are to be tamed, or like disteched stallions which with bit & bydale must be managed, as one saith:

Whereupon that noble cheeke and valiant erle of Marlowe, lately before appointed to haue gone against the Scots and Frenchmen into Scotland, was called backe, and commanded to take vpon him the conduction of this armie against the Pockthorpe rebels: for such was the opinion then conceived of that honorable erle, for the high manhood, valiant prowesse, and great experience in all warlike enterprises, sufficientlie tried, and knowne to rest in him, that either they might be vanquished and ouercome by him, or by none other.

Captaine Ket and his rebellious armie, hauing some aduertisement by rumors spred, of this preparation and comming of an armie against them, they were not slacke to make themselves strong and ready to abide all the hazard that fortune of warre might bying. The erle of Marlowe then, after that his men and provisions were ready, did set forward, and came vnto Cambridge, where the lord marquisse of Northampton and other met his lordship. Here also diuerse citizens of Northwich came to him, and falling downe vpon their knees before him, besought him to be good lord vnto them; and withall declared their miserable state, great griefe and sorrow, which they had conceined for the wretched destruction of their countrie: beseeching him to haue pittie vpon them. And if in such extremitie of things as had happened vnto their citie, they had through feare or ignorance committed anie thing contrarie to their dutifull allegiance, that it might please his honor to pardon them their offenses in such behalfe, sith if anie thing were amisse on their parts, the same came to passe fore against their wills, and to their extreme griefe and sorrow.

The erle of Marlowe told them, that he knew indeed in what danger they had bene among those vnrulie ribalds; and as for anie offense which they had committed, he knew not: for in leaving their citie sith matters were growne to such extremitie, they were to be borne with, but in one thing they had ouershot themselves: for that in the beginning they had not sought to repress those tumults, sith if they had put themselves in defense of their countrie, to resist the rebels at the first, such mischiefs as were now growne, might easilie haue bene avoided. But neuertheless, vpon this their humble submission, he granted them all the kings mercifull pardon, and commanding them to prouide themselves of armour and weapon, appointed them to march forth with the armie, wearing certeine laces or ribbons about their necks for a difference, that they might be knowne from others. There were in this armie under the earle of Warwicke diuerse men of honor and great worship, as lords, knights, esquires, and gentlemen in great numbers. First the lord marquisse of Northampton, and sundrie of them that had bene with him before, desirous to be reuenged of his late repulse, the lords Willoughbie, Powes and Baie, Ambrose Dudley, sonne to the said earle, and at this present worthilie adorned with the title (which his father then bare) of earle of Warwicke, and his brother lord Robert Dudley now earle of Leicester; also Henrie Willoughbie esquier, sir Thomas Tresham, sir Martin duke constable, William Deuereux sonne to the lord Ferrers of Chartley, sir Edmund Knevet, sir Thomas Palmer, sir Andrew Flammoche, and diuerse other knights, esquires, and gentlemen: all which plaied their parts as time and occasion was ministered vnto them to giue triall of their manhood.

The earle of Warwicke, and such as were come with him to Cambridge, marched directlie from thence towards Norwich, and came vnto Wymondham the two and twentieth of August, where and by the waie the most part of all the gentlemen of Norfolk folke that were at libertie, came vnto him. The next daie betimes he shewed himselfe vpon the plaine, betwixt the citie of Norwich and Coton wood, and lodged that night at Intwood, in house belonging to sir Thomas Tresham knight, a two miles distant from Norwich. Here they rested that daie and night following, not once putting off their armour, but remaining still in a readinesse, if the enimies should haue made anie sudden inuasion against them. The earle of Warwicke in the meane time sent the afore remembred king of armes Porreie, to summon the citie, either to open the gates that he might quietlie enter; or else to looke for warre at his hands that would then assaie to win it by force, and such reward as rebels (that wilfullie withstand their soueraigne) ought to receiue.

was made to the herald by the citizens of Norwich, whom Ket assigned there-
vnto.

When Ket vnderstood that the herald was come to the gates, he appointed the maiors deputie Augustine Steward, and Robert Rug, two of the chiefe citizens, to go to him and to know his errand. They passing forth at a posterne, and hearing his message, made answer, that they were the miserablest men that were then liuing, as they themselves beleued, sith that hauing suffered such calamities as they could not but tremble at in calling to remembrance, they could not now haue libertie to declare the loiall dutie which they bare & ought to beare to the kings highnesse: so that they accompted themselves most vnforsunate, sith their hap was to liue in that season, in which they must either leoparde losse of life, or the estimation of their good name, although they trusted the kings maiestie would be gracious lord vnto them. sith they had giuen no consent vnto such wicked rebellion as was thus raised against his highnesse, but with losse of goods and perill of life so farre as in them laie, had done what they could to keepe the citizens in good order and dutifull obedience.

One thing more they would humble desire of my lord of Warwicke, that whereas there was no small number of Kets armie in the citie without armour or weapon, and as it should seme irksome and wearie of that which had bene already done, it might please him once againe to vouchsafe to offer them the kings pardon, and if he should thus do, they had great hope that the rebels would gladlie accept it, and so the matter might be pacified without more bloudshed. Porreie returned to the earle of Warwicke, and declared what answer he had receiued. The earle desirous of nothing more than to haue the matter thus taken vp, as well for other considerations, as for feare least the gentlemen remaining prisoners with the rebels, should be vnnecessarily murdered by their keepers, if they came to the vttermost triall of battell, he resolved to pounce if it would thus come to passe. And herevpon was Porreie with a trumpet sent to offer them a generall pardon, who being entered the citie, met about foytie of the rebels on horsebacke, riding two and two together verie pleasant and merrie, and so passing from S. Stephens gate vnto Bishops gate, the trumpetter sounded his trumpet, and with that, a great multitude of the rebels came thronging downe together from the hill: to whom the hostler speedilie riding, commanded that they should dismount themselves, and stand in order vpon either side the waie. And as Porreie and the trumpetter, with two of the chiefe citizens entred betwixt them, they were receiued with great noise and clamour, for euerie of them putting off their hats or caps, cried; God saue king Edward, God saue king Edward.

Porreie and the two citizens, highlie commending them herein, requested them to keepe their place and order wherein they stood for a while: and then Porreie passing forth about two hundred and fiftie paces, came to the top of the hill, and putting on his coate armour, raised a while (for Ket was not yet come) and at length began to declare vnto them in what maner diuers times since first they had taken armes in hand, the kings maiestie by sundrie persons, as well heralds as other, had sought to reduce them from their unlawfull and rebellious tumults, vnto their former dutie and obedience; and yet neuerthelesse, they had shewed themselves wilfull and stubborne, in refusing his mercifull pardon freely offered vnto them, and despised the ministers which his grace had sent vnto them to pronounce the same. He willed them therefore to call themselves now at length to remembrance, and to behold the state of the common-wealth, which they so often to no purpose had still in their mouths, and neuerthelesse by them miserable defaced, & brought in danger of vtter ruine and decay.

And herewith discourting at large of the horrible, wicked, and heinous murders, riots, burnings, and other crimes by them committed, he willed them to consider into what sea of mischeces they had throtten themselves, and what punishment they ought to looke for as due to them for the same; sith as well the wrath of God as the kings armie was hanging ouer their heads, and ready at hand, which they were not able to resist. For his grace had resolved no longer to suffer so great and presumptuous a mischief as this, to be suffered in the middle of his realme: and therefore had appointed the right honourable earle of Warwicke, a man of noble fame and approued valiancie, to be his generall lieutenant of that his roiall armie, to persecute them with fire and sword; and not to leaue off, till he had utterly disperfed and scattered that wicked and abominable assemblie. And yet such was the exceeding greatnesse of the kings bountifull mercie and clemencie, that he that was by him appointed to be a reuenger of their heinous treasons committed against his maiestie, if they continued in their obstinate wilfulnesse, should be also the interpreter and minister of his gracious and free pardon, to so manie as would accept it. Which while they now imbraced, the said earle had made a solemn vow, that they should neuer haue it offered to them againe; but that he would persecute them till he had punished the whole multitude according unto their last deserts.

Whan he that heard him, hauing due consideration of their miserable estate, were touched with some remorse of conscience, fearing at length to taste the reuenge of such horrible crimes as they had been partakers of with others in committing the same.
But the more part finding themselves highlie offended with his words, began to iangle (as they had done before vnto other that had bene sent to offer them pardon) that he was not the kings herald, but some one made out by the gentlemen in such a gaie coate, patched together of vestments and church-surfe, being sent onelie to deceiue them, in offering them pardon, which would proue nought else but halters; and therefore it were well done, to thrust an arrow into him, or to hang him by. Although other seemed dutifullie to reuerence him, and diuerse that had serued in Scotland and at Bullongne, re-membryng that they had sene him there and knew him, told and perswaded their fellowes, that he was the kings herald indeed. Whereupon they became more mild, and offered him no further iniurie: but yet they could not be perswaded that this pardon tended to anie other end, but to bring them to destruction; and that in stead of pardon, there was prepared for them nought else but a barrell full of halters.

Such letud speech was amongst them, fauouring altogether of malicious mistrust, and most wilfull treason. Forreie neuertheless departing from thence, accompanied with Ket, came to another place, where he made the like proclamation: for the multitude was such that he could not be heard of them all in one place. Here, before he had made an end of his tale, there was a vile boie (as some write) that turned by his bare taile to him, with words as vncomely as his gesture was filthy: with which spitefull reproch thus shewed towards the kings maiesties officer at armes, one (which in com-panie of some other that were come ouer the water to view things) being greatly offended, with an harquebuse shot stroke that vngracious lad through the bodie a little aboue the reins.

Which when some of the rebels had sene, a dozzen of their horsemen came galloping out of the wood, crieng; We are betrayed friends, we are betrayed, if you looke not about you: do you not see how our fellows are slaine with guns before our faces: What may we hope if we disarm our selues, that are thus vsed being armed? This herald goeth about nothing else, but to bring vs within danger of some ambush, that the gentlemen may kill and beate vs all downe at their pleasure. Whereupon they all shanke awaie, and fled, as they had bene out of their wits: yet did their great capteine Robert Ket accompanie Forreie, meaning (as hath bene said) to haue gone to the earle of Warwike himselfe, to haue talked with him: but as he was almost at the foot of the hill, there came running after him a great multitude of the rebels, crieng to him, and asking him whether he went: We are readie (said they) to take such part as you doe, be it neuer so bad: and if he would go anie further, they would (as they said) surelie follow him.

Forreie then perceiving such numbers of people following them, desired Ket to staie them: who returning backe to them, they were incontinentlie appeared, and so they all returned with him backe to their campe. When the earle of Warwike vn-derstood that they were thus altogether set on mis-chance, and neither with praier, proffer of pardon, threatening of punishment, nor other means they could be reduced to quietnes, he determined to proceed against them by force. And hereupon bringing his armie vnto saint Stephens gate, which the rebels stopped vp, with the letting downe of the porticulice, he commanded those that had charge of the ar-tillerie, to plant the same against the gate, and with batterie to breake it open.

As these things were in hand, he understood by Augustine Steward the maiors deputie, that there was an other gate on the contrarie side of the citie, called the Walsen gate, which the rebels had rammed up, but yet not so, but that it might be easilie broken open. Whereunto were the pioners called, and commanded to breake open that gate also: which being done, the soldiers entered by the same into the citie, and slue diuerse of those rebels that stood readie to defend and resist their entrie. In the meane time had the gunners also broken in sunder with their shot the portculice, and nere hand the one halfe of the other gate, by the which the marques of Northampton, and capteine Dyrrie, alias Poignard (that being sent from London met my lord of Warwike by the waie) entered with their bands, and drove backe the rebels with slaughter, that were readie there to resist them.

Forreie, the maiors deputie caused West-wike gate to be set open: at the which the earle of Warwike himselfe entring with all his armie, and finding in manner no resistance, came to the market place. Here were taken a threescore of the rebels, the which according to the order of martiall law were incontinentlie executed, according to the qualities of their offense, confessing (no doubt) in confession, that their punishment was proportioned to their trespasse, and that in dieng the death (were the same neuer so extreme & dreadfull) they had but their desert; and therefore might well saie with the poet:

Supplicia & scelerum penas expendimus omnes.

Virgil.

Shorlie after, the carriages belonging to the armie were brought into the citie by the same gate, and passing through the citie, by negligence & want of order given to them that attended on the same cariage, they kept on forward till they were got out at Bishops gate towards Household. Where of the rebels being aduised, they came downe, & setting upon the carters, and other that attended on the carriages, put them to flight, and drove awaie the carts laden with artillerie, powder, and other munition, bringing the same into their campe, & greatlie reioissing thereof, because they had no great store of such things among them: but yet capteine Dyrrie with his band comming in good time to the rescue, recovered some of the carts from the enemies, not without some slaughter on either side. Forreie, the enimies as yet being not fullie diuen out of the citie, placed themselves in crosse strats, & were readie to assail the soldiers as they saw their aduantage, part of them standing at S. Michaels, part at S. Ste-phans, and part at S. Peters, and some of them also stood in Wilmers street.

Here they assailing such as bradsheddie were entered within their danger, they slue diuerse, and among other three or foure gentlemen, before they could be succoured from anie part. The earle of War-wike aduertised hereof, passed forth with all his forces to remove the enimie, and comming to S. Andrew in Johns street, was receiued with a sharpe sorme of arrowes: but capteine Dyrrie his harquebusers galled them so with their shot, that they were glad to giue place, and so fled amaine. There were slaine a hundred and thirtie, and diuerse of them shynking aside into churchyards and other places vnder the walles, were taken and executed. All the rest got them vp to their campe at Household, and so the citie was rid of them for that time. Then doe the erle of Warwike take order for the safe keeping of the citie, appointing watch and ward to be kept on the walles, and in euerie street. Also that all the gates should be rammed vp, except one: two that stood towards the enemies, at the which were planted certaine peeces of the great artillerie.

Alexander
Neuill.

But the rebels understanding that the erle of Warwike wanted powder and other things appertaining to the vse of the great ordinance, and withall perceiuing that the Welshmen which were appointed to the gard of the said great peeces of artillerie were no great number, and therefore not able to resist anie great force that should come against them, they came downe the hill vpon the sudden as it were wholie together in most outrageous maner. And withall one Hiles that was a verie perfect gunner, and maruellous skilfull in the feat of shooting of great artillerie, and at that time remaining among the rebels, shot off a peece; and Rue one of the kings principall gunners, that was attending vpon those peeces of artillerie, which stood thus befoze the gate. Whom then the rebels perceiued thus to be slaine, they made forward with more courage, and gaue such a desperate onset vpon them that garded the said artillerie, that their small number, being not able to withstand their aduersaries great and huge multitude pressing in such furious rage vpon them, that they were constrained to flee backe, and to leaue the artillerie for a preie vnto the enemies, who seizing vpon the same, conueied them awaie with certaine caris laden with all manner of munition for wars vp to their campe: a matter (as was thought) of no small importance, sith the enemies thereby were furnished now with such things, whereof befoze they stood most in need, and now hauing store thereof, they spared not liberallie to bestow it against the citie, beating downe not onlie the highest top of Bishops gate, but also a great part of the wals on that side.

The rebels

peeces of ar-

Captaine Dunrie.

And here trulie the good seruice of captaine Dunrie is not to be forgotten, who now as earst being readie to reuenge this iniurie, following vpon the enemies, put them to flight, and recouered much of that which they had taken from the earls souldiers. The erle of Warwike after this cut off the entries at the gates, and rampired them vp, placed at the bridges and turnings of the waies and streets diuers bands of souldiers to keepe the passages, brake downe the White friers bridge, and at Bishops gate he appointed the lord Willoughbie with a great number of souldiers to defend that part, & in this sort he made provision to defend the citie from the rebels, if they should attempt to make anie surpriſe vpon the sudden.

Councell gi-uen to the erle of Warwike to abandon the citie.

The next daie yet they passing ouer the river, set fire on certaine houses at Connelſworth, burning the more part of all the houses of two parishes: and so great was the rage of the fire, that catching hold vpon an house wherein the merchants of Dorwich vse to laie vp such wares and merchandize as they conueie to their citie from Vermouth, the same house with great store of wheat and other riches was miserablie consumed and defaced. Thus whilest euerie thing seemed to chance and fall out in fauour of the rebels, there were some in the erle of Warwikes armie, that despairing of the whole successe of their iourneie, came to the erle of Warwike, and began to persuaide with him, that sith the citie was large, and their companies small (for indeed the whole appointed numbers as yet were not come, neither of strangers nor Englishmen) it was impossible to defend it against such an huge multitude as were assembled together in Rets campe, and therefore besought him to regard his owne safetie, to leaue the citie, and not to hazard all vpon such an vn certaine maine chance.

The erle of Warwike as he was of a noble and intvincible courage, valiant, hardie, and not able to abide anie spot of reproch, whereby to lose the least peece of honour that might be, made this answer: White (saith he) and do your harts faile you so some: Are you so mad withall, to thinke that so long as anie life resteth in me, that I will consent to such dishonour? Should I leaue the citie, heaping vp to my selfe and likewise to you such shame and reproch as woorthilie might be reputed an infamie to vs for euer? I will rather suffer whatsoever either fire or sword can worke against me. These words being uttered with such a courage as was marvellous to consider, he drew out his sword. Which other of the honorable and woorthiefull that were then present likewise did, whome he commanded that each one should kisse others sword, according to an ancient custome vsed amongst men of war in time of great danger: and herewith they made a solemne vow, binding it with a solemne oth, that they should not depart from thence, till they had either vanquished the enemies, or lost their liues in manfull fight for defence of the kings honour.

Whilest these things were in doing, the rebels brake into the citie on that side, where was no suspicion of their entring at all; but being come almost to the bridges, they were encountered by the souldiers, beaten backe, and chased out by the same waie they came. The next daie being the six and twentieth of August, there came to the erle 1400 lancequenets. The rebels notwithstanding that such reinforcement of the earles power might have somewhat discouraged them, yet trusting altogether to certaine vaine propheties, which they had among them, and set out in verses by such wifards as were there with them in the campe, they had conceiued such a vaine hope of prosperous successe in their businesse, that they little esteemed anie power that might come against them.

Among other of those same verses, these were two:
The countrie gnuſſes, Hob, Dick, and Hick, with clubs and clowted shone, Shall fill vp Duffin dale with blood of slaughtered bodies sone.

Vpon hope therefore of this and other vaine propheties, the rebels through the diuels procurement, that had nourished and picked them forward all this while in their wicked proceedings, determined to remoue thither, to the end that they might with more speed make an end of the matter, befoze they should be driuen to disperse themselves by famine. For the erle of Warwike had taken order to haue the passages stopped, in such wise as no vittels could easilie be conueied to their campe, the want whereof began already to pinch them. Here vpon setting fire on their cabins, which they had raised and built here and there of timber and bushes (the smoke whereof couered all the grounds about them) they came downe with their ensignes into the ballie called Duffin dale, where with all speed that might be they intrenched themselves about, and raising a rampire of a good height, set stakes also round about them, to keepe off the horsemen.

The erle of Warwike perceiuing their doings, the next daie being the seuen and twentieth of August with all his horsemen, and the Almans with captaine Duries band, issued forth of the citie, marching straight towards the enemies. Yet befoze he approached in sight of them, he sent sir Edmund Lutet & sir Thomas Palmer knights, with others, to understand of them, whether now at length they would submit themselves, & receiue the kings pardon: which if they would do, he offered to grant it freely to all the whole multitude, one or two of them onlie excepted.

red: but they with generall voices refusing it, the earle fell in hand to encourage his people unto the battell, and having appointed as well the horsemen as footmen in what order they should give the charge, they passed forward in approaching the enemies. The rebels beholding them thus to come forward, put themselves in order of battell, in such manner, that all the gentlemen which had bene taken prisoners, and were kept in irons for starting awaie, were placed in the fore ranke of their battell, coupled two and two together, to the end they might be killed by their owne friends that came to seeke their deliverance: but yet as God would haue it, the most part of them were saued. Besides the maister gunner among the rebels, leuising a peece of ordinance, shot it off, and strooke him that carried the kings standard in the thigh, and the horse through the shoulder.

The earle of Warwicke and others fore grieved therewith, caused a whole volie of artillerie to be shot off at the rebels: and herewith capteine Wyurie with his owne band, & the Almans or lanceknights, whether ye list to call them, on foot, getting nere to the enemies, hailed them with their harquebut shot so sharplie, and thrust forward upon them with their pikes so stronglie, that they brake them in sunder. The gentlemen, who (as we haue said) were placed in the fore ranke, found meanes (as god hap was) to shynke aside, and escaped the danger for the more part, although some indeed were slaine by the Almans, and other that knew not what they were. The light horsemen of the kings part herewith gaue in amongst them so roundlie, that the rebels not able to abide their valiant charge, were easilie put to flight, and with the foremost their grand capteine Robert Ket galloped awaie so fast as his horse would beare him. The horsemen following in chase, slue them downe on heapes, euer still as they overtake them; so that the chase continuing for the space of thre or foure miles, there were slaine to the number of thre thousand five hundred at the least: besides a great multitude that were wounded as they fled here and there ech waie forth, as seemed best to serue their turne for their most speedie escape out of danger. Yet one part of them that had not bene assailed at the first onset, seeing such slaughter made of their fellows, kept their ground by their ordinance, and shanke not: determining as men desperatlie bent, not to die vntreuerged, but to fight it out to the last man.

They were so inclosed with their carts, carriages, trenches (which they had cast) and stakes pitched in the ground to keepe off the force of horsemen, that it would haue bene somewhat dangerous to haue assailed them within their strength. But sure they were that now they could not escape, seeing no small part of their whole numbers were cut off and distressed, and they inuironed on ech side, without hope of succour or relouche of vittels, which in the end must needs haue forced them to come forth of their inclosure to their vndoubted overthrow and destruction. The earle of Warwicke yet pittens their case, and loth that the king should lose so manie stout mens bodies as were there amongst them, which might do his maiestie and their countrie good seruice, if they could be reclaimed from this their desperat follie vnto due obedience, sent Pooreie vnto them, offering them pardon of life if they would throw downe their weapons and yeld: if not, he threatened that there should not a man of them escape the deserved punishment. Their answer was, that if they might be assured to haue their liues saued, they could be contented to yeld: but they could haue no trust that promise should be kept with them. For notwithstanding all such faire offers of pardon, they took it that there was nothing meant but a subtill practise, to bring them into the hands of their aduersaries the gentlemen, that had prepared a barrell of ropes and halters, with which they purposed to trusse them by: and therefore they would rather die like men, than to be strangled at the wils and pleasures of their mortal enemies.

The earle of Warwicke right sozie to see such desperat minds among them, sent to the citie, and caused the most part of the footmen which he had left there to defend the same, to come forth now in battell arrate, that they might helpe to distresse those wilfull rebels that thus obstinatelie refused the kings pardon. And having brought as well them as the Almans and the horsemen in order of battell againe, and readie now to set vpon the rebels, he likewise sent vnto them to know that if he should come himselfe and give his word, that they should haue their pardon, whether they would receiue it or not. Herevnto they answered, that they had such confidence in his honor, that if he would so do, they would giue credit thereto, and submit themselves to the kings mercie. Incontinentlie herevpon he went vnto them, and commanded Pooreie to read the kings pardon freely granted to all that would yeld. Which being read, euerie man threw downe his weapon, and with one whole and entier voice cried; God saue king Edward, God saue king Edward. And thus thorough the prudent policie, and fauourable mercie of the earle of Warwicke, a great number of those offenders were preserved from the gates of death, into the which they were readie to enter.

Thus were the Norfolk rebels subdued by the high prowesse, wisdome, and policie of the valiant earle of Warwicke, and other the nobles, gentlemen, & faithfull subiects there in the kings armie: but not without losse of diuers personages of great worth, beside other of the meaner sort, namelye maister Henrye Willoughbie esquier, a man so well beloued in his countrie for his liberalitie in housekeeping, great courtesie, bright dealing, assured steadfastnes in friendship, & modest staidnesse in behauiour, that the countries where his liuings laie lament the losse of so worthie a gentleman euen to this date. There died also maister Lucie esquier, maister Foster esquier, and maister Throckmorton of Northamptonshire, gentlemen of no small credit and worship in their countries. The battell being thus ended, all the spoile gotten in the field was giuen to the soldiers, who sold the most part thereof openlie in the market place of Norwich. The next daie the earle of Warwicke was advertised that Ket, being crept into a barne, was taken by two seruants of one maister Riches of Swantonington, and brought to the house of the same Riches. Herevpon were twentie horsemen sent thither to fetch him, who brought him to Norwich. The same daie examinations were taken of them that were the principall beginners and setters forth of this unhappie rebellion, and diuerse being found guiltie were hanged, and nine of the chiefest procurers of all the mischief (Robert Ket and his brother William onelie excepted) were hanged vpon the oke of reformation, Besides the gunner & two of their prophets being thre of that number.

Some others of them were halowe, hanged, and quartered, & their heads and quarters set vp in publicke places for a terror to others. But yet the earle of Warwicke spared manie, where some would gladlie haue perswaded him, that there might haue bene a great number more executed. But his lordship perceiving them importunate in that vnharitable sute, told them (as it were in fauour of life of those illie wretches, whose miserable case he seemed to pitie) that measure must be used in all things, & in punishing of men by death (saith he) we ought alwaies to beware that we passe not the same. I know well that such wicked doings deserue no small reuenge, and that the offenders are worthy to be most sharplie chastised. But how farre yet shall we go? Shall we not at length shew some mercie? Is there no place for pardon? What shall we then do? Shall we hold the plough our selues; plaie the carters and labour the ground with our owne hands. These and such like words tassing altogether of mercie and compassion in that noble earle, did quench the cruell desire of reuenge in them that were altogether kindled in wrath and wished nothing more than to see the whole multitude executed: but now moued with the earles wise and mercifull answer to their rigorous sute, they became more mild and mercifull towards the miserable creatures.

This also is not to be forgotten, that when information was giuen against some of the rebels, for that they had bene busie fellows, & great doers in time of those vpproes, so as it was thought of some, that it stood with good reason to haue them punished by death, when the earle of Warwike vnderstood by credible report of Rozeie king at armes, that vpon the offer of the kings pardon, they were the first that threw downe their weapons, and submitted themselves to the kings mercie, the earle would not in any wise consent that they should die, but protested franklie that he would keepe promise with them, and that he would be as good to them as his word: and so they had their liues saued. The same daie was order giuen by the earle that the bodies of them that were slaine in the field should be buried. On the morrow being the nine and twentieth of August, the earle of Warwike, with the nobles and gentlemen of the armie, and others in great numbers, both men and women, went to saint Peters church, and there gaue praises and thanks to God for the victorie obtained. And this done, he with all the armie departed out of the citie, and returned homewards with high commendation of citizens & others, that acknowledged the said earle to be the defender of their liues, and recoverer of their wiues, children, houses, and livinges.

It was afterwards ordeined, that vpon the same daie in the which the rebels were thus subdued, the citizens yearelie should repaire to their churches, and there to heare sermice, and to haue a sermon abrode, to the which they should come together, to giue thanks to God for their deliuerance as that daie, and this is obserued till these our times. Robert Ket and his brother William Ket were brought vp to London, where they were committed to the tower, and shortly after arraigned of their treason and found guiltie, were brought to the tower againe, where they continued till the nine and twentieth of Nouember, on which daie they were deliuered to sir Edmund Windham high shiriffe of Suffolke and Suffolke, to be conueied downe into Suffolke, where Robert Ket was hanged in chains vpon the top of Norwich castle: and William Ket his brother on the top of Windmondham steeple, in which towne they had both dwelled, and conspired with others to go forth with their wicked rebellion.

dissembling
traitor.

This William Ket (as was thought) had bene sure of his pardon, if he had not plaied the traitorous hypocrite: for vpon his submission at the first to my lord marquisse of Northampton, at his comming downe to suppress this rebellion, he was sent to his brother to persuaade him and the rest to yeeld, and receiue the kings pardon: but he (like a dissembling wretch, although he promised to my lord to do what he could in that behalfe) vpon his comming to his brother into the rebels campe, beholding the great multitude that were there about him, he did not one-lie not dissuade him and them from their traitorous rebellion, but encouraged them to persist and continue in their doings, declaring what a small number of souldiers the marquisse brought with him, nothing able to resist such a puissance as was there assembled. So that if it had not bene thorough the wicked persuation of him, and some others at that time, not onelie Robert Ket himselfe, but also all the multitude beside, would haue submitted themselves, and receiued the kings pardon, to the preservation of manie a good mans life that after died in the quarrell.

But now to retorne somewhat backe to the doings in Scotland. In the meane while that such buisles were in hand here in England, ye shall vnderstand that in the beginning of this summer, the king by aduise of his counsell sent forth a nauie by sea towards Scotland, the which arriving in the forth, and comming before Leith, saluted the towne with cannon shot, & remaining there ten or twelue daies, toke in the meane time the Ile of Inchkeith, leaving therein foure ensignes of Englishmen, and one of Italians, with certeine pioners to fortifie the place. But the Frenchmen (as in the Scottish historie ye shall find more at large) after the departure of the English nauie, recovered that Ile againe out of the Englishmens possession (after they had kept it sixtē daies) with the slaughter of capteine Cotton their generall, capteine Applebie, & one Jasper that was capteine of the Italians, beside others. After the recovering of this Ile, monsieur de Delle returned into France, leauing his charge to monsieur de Thermes latelic before there arrived: who after the departure of the said Delle, with a campe volant did what he could to stop the Englishmen within Waddington from bittels. But notwithstanding the earle of Rutland being lieutenant of the north, did not onlie bittell it, but put the French armie in danger of an ouerthrow, as it was thought must needs haue followed, if they had not with more speed than is vsed in a common march slipt awaie, after they perceiued the English armie so neare at their elbowed.

Moreover, beside these inordinate vpproes and insurrections aboue mentioned, about the latter end of the said moneth of Iulie, in the same yeare, which was 1549, another like sturre or commotion began at Semer in the north riding of Yorkshire, and continued in the east riding of the same, and there ended. The principall doers and raisers by whereof, was one William Dmbler of Calthelberton porman, and Thomas Dale parish cleark of Semer, with one Steuen son of Semer, neighbour to Dale and nephew to Dmbler, which Steuen son was a meane or messenger betwene the said Dmbler and Dale, being before not acquainted together, and dwelling seven miles one from the other: who at last by the trauell of the said Steuen son, and their owne euill dispositions, inclined to vngenerationnelle and mischiefe, knowing before one the others mind by secret conference, were brought to talke together on saint James daie, Anno 1549.

The chaile rangers of the rebellion.

The causes mouing them to raise this rebellion, were these. First & principally their traitorous hartes grudging at the kings most goodlie proceedings, in aduancing and reforming the true honour of God and his religion. Another cause also was, for trusting to a blind and a fantasticall prophesie, wherwith they were seduced, thinking the same prophesie should shortly come to passe, by hearing the rebellions of Suffolke, of Denonshire, and other places. The reason of which prophesie and purpose together of the traitors was, that there should no king reigne in England, the noblemen and gentlemen to be destroyed, and the realme to be ruled by foure gouernours, hours, to be elected and appointed by the commons, holding a parlement in commotion, to begin at the south and north seas of England, supposing that this rebellion in the north, and the other of the Denov-10 three men in the west, making (as they intended) at one place, to be the meane how to compass this their traitorous diuulish deuise. And therefore laing their studies together, how to find out more companie to ioinc with them in that detestable purpose, and to set forward the furre, this deuise they framed: to sturre in two places, the one distant seven miles from the other, and at the first rush to kill and deströie such gentlemen and men of substance about them, as were fauourers of the kings proceedings, or which would resist them.

But first of all for the more speedie raising of men, they deuised to burne beacons, & thereby to bring the people together, as though it were to defend the sea-coasts: and hauing the ignorant people assembled, then to pöur out their poison, first beginning with the readiest and poorest sort, such as they thought were packed with pouertie, and were unwillig to labor, and therefore the more readie to follow the spoile of rich mens goods, blowing into their heads that Gods seruice was laid aside, and new inuentions neither god nor godlie put in place, and so feeding them with false promises, to reduce into the church againe their old ignorance and idolatrie, thought by that means to allure them to rage and run with them in this commotion. And furthermore, to the intent they would giue the more terror to the gentlemen at the first rising, least they should be resisted, they deuised that some should be murdered in churches, some in their houses, some in seruing the king in committion, and other as they might be caught, and to picke quarrels at them by alteration of seruice on the holie daies: and thus was the platförm cast of their deuise, according as afterward by their confession at their examinations was testified, and remaineth in true record.

Thus they being together agræd, Dmbler and Dale, with others, by their secret appointment, so laboured the matter in the parish of Seimer, Wint-40 tingham, and the towncs about, that they were infected with the poison of this confederacie, in such sort that it was easie to vnderstand wherunto they would incline, if a commotion were begun, the accomplish-50 ment whereof did shortly follow. For although by the words of one drunken fellow of that conspiracie named Caluero, at the alehouse in Winttingham, some suspicion of that rebellion began to be smelled before by the lord president and gentlemen of those parties, and so prevented in that place where the rebels thought to begin: yet they gaue not ouer so, but drew to another place at Seimer by the sea-coast, and there by night rode to the beacon at Straxton, and set it on fire, and so gathering together a rude rout of rascals out of the towncs neare about, bring on a furre, Dmbler, Thomas Dale, Barton, and Robert Dale, passed forthwith with the rebels to maister 60 Whites house to take him: who notwithstanding being on horsebacke, minding to haue escaped their hands, Dale, Dmbler, and the rest of the rebels toke him, and Clopton his wifes brother, one Sauage a merchant of Porke, and one Berrie seruant to sir Walter Mildmaie. Which foure without cause or quarrell, laing their seditious prophesie in some part, and to giue a terror to other gentlemen, they cruelly murdered, after they had caried them one mile from Seimer towards the Wold, and there after they had stripped them of their clothes & purges, left them naked behind them in the plaine fields for crows to feed on: untill Whites wife and Sauages wife, then at Seimer, caused them to be buried.

Long it were and tedious to recite what remell these rebels kept in their raging madnesse, who ranging about the countrie from towne to towne, to im-10 large their vngratious and rebellious band, taking those with force which were not willing to go, & lea-20 uing in no towne where they came any man above the age of sixteen peares, so increased this number, that in short time they had gathered three thousand to fauour their wicked attempts, and had like to haue gathered more, had not the Lords godnesse through prudent circumspection of some interrupted the course of their furious beginning. For first came the kings grations and free pardon, discharging & par-30 doning all them and the rest of the rebels, of all trea-40 sons, murders, felonies, & other offenses done to his maiestie before the one & twentieth of August, 1549. Which pardon although Dmbler contemptuoullie reading, persisted still in his wilfull obstinacie, dis-50 suaded also the rest from the humble accepting of the kings so louing & liberall pardon: yet notwithstanding with some it did good, who of likelihood submitted themselves, assurcalie belicueing if they persevered in their enterprise, there was no way with them but one, namelie deserued death, wherewith there was no dispensing after the contempt of the princes par-60 don and refusall of his mercie: so that in this hea-70 uie case they might verie well complaine and saie:

Funditus occidimur, nec habet fortuna regressum.

To make short, it was not long after this, but 80 Dmbler as he was riding from towne to towne, twelve miles from Hummanbie, to charge all the conestables and inhabitants where he came, in the kings name to resort to Hummanbie: by the waie he was espied, and by the circumspect diligence of John Wozd the younger, James Allabrie, Rafe 90 Twinge, and Thomas Conestable gentlemen, he was had in chase, and at last by them apprehended, and brought in the night in sure custodie vnto the citie of Porke, to answer vnto his demerits. After 100 whome within short time, Thomas Dale, Henrie Barton, the first chieftains and ringleaders of the former commotion, with John Dale, Robert Wright, William Pecoche, Weatherell, and Edmund Wattrie, busie stirrers in this sedition, as they trauelled from place to place, to draw people to their faction, were likewise apprehended, commi-

Whilist these wicked commotions and tumults through the rage of the indiscreet commons were thus raised in sundrie parts of the realme, to the great hinderance of the common-wealth, loife and danger of euerie god and true subiect, sundrie wholsome and godlie exhortations were published, to ad-

¶ The hurt of sedition how greuous it is to a common-wealth, set out by sir Iohn Cheeke knight, in the yeare 1549.

The true subiect to the rebell.

Among so manie and notable benefits, wherewith God hath alreadie and plentifully indued vs, there is nothing more beneficiall, than that we haue by his grace kept vs quiet from rebellion at this time. For we see such miseries hang ouer the whole state of the common-wealth, through the great misorder of your sedition, that it maketh vs much to reioyse, that we haue bene neither partners of your doings, nor conspirers of your counsels. For euen as the Lacedemonians for the auoiding of drunkennesse did cause their sons to behold their seruants when they were drunke, that by beholding their beastlinesse, they might auoid the like vice: euen so hath God like a mercifull father saied vs from your wickednesse, that by beholding the filth of your fault, we might lustie for offense abhorre you like rebels, whome else by nature we loue like Englishmen. And so for our selues, we haue great cause to thanke God, by whose religion and holie word daile taught vs, we learne not onelie to feare him trulie, but also to obeye our king faithfullie, and to serue in our owne vocation like subiects honestlie. And as for you, we haue surelie tuff cause to lament you as brethren, and yet suffer cause to rise against you as enemies, and most tuff cause to overthrow you as rebels.

For what hurt could be done either to vs priuately, or to the whole common-wealth generally, that is now with mischief so brought in by you, that euen as we see now the flame of your rage, so shall we necessarily be consumed hereafter with the miserie of the same. Wherefore consider your selues with some light of vnderstanding, and marke this greuous and horrible fault, which ye haue thus vilelie committed, how heinous it must needs appeare to you, if ye will reasonable consider that which for my duties sake, and my whole countries cause, I will at this present declare vnto you. Ye which be bound by Gods word not to obeye for feare like men-pleasers, but for conscience sake like christians, haue contrarie to Gods holie will, whose offense is everlasting death, and contrarie to the godlie order of quietnesse, set out to vs in the kings maiesties lawes, the breach whereof is not vnknewen to you, taken in hand vncalled of God, vnsent by men, vnst by reason, to cast auaie your bounden duties of obedience, and to put on you against the magistrats, Gods office committed to the magistrats, for the reformation of your pretended iniuries. In the which doing ye haue first faulted grieuousslie against God, next offended vnnaturallie our soueraigne lord, thirde troubled miserablie the whole common-wealth, vndone cruelle manie an honest man, and brought in an bitter miserie both to vs the kings subiects, and to your selues being false rebels. And yet ye pretend that partlie for Gods cause, and partlie for the common-wealths sake, ye do arise, when as your selues cannot denie; but ye that seeke in Gods cause, do breake in daed Gods commandments; and ye that seeke the common-wealth, haue destroyed the common-wealth: and so ye marre that ye would make, & breake that ye would amend, because ye neither seeke anie thing rightlie, nor would amend anie thing orderlie.

Ye that faulteth, faulteth against Gods ordinance, who hath forbidden all faults, and therefore ought againe to be punished by Gods ordinance, who is the reformer of faults. For he saith, I caue the prinishment to me, and I will reuerge them. But the magistrate is the ordinance of God, appointed by him with the sword of punishment to looke straightlie to all euill doers. And therefore that that is done by the magistrate, is done by the ordinance of God, whome the scripture oftentimes doth call God, because he hath the execution of Gods office. How then do you take in hand to reforme? Ye ye kings: By what authoritie? By what occasion? Ye ye the kings officers: By what commission? Ye ye called of God: By what tokens declare ye that? Gods word teacheth vs, that no man should take in hand anie office, but he that is called of God like Aaron. What Moses I praie you called you: What Gods minister had you rise?

Ye rise for religion. What religion taught you that? If ye were offered persecution for religion, ye ought to lie: so Christ teacheth you, and yet you intend to fight. If ye would stand in the truth, ye ought to suffer like martyrs, and you would sleie like tyrants. Thus for religion you keepe no religion, and neither will follow the counsell of Christ, nor the constancie of martyrs. Why rise ye for religion? Haue ye anie thing contrarie to Gods booke? Poa, haue ye not all things agreeable to Gods word? But the new is different from the old, and therefore ye will haue the old. If ye measure the old by truth, ye haue the oldest; if ye measure the old by fanisie, then it is hard: because mens fanisies change, to giue that is old. Ye will haue the old still. Will ye haue anie older than that as Christ left, & his apostles taught, & the first church after Christ did vse? Ye will haue that the canons do establish. Why that is a great deal ponger than that ye haue, of later time, and neuer invented. Yet that is it that ye desire. Why then ye desire not the oldest. And do you preferre the bishopps of Rome afore Christ, mens inuentions afore Gods law, the newer sort of worship before the older? Ye seeke no religion, ye be deceived, ye seeke traditions. They that teach you, blind you, that so instruct you, deceiue you. If ye seeke what the old doctors saie, yet loke what Christ the oldest of all saith. For he saith, Before Abraham was made I am. If ye seeke the truest way, he is the verie truth; if ye seeke the readiest waie, he is the verie waie; if ye seeke everlasting life, he is the verie life. What religion would ye haue other now, than his religion?

You would haue the bibles in againe. It is no maruell, your blind guides would leade you blind still. Why, be ye howlets and backs, that ye cannot loke on the light? Christ saith to euerie one of Search ye the scriptures, for they beare witness of Christ. You saie, Pull in the scriptures, for we will haue no knowledge of Christ. The apostles of Christ will vs to be so readie, that we maie be able to giue euerie man an account of our faith. Ye will vs not once to read the scriptures, for feare of knowing of our faith. Saint Paul praieeth that euerie man may increase in knowledge: ye desire that our knowledge might decaie againe. A true religion ye seeke belike, and woorthie to be sought for. For without the sword indeed nothing can helpe it, neither Christ, nor truth, nor age can mainteine it. But why should ye not like that which Gods word establisheth, the primitive church hath authorised, the greatest learned men of this realme haue drunken, the whole consent of the parlement hath confirmed, the kings maiestie hath set forth: Is it not trulie set out? Can ye deuise anie truer than Christes apostles vnde: Ye thinke it is not learnedlie done. Were ye commons take vpon you more learning, than the chosen bishops and clerks of this realme haue? Thinke ye follie in it? Ye were wont to iudge your parlement wisest, & now will ye suddenly errell the m in law come?

what the Lacedemonians did to make their sons detest drunkennesse.

done: & can ye thinke it lacketh authoritie, which the king, the parlement, the learned, the wise haue iustlie approued: & learne, learne, to know this one point of religion, that God will be worshipped as he hath prescribed, and not as we haue deuised; and that his will is wholie in his scriptures, which be full of Gods spirit, and profitable to teach the truth, to re-10 prone lies, to amend faults, to bring one by in righteousnesse, that he that is a Gods man may be perfect & ready to all good works. What can be more required to serue God withall: And thus much for religion, rebells.

The other rable of Northfolke rebelles, ye pretend a common-wealth. How amend ye it: By killing of gentlemen, by spoiling of gentlemen, by imprisonment of gentlemen: A marvellous tanned common-wealth. Whie should ye thus hate them: For their riches or for their rule? Kule they neuer toke so much in hand as ye do now. They neuer resisted the king, neuer withstood his counsell, be faithfull at this daie when ye be faithlesse, not onelie, to the king, whose subiects ye be, but also to your lords whose tenants ye be. Is this your true ductie, in some of homage, in most of fealtie, in all of allegiance; to leaue your duties, go backe from your promises, fall from your faith, and contrarie to law and truth to make vniuersall assemblies, vngodlie companies, wicked and detestable camps, to disobeie your betters, and to obeie your tanners, to change your obedience from a king to a ket, to submit your selues to traitors, and bycasse your faith to your true king and lords: They rule but by law, if other wise, the law, the counsell, the king taketh awaie their rule. Ye haue orderlie fought no redresse, but ye haue in time found it. In countries some must rule, some must obeie, euerie man maie not beare like stroke: for euerie man is not like wise. And they that haue scene most, and be best able to beare it, and of iust dealing beside, be most fit to rule. It is an other matter to vnderstand a mans owne greife, and to know the common-wealths soze; and therefore not they that know their owne case, as euerie man doth, but they that vnderstand the common-wealths state, ought to haue in countries the preferment of ruling. If ye felt the paine that is ioined with gouernance, as ye see and like the hono, ye would not hurt others to rule them, but rather take great paine to be ruled of them. If ye had rule of the kings maiestie committed vnto you, it were well done ye had ruled the gentlemen: but now ye haue it not, and cannot beare their rule, it is to thinke the kings maiestie forli and vniust, that hath giuen certeine rule to them. And seeing by the scripture, ye ought not to speake euill of anie magistrat of the people, why do ye not onelie speake euill of them whome the kings maiestie hath put in office, but also iudge euill of the king himselfe, and thus seditionlie in field stand with your swordes drawn against him.

If riches offend you, because ye wish the like, then thinke that to be no common-wealth, but enuie to the common-wealth. Enuie it is to apaire another mans estate, without the amendment of your owne. And to haue no gentlemen, because ye be none your selues, is to bring downe an estate, and to mend none. Would ye haue all alike rich: What is the overthrow of labour, and bitter decay of worke in this realme. For who will labour more, if when he hath gotten more, the idle shall by last without right take what him luss from him, vnder pretense of equalitie with him. This is the bringing in of idleness, which destroyeth the common-wealth; and not the amendment of labour, that mainteineth the common-wealth. If there should be such equalitie, then ye take awaie all hope from yours to come to anie better estate than you now leaue them. And as manie meane mens children do come honestlie by, and are great succour to all their stocke: so shoud none be hereafter holpen by you, but because ye seke equalitie, whereby all can not be rich. Ye would that (belike) whereby euerie man should be poze; and thinke beside that riches and inheritance be Gods prouidence, and giuen to whome of his wisdom he thinketh good: to the honest for the increase of their godlinesse, to the wicked for the heaping by of their damnation, to the simple for a recompense of other lacks, to the wise for the greater setting out of Gods godnesse. Whie will your wisdom now stop Gods wisdom, and prouide by your lawes, that God shall not enrich them, whome he hath by prouidence appointed as him liketh: God hath made the poze, & hath made them to be poze that he might shew his might, and set them aloft when he listeth for such cause as to him seemeth, & plucke downe the rich to this state of pouertie by his power, as he disposeth to order them. Whie do not we then being poze beare it wiselie, rather than by lust seke riches vniustlie, and shew our selues content with Gods ordinance, which we must either willinglie obeie, and then we be wise, or else we must vnprofitable strue withall, and then we be mad.

But what meane ye by this equalitie in the common-wealth: If one be wiser than an other, will ye banish him, because ye intend an equalitie of all things: If one be stronger than another, will ye slay him, because ye seke an equalitie of all things: If one be well fauourder than an other, will ye punish him, because ye loke for an equalitie of all things: If one haue better utterance than another, will ye pull out his tong to saue your equalitie: And if one be richer than an other, will ye spoile him to mainteine an equalitie: If one be elder than an other, will ye kill him for this equalities sake: How iniurious are ye to God himselfe, who intendeth to bestow his gifts as he himselfe listeth: and ye seke by wicked insurrections to make him glue them commonlie alike to all men as your vaine fantasie liketh: Whie would ye haue an equalitie in riches & in other gifts of God: There is no meane sought. Either by ambition ye seke lordliness much vnfit for you; or by conetousnesse ye be vnfatiable, a thing likelie inough in ye; or else by folie ye be not content with your estate, a fantasie to be plucked out of you.

But if we being wearie of pouertie would seke to enrich our selues, we should go a farre other waie to worke than this, and so should we rightlie come to our desire. Doth not S. Peter teath vs afoze God a right waie to honour, to riches, to all necessarie and profitable things for vs: He saith, Humble your selues that God might exalt you, and cast all your care on him, for he careth for you. He teacheth the waie to all good things at Gods hand, is to be humble, and you exalt your selues. Ye seke things after such sort, as if the seruant should anger his master, when he seeketh to haue a good turne of him. Ye would haue riches (I thinke) at Gods hand who giueth all riches, and yet ye take the waie cleane contrarie to riches. Know ye not that he that exalteth himselfe, God will throw him downe: How can ye get it then by thus setting out your selues: Ye shuld submit ye by humilitie one to another, and ye set by your selues by arrogancie above the magistrates. See herein how much ye offend God. Remember ye not that if ye come nigh to God, he will come nigh vnto you: If then ye go from God, he will go from you. Doth not the psalme saie, He is holie with the holie, and with the wicked man he is forward: Euen as he is ordered of men, he will order them.

them againe. If ye would follow his will, and obeye his commandements, ye should eat the fruits of the earth, saith the prophet; if not, the sword shall devour you. Ye might haue eaten the fruits of this reasonable p̄ere, if ye had not by disobedience rebelled against God. Now not onelie ye can not eat that which your selues did first sowe by labour, and now deſtroye by ſedition; but also if the kings maiesties sword came not against you, as iust policie requirereth, yet the iust vengeance of God would light among you, as his word promisereth, and your cruell wickednesse deserueth.

The act of rebellion aggravated, & pronounced most wicked and horrible.

An exhortation to rebels.

Disobedience to the prince is a most abominable sinne, and that we are bound by dutie to obey.

A notable and rhetoricall clause, and to the purpose.

For what ſocuer the cauſes be that haue moued your wild affections herin, as they be brutiſh cauſes, & increaſe your faults much, the ſing it ſelfe, the riſing I meane, muſt needs be wicked and horrible beſore God, and the vſurping of authoritie, and taking in hand of rule, which is the ſitting in Gods ſeat of iuſtice, and a proud climbing vp into Gods high throne, muſt needs be not onelie curſed netolie by him, but alſo hath bene often puniſhed afore of him. And that which is done to Gods officer, God accounteth it done to him. For they deſpiſe not the miniſter, as he ſaith himſelfe, but they deſpiſe him: and that preſumption of chalenging Gods ſeat, doth ſhew you to haue bin Lucifer, and ſhelueth vs that God will puniſh you like Lucifers. Wherefore rightlie looke, as ye duſtie haue deſerued, either for great vengeance for your abhominable tranſgreſſion, or elſe earnestlie repent, with vnſeined minds, your wicked doings; and either with crampe of death be content to dehort other, or elſe by faithfullneſſe of obedience declare how great a ſeruice it is to God, to obeye your magiſtrats faithfullie, and to ſerue in ſubjection true.

Well, if ye had not thus grievouſlie offended God, whome ye ought to worſhip, what can ye reaſonablie thinke it, to be no fault againſt the king, whom ye ought to reuerence? Ye be bound by Gods word to obeye your king, and is it no breach of dutie to withſtand your king? If the ſeruant be bound to obeye his maſter in the familie, is not the ſubiect bound to ſerue the king in his realme? The child is bound to the priuat father, and be we not all bound to the common-wealths father? If we ought to be ſubiect to the king for Gods cauſe, ought we not then I praye you to be faithfullie ſubiect to the king? If we ought duſtfullie to ſhew all obedience to heathen kings, ſhall we not willinglie and true be ſubiect to chriſtian kings? If one ought to ſubmit himſelfe by humilitie to another, ought we not all by dutie to be ſubiect to our king? If the members of our naturall bodie all follow the head, ſhall not the members of the politicall bodie all obeye the king? If god maners be content to giue place the lower to the higher, ſhall not religion teach vs alwaie to giue place to the higheſt? If true ſubiects will die gladlie in the kings ſervice, ſhould not all ſubiects thinke it dutie to obeye the king with iuſt ſervice. But you haue not onelie diſobeyed like ill ſubiects, but alſo taken ſcoundrell rule vpon you like wicked magiſtrates.

We haue bene called to obedience by counſell of priuat men, by the abuſe of the kings maiesties counſell, by the kings maiesties free pardon. But what counſell taketh place, where ſturdiſneſſe is law and churliſh answers be counted wiſdome? Who can perſuade where treaſon is aboue reaſon, and might ruleth right, and it is had for lawfull whatſocuer is luſtfull, and commotioners are better than commiſſioners, and common law is named common-wealth? Haue ye not broken his lawes, diſobeyed his counſell, rebelled againſt him? And what is the common-wealth worth, when the law which is indiſſerent for all men, ſhall be wiſtfullie and ſpitefullie broken of head-strong men, that ſake againſt lawes to order lawes; that thoſe may take place, not what content of wiſe men hath appointed, but what the luſt of rebels hath determined? What vniuſtneſſe is in ill ſeruants, wickednes in vniuerſall children, ſturdineſſe in vniuerſall ſubiects, crueltie in fierce enemies, wilbnes in beaſtie minds, pride in diſdainfull harts; that ſloweth now in you, which haue fled from houſed conſpiracies, to incamped robberies, and are better contented to ſuffer famine, cold, trauell, to glut your luſts, than to liue in quietneſſe to ſaue the common-wealth, and thinke more libertie in wiſtfullneſſe, than wiſedome in dutifulneſſe, and ſo run headlong not to the miſchiefe of other, but to the deſtruction of your ſelues, and vndo by follie that ye intend by miſchiefe, neither ſeeing how to remedie that ye ſudge faultie, nor willing to ſaue your ſelues from miſerie: which ſtiffeheadedneſſe cannot do, but honeſtie of obedience muſt frame.

If authoritie would ſerue vnder a king, the counſell haue greateſt authoritie; if wiſedome and grauitie might take place, they be of moſt experience; if knowledge of the common-wealth could helpe, they muſt by daillie conference of matters vnderſtand it beſt: yet neither the authoritie that the kings maiestie hath giuen them, nor the grauitie which you know to be in them, nor the knowledge which with great trauell they haue gotten, can moue you either to keepe you in the dutie ye ought to do, or to auoid the great diſorder wherein ye be. For there diſobedience is thought ſtoutneſſe, and ſallennes is counted manhood, and ſtomaching is courage, and prating is iudged wiſedome, and the cluiſheſt is moſt meet to rule; how can other iuſt authoritie be obeyed, or ſad counſell be followed, or good knowledge of matters be heard, or commandements of counſellors be conſidered? And how is the king obeyed, whoſe wiſeſt be withſtanded, the diſobedientſt obeyed, the high in authoritie not weied, the vniſkilfulleſt made chiefe captains, to the nobleſt moſt hurt intended, the baggingeſt braller to be moſt ſafe? And euen as the ſiler parts of the bodie would contend in knowledge & gouernement with the ſue wits: ſo do the lower parts of the common-wealth enterpriſe as high a matter, to ſtrive againſt their dutie of obedience to the counſell.

But what talke I of diſobedience ſo quietlie? Haue not ſuch mad rages run in your heads, that ſoſaking and burſting the quietneſſe of the common peace, ye haue heinouſlie and traitorouſlie incamped your ſelues in field, and there like a bile in a bodie, naie like a ſinke in a towne, haue gathered together all the naſtie vagabonds and idle loſterers to beare armour againſt him, whome all goodlie and good ſubiects will liue and die withall. If it be a fault when two fight together, and the kings peace broken, and puniſhment to be ſought therefore; can it be but an outrageous and a deteſtable miſchiefe, when ſo manie rebels in number, malicious in mind, miſchievous in enterpriſe, fight not among themſelues, but againſt all the kings true and obedient ſubiects; and ſeake to proue whether rebellion may beat downe honeſtie, and wickedneſſe may overcome truth or no? If it be treaſon to ſpeake heinouſlie of the kings maiestie, who is not hurt thereby, and the infamous turneth to the ſpeaker againe; what kind of outrageous & horrible treaſon is it, to aſſemble in campe an armie againſt him, and ſo not onelie intend an overthrow to him, and alſo to his common-wealth; but alſo to caſt him into an infamie, through all outward and ſtrange nations, and perſuade them that he is hated of his people, whome he can not rule; and that they be no better than bilans, which will not with god orders be ruled?

That death can be deuised cruell enough for those rebels, who with trouble seeke death, and can not quench the thirst of their rebellion, but with the blood of true subiects; and hate the kings mercifull pardon, when they miserable haue transgressed, and in such an outrage of mischief will not by stubbornesse acknowledge themselves to haue faulted, but intend to boyle the common-wealth with the flame of their treason, and as much as lieth in them not one to annoie themselves, but to destroe all others: He that is discontented with things that happen, and because he cannot beare the miserie of them, renteth his heare, and teareth his skin, & mangleth his face, which causeth not his sorow, but increaseth his miserie; maie he not be iustlie called mad and fantasti- call, and worthe whose wisdom should be suspect- ed? And what shall we saie of them, who being in the common-wealth, seeing a soe gracious vnto them, and easie to haue bene amended, sought not the remedie, but haue increased the grasse, and like franke beasts raging against their head, doe feare and deface as much as lieth in them his whole autho- ritie in gouernement, and violentlie take to them- selues that rule vpon them, which he by policie hath granted vnto other?

And who seeing well the beautiesse of the fault, maie not iustlie saie and hold them to be worse here- in than any kind of brute beasts? For we see that the shepe will obeye the shepheard, and the neat be ru- led by the neatheard, and the horse will know his keeper, and the dog will be in awe of his maister, and euerie one of them feeleth there, and of that, as his kee- per and ruler doth appoint him, & goeth from thence, and that, as he is forbidden by his ruler. And yet we haue not heard of, that anie heard or companie of these haue risen against their heardsman or gouer- nour, but be alwaies contented not onelie to obeye them, but also to suffer them to take profit of them. And we see furthermore, that all heards, & all sorts, be more egre in fiercenesse against all kind of stran- gers, than they be against their owne rulers, & will easilier offend him who hath not hurt them, than touch their ruler who seeketh profit on them.

But ye that ought to be gouerned by your ma- gistrates, as the heards by the heardsman, and ought to be like shepe to your king, who ought to be like a shepheard vnto you, even in the time when your profit was sought, and better redresse was intended, than your vplifts and vniquietnesse could obtaine, haue beyond the crueltie of all beasts foliowen as- gainst your ruler, and shewed your selues worthe to be ordered like beasts, who in kind of obedience will fall from the state of men. A dog stoppeth when he is beaten of his maister, not for lacke of stomach, but for naturall obedience: you being not stricken of your head but fauoured, not kept downe but surrou- red and remedied by law, haue violentlie against law not onelie barked like beasts, but also bitten like helhounds. What? Is the mischief of sedition either not knowne vnto you, or not feared? Haue not examples aforesaid both told the end of rebels, and the wickednesse of rebellion it selfe? But as for old examples, let them passe for a while, as things well to be considered. But at this present one thing more to be weied.

While vpon your selues, after ye haue wickedlie slept into this horrible kind of treason, doe ye not see how manie bottomlesse whirlpools of mischief ye be gulst withall, and what lothsome kinds of rebel- lion ye be faine to wade through? Ye haue sent out in the kings name, against the kings will, precepts of all kinds, & without commandment comman- ded his subiects, and vnrulie haue ruled where ye liued to command, thinking your owne fancies the kings commandments, and rebels lusts in things to be right gouernement of things, not looking what should follow by reason, but what your selues follow by affection. And is it not a dangerous and a cruell kind of treason, to giue out precepts to the kings people? There can be no iust execution of lawes, re- formation of faults, giuing out of commandments, but from the king. For in the king onelie is the right herof, & the authoritie of him deriued by his appoint- ment to his ministers. Ye haue no authoritie of the king, but taking it of your selues, what thinke ye your selues to be? Ministers ye be none, except ye be the diuels ministers, for he is the author of sedition.

The kings maiestie intendeth to mainteine peace, and to oppresse warre; ye stirre vp bypoces of people, huriburles of vagabonds, routs of robbers. Is this anie part of the kings ministerie? If a vagabond would doe what he lust, and call himselfe your seruant, and execute such offices of trust, whether ye would or no, as ye haue committed vnto another mans credit, what would euerie one of you saie or doe herein? Would ye suffer it? Ye wander out of houses, ye make euerie daie new matters as it please you, ye take in hand the execution of those things, God by his word forbidding the same, which God hath put the magistrates in trust withall. What can ye saie to this? Is it sufferable thinke ye? If ye told a priuat message in another mans name, can it be but a false lie? Ye saie you? And to tell a feined message to the common-wealth, and that from the king, can it be honest thinke ye? To command is more than to speake: what is it then to command so traitorous a lie? This then which is in word a deceit- full lie, and in deed a traitorous fact, noisome to the common-wealth, vnhonourable to the king, mischie- fous in you, how can ye otherwise iudge of it, but to be an vheard of and notable disobedience to the king: and therefore by notable example to be puni- shed; and not with gentlenesse of pardon to be for- giuen? Ye haue robbed euerie honest house, and spoile- d them vnrulie, and pittoully wronged poore men being no offenders, to their vtter vndoing; and yet ye thinke ye haue not broken the kings lawes. The kings maiesties law and his commandment is, that euerie man should safelie keepe his owne, and vse it reasonable to an honest gaine of his liuing: ye violentlie take and carie awaie from men with- out cause, all things whereby they should mainteine, not onelie themselves, but also their familie, & leaue them so naked, that they shall feele the smart of your cursed enterprise, longer than your owne vnnatu- rall & vngodlie stomachs would well vouchsafe. By iustice ye should neither hurt nor wrong man, and your pretended cause of this monstrous sturre is to increase mens wealth. And yet how manie, and saie truly, haue ye decayed and vndone, by spoiling and taking awaie their goods? How should honest men liue quietlie in the common-wealth at anie time, if their goods, either gotten by their owne laboz, or left to them by their friends, shall vnlawfully and vno- derlie, to the seding of a sort of rebels, be spoiled and wasted, and vtterlie scattered abroad? The thing that ye take is not your right, it is an other mans owne. The manner of taking against his will is vnlawfull, & against the order of euerie godd common-wealth. The cause why ye take it is mischievous and horrible, to fat your sedition. Ye that take it be wicked tra- tois, and common enemies of all godd order.

If he that desireth an other mans goods or cat- tel, doe fault: what doth he (thinke you) whose desire taking followeth, and is led to and fro by lust, as his wicked fancies void of reason doth guide him? He that vseth not his owne well and charitable, hath much to answer for: and shall they be thought not vnrulie, unlike, who not onelie take awaie other mens, but also misuse and wast the same goodlie: They that take things pzinlie awaie, and steale secretlie and couertlie other mens goods, be by law iudged woth this death: and shall they that without shame spoile things openlie, and be not affraid by impudencie to pposse their spoile, be thought either honest creaturs to God, or faithfull subiects to their king, or naturall men to their countrie? If nothing had moued you but the example of mischæse, and the soule pzinse of other moued by the same, ye should yet haue abstained from so licentious and vilanous a shew of robbery, considering how manie honeste there be, that being loth their wickednesse should be blazed abroad, yet be found out by prouidence, and hanged for desert. What shall we then thinke of saie of you? Shall we call you pickers, or hid theues; naie more than theues, daie theues, heard stealers, thire spoli-ers, and bitter destroyers of all kinds of families, both among the poore and also among the rich. Let vs yet further see. Be there no mo things wherein ye haue broken the kings laws, and so vilelie disobeyed him, flat contrarie to your bounden dutie and allegiance?

Ye haue not onelie spoiled the kings true subiects of their goods, but also ye haue imprisoned their bodies, which should be at libertie vnder the king, and restrained them of their seruice, which by dutie they owe the king, and appaired both strength and health, wherewith they liue and serue the king. As there aie honest things more desired than libertie: Ye haue shamefullie spoiled them thereof. As there aie things more outfull than to serue their lord and master: But as that was desired of the one part, so was it hindered and stopped on your part. For nei-ther can the king be serued, nor families kept, nor the common-wealth looked vnto, where freedom of libertie is stopped, and diligence of seruice is hindered, and the helpe of strength and health abated. Mens bodies ought to be free from all mens bondage and crueltie, and onelie in this realme be subiect in publike punishment to our publike gouernour, and neither be touched of headlesse capteins, nor holden of brainlesse rebels. For the gouernement of so pretious a thing ought to belong vnto the most noble ruler, and not iustlie to be in euerie mans power, which is iustlie euerie lining mans treasure. For what goods be so deare to euerie man, as his owne bodie is, which is the true vessell of the mind, to be mesurable kept of euerie man for all exercises & seruices of the mind: If ye may not of your owne authoritie meddle with mens goods, much lesse you may of your owne authoritie take order with mens bodies.

For what be gods in comparison of health, libertie, and strength, which be all settled and fastened in the bodie: They that strike other, do greattie offend, and be iustlie punishable: and shall they that cruel-ly and wrongfullie torment mens bodies with irons and imprisonments, be thought not of others but of themselves honest, and plaine, and true dealing men? What shall we say by them, who in a priuat businesse will let a man to go his iournele in the kings high waie: Do they not thinke ye plaine wrong: When in a common cause not onelie to hinder them, but also to deale cruelle with them, and shut them from doing their seruice to the king, and their dutie to the common-wealth, is it not both disobedience, crueltie, and mischæse thinke ye? What an hinderance is it, to haue a good garment hurt, anie setwell appaired, or anie esteemed thing to be decaied: And seeing no earthlie thing a man hath is more pretious than his body, to cause it to be cruellely tormented with irons, sebled with cold, weakened with ordering: can it be thought anie other thing but wrong to the sufferer, cruelle in the doer, & great disobedience and transgression to the king: How then be ye able to defend it? But seeing ye so unpittifullie bere men, cast the m in prison, lade them with irons, pine them with famine, contrarie to the rule of nature, contrarie to the kings maiesties lawes, contrarie to God holie ordinances, hauing no matter but pretended and fained gloses, ye be not onelie disobedient to the king like rebels, but withstanding the law of nature like beastes, and so wothie to die like dogs, except the kings maiestie, without respect of your deseruing, do mercifullie grant you of his goodnesse that which you cannot escape by iustice.

Act ye being not content with this, as small things enterprize great matters, and as though ye could not satisfie your selues, if ye should leaue anie mischæse vndone, haue sought blood with cruelle, and haue laine of the kings true subiects manie, thinking their murder to be your defense, when as ye haue increased the fault of your vile rebellion, with the horroz of bloodshed, and so haue burdened mischæse with mischæse, whilest it come to an importable weight of mischæse. What could we do more, in the horribles kind of faults, vnto the greatest transgressours and offenders of God and men, than to looke straitlie on them by death, and so to rid them out of the common-wealth by seuerer punishment, whome ye thought unworthie to liue among men for their doings: And those who haue not offended the king, but defended his realme, and by obedience of seruice sought to punish the disobedient, and for safegard of euerie man put themselves vnder dutie of law, those haue ye miserable and cruelle laine, and bathed you in their blood, whose doings ye should haue followed, & not to haue appaired the common-wealth, both by destruction of good men, and also by increase of rebels. And how can that common-wealth by anie meanes indure, wher- in euerie man without authoritie, may unpunished slea whome he list, and that in such case as those who be laine shew themselves most noble of courage, and most readie to serue the king and the common-wealth, and those as do slea be most vilanous and traitorous rebels that anie common-wealth did euer susteine?

For a citie and a prouince be not the faire houses, and the strong walles, nor the defense of anie engine, but the lining bodies of men, being able in number and strength to mainteine themselves by god order of iustice, & to serue for all necessarie & behouable uses in the common-wealth. And when as mans bodie being a part of the whole common-wealth, is wrongfullie touched anie way, and specially by death, then suffereth the common-wealth great iniurie, and that alwaies so much the more, how honeste and nobler he is, who is iniuriously murdered. How was the lord Sheffield handled among you, a noble gentleman, and of good seruice, both fit for counsell in peace, and for conduct in war, considering either the granitie of his wisdom, or the authoritie of his person, or his seruice to the common-wealth, or the hope that all men had in him, or the need that England had of such, or among manie notable good, his singular excellencie, or the fauor that all men bare toward him, being loued of euerie man, and hated of no man?

Considered ye who should by dutie be the kings subiects, either how ye should not haue offended the k. or after offense haue required the kings pardon, or not to haue refused his goodnesse offered, or at length, to haue yielded to his mercie, or not to haue laine those who came for his seruice, or to haue spared those who in danger offered ranfome. But all these things forgotten by rage of rebellion, because one madnesse cannot be without infinit vices, y<sup>e</sup> slew him cruelle, who offered himfelfe manfullie, nor would not so much as spare him for ranfome, who was worthe for noblenesse to haue had honour, & helped him bare whome y<sup>e</sup> could not hurt armed, and by flauerie flue nobilitie, in deed miserable, in fashion cruelle, in cause diuelishlie. Wh<sup>o</sup> with what cruell spite was violentlie sundred so noble a bodie from so godlie a mind? Whose death must rather be reuenged than lamented, whose death was no lacke to himfelfe, but to his countrie, whose death might euerie way bene better bozne, than at a rebels hand. Violence is in all things hurtfull, but in life horrible. What should I speake of others in the same case, diuerse and notable, whose death for manhood and seruice can want no worthe praise, so long as these vglie stirrers of rebellion can be had in mind. God hath himfelfe ioined mans bodie and his soule togither, not to be departed alunder, afoze he euer disseuer them himfelfe, o<sup>r</sup> cause them to be disseuered by his minister.

And shall rebels and heedlesse camps, being armed against God, and in field against their king, thinke it no fault to shed blood of true subiects, haniug neiether office of God, nor appointment of ministers, nor cause of rebellion? He that stealeth anie part of a mans substance, is worthe to lose his life. What shall we thinke then of them, who spoile men of their liues, for the maintenance thereof, not onelie substance & riches be sought for, but also all common welthe be denied? Now then, your owne consciences should be made your iudges, & none other set to giue sentence against y<sup>e</sup>. Seeing y<sup>e</sup> haue bene such bloodshedders, so heinous manquellers, so horrible murderers, could y<sup>e</sup> do anie other than plainlie confesse your soule and wicked rebellion to be grauous against God, and traitorous to the king, and hurtfull to the common-wealth? So manie grauous faults meeting together in one sinke, might not onelie haue discouraged, but also diuinen to desperation, anie other honest o<sup>r</sup> indifferent mind.

But what saie they, whose hearts so deepe mischæfe had hardened, and by vehemencie of affection be made vnshamefast, and stop all discourse of reason, to let at large the full scope of their vnmeasurable madnesse? P<sup>r</sup>inat mens goods seme little to your vninsatiable desires, y<sup>e</sup> haue waied graddie now upon cities, and haue attempted mightie spoiles, to glat by (and y<sup>e</sup> could) your waisting hunger. Oh how much haue they need of, that will neuer be contented, and what riches can suffice anie that will attempt high enterprises aboue their estate? Y<sup>e</sup> could not mainteine your camps with your p<sup>r</sup>inat goods, with your neighbours portion, but y<sup>e</sup> must also attempt cities, because y<sup>e</sup> sought great spoiles with o<sup>r</sup>ther mens losses, and had forgotten how y<sup>e</sup> liued at home honestlie with your owne, and thought them worthe death that would disquiet y<sup>e</sup> in your house, and plucke awaie that which y<sup>e</sup> by right of law thought to be your owne. Herein see what y<sup>e</sup> would haue done, spoiled the kings maiesties subiects, weakened the kings strength, ouerthrowne his towne, taken awaie his munition, bratone his subiects to like rebellion, y<sup>e</sup> and as it is among forren enemies in lacking of cities, no doubt thereof, y<sup>e</sup> would haue fallen to slaughter of men, raulthing of wiues, deslouring of maidens, chopping of children, fiering of houses, beating downe of streets, ouerthrowing of altogither.

For what measure haue men in the increase of madnesse, when they can not at the beginning staie themselves from falling into it. And if the besetting but of one house to rob it, be iustlie damned worthe death: what shall we thinke of them that besiege whole cities for desire of spoile? We liue vnder a king to serue him at all times when he shall need our strength: and shall y<sup>e</sup> then not onlie withdraw your selues, which ought as much to be obedient as we be, but also violentlie plucke other awaie to, fro the dutie vnto the which by Gods commandement all subiects be strictlie bound, and by all lawes eueris nation is naturallie led? The towne be not onelie the ornament of the realme, but also the seat of merchants, the place of handicrafts, that men scattered in villages, and needing diuerse things, maie in little rowne know where to find the lacke. To ouerthrow them then, is nothing else but to waik your owne commodities, so that when y<sup>e</sup> would buie a necessarie thing for monie, y<sup>e</sup> could not tell where to find the same.

Apuntion serueth the king not onelie for the defence of his owne, but also for the inuasion of his enemy. And if y<sup>e</sup> will then so strictlie deale with him, that y<sup>e</sup> will not let him so much as defend his owne, y<sup>e</sup> offer him double iniurie; both that y<sup>e</sup> let him from doing anie notable fact abroad, and also that y<sup>e</sup> suffer not him quietlie to inioie his owne at home. But herein hath notable appered what cities haue faithfully serued and suffered extreme danger, not onelie of goods, but also of famine & death, rather than to suffer the kings enemies to enter: and what white lined cities haue not onlie not withstood them, but also with shame fauored them, and with mischief aided them. And I would I might praise herein all cities alike! which I would do, if all were like worthe. For then I might shew more faith in subiects than strength in rebelles; and testifie to men to come, what a generall faith euerie citie bare to the kings maiestie, whose age although it were not fit to rule, yet his subiects hearts were willing to obey, thinking not onelie of the hope, which all men conceiue hereafter to be in him, but also of the iust kind of gouernment, which in his minority his counsell doth vse among them. And here, how much and how worthe maie Greester be commended, which being in the midst of rebels, vnattelled, vnfortified, vnprepared for so long a siege, did noble hold out the continuall and dangerous assault of the rebell: for they succined the violence of the rebell, not onlie they had plentie enough of vittels, but also eleuen o<sup>r</sup> twelue daies after the extreme famine came on them, and liuing without bread, were in courage so manfull, & in dutie so constant, that they thought it yet much better to die the extreme death of hunger, shewing truth to their king, and loue to their countrie, than to giue anie place to the rebell, and fauor him with aid, although they might haue done it with their lesse danger. Whose example if Norwich had followed, & had not rather giuen place to traitors, than to keepe their dutie; and had not sought more safeguard than honestie, and p<sup>r</sup>inat hope more than common quietnesse: they had ended their rebellion sooner, and escaped themselves better, and sauued the losse of the worthe lord Sheffield, in whome was more true seruice for his life, than in them for their goods. And although this can not be spoken against a certeine honest sort that were amongst them, whose praise was the greater, because they were so few: yet the greater number was such, that they not onelie obeyed the rebell for feare, but also followed him for loue, and did so traitorouslie order the kings band vnder my lord marquisse, that they suffered more damage out of their houses by the towne men, than they did abroad by the rebelles. Whose fault as the kings maiestie maie pardon, so I would either the example might be forgotten, that no citie might

Who then that would willinglie defend ye, can ſay

The loſſe of

Warns be

And fiſt if ye be anie thing reaſonable, liſt by your reaſon, and weigh by wiſdome, if not all things, yet your owne caſes, and learne in the beginning of matters to foreſee the end, and iudge aduiſedlie per ye enter into anie thing haſtillie. See ye not this yeare the loſſe of harueſt? And thinke ye can growe to wealth that yeare when ye loſe your thiſt and profit? Warns be poze mens ſtozehouſes, wherein lieth a great part of euerie mans owne liuing, his wines and childzens liuing, wherewith men mainteine their families, paie their rents: and therefore be alwaies thought moſt rich when they haue beſt crops. And now when there is neither plentie of haie, nor ſuffient of ſtraw, nor corne enough, and that through the great diſorder of your lewd rebellion, can ye thinke ye do well, when ye vndo your ſelues, and iudge it a common-welth when the commons is deſtroied, and ſeeke your hap by unhappineſſe, and eſtyme your owne loſſe to be your owne ſorwardneſſe, and by this iudgement ſhew your ſelues, how little ye vnderſtand other mens matters, when ye can ſcarſelie con-ſider the weightieſt of your owne: hath not the haie this yeare, as it roſe from the ground, ſo rotted to the ground againe: and where it was wont by mens reaſonable laboz to be taken in due time, and then ſerue for the maintenance of hozſe and cattell wherwith we liue, now by your diſordered miſchance hath bene by mens ſoleneſſe and vnbutifullneſſe let alone vntouched, and ſo neither ſerueth the poze to make monie of, nor arie cattell to liue with. The corne was ſowne with labour, and the ground tilled for it with labour, and looked to be brought home againe with labour: and for lacke of honeſt labozers it is loſt on the ground; the owners being loiterers, and ſe-king other mens, haue loſt their owne, and hoping for mounteins, lacked their preſent thiſt, neither ob-teining that they ſought, nor ſeeing that they ought.

And how ſhall men liue when the maintenance of their prouiſion is lacking? For labouring and their old ſtoze is waſted by wiſdome of ſedition, and ſo neither ſpare the old nor ſaue the new. How can men be fed then or beaſts liue, when as ſuch waſtfull negligence is miſerable vſed? And miſpending the time of their profit, in ſhamefull diſorder of inobedience, they care not greatly what becometh of their owne, becauſe they intend to liue by other mens: Haie is gone, corne is waſted, ſtraw is ſpoiled; what reckoning of harueſt can ye make, either for the aid of others, or for the releafe of your ſelues? And thus haue ye brought in one kind of miſerie, which if ye ſaw before, as ye be like to ſee after, although ye had hated the common-welth, yet for loue of your ſelues ye would haue avoided the great enormitie thereof, into the which ye wiſtullie now haue caſt your ſelues.

An other no leſſe is, that ſuch plentie of bitfels as was abundantlie in euerie quarter for the releafe of vs all, is now waſtfullie and vnthiſtfullie ſpent, in mainteining you vnlawfull rebels, and ſo with diſorder all is conſumed, which with good husbandrie might long haue endured. For, ſo much as would haue ſerued a whole yeare at home with diligence and ſkilfull heed of husbandrie, that is wiſtullie waſted in a moneth in the campe, through the rauening ſpoile of bilanie. For what is vnordered plentie, but a waſtfull ſpoile, wherof the inconueniencie is ſo great, as ye be woorthie to ſeele, and bringeth in more hardneſſe of liuing, greater dearth of all things, & occasioneth manie cauſes of diſeaſes: The price of things muſt needs increaſe much, when the number of things wareth leſſe, and by ſcarſitie be inhaſed, & compelleth men to abate their liberalitie in houſe, both to their owne, and alſo to ſtrangers. And where the rich wanteth, what can the poze find, who in a common ſcarſitie liueth moſt ſcarſelie, and ſeleth quicklieſt the ſharpneſſe of ſtarruing, when euerie man for lacke is hungerbitten. Which if ye had well remembred before, as ye now maie after perceiue, ye would not I thinke ſo ſtiffe-neckedlie haue reſiſ-

These are the causes

of the people.

These are
the causes of the death
of the people.

Experience teacheth vs, that after a great dearth cometh a great death; for that when men in great want of meat eat much ill meat, they fill their bodies with ill humors, and cast them from their state of health, into a subiection of sicknesse: because the good blood in the bodie is not able to keepe his temper, for the multitude of the ill humors that corrupteth the same. And so grow great & deadlie plagues, and destroye great numbers of all sorts, sparing no kind that they light on, neither respecting the poore with mercie, nor the rich with fauour. Can ye therefore thinke herein, when ye see decaying of vittels, the rich pinch, the poore famish, the following of diseases, the greatnesse of death, the mourning of widowes, the pitifulnesse of the fatherlesse, and all this miserie to come thorough your vnnatural misbehaviour, that ye haue not dangerously hurt the commons of your countrey with a dolefull and incurable wound? These things being once felt in the common-wealth, as they must needs be, euerie man seeth by and by what followeth: euen a great diminishment of the strength of the realme, when the due number that the realme doth mainteine is made lesse, and thereby we be made rather a prey for our enemies, than a safetie for our selues.

And how can there be but a great decay of people at the length, when some be ouerthrowne in warre, some suffer for punishment, some pine for famine, some die with the campes diet, some be consumed with sicknesse? For although ye thinke your selues able to match with a few vnprepared gentlemen, and put them from their houses, that ye might gaine the spoile: do ye iudge therefore your selues strong enough, not onlie to withstand a kings power, but also to ouerthrow it? Is it possible that ye should haue so mad a frensie in your head, that ye should thinke the number ye see so strong, that all ye see not should not be able to preuaile to the contrarie? With what reason could ye thinke, that if ye bode the hot brunt of battell, but ye must needs seele the smart, spectallie the kings power comming against you: which if ye feare not, belike ye know not the force thereof? And so much the greater number is lost in the realme, that both the ouercommer and the ouercommed be parties, although unlike, of one realme: and what losse is not onlie of either side, but of both, that doth plainlie rebound to the whole.

When where so great and so horrible a fault is committed, as woyle can not be mentioned of from the beginning, and bringeth in withall such penurie, such weakenes, such disorder in the common-wealth, as no mischiefe besides could do the like: can aite man thinke with iust reason, that all shall escape unpunished that shall escape the sword, and not manie for terror and examples sake should be looked vnto, who haue bene either great doers in such a disorderd bilanie, or great counsellors to such an outrageous mischiefe; seeing the onlie remedie of redressing wilfull faults is a iust and seuerer punishment of such, whose naughtie deeds god men ought to abhorre for duties sake, and ill men maie dread for like punishments sake, and a free licence to do mischiefe vnpunished is so dangerous, that the sufferance of one is the occasion of the fall of a great number, and womanish pitie to one is a deceitfull crueltie to the whole, inticing them to their owne destruction by sufferance, which would haue auoided the danger by force punishment.

And in such a barrennesse of vittels, as must needs come after so rauening a spoile, it must needs be, that some (though few) shall be so nipt with egeresse of famine, that they shall not recouer againe themselves out of so fretting a danger. So is a generall weakenesse, where all shall be feebled, some must needs die, and so diminish the number, and abate such strength as the realme defended it selfe withall be- fore. Which occasion of neuer so few, comming of so great a cause, if ye should make iust amends for, not of recompense which ye could not, but of punishment which ye ought; how manie, how diuerse and how cruell deaths ought euerie one of ye often to suffer? How manie came to the camps from long labour to sudden ease, and from meane fare to streng of vittels; and so fell in a maner vnwares to such a contrarie change, that nature hie selfe abiding neuer great and sudden changes, can not beare it without some grounds entered of diseases to come, which vncircumpect men shall sooner seele than thinke of, and then will scarcele iudge the cause, when they shall be vexed with the effect.

It is little maruell that idlenesse and meane of an other mans charge will some feed by & fat like men: but it is great maruell if idlenesse and other meane meat do not abate the same by sicknesse againe, and spectallie comming from the one, and going to the other: contrarie in those who violentlie seele to turne in a moment the whole realme to the contrarie. For while their mind chaungeth from obedience to vnrulinesse, and turneth it selfe from honestie to wildnesse, and their bodies go from labour to idlenesse, from small fare to spoile of vittels, and from beds in the night to cabins, and from sweet houses to stinking camps, it must needs be by changing of affections which alter the bodie, and by vnting of rest that filleth the bodie, and by glutting of meats which weakeneth the bodie, & with cold in the nights which accreteth the bodie, and with corrupt aire which infecteth the bodie, that there follow some grievous tempest not onlie of contagious sicknesse, but also of present death to the bodie.

The greatest plucke of all is, that behemencie of plague, which naturallie followeth the dint of hunger, which when it entereth once among men, what darts of pangs, what throlwes of paines, what throlwes of death doth it cast out? How manie fall, not affonied with the sicknesse, but fretted with the paine? How beateth it downe not onlie small tolowes, but also great countries? This when ye see light first on your beafts which lacke fodder, and after fall on men whose bodies gape for it, and see the scarcenesse of men to be by this your soule enterprise, and not onlie other men touched with plagues, but also your owne house strong with death, and the plague also raised of your rising, to fire your selues: can ye thinke you to be aie other but mankillers of other, and murderers of your selues, and the principals of the ouerthrow of so great a number, as shall either by sword or punishment, famine, or some plague or pestilence be consumed and waisted out of the common-wealth?

And seeing he that decayeth the number of cottages or plowes in a towne, seemeth to be an enemy to the common-wealth: shall we not count him, not onlie an enemy, but also a murderer of his countrey, who by harebained vnrulinesse causeth bitter ruine and pestilent destruction of so manie thousand men? Grant this folke then and oversight to be such as woorthie ye maie count it, and I shall go further in declaring of other great inconueniences, which your dangerous and furious misbehaviour hath hurtfullie brought in; seeing diuerse honest and true dealing men, whose living is by their owne prouision, hath come so before hand by time, that they haue bene able well to liue honestlie in their houses, & paie beside the rents of their farmes trolie, and now haue by your crueltie and abhorred insurrections lost their goods, their cattell, their harness, which they had gotten before, and wherewith they intended to live hereafter, & now be brought to this extremitie, that they be neither able to live, as they were wont at home before; nor to paie their accustomed rent at their due time. Whereby they be brought into trouble and inquietnesse, not onlie musing what they have lost by you, but also cursing you by whome they have lost it, and also in danger of losing their holds at their lords hands, except by pitie they shew more mercie, than the right of the law will grant by iustice.

The fruits of honest mens travels long in gathering, quicklie spoiled by rebellion.

And what a grieve is it to an honest man, to labour fruitie in youth, and to gaine painefullie by labour, wherewith to live honestly in age, and to have this, gotten in long time, to be suddenlie caught awaie by the violence of sedition, which name he ought to abhorre by it selfe, although no miserie of losse followed to him thereby. But what greater grieve ought seditious rebels to have themselves, who if they be not stricken with punishment, yet ought to pine in conscience, and melt awaie with the grieve of their owne faults, when they see innocents and men of true service hindered and burdened with the hurt of their rebellion, & who in a good commonwealth shoud for honesties sake prosper, they by these rebels onlie meanes be cast so behind the hand, as they cannot recouer easilie againe by their owne truth, that which they have lost by those traitors mischiefes? And if unwill men ought not so to be handled at anie mans hands, but onelie stand to the order of a law: how much more shoud true and faithfull subjects, who deserve praise, feele no inquietnesse, nor be vexed with sedition, who be obedientlie in subjection, but rather seeke iust amends at false rebels hands, and by law obtaine that they lost by disorder, and so constrain you to the uttermost, to paie the recompense of wrongfull losses, because ye were the authors of these wrongfull spoiles.

An argument from equitie & bright dealing with the unwill.

Then would ye some perceive the commonwealths hurt, not when other felt it who deserved it not, but when you smarted who caused it, and stood not & looked upon other mens losses which ye might pitie, but tormented with your owne which ye would lament. Now I am past this mischief, which ye will not hereafter denie, when ye shall praise other mens foresight, rather than your wicked doings, in beuailing the end of your furie, in whose beginning ye now reioise. What saie ye to the number of vagabonds and loitering beggers, which after the overthrow of your campe, and scattering of this seditious number, will swarme in euerie corner of the realme and not onelie lie loitering vnder hedges, but also stand sturdy in cities, and beg boldlie at euerie doore, leauing labour which they like not, and following idlenesse which they shoud not? For euerie man is easilie and naturallie brought from labour to ease, from the better to the worse, from diligence to slothfulness: and after warres it is commonlie seene, that a great number of those which went out honest, returne home againe like roifiers, and as though they were burnt to the wars bottom, they haue all their life after an vnauoxie smeeke thereof, & smell still toward daisie pickers, purple pickers, highwaie robbers, quarrellmakers, pea and bloudshedders too.

What shifts soldiers fall after dis-camping and ceasing from warres.

Do we not see commonlie in the end of warres more robbing, more begging, more murdering than before, and those to stand in the high waie to aske their almes, whome ye be affraid to saie naie vnto honestly, least they take it awaie from you violentlie, and haue more cause to suspect their strength, than pitie their need? Is it not then daile heard, how men be not onelie pursued, but bitterlie spoiled, & few make ride safe by the kings highwaie, except they ride strong, not so much for feare of their goods, which men esteeme lesse, but also for danger of their life, which euerie man loueth. Whoe is vndone at home and loiterers linger in streets, lurke in alehouses range in highwaies, valiant beggers plate in towns and yet complaine of need, whose staffe if it be once hot in their hand, or sluggishness byed in theirosome, they will neuer be allured to labour againe, contenting themselves better with idle beggerie, than with honest and profitable labour. And what more noisome beasts be there in a commonwealth? Whores in hies sucke out the honie, a small matter, but yet to be looked on by good husbands. Caterpillers destroy the fruit, an hurtfull thing, and well shifted for by a diligent ouerser. Diuers bermeine destroy corne, kill pulleins, engines and snares be made for them.

Aggravating the hurt of rebellion.

But what is a loiterer? A sucker of honie, a spoiler of corne, a stroier of fruit, a waster of monie, a spoiler of vittels, a sucker of bloud, a breaker of orders, a seeker of breaches, a queller of life, a basilisk of the commonwealth, which by companie and light doth poison the whole countrie, and straineth honest minds with the infection of his beneuice, and so draweth the commonwealth to death and destruction. Such is the fruits of your labour and trauell for your pretended commonwealth, which iustice would no man shoud taste of but your felices, that ye might trulie iudge of your owne mischief, and fraie other by example from presuming the like. When we see a great number of flies in a yeare, we naturallie iudge it like to be a great plague, and hauing so great a swarming of loitering vagabonds, ready to beg and biall at euerie mans doore, which declare a greater infection, can we not looke for a greivous and perillous danger than the plague is? Who can therefore otherwise deeme, but this one deadlie hurt, wherewith the commonwealth of our nation is wounded, be the all other is so pestilent, that there can be no more hurtfull thing in a well gouerned estate, nor more thowne into all kind of vice and unrulinesse: and therefore this your sedition is not onelie most odious, but also most horrible, that hath spotted the whole countrie with such a staine of idlenesse.

The light manner of a yeare and a plague of flies.

There can be none end of faults, if a man rehearse all faults that do necessarilie follow this unrulie sturdinesse. For not onelie vagabonds wandering and scattering themselves for mischief, shall run in a mans eyes, but also disorder of euerie degree shall enter into a mans mind, and shall be hold here by the commonwealth miserable defaced by you, who should as much as other haue kept your felices in order in it. Neither be the magistrats duly obeyed, nor the lawes iustlie feared, nor degrees of men considered, nor maiesters well serued, nor parents trulie reuerenced, nor lords remembered of their tenants, nor yet either naturall or ciuill law much regarded. And it is plainlie vnpossible that that countrie shall well stand in gouernement, and the people growe to wealth, where order in euerie state is not trulie observed: and that bodie cannot be without much griefe of inflammation, where anie lest part is out of ioint, or not due lie set in his owne naturall place.

Disorder in euery degree caused by rebellion.

Aggravating the hurt of rebellion.

Disorder in euery degree caused by rebellion.

Wherefore order must be kept in the commonwealth like health in the bodie, and all the dist of policie looketh to this end, how this temper may be safely maintained, without anie excess of vnrulenesse, either of the one side, or of the other. And easie enough it is to keepe the same, when it is once brought into the meane, and to hold it in the state it is found in: but when it bursteth out once with a vehemencie, and hath gotten into an unrulie disorder, it spreadeth so fast, and ouerwhelmeth all honest mens resisting so violentlie, that it will be hard to recouer the breach of long time againe, except with great great and wise counsell, which no doubt shall be in reason used, there be wonderfull remedies sought therefore. And even as a man falling, is easier holden by by state, than when he is fallen downe he is able to rise againe: so is the commonwealth slipping, by the foresight of wisdomme better kept from ruine; than when it is once fallen into anie kind of miserie, the same may be called againe to the old and former state. Doe we not euidentlie know, that a man may better keepe his arme or his leg from breaking or falling out of joint, afore hurt come to it; than after the hurt it may safelie and quietlie be healed, and restored to the former strength and health againe? And now through your seditious means, things that were afore quiet and in good order, laies feared and obied, subiects ruled and kept in dutie, be all now in a great disorder, and like (if it be not holpen) to grow to wild-nesse, and a beaklineffe; seeing that neither common dutie can be kept, which nature prescribeth, nor common law can be regarded, which policie requireth.

How can ye keepe your owne if ye keepe no order?
Your wifes and children, how can they be defended from other mens violence, if ye will in other things breake all order? By what reason would ye be obedient of yours as seruants, if ye will not obieie the king as subiects? How would ye haue others deale orderlie with you, if ye will vse disorder against all others? Seeing then there is such a confusion now of things, such a turmoile of men, such a disorder of fashions; who can loke to lue quietlie a great while, who can thinke but that ye haue miserable tossed the commonwealth, and so vered all men with disorder, that the inconuenience hereof cannot onelie nip others, but also touch you?

But now see how that not onelie these vnlooked for mischances haue heauilie growne on ye, but also those commodities, which ye thought to haue holpen your selues and others by, be not onelie hindered, but also hurt thereby. The kings maiestie by the aduise, as: intended a iust reformation of all such things as pe men could trulle shew themselves oppressed with, thinking equalitie of iustice to be the diademe of his kingdome, and the safegard of his commons.
Which was not onelie intended by wisdomme, but also for with speed, and so entered into a due considering of all states, that none should haue iust cause to grudge against the other, when as euerie thing rightfullie had, nothing could be but brightfullie grudged at. And this would haue bene done, not onelie with your glad and willing assent: but also bene done by this daie almost throughout the whole realme: so that quietlie it had bene obtained without inconuenience, and speedilie without delai. And whatsoener had bene done by the kings maiesties authoritie, that would by right haue remained for e-uer, and so taken in law, that the contrarie partie neither could by iustice, neither would by boldnesse haue enterprised the breach thereof.

But least wicked men should be wealthisie, and they whose hearts be not truelie bent to obedience, should obtaine at the kings hands that they deser-ued not in a commonwealth, ye haue maruellouslie and worthilie hurt your selues, and greuouslie prouoked (except the kings godnesse be more vnto you than your owne deserts can claime) that ye be not so much worthie as to be benefited in anie kind, as ye be worthie to lose that ye haue on euerie side. Ye haue thought god to be your owne reformers belike, not onelie unnaturallie mistrusting the kings iustice, but also cruellie and vnciuillie dealing with your owne neighbours. Wherein I would as ye haue hurt the whole realme, so ye had not enterprised a thing most dangerous to your selues, & most contrarie to the thing ye intended. If ye had let things alone, thought god by your selues to be redressed, and dutifullie looked for the performance of that, the kings maiestie promising reformation, they should not haue bene vndone at this time, as in a great sort of honest places they be; nor whole countries, who for their quietnesse be most worthie to be looked on, should haue bene vnprouided for at this daie. But this commoditie hath happened by the waie, that it is euidentlie knowne by your mischance, and others dutie, who be most true to the king, and most worthie to be done for, and who be most pernicious and traitorous rebels. And it is not to be doubted, but they shall be considered with thanks, and find iust redresse without deserued miserie, & you punished like rebels, who might haue had both praise & profit like subiects.

For that as ye haue valiantlie done of your selues, thinke ye it will stand anie longer, than men feare your rage, which cannot indure long; and that ye shall not then bide the rigour of the law for your prouat inturtes, as ye vied the furie of your braines in other mens oppressions? Will men suffer wrong at your hands, when law can redresse it, & the right of the commonwealth will mainteine it, and god order in countries will beare it? Ye amend faults as ill surgeons heale sores, which when they seeme to be whole about, they rankle at the bottome, and so be faine continuallie to be soze, or else be mended by new breaking of the skin. Your redresse seemeth to you perfect and good, ye haue pulled downe such things as ye would, ye thinke now all is well: ye consider no further, ye seeke not the bottome, ye see not the soze, that ye haue done it by no law, ye haue redressed it by no order, what then? If it be no other, wise searched than by you, it will not tarie long for either it will be after continuallie as it was afore your coming, or else it must be (when all is done) amended by the king.

Thus haue ye both lacked in the time, and mist in the doing, and yet besides that ye haue done, which is by your doing to no purpose. Ye haue done the things with such inconueniences, as hath bene both before rehearsed, and shall be after declared; that better it had bene for you, neuer to haue entioied the commoditie, if there be anie; than to suffer the greets that will insue, which be verie manie. In euerie quarter some men (whom ye set by) will be lost, which euerie one of you (if ye haue loue in ye) would rather haue lacked the profit of your inclosures, than cause such destruction of them, as is like by reason & iudge-ment necessarilie to follow. What commonwealth is it then, to do such abhominable enterprises after so vile a sort, that ye hinder that god ye would do, and bring in that hurt ye would not, and so find that ye seeke not, and follow that ye lose, and destroye your selues by follie; rather than ye would be ordered by reason, and so haue not so much amended your old sores, as brought in new plagues, which ye your selues that deserue them will lament, and we which haue not deserued them may curse you for? For although the kings maiestie, as: intended for your profit a reformation in his commonwealth: yet his pleasure was not, nor no reason gaue it, that euerie subiect should busilie intermeddle with it of their owne head, but onelie those whom his counsell thought most meet men for such an honest purpose.

The kings maiestie, as: hath godlie reformed an vnclene part of religion, and hath brought it to the true forme of the first church that followed Christ, thinking that to be truest, not what later mens fan-ties haue of themselves deuised, but what the apostles and their felowes had at Christes hand receiued, and willetly the same to be knowne and set abroad to all his people. Shall euerie man now that listeth and fantiseth the same, take in hand vnalled, to be a reformer.

what things in a well and iustitie done matter ought well to be weighed.

nister, and to set forth the same, hauing no authoritie: spake, though the thing were verie goodlie that were done, yet the person must needs do ill that enterpriseth it, because he doth a good thing after an ill sort, and looketh but on a little part of dutie, considering the thing, and leaueth a great part vnaduised, not considering the person: when as in a well and iustlie done matter, not onelie these two things ought well to be weighed, but also good occasion of time, and reasonable cause of the doing, ought also much to be set before euerie doers eyes. Now in this your deed, the manner is vngoodlie, the thing vnusurferable, the cause wicked, the person seditious, the time traitorous: and can ye possible by anie honest defense of reason, or anie good conscience religiouslie grounded, denie that this malicious and horrible fault, so wickedlie set on, is not onelie sinfull afoze God, and traitorous to the king, but also deadiie and pestilent to the whole common-wealth of our countrie, and so not onelie ouerfloweth vs with the miserie, but also ouertushmeth you with the rage thereof?

The poke that rebels willfullie bring vpon
themselves.

Yet further see and ye be not wearie with the multitude of miseries, which ye haue maruellouslie moued, what a poke ye willfullie do bring on your selues, in stirring by this detestable sedition, and so bring your selues into a further slaerie, if ye vse your selues into a further slaerie, if ye vse your selues often thus inobedientlie. When common order of the law can take no place in vnrulie and disobedient subiects, and all men will of willfullie resist with rage, and thinke their owne violence to be the best iustice; then be wise magistrats compelled by necessitie to seeke an extreamie remedie, where meane waies helpe not, and bring in the martiall law where none other law serueth. Then must ye be contented to bide punishment without processe, condemnation without witnesse, suspicion is then taken for iudgement, and displeasure may be iust cause of your execution, and so without fauor ye find strictnesse, which without rule seeke violence. Ye thinke it a hard law and vnusufferable. It is so indeed, but yet good for a medicine.

Desperat remedies
for desperat diseases.

Rebels woorthie to suffer extremities of punishment.

The greatest shame that can come to a common-wealth.

Desperate sicknesses in physike must haue desperate remedies, for meane medicines will neuer helpe great griefes. So if ye cast your selues into such sharpe diseases, ye must needs loke for sharpe medicines againe at your physicians hands. And woorthie ye be to suffer the extremitie in a common-wealth, which seeke to do the extremitie, and by reason must receiue the like ye offer, and so be contented to bide the end willinglie which set on the beginning willfullie. For no greater shame can come to a common-wealth, than that those subiects which should be obedient euen without a law, can not be contented to be ordered by the law, and by no means kept within their dutie, which should euerie waie offend rather than in their dutie. It is a token that the subiects lacke reason, when they forsake law, and thinke either by their multitude to find pardon, which cannot iustlie stretch to all, or else by strength to beare the stroke, which cannot prosper against a king.

They must needs little consider themselves, who bring in this necessitie, rather to stand to the pleasure of a mans will, than to abide the reason of the law; and to be indangered more when an other man lieth, than when himselfe offendeth. And this most necessarilie folow if your rebellion thus continue: and while ye seeke to throw downe the poke, which ye fastie pour selues burdened withall, ye bring your selues in a greater bondage, leauing safetie and following danger, and putting your selues vnder the iustice of them whose fauour ye might easilie haue kept, if ye would willinglie and dutifullie haue ser-

ued. Now the gentlemen be more in trust, because the commons be vnrulie, and they get by seruice, which ye lose by stubbornnesse, and therefore must needs, if ye thus continue, haue more authoritie from the king: because ye would be in lesse subiection to the king, and that as ye will not do of your selues, ye must be compelled to do by others, and that ye refuse to do willinglie, thinke ye must be bound to do the same constrainde. Which when it cometh to passe, as wisdometh saith in your faults that it must needs, what gaine ye then, or what profit can arise to you by rising, which might haue found ease in sitting still? And what shall ye be at length the better for this turmoile, which beside diuerse other in-commodities rehearfed, shall be thus clogged with the vnusufferable burden of the martiall law.

Yet there is one thing behind, which me thinke your selues should not forget, seeing that ye haue giuen the cause, ye should dulie loke for the effect. Ye haue spoiled, imprisoned, and threatened gentlemen to death, and that with such hatred of mind, as may not well be bozne. The cause therof I speake not on, which tried, will happilie be not so great: but see the thing, set murther aside, it is the heinouest fault to a priuat man. What could more spitefullie haue bene done against them, than ye haue used with crueltie? Can this do anie other but breed in their stomachs great grudge of displeasure toward you, and ingender such an hatred, as the weaker and the sufferer must needs beate the smart thereof.

The kings best kind of government is so to rule his subiects, as a father ordereth his children, and best life of obedient subiects is one to behaue himselfe to an other, as though they were brethren vnder the king their father. For loue is not the knot onelie of the common-wealth, whereby diuerse parts be peacefully ioined together in one politike bodie, but also the strength and might of the same, gathering together into a small come with order, which scattered would else breed confusion and debate. Dissention we see in small houses, and thereby may take example to great common-wealths, how it not onelie decaith them from wealth, but also abateth them from strength. Thinke small examples to take place in great matters, and the like though not so great to follow in them both, and there by learne to iudge of great things vnknotome, by small things perceived. When brethren agree not in a house, goeth not the weakest to the walles, and with whom the father taketh part withall, is not he likeliest to preuaile? As it not wisdometh for the younger brother, after the god will of the parents, to seeke his eldest brothers fauour, who vnder them is most able to do for him? So seeke them both with honestie is wisdometh, to lose them both by fullennesse is madnesse.

Haue there not bene dailye benefits from the gentlemen to you, in some more, and in some lesse, but in none considered, which they haue more friendlie offered, than you haue gentlie requited? This must ye lose, when ye will not be thankfull, and learne to gaine new god will by desert, when ye forsake the old friendship vnproouoked. And ye must thinke that liuing in a common-wealth together, one kind hath need of an other: and yet a great sort of you more need of one gentleman, than one gentleman of a great sort of you. And though all be parts of one common-wealth, yet all be not like woorthie parts, but all being vnder obedience, some kind in more subiection one waie, and some kind in more seruice another waie. And seeing ye be lesse able by monie and liberalitie to deserue god will than others be, and your onelie kind of desert is to shew god will, which honest men do well accept as much woorth as monie, haue ye not much hindered & hurt your selues herein, herein, losing that one kind of humanitie which ye haue onelic left, and turning it into crueltie, which ye ought most to abhor, not onelic because it is wicked of it selfe, but also most noisome to you.

I can therefore for my part thinke no lesse herein, if ye follow your stiffenesse still, & must needs iudge that ye haue wilfullie brought on your selues such plagues, as the like could not haue fallen on you, but by your selues. Seeing then thus manie waies ye haue hurt the common-wealth of this whole countrie within, by destruction of thyres, losing of haruest, wasting of vittells, decayng of manhood, vndoing of farmers, increasing of vagabonds, mainteining of disorders, binding of rebeldes, bringing in of martiall law, and breeding continuall hatred among diuerse states: what thinke ye, I praie you: Iudge ye not that ye haue committed an odious and detestable crime against the whole common-wealth, whose fartherance ye ought to haue tendered by dutie, and not to haue sought the hurt thereof with your owne damage?

Besides all these inward griefes, which enerie one feuerallie must needs feele with miserie, there happeneth so manie outward mischances among strangers to vs with disdain; that if there were nothing ill within the realme which we should feele, yet the shame which both touch vs from other countries, should not onelic moue, but also compell you hartlie to forthink this your rebellious sedition. For what shall strangers thinke, when they shall heare of the great disorder which is in this realme with such confusion, that no order of law can keepe you vnder, but must be faine to be beaten downe with a kings power? Shall they not first thinke the kings maiestie, in whose mind God hath put so much hope for a child, as we may loke for gifts in a man; either for his age to be little set by, or for lacke of qualitties not to be regarded, or for default of lone to be resisted, and no notable grace of God in him considered, nor the worthinesse of his office looked vpon, nor naturall obedience due to him remembred?

Shall they not next suppose, small estimation to be giuen to the rulers, to whom vnder the king we owe due obedience, that can not in iust and lawfull matters be heard, nor men to haue that right iudgement of their wisdoms, as their iustice in rule, and foresight in counsell requirith: but rather prefer their owne fauours before others experience, and deeme their owne reason to be common-wealth, and other mens wisdoms to be but dreaming? Shall they not trulie saie the subiects to be more vnfaithfull in disobedience, than other subiects were ordered be; and licence of libertie to make wild heads without order, and that they neither haue reason that vnderstand not the mischief of sedition, nor dutie which followeth their beastlinesse, nor lone in them which so little remember the common-wealth, nor naturall affection which will dailie seeke their owne destruction?

Thus the whole countrie lacking the good opinion of other nations, is cast into great shame by your vnruleinesse, and the proceedings of the countrie, be they neuer so goodlie, shall be ill spoken of, as vnfit to be brought into life, and good things hereby that deserue praise, shall bide the rebuke of them that list to speake ill, and ill things vntouched shall be boldlie mainteined. Nothing may with praise be redressed, where things be measured by changeable disorder, rather than by necessarie vse, and that is thought most politike, that men will be best contented to doe, and not that which men should be brought vnto by dutie. And with what dutie or vertue in ye, can ye quench out of memorie this foule enterprise, or gather a good report againe to this realme, who haue so onelic with reppoynt flandered the same, and diuerslie discredited it among others, and abated the good opinion which was had of the iust gouernement and ruled order vnder heretofore in this noble realme, which is now most grieuous, because it is now most without cause.

If this outward opinion (without further inconvenience) were all, yet it might well be borne, and would with ease decaye as it grew: but it hath not onelic hurt vs with voice, but indangered vs in deed, and cast vs a great deale behind the hand, where else we might haue had a iollie foretaste. For that oportunitie of time which seldome chanceth, and is alwaies to be taken, hath bene by your steward meanes lost this yeare, and so vaine spent at home for bringing downe of you, which should else profitable haue bene otherwise bestowed, that it hath bene almost as great a losse to vs abroad, to lacke that we might haue obtained, as it was combrance at home, to go about the ouerthrow of you, whose sedition is to be abhorred. And we might both conuenientlie haue inuaded some, if they would not reasonably haue growne to some kind of friendship, and also defended others which would beside promise for times sake vniustlie set vpon vs, and casilie haue made this stormie time a faire yeare vnto vs, if our men had bene so happie at home, as our likelihood abroad was fortunat.

But what is it I praie you either to let slip such an occasion by negligence, or to stop it by stubbornnesse, which once past awate, can be by no means recovered; no not though with diligence ye go about to reinforce the same againe? If ye would with wickednes haue forsaken your faith to your naturall countrie, and haue sought craftie means to haue vtterlie betrayed it to our common enemies: could ye haue had anie other speedier waie than this is, both to make our strength weakie, and their weakenesse strong? If ye would haue sought to haue spied your countrie, and to haue pleased your enemy, and follow their counsell for our hinderance: could ye haue had deuised of them anie thing more shamefull for vs, and ioisfull to them? If they which lie like spials, and hearken after likelihoods of things to come, because they declare oportunitie of times to the enemy, are to be iudged common enemies of the countrie: what shall we reasonable thinke of you, who doe not secretlie betraye the counsels of other, but openlie betraie the common-wealth with your owne deeds, and haue as much as lieth in you, sought the ouerthrow of it at home: which if ye had obtained at Gods hand, as ye neuer alloweth so horrible an enterprise, how could ye haue defended it from the ouerthrow of others abroad?

For is your vnderstanding of things so small, that although ye see your selues not vnfit to get the upper hand of a few gentlemen, that ye be able to beat downe afore the kings power: ye and by chance ye were able to doe that, would ye iudge your selues by strength mightie enough, to resist the power of outward nations, that for praise sake would inuade ye? I praie, thinke trulie with your selues, that if ye doe overcome, ye be vnfit both by strength abroad, and displeasure of honest men at home, and by the punishment of God above. And now ye haue not yet gotten in deed, that your vaine hope looketh for by fauour: thinke how certainlie ye haue wounded the common-wealth with a sore stroke, in procuring our enemies by our weakenesse to seeke victorie, and by our outward miserie to seeke outward glorie with inward dishonor. Which howsoeuer they get, thinke it to be long of you, who haue offered them victorie before they began warre: because ye would declare to men hereafter (belike) how dangerous it is to make stirres at home, when they do not onelic make our

Beside these, there is another sort of men derions of advantage, and disdainfull of our wealth, whose greafe is most our greatest hap, and be offended with religion, because they be drowned in superstition, men sealed toward God, but not fit to iudge, meaning better without knowledge, than they iudge by their meaning, whether whole ignorance should be taken awaie, than their will should be followed; whom we should more rebuke for their stub-bornesse, than despise for their ignorance. These seeing superstition beaten downe, and religion set up, Gods word taking place, traditions kept in their kind, difference made betwene Gods commandments and mans learning, the truth of things sought out according to Christs institution, examples taken of the

there were no cause whie God might haue punished, if their viled profession might still haue taken place.
They see not that where Gods glorie is truest set laboureth to corrupt by lewtonesse, that as is gotten simple men that to be a cause, which in deed can not be tried and taken for a cause. So he causeth religion which teacheth obedience, to be iudged the cause of sedition; & the doctrine of loue, the seed of dissention; prophets counsell, and thought to serue God most trulie by their roted & accustomed idolatrie. When the christian men were persecuted in the primitive church, & daillie suffered martyrdome for Christs profession, such faire season of weather was for three or four peares together, that the heathen iudged thereupon God to be delighted with their crueltie, and so were persuaded that with the blood of the martyrs they pleased God highlie. Such fantasies light now in papists, and irreligious mens heads, and soine things by chance happening together, and conclude the one to be the cause of the other, and then delight in true worshippers hurt, because they iudge cursedlie the god to be bad, and therefore reioice in the punishment of the goodlie. For they being fleshlie, iudge by outward things, and perceiue not the inward, for that they lacke the spirit and so iudge amis, not vnderstanding God, what diuersitie he suffereth to blind still the wilfull, and how through all dangers he sauneth his chosen.

And thus haue ye giuen a large occasion to stub-borne papists, both to iudge amisse, and also to reioice in this wicked chance, contented with our mischance, not liking our religion, and thinking God doth pur-nise for this better change, and haue thereby an euill opinion of Gods holie truth, confirmed in them by no sure scripture, but by following of mischance, which they ought to thinke to come for the pride and stubbornesse of the people, who doth not accept Gods glorie in god part, nor giue no due praise to their Lord and maker. What should I saie more?
The hurt is euerie waie, the dangers be so great, and the perils so manie, which do daillie follow your duilish enterprife, that the more I seeke in the matter, the more I continuallie see to saie. And what words can wortheilie declare this miserable beasliness of yours, which haue intended to diuide the realme, and arme the one part for the killing of the other? For euen as concord is not onelie the health, but also the strength of the realme: so is sedition not onelie the weaknesse but also the apostume of the realme, which when it breaketh inwardlie, putteth the state in great danger of recouerie, and corrupteth the whole commonwealth with the rotten furie that it hath bene long putrified withall. For it is not in sedition as in other faults, which being mischances of themselves, haue some notable hurt alwaies fast adioined to them: but in this one is there a whole hell of faults, not seuerallie scattered, but clustered on a lump together, and coming on so thicke, that it is impossible for a region armed with all kinds of wisdom, and strength thereto, to auoid the dangers that issue out thereof.

When sedition once breaketh out, see ye not the lawes ouerthrowne, the magistrates despised, spol-ling of houses, murdering of men, wasting of countries, increase of disorder, diminishing of the realms strength, swarming of vagabonds, scarcitie of laborers, and all those mischances plentionlie brought in, which God is wont to scourge seuerellie withall, warre, dearth, and pestilence? And seeing ye haue these & murder, plague & famine, confusion and vblenesse linked together, can ye loke for anie more mis-chance in one shamefull enterprife, than ye euidentlie see to grow herein? As for warre, although it be miserable, yet the one part getteth somewhat, and restor-seth in the spoile, and so goeth lustier awaie: and either increaseth his countrie with riches, or inhanseth himselfe with glorie: but in sedition both parts lose, the overcommer cannot stie, the overcommed cannot spoile; the more the winner winneth, the more he loseth; the more that escape, the more infamous men liue; all that is gained is scarcelie saued; the winning is losse, the losse is destruction, both wast themselves, and the whole most wasted; the strengthening of themselves, the decaye of the coun-trie; the striving for the victorie, is a preie to the enimie: and thortlie to saie, the hellish turmole of sedition so farre passeth the common miserie of warre, as to stae himselfe is more heinous, than to be slaine of another.

A noble peace, that wealth bringeth thou in, both do all things flourish in field and in towne, what for-wardnesse of religion, what increase of learning, what granitie in counsell, what deuise of wit, what order of maners, what obedience of lawes, what re-uerence of states, what safeguard of houses, what qui-etnesse of life, what honoz of countries, what friendship of minds, what honestie of pleasure hast thou alwaies maintained, whose happinesse we knew not, while now we seele thy lacke, and shall learne by miserie to vnderstand plentie, and so to auoid mischance by the hurt that it bringeth, and learne to serue better, where rebellion is once knowen; and so to liue trilie, and ha'pe the king's peace. What god state were ye in afore ye began, not picked with pover-tie, but sturred with mischief, to seeke your destruction, hauing waies to redresse all that was amisse?

Magistrats most readie to tender all iustice, and pitiffull in hearing the poore mens causes, which sought to amend matters more than you can deuise, and were readie to redresse them better than ye could imagine: and yet for a headinesse ye could not be contented; but in despite of God, who commandeth obedience, and in contempt of the king, whose lawes doe seeke your wealth, and to ouerthrow the countrie, which naturallie we should loue, ye would proude rise, and doe ye wot not what, and amend things by rebellion to your utter bndwing. What state leaue ye vs in now, besieged with enimies, divided at home, made poore with spoile and losse of our haruist, vnbordered and cast downe with slaughter and hatred, hindered from amendments by our owne sturthly hast, endangered with sicknesse by reason of misorder, laid open to mens pleasures for breaking of the lawes, and scabbed to such faint-nesse that scarcelie it will be couered.

Therefore for Gods sake haue pittie on your selues, consider how miserable ye haue spoiled, destroied, and wasted vs all: and if for desperatnesse ye care not for your selues, yet remember your louies, your children, your countrie, and for sake this rebellion. With humble submission acknowledge your faults, and tarie not the extremitie of the kings sword, leaue off with repentance, and turne to your duties, aske God forgiveness, submit ye to your king, be contented for a common-wealth one or two to die. And ye capitaine for the residue sacrifice your selues, ye shall so best attaine the kings gracious pardon, saue the assemblie, and helpe the common-wealth, to declare your doings to proceed of no stubborneesse; but all this mischief to grow out of ignorance, which seeing the miserie, would redresse the fault, to recouer best the blot of your disorder, and staie the great miseries which be like to follow.
Thus if ye doe not, thinke trulie with your selues, that God is angrie with you for your rebellion, the kings sword dialone to defend his countrie, the crye of the poore to God against ye, the readinesse of the honest in armor to vanquish ye, your death to be at hand, which ye cannot escape, hauing God against ye, as he promisseth in his word, the kings power to ouerthrow ye, gathered in the field, the commonwealth to beate ye downe with stripes and with curses, the shame of your mischief to blemish ye for euer.

Thus far this necessarie treatise touching rebellion, penned by sir John Cheke, a gentleman esuerie waie in complet sort satisfieng the report blazed abroad of him. For if there were no more testimonies extant in the world, but this onelie treatise discoursing Betts rebellion; it were enough to warrant no lesse true, than in common speech and writing is left witnessed of him. And suerlie it ap-peareth, that as in this gentleman there was an extraordinarie heape of laudable gifts; so was there also in him the right vse of them all. Whereby he grew in such fauor with king Henrie the eight, that partlie for his absolute knowledge in tongues, speciallie the Greke and Latine, and also for his integritie of life and religion; he was chosen scholemaister to yong prince Edward, to traine him vp in the right vnderstanding, both of forren languages, and the purenes of Gods seruice. Insomuch that by his industrie such effects followed (God aboue prospering his actions) that the yong prince, when he came to the kingdome was mindefull of him, and among other (I will not saie gratuities, where cause of desert maketh challunge of some recompense) tokens of benenolence, advanced him to the dignitie of knight-hood; as hereafter in due place maie appeare. Of this worthie man, whose praise though neuer so excessive (if meet for a man) is equiualent vnto his merits, Iohn Leland, vpon presenting vnto him a booke, taketh occasion to write this epigram, compiling in summe no lesse than is here vnder in English remembred:

During the time of these commotions and sturs here within the realme, to the great danger of the state; the French king hauing knowledge thereof, ment not to omit the oportunitie offered, to recouer out of the Englishmens hands those fortresses which they held at Bullongne and in Bullongnois. Where-vpon he gaue summons to the gentlemen and men of armes, and others of his realme, to put themselues in order with all their furniture, that they might be readie to attend him in his armie in Bul-longnois by a daie appointed. And about the same time, that is to saie, in the beginning of August; the French king purposing to surpriue the Isles of Cerneleste and Jerseie, appointed certeine gallies and ships of warre to passe thither; but being recet-ued by the king of Englands nauie that laie there, and other of the Island, they were beaten backe and repelled, with the losse of a thousand men (as some write) and so were constrained to retire without attaining their enterprise.

The French
king purposed to surpriue Cerneleste and Jerseie, but is repelled.

John Fox.

Credible word was brought out of France to the lord protector, that into one towne in one vessell were brought at the least thre score gentlemen to be buried, and also an inhibition giuen out by the French king, not to speake of the euill successe of that iour-nie. In the meane time, the French king being come downe vnto Abulle, departed from thence the firste of August, and comming vnto Aue, lodged there that night, and the next daie came to Sponsreull, where he found the constable and monseigneur Daumalle. The next daie being the eighteenth of August, he came to his armie lodged foure leagues on this side Sponsreull at a village called Pescastell, nere to the Forrest of Ardele, vpon the waie that leadeth to Bullongne. The same daie were certeine pioneers sent to Pont de Bique to repare the bridge there, and to make the waies easie for the artillerie to passe. The next daie the said king with his armie passed by Bullongne berg, and camped that night on a little hill betwixt that Forrest and the Forrest of Suren,

In this place he caused trenches to be cast about a plot of ground, after the maner of a fortresse, within the which he left certeine bands of men of warre to be a safegard vnto such as should passe to and fro with bittels to furnish his campe. He staied not there past a daie and a halfe, but remoued to Ardenton, a mile or little more beyond Wargullen; from thence he came with his armie, and lodged on a hill, some what more than a mile & a halfe from Hambleteuue. The french king hauing viewed the forts, caused fixe and twentie peeces of artillerie to be planted against that fort, which was built in a place called the Almaine campe, but the frenchmen named it Le fort de Selague, distant from Hambleteuue about a quarter of a mile. The artillerie had not gone off little more than the space of two houres, but that Charles Sturton capitaine of that pece, and George Willoughbie a gentleman associat with him, came forth to parlee with the Conestable, offering to yeld the fort into his hands, vpon condition they might depart with bag and baggage. But as they were thus in hand to make their composition, the frenchmen thrust forward to the rampiers, and entered in plumps into the fortresse, slue fourescore persons, & toke the rest prisoners. There might be in all within that pece two hundred and thirtie persons, men and women. This happened the foure and twentieth of August, being Bartholomew daie.

This done, the king caused part of the artillerie to be planted against the castell of Hambleteuue, situated at the one end of the towne nere to the sea side. Towards night monsieur de Wandosme gaue an approach to the said castell, and they within by commandement of the lord Greie retired to the maine fort to helpe to furnish the same, wanting numbers sufficient to defend it. The next daie being the fixe and twentieth of August, the king caused approaches to be made vnto the great fort, and the morrow after the batterrie began most furiously. The same daie after dinner, the king summoned them within to yeld; but the lord John Greie being generall (although he saw how weake the pece was of it selfe, & the lacke of sufficient numbers of men to resist such a puissant force, as the french king had there with him) would not yet hearken vnto anie talke, no: suffer the herald to come nere; for that he should not perceiue the weaknesse of the pece: and so he was commanded to get him thence with speed, or else they would cause him to be packing smallie to his ease. The french king fore offended here with, that his herald was so discourteouslie used, caused the batterrie to be reinforced with great diligence, which dismounting their ordinance within, and beating downe their rampiers, made such breaches, that my lord John and the capitaines within perceiued they were not able by anie meanes to defend the place anie longer. Wherevpon they offered to reuer the fort to the king vpon composition: which in the end fell out to be thus, that the souldiers should depart with their liues saued, and that the generall (for honor sake) should haue one horse to ride on in his conflict, without sword or dagger, and likewise two other capitaines with him: but as for the other souldiers, with the women and children, should depart on foot in their shirts, leauing all their goods and substance behind them. After it was agreed that the fort should be thus surrendered, there entered monsieur de Chatillon that was after admerall of France, and monsieur de Desse, latelie returned out of Scotland. The french souldiers entring by stealth into the fort by the breaches, committed foule disorders, not onelie in ransacking the houses, but also in spoiling the souldiers by force, intreating them in most rigorous manner.

The french writers confesse, that it was pitie to see the poore men and women so miserable handled and abused as they were by the outrageous souldiers that thus entered the fort, and sacked all that they could laie hands vpon. Monsieur de Desse saued a great number of women and yong maidens from the cruell hands of their aduersaries, causing them to passe forth by the breach, and presented them to the king, who appointed that they should be conueied in safetie, with all that they had about them, till they had gotten out of danger. Monsieur de Chatillon, by the kings commandement, caused all the rest within the fort to come forth, who passing thre and thre in a range came before the king, who stood there to behold them, with the whole armie placed so in order on either side the waie as they should come, that they might passe betwixt their ranks, as it were through a lane. They that came forth in this fort might be (as the french writers record) about seven or eight hundred in all of men and women, wherof there were manie hurt and maimed; some with halfe a shirt on to couer them, and diuerse stark naked. The lord John Greie being mounted on a curtalle, passing by the french king, and saluting him, was courteously of him embraced.

The morrow after was the fort of Blacknesse or Blaconnesse rendered to the french king, with like conditions as they of Hambleteuue had rendered theirs. This was on the tuesday the seven and twentieth of August. The nine and twentieth of August sir Nicholas Arnault conueied all the artillerie, munition, vittels, and goods out of Bullongne berg, caused fire to be set on that fort, and retired with all his souldiers and other people vnto Bullongne. Wherevpon shortly after the frenchmen seized vpon the said place of Bullongne berg, & kept it. The french king leauing monsieur de Chatillon within Hambleteuue with the old hands of the french souldiers, returned towards Bullongne, & approaching within a mile and a halfe of the old man, meant to build there a fort on the sea side: but what through such sharpe skirmishes as the Englishmen continually were rebde to make with his men, and what through the abundance of raine which fell in that season, he was constrained to breake by his campe, and leauing strong garrisons both of horsemen and footmen in all those places, which he had in that season wonne out of the Englishmens hands, he returned himselfe with the princes of his blood into France.

In this meane time whilst the french king was thus occupied, to vse the oportunitie of time in recovering of those fortresses in Bullongne out of the Englishmens hands, the kings maiestie and his counsell were busie still in quieting his rebellious subiects here in England: and finally for meane of a full pacification, and to set all things in good frame and quiet rest, the king published his graces most generall and free pardon to all rebelles, so that they would forthwith (vpon publication of the same pardon) returne euerie man to his house and countrie; which they gladlie did: and so these seditious and most dangerous troubles were brought to end and pacified.

Also in this busie time Marie Steward queene of Scots was conueied by sea out of Scotland into France, and there on the nineteenth daie of April 1549, was married in our ladie church in Paris (with great triumph and solemnitie) to Francis the Dolphin, eldest sonne vnto king Henrie the second of that name french king. This conueied of the yong queene is reported by one to haue bene prouoked, at such time as the counsell of England were in some expectation and hope to obtaine hir. Neuertheless the subtilt aduise of the french, and the trecherous forwardnesse of the Scots, bitterlie disappointed the honest and honorable purpose of the English. Now when the yong queene and hir traine, with the gerd of hir person (be they whome you will) were vnder saile, the English nauie was abroade, and lieng in wait to haue intercepted hir course, course, meant not onlie to skemiſh, but also to recover the yong queene from the French in spite of their hearts, had not the king of England and the most of his counsell flatlie forbidden them to attempt anie warlike encounter, for certeine iust and weightie causes to them knowne. But the Scots smarted for this their baine lightnesse, as in former times for like practices of their vile lewdenesse, as C.O. saith:

Sic letiora leui pluma promissa Scotorum Infamem reddunt gentem, dant sanguine pennis Perfidia quandoq; sua velut ante dederunt.

In this troubleſome yere also Edmund Bonner biſhop of London preached a sermon at Paules croſſe, for the which he was accus'd vnto the counsell by William Latimer parſon of ſaint Laurence Pountneie, and John Wyper ſometime a white monke, and ſo conuented before the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and other commiſſioners at Lambeth, on the twentieth daie of that ſame moneth, and ſent to the Parthaleſea. On the firſt of October he was deſpiued of his biſhoprike, for diſobeieng the kings order in religion.]

Now after that theſe hurlie burlies were thoroughlie quieted, manie of the lords of the realme, as well counſellores as other, miſliking the gouernment of the proteſtor, began to withdraue themſelues from the court, and reſorting to London, ſell to ſecret conſultation for redreſſe of things, but namelie for the diſplacing of the lord proteſtor. And ſuddenlie vpon that occaſion manie maruelled, but few knewe, the uerie lord and counſellor went thorough the citie weaponed, and had their ſeruants likewiſe weaponed, attending vpon them in new lincies, to the great wondering of manie. And at the laſt a great aſſembly of the ſaid counſellores was made at the earle of Marſhalls lodging, which was then at Cleie place in Holborne, whither all the confederats in this matter came priuile armed; and finally concluded to poſſeſſe the towre of London, which by the policie of ſir William Paulet lord treaſurer of England was peaceablie obtained, & who by order of the ſaid confederats immediatlie remoued ſir John Parham then lieutenant of the towre, and placed in that roome ſir Leonard Chamberleine. And after that the ſaid counsell was broken vp at Cleie place, the earle of Marſhall remoued ſorthwith into the citie of London, and laie in the houſe of one John Worke a citizen of London, who was then cheefe maſter of the mint, kept at Suffolke place in Southwooke. The lord proteſtor hearing of the manner of the aſſembly of this counsell, and of the taking of the towre, which ſeemed to him verie ſtrange and doubtfull, did preſentlie the ſaid night remoue fro Hampton court, taking the king with him, vnto the caſtell of Windſore, and there began to fortiſie the ſame, and withall wrote a letter to that noble gentleman the lord Ruſſell lord priuie ſeale remaining as yet in the weſt countrie, aduerting him of theſe troubles as folloiweth.

A letter of the lord proteſtors to the lord Ruſſell lord priuie ſeale, concerning troubles working againſt him.

After our right hartie commendations to your good lordſhip. Here hath of late riſen ſuch a conſpiracie againſt the kings maiestie & vs, as neuer hath bene ſene, the which they can not mainteine, with ſuch baine letters and falſe tales ſurmised, as was neuer ment nor intended on vs. They pretend and ſaie, that we haue ſold Bullongne to the French, and that we do withhold wages from the ſoldiers, & other ſuch tales and letters they do ſpread abroad (of the which if anie one thing were true, we would not wiſh to liue) the matter now being brought to a marvellous extremitie, ſuch as we would neuer haue thought it could haue come vnto, eſpeciallie of thoſe men towards the kings maiestie and vs, of whom we haue deſerued no ſuch thing, but rather much fauour and loue. But the caſe being as it is, this is to require & praie you, to haſten you hither to the deſenſe of the kings maiestie, in ſuch force and power as you maie, to thew the part of a true gentleman, and of a verie friend: the which thing we truſt God ſhall reward, and the kings maiestie in time to come, and we ſhall neuer be vnmindfull of it too. We are ſure you ſhall haue other letters from them, but as ye tender your dutie to the kings maiestie, we requie you to make no ſtaie, but immediatlie repaire with ſuch force as ye haue to his highneſſe in his caſtell of Windſor, and cauſe the reſt of ſuch force as ye maie make to follow you. And ſo we bid you right hartlie farewell. From Hampton court the firſt of October.

Your lordſhips aſſured louing friend Edward Summerſes.

An answer to the lord proteſtors letter.

In this letter of the lord proteſtors ſent the firſt of October, the lord Ruſſell returning anſwer againe vpon the eight of the ſaid moneth, firſt lamented the heauie diſſention fallen betwene the nobilitie and him, which he toke for ſuch a plague, as a greater could not be ſent of almighty God vpon this realme being the next waie (ſaid he) to make vs of conquerors, ſlaves; and like to induce vpon the whole realme an vniuerſall thraldome and calamitie, unleſſe the mercifull godneſſe of the Lord do helpe, and ſome wiſe order be taken in ſtaing theſe great extremities. And as touching the dukes requeſt in his letters, ſo much as he had heard before of the boile of the lords, and feared leaſt ſome conſpiracie had bene meant againſt the kings perſon, he haſted ſorthwith ſuch companie as he could make, for the ſuertie of the king as to him appertained. Now perceiving by the lords letters ſent vnto him the ſame firſt daie of October, theſe tumults to riſe vpon priuie cauſes betwene him and them, he therefore thought it expedient, that a conuenient power ſhould be leuted, to be in a readineſſe to withſtand the worſt (what perils ſoeuer might inſue) for the preſeruacion both of the king and ſtate of the realme from inuaſion of forren enemies, and alſo for the ſtaing of bloodſhed, if anie ſuch thing ſhould be intended betwixt the parties in the heat of this faction. And this he thinking beſt for the diſcharge of his allegiance, humble beſought his grace to haue the ſame alſo in ſpeciall regard and conſideration; firſt, that the kings maiestie be put in no feare; and that if there be anie ſuch thing, wherein he hath giuen cauſe to them thus to proceed, he would ſo conſorme himſelfe, as no ſuch priuie quarrels do redound to the publike diſturbance of the realme: certifieng moreouer the duke, that if it were true which he vnderſtood by the letters of the lords, that he ſhould ſend about proclamations and letters for raiſing vp of the commons, he liked not the ſame. Notwithſtanding he truſted well that his wiſedome would take ſuch a waie, as no effuſion of blood ſhould follow.

And thus much being contained in his former letters the eight of October, in his next letters againe written the eleuenth of October, the ſaid lord Ruſſell reſoiſing to heare of the moſt reaſonable offers of the lord proteſtor made to the lords, wrote vnto him

The effect of the lord Ruſſells letter anſwering the lord proteſtors.

The content of the ſecond anſwer of the lord Ruſſell to the lord proteſtor.

The good lord Russell a folicitor for peace and promised to do, what in the uttermost power of him (and likewise of sir William Herbert joined together with him) did lie, to worke some honorable reconciliation betwene him & them: so as his said offers being accepted and satisfied, some good conclusion might insue, according to their good hope and expectation: signifieng moreover, that as touching the leueng of men, they had resolved to haue the same in readinesse for the benefit of the realme, to oc-curre all inconueniences thatsoeuer, that either by fozen inuasion or otherwise might happen: & so hauing their power at hand to draw nere, whereby they might haue the better oportunitie to be solicitoꝝ and meanes for this reformation on both parts, &c.

And thus much for the answer of the lord Russell to the lord protectoꝝ letters.

But now to proceed and go forward with the matter of the lordꝝ, who together with the earle of Warwicke (vpon that occasion God knoweth) were assembled at London (as ye haue heard) against the lord protectoꝝ. When the king with his counsell at Hampton court heard thereof, first secretarie Peter with the kings message was sent vnto them, whome the lordꝝ notwithstanding detained still with them; making as yet no answer to the message.
Wherevpon the lord protectoꝝ wrote as followeth.

A letter of the lord protectoꝝ to the counsell at London.

The protec-toꝝs letter to the lordꝝ.

M lordꝝ we commend vs heartlie vnto you. And whereas the kings maiestie was informed that you were assembled in such sort as you do, and now remaine, and was aduised by vs and such other of his counsell as were then here about his person, to send master secretarie Peter vnto you with such a message, as whereby might haue ensued the suertie of his maiesties person, with the preservation of his realme and subiects, and the quiet both of vs and your selues, as master secretarie can well declare to you: his maie-stie and we of his counsell here do not a little maruell, that you staie still with you the said master se-cretarie, & haue not as it were boughsated to send answer to his maiestie, neither by him nor yet by anie other. And for our selues we do much more maruell and are sorie, as both we and you haue good cause to be, to see the manner of your doings bent with force of violence, to bying the kings maiestie & vs to these extremities.

So word his hereto sent from the lordꝝ to the lord protectoꝝ
what they required of him to do.

Which as we intend, if you will take no other waie but violence, to defend (as nature and allegiance duty bind vs) to extremitie of death, and to put all to Gods hand, who giueth victorie as it pleaseth him: so if that anie reasonable conditions & offers would take place (as hitherto none hath bene signified vnto vs from you, nor we do not vnderstand, what you do require or seeke, or what you do meane) and that you do seeke no hurt to the kings maiesties person, as touching all other priuat matters, to auoid the effusion of christen blood, and to preferue the kings maiesties person, his realme and subiects, you shall find vs agreeable vnto anie reasonable conditions that you will require. For we do esteeme the kings wealth and tranquillitie of the realme more than all other worldlie things, yea than our owne life. Thus praiseng you to send vs your determinate answer herein by master secretarie Peter, or if you will not let him go, by this bearer, we beseech God to giue both you and vs grace to determinate this matter, as maie be to Gods honor, the preservation of the king, and the quiet of vs all: which maie be, if the fault be not in you. And so we bid you most hartlie farewell. From the kings maiesties castell of Windsoꝝ the seventh of October, 1549.

Your lordships loving friend Edward Summerjet.

After the receipt of these letters, the lordꝝ seeming not greatlie to regard the offers contayned therein, persisted in their intended purpose; and continuing still in London conferred with the maior of London and his brethren, first willing them to cause a good and substantiall watch by night, and a good ward by daie to be kept for the safegard of the citie, and the ports and gates thereof: which was consented vnto, and the companies of London in their turnes warned to watch and ward accordingly. When the said lordꝝ and counsellors demanded of the lord maioꝝ and his brethren five hundred men to aid them, to fetch the lord protectoꝝ out of Windsoꝝ from the king. But therevnto the maioꝝ answered, that he could grant no aid without the assent of the common counsell of the citie: wherevpon the next daie a common counsell was summoned to the Guildhall in London. But in this meane time the said lordꝝ of the counsell assembled themselves at the lord maioꝝs house in London, who was then sir Henrie Amcofes fishmonger, and John Poike and Richard Turke thyrifes of the said citie. And there the said counsell agreed and published forthwith a proclamation against the lord profectoꝝ, the effect of which proclamation was as fol-loweth.

continue in their intended purpose against the lord protectoꝝ.

A proclamation published on published against the lord protec-toꝝ.

- 1 That the lord protectoꝝ, by his malicious and euill gouernement, was the occasion of all the sedition that of late hath hapened within the realme.
- 2 The losse of the kings peaces in France.
- 3 That he was ambitious and sought his owne glozie, as appeared by his building of most sumptuous and costlie buildings, and speciallie in the time of the kings warres, and the kings soldiers vnpaid.
- 4 That he esteemed nothing the graue counsell of the counsellors.
- 5 That he sowed sedition betwene the nobles, the gentlemen, and commons.
- 6 That the nobles assembled themselves together at London, for none other purpose, but to haue caused the protectoꝝ to haue liued within his limits, and to haue put such order for the kings maiestie as appertained, whatsoeuer the protectoꝝs doings were, which (as they said) were vnnaturall, ingrate, and traitorous.
- 7 That the protectoꝝ slandered the counsell to the king, and did what in him late to cause variance be-twene the king and his nobles.

8 That he was a great traitor, and therefore the lordꝝ desired the citie and commons to aid them to take him from the king. And in witnesse and testi-monie of the contents of the said proclamation the lordꝝ subscribed their names and titles as followeth.

Witness to the contents of the said proclamation.

The lord Rich lord chancelloꝝ, the lord John lord great maister and president of the counsell, the lord re, quesse of Northampton, the earle of Warwicke lord great chamberleine, the earle of Arundell lord chamberleine, the earle of Shrewesburie, the earle of Southampton, the lord Thomas Cheinie knight treasuroꝝ of the kings house and lord warden of the cinque ports, sir John Cage knight constable of the tower, sir William Peter knight secretarie, sir Edward North knight, sir Edward Montague chiefe iustice of the common pleas, sir Rafe Sadler, sir John Baker, sir Edward Wol-ton, doctor, Wolton deane of Canturburie, sir Richard Southwell.

After the foresaid proclamation was proclaimed, the lordꝝ or the most of them continuing and lieng in London, came the next daie to the Guildhall, di-ring

REG. ring the time that the lord maior and his brethren sat in their court or inner chamber, and entered and communed a long while with them, and at the last the maior and his brethren came forth vnto the common counsell, where was read the kings letter sent vnto the maior and citizens, commanding them to aid him with a thousand men, as hath maister Fox, and to send the same to his castell at Windsoze: and to the same letter was adioined the kings hand, and the lord protectors. On the other side, by the mouth of the recorder it was requested, that the citizens would grant their aid rather vnto the lords: for that the protector had abused both the kings maiestie, and the whole realme, and without that he were taken from the king, made to vnderstand his follie, this realme was in a great hazard: and therefore required that the citizens would willingly assent to aid the lords with five hundred men: herevnto was none other answer made but silence. But the recorder (who at that time was a worthy gentleman called maister Spoke) still cried vpon them for answer.

At the last stepped vp a wise and good citizen, named (as maister Fox saith) George Stadlow, and said thus. In this case it is good for vs to thinke of things past to auoid the danger of things to come. I remember (saith he) in a storie written in Fabians chronicle, of the warre betwene the king and his barons, which was in the time of king Henrie the third, and the same time the barons (as our lords do now) commanded aid of the maior and citie of London, and that in a rightfull cause for the common-weale, which was for the execution of diuerse good lawes, wherevnto the king before had giuen his consent, and after would not suffer them to take place, and the citie did aid the lords. Now it came to an open battell, wherein the lords preuailed, and toke the king and his sonne prisoners, and vpon certeine conditions the lords restored againe the king and his sonne to their liberties. And among all other conditions, this was one, that the king should not onlie grant his pardon to the lords, but also to the citizens of London, which was granted, yea and the same ratified by act of parlement. But what followed?

Was it forgotten? No suerlie, no; yet forgiven during the kings life. The liberties of the citie were taken awaie, strangers appointed to be our heads and gouernours, the citizens giuen a waie bodie and goods, and from one persecution to another were most miserablie afflicted: such it is to enter into the wrath of a prince, as Salomon saith: The wrath and indignation of a prince is death. Wherefore forsomuch as this aid is required of the kings maiestie, whose voice we ought to hearken vnto (for he is our high shephcard) rather than vnto the lords: and yet I would not wish the lords to be clearlie shaken off, but that they with vs, and we with them may soine in fate, and make our most humble petition to the kings maiestie, that it would please his highnesse, to heare such complaint against the gouernement of the lord protector as may be iustlie alledged and proued. And I doubt not but this matter will be so pacified, that neither shall the king nor yet the lords haue cause to sike for further aid, neither we to offend any of them both. After this tale the commons staied, and the lord maior and his brethren for that time bade adieu, and afterward communed with the lords.

The lords set the next daie in counsell in the Star chamber, and from thence they sent sir Philip Hobbie with their letters of credence to the kings maiestie, beseeching his highnesse to giue credit to that which the said Philip should declare vnto his maiestie in their names: & the king gaue him libertie to speake, and most gentlie heard all that he had to saie. And trulie he did so wisely declare his message, and so grauelie told his tale in the name of the lords, yea therewithall so vehementlie and grieuousslie against the protector, who was also there present by the king, that in the end, the lord protector was commanded from the kings presence, and shortly was committed to ward in a tower within the castell of Wind-soze called Beauchamps tower. And some after were staied sir Thomas Smith, sir Michaele Stanhope, and sir John Thyn knights, maister Whalleie, master Fisher, Wolfe of the priue chamber, Craie of Reading, and diuers other gentlemen that attended vpon the lord protector. And the same daie the lords of the counsell came to Windsoze to the king, and the next daie they brought from thence the lord protector, and the other that were there staied, and conueied them through the citie of London, with as much wonderment as might be, vnto the tower, where they remained prisoners.

¶ Touching the manner of the dukes coming to the tower from Windsoze, I find that it was on the foureteenth of October in the after none, at which time he was brought on horsebacke through Holburne, in at Newgate, and so to the tower of London, accompanied with diuerse lords and gentlemen with three hundred horse: the lord maior, sir Rafael Warren, sir John Gresham, maister recorder, sir William Locke, and both the shiriffes, and other knights, sitting on their horses against Soper lane, with all the officers with halberds, and from Holburne bridge to the tower, certeine aldermen or their deputies on horsebacke in euerie street, with a number of householders standing with billes as he passed. Shortly after the lords resorted to the tower, and there charged the protector with sundrie articles, as followeth.

 tector committed to prison.

Articles objected against the lord protector.

In primis, you toke vpon you the office of a protector and gouernour, vpon condition, expresselie and speciallie, that you would do nothing in the kings affaires publicke or priuatie, but by the assent of the late kings executors.

2 Also you, contrarie to the said condition, of your owne authoritie, did staie and let iustice, and subuerted the lawes, as well by your letters as by your commandements.

3 Also you caused diuerse persons, being arrested and imprisoned for treason, murder, manslaughter and felonie, to be discharged and set at large, against the kings lawes and statutes of this realme.

4 Also you haue made and ordeined lieutenants for the kings armies, and other weightie affaires vnder your owne writing and seale.

5 Also you haue communed with the ambassadors of other realmes, discourting alone with them in the weightie causes of this realme.

6 Also you haue sometime rebuked, checked and taunted, as well priuatie as openlie, diuerse of the kings most honorable counsellors, for shewing and declaring their aduises and opinions against your purposes in the kings weightie affaires, saleng som-times to them, that you need not to open matters vnto them, and would therefore be othertofte aduised: and that you would, if they were not agreeable to your opinion, put them out, and take other at your pleasure.

7 Also you had and held against the law in your owne house, a court of requests, and thereby did in-force diuerse the kings subjects to answer for their free holds and goods, and determined the same to the subuer-subuersion of the same lawes.

8 Also you being no officer, without the aduise of the counsell, or the more part of them, did dispose of the offices of the kings gift for monie, and granted leases and wards of the kings, and gaue presentations to the kings benefices and bishopricks, hauing no authoritie so to do. And further, you did meddle with the selling of the kings lands.

9 Also you commanded multiplication and alteration to be practised to abuse the kings coine.

10 Also you caused a proclamation to be made concerning inclosures, whereby the common people haue made diuerse insurrections, and leued open war, and disreined and spoiled diuerse of the kings subjects, which proclamation went forth against the will of the whole counsell.

11 Also you haue caused a commission with certaine articles thereunto annexed, to be made out concerning inclosures of commons, high waies, decaying of cottages, and diuerse other things, giuing the commissioners authoritie to heare and determine the same causes, to the subuersion of the lawes and statutes of this realme: whereby much sedition, insurrection, and rebellion haue risen and growne among the kings subjects.

12 Also you haue suffered the rebels and traitors to assemble and to lie in campe and armes against the king, his nobles, and gentlemen, without anie speedie subduing or repressing of them.

13 Also you did comfort and encourage diuerse of the said rebels, by giuing of them diuerse sums of your owne monie, and by promising to diuerse of them, fees, rewards, and seruices.

14 Also you in fauor of the said rebels did against the lawes cause a proclamation to be made, that none of the said rebels and traitors should be sued or veried by anie person, for anie their offenses in the said rebellion, to the cleare subuersion of the same lawes.

15 Also you haue said in time of the rebellion, that you liked well the doings and proceedings of the said rebels and traitors, and said that the countenance of the gentlemen gaue occasion to the common people to rise: saying also, that better it is for the commons to die, than perish for lacke of liuing.

16 Also you said that the lords of the parlement were loth to incline themselves to reformation of inclosures and other things: therefore the people had god cause to reforme the things themselves.

17 Also you after the report and declaration of the defaults and lacks reported to you by such as did surueie Bullongne and the peeces there, would neuer amend the same defaults.

18 Also you would not suffer the peeces beyond the seas, called Pewhauen and Blacknesse, to be furnished with men and vittels; although you were aduertised of the defaults therein by the captains of the same peeces and others, and were thereto aduertised by the kings counsell: whereby the french king being the kings open enemy, was encouraged and comforted to win the said peeces, to the kings great losse, and dishonour of his realme.

19 Also you declared and published vntrulie, as well to the kings maiestie, as other the young lords attendant vpon his graces person, that the lords of the counsell at London minded to destruye the king, and you required the king neuer to forget it, but to reuenge it: and likewise you required the young lords to put the king in remembrance thereof, to the intent to make sedition & discord betwene the king and his lords.

20 Also where the kings maiestie p'suite counsell, of their loue and zeale that they did beare vnto the king and his realme, did consult at London to haue communed with you, to the intent to moue you charitable to amend your doings and misgouernment: you hearing of the said assemblee, did cause to be declared by letters in diuerse places the said lords to be high traitors to the king, to the great disturbance of the realme.

And thus much for these troubles of the lord protector, and articles against him objected; to the end, as was doubted, that the same should haue cost him his life. But such was the pleasure of almighty God, disposing mens hearts as seemeth to him best, that at length, to wit, the first of februarye next, he was deliuered; and that night he supped at sir John Poyes one of the shiriffes of London, also the proclamation before set forth against him was reuoked & called in. And thus being againe restored, though not to his former office, yet vnto libertie, he continued therein for the space of two yeares and two daies, till new troubles (as after shall appeare) chanced to him, which as they were too heauie for him either to cast off, or carrie aboate; so were his lovers more readie to aggravate his burthen, than willing to ease him anie waie of the weight. So that this his exaltation & raising to dignitie, in respect of the short continuance thereof, as also for the enuie therewith it was assailed, had bene better not to haue happened, than with such infelicitie in so short a time to haue ended. But this fall from honor & advancement with losse of life (than the which nothing more p'etious, nothing more delicious) graued him the lesse: because he might perceiue (as some suspected) that rather of enuie than otherwise (referring the course of Gods iudgement and vengeance to the secrecie of his owne counsels) the same was deuised, prosecuted, & finally practised;

The seventeenth of October, king Edward came from Hampton court to his place in Southwiche, and there dined, and after dinner he made maister Poyes one of the shiriffes knight, and then rode thorough the citie to Westminster. The lord mayor of London for this yeare named sir Rowland Hill, was a man of great charitie and compassion, euent and effectuell testimonies whereof he hath left in the world; some of whose good deeds partlie in his remembrance & partlie for others example are before us recorded. This man caused to be made a causeis, commonlie called Querlanc pauement in the high waie from Stone to Pantwiche, in length foure miles, for horse and man, with diuerse lanes on both sides the same causeis. He caused likewise a causeis to be made from Dunchurch to Branfen in Warwickshire, more than two miles of length, and gaue twentie pounds in monie towards the making of Roitton bridge, three miles from Countreie. He made the high waie to Kilborne nere to London. He made foure bridges, two of them of stone, containing eightene arches in them both, the one ouer the riuer of Senerne, called Achambridge; the other Ternebridge, for that the water of Terne runneth vnder it; the other two of timber at Stoke, and built a good part of Stoke church. He builded one notable free schole at Draiton in Shropshire, with maister and other, and sufficient stipends for them both, besides conuenient lodgings for the same. He also purchased a free faire to the said towne, with a free market wakelie, & also a free market for cattell euerie forerene daies. He gaue to the hospitall of Christs church in London in his life time five hundred pounds in readie monie, and a hundred pounds at his deceasse.]

But now to retorne to other doings. Whilste these huris and tumults were in hand, to the danger of the whole state, the wars against the Scots were nothing followed, according to the former purposed meaning of the counsell: so that it seemed necessarie to giue ouer the keeping of Haddington, the same being in deed more chargeable (as was thought) than profitable, sith the garrison there could not be bittled but with a great power to conduct the cariages in safetie, the enimies being still readie to take their advantage to distresse them upon anie opportunitie offered. It was therefore resolved, that the earle of Rutland should go thither to see the fortifications raised, and to conduct from thence the men & ordinance in safetie home into England. Whereupon the said earle with the Almans, and other souldiours then remaining on the borders, marched thither, and caused the bulwarks, rampiers, and trenches to be raised and filled flat with the ground, and bringing from thence all the men, artillerie and munition, bag and baggage returned unto Warwicke without encounter, in peaceable and quiet maner.

Shortlie after this, the kings maiestie called his high court of parlement, which began at Westminster, the foure and twentieth daie of November in this third yeare of his reigne, and there continued the same untill the first daie of Februarye next following, which was in the beginning of the fourth yeare of his reigne. And among other things there enacted and concluded, one statute was made for the punishment of rebels, and unlawfull assemblies: the which law was made by occasion of the late rebellion that happened in manner through the realme the yeare passed, & was not thought nor meant to haue touched anie noble man, speciallie such as the duke of Sumnerfet was, which after (as it shall appeare) it did, and by that statute he was condemned within two yeares next after.

The nineteenth of Januarie, sir John Russell lord pitie scale, was created earle of Bedford: and lord saint John Lord great master, was created earle of Wilshire: and sir William Paget, comptrolor of the kings house, was made lord Paget. On the same daie at night, were murdered by saint Dunstons church against the kings head without Newgate of London two capteins, that had serued the king of Bullongne and else where, the one was sir Peter Gambo, the other Filicirga. Which murder was committed by Charles Gauaro a Flemming, who came poss from Warwicke to do that act. On the morrow, he with three of his companie was taken in Smithfield by the lord Paget, and sent to Newgate, and the foure and twentieth of Januarie they were all foure, Charles Gauaro, Balthasar Gauaro, Nicholas Disalueron, and Francis Deualasco, had in a cart to Smithfield. And by the waie at the place where the murder was done, Charles Gauaro had his right hand stricken off on the cart wheele, and then all hanged in Smithfield; who being exhorted to reconcile himselfe to God and the world by confessing his fault, by repenting himselfe of the offense, and asking forgiveness, that he might with a disburthened conscience resigne his soule into the hands of God, obstinate and desperatlie answered, that he would neuer repent him of the deed.]

About the same time, monsieur de Thermes that succeeded monsieur de Delfe in gouernement as generall of the French forces in Scotland, came before Boughtrig, where he did so much by batterrie & other kinds of inforcement, that giuing an assault both with his Frenchmen and certeine Scots joined with him, the twentieth of Februarye, the fort was entered by fire force, and all within it either taken or slaine. Sir John Lutterell gouernour of that peece remained prisoner amongst the Frenchmen.

Whereouer, now after the end of the parlement, the earle of Warwicke, hauing then highest authoritie, and the rest of the lords of the counsell, calling to remembrance how the last yeare in the time of rebellion, the French king had entered Bullongnois, and wone diuerse of the English forts there, being of great importance for defense of the towne and countrie, the default whereof was imputed to the negligent gouernment of the lord protector: and for so much as they well vnderstood that the French king upon further practise had placed a capteine called the Keingraue, with diuerse regiments of Almaine lancequenets, and certeine ensignes also of Frenchmen, to the number of foure or five thousand at the towne of Pozguison, being the midwaie betwene Bullongne and Calis, to the great perill and danger as well of the countie of Bullongnois, as al of Calis, Gullines, and all the low countrie.

The king therefore for the defense of the said frontiers, caused all the strangers which had serued that yeare against the rebels, being to the number of two thousand, to be transported ouer the sea to the marches of Calis. And now at Christmas last past, by order of the said earle, and of the counsellors aforesaid, Francis earle of Huntington, and sir Edward Hastings his brother, sir James Croft, sir Leonard Chamberleine, and diuerse other capteins and souldiers, to the number of three thousand, were set ouer to the marches of Calis, to ioune with the said strangers, minding with as conuenient speed as they might, to remoue the campe, and otherwise to annoy the French. But in the meane time through the diligent trauell of certeine persons, speciallie of one Guidotti an Italian, and a Florentine borne, there was a motion made for a treatie to be had by certeine commissioners, appointed betwixt the kings of England and France, for the conclusion of some peace, vpon such reasonable conditions and articles as might be thought expedient for the present time; and to stand with the honoz and commoditie of both the princes.

This motion toke such effect, that about the seventh daie of Februarye, certeine commissioners, appointed for this treatie, that is to wit, John the earle of Bedford, the lord Paget, sir William Peter the kings chiefe secretarie, and sir John Mason, arrived at Calis: by reason of whose coming, the earle of Huntington, and the armie sent ouer before for the defense of the frontiers were countermanded from anie attempt, so that little or nothing was done in that voiage, sauing certeine skirmishes at diuerse times, not much materiall to be written of. These commissioners being thus arrived, passed from Calis to Bullongne, there to meet with the commissioners appointed for the French king, where as a certeine house was newlie erected for the said treatie to be had, which was vpon the side of Bullongne haueu next to France, where after diuerse meetings & conferences of the commissioners of either partie, a finall peace was at last concluded betwixt both the realmes. But chiefe among other things, for the restitution of Bullongne and Bullongnois to the Frenchmen, which were vpon certeine conditions following.

First, that the French king should yeld and paie to the king of England a certeine summe of monie, and the same to be paid at two payments, as it was then agreed: and for the same summe the king of England should render the towne of Bullongne, and all the forts thereto adjoining, which he then in-there found at the taking of the same to the French

French king sent into England for hostages and Clandosme his brother, the Vidame of Charters, and the duke de Aumale and others. And on S. Marthes daie next following, being the five and twentieth daie the Englishmen did deliver to the Frenchmen the possession of Bullongne, and the castles and forts in the countie of Bullogneis, according to the agree-the fifteenth daie next following the French king en-be, where he offered one great image of silver of our ladie in the church there, which was called our ladie church: the which image he had caused speciallie to be made in the honoz of the said ladie, and caused the same to be set up in the place where the like image before did stand, the which before was taken awaie by the Englishmen at the winning of the towne.

¶ On Candlemasse daie, William lord S. John earle of Willshire, lord great maister, and president of the counsell, was made lord treasurer. John Dudleie earle of Warwike, lord great chamberleine, was made lord great maister. William Parre mar-quesse of Northampton, was made lord great cham-berleine. Lord Wentworth was made lord cham-berleine of the household. Sir Anthonie Wingfield capitaine of the gard, was made comptrollor of the kings house. And sir Thomas Warcie knight, was made vicechamberleine & capitaine of the gard. And the earle of Arundell late lord chamberleine, with the earle of Southampton were put off the counsell, and commanded to keepe their houses in London.
¶ On the 10 of Februarie, one Bell a Suffolke man was hanged and quartered at Tyburne, for moving a new rebellion in Suffolke and Essex. This time, the lord mayo of London and the aldermen purchased all the libertie of Southwarke, which were in the kings hands.

¶ Some after the aforesaid agreement betwene England and France was concluded, upon the foze remembred capitulations, because of suspicion of displeasure and hatred that was thought to remaine betwene the earle of Warwike and the duke of Summerset, latelie before delivered out of the tower, a meane was found that their friendship should be renewed through alliance, and a marriage was concluded betwene the earle of Warwikes eldest sonne, and the duke of Summersets eldest daughter: the which marriage was solemnized at Shene, the king being then present. After the solemnitie of this marriage, there appeared outwardlie to the world great love and friendship betwene the duke and the earle, but by reason of carietales and flatterers, the love continued not long, howbeit manie did berie earnestlie with love and amitie to continue betwene them. ¶ About this time was a new rebellion in Kent, but it was soon suppressed, and certeine of the chiefe were apprehended and put to death, namelie Richard Lion, Goddard Coxrain, and Richard Ireland. This yeare was a parlement holden at Westmister, where among other things by the authoritie of the said parlement, priests children were made legitimate, and blurie for the loane of monie forbidden.]

¶ On wednesday in Whitsonweke, at a court of aldermen kept at the Guildhall, sir John Aliffe knight, and maister of Blackwell hall, was swozne alderman of the Widge ward without, to have iurifdication of the borough of Southwarke, and this was he the first alderman that ever was there, so made up the number of six and twentieth aldermen of London, whereas before that time had bene but five and twentie. Trinitie tearme was adourned till Michaelmasse, for that the gentlemen should keepe the commons from commotion. The eleventh of June being S. Barnabies daie, was kept solidaie all London over: and the same daie at night, the high altar in Paules church was pulled downe, and a table set where the altar stood, with a veile drawne beneath the steps; and on the sondaie next a communion was song at the same table; and shortly after all the altars in London were taken downe, and tables placed in their romes. This yeare was no this yeare mayo of London, and Kinner, created one notable freeshole at Tunbridge in Kent, wherein he brought up and nourished in learning great store of youth, as well bred in that shire, as brought from other countries adjoining. A noble act and corresponpoore almshouse people, nigh to the parish church of saint Helens within Bishopsgate of London, & gave land to the companie of the skinner in the same cite, amounting to the value of threescore pounds three shillings eight pence the yeare: for the which they be bound to paie twentie pounds to the scholemaister, and eight pounds to the vicer of his freeshole at weeke to the six poore almshouse people at S. Helens aforesaid, eight pence the pece wekelie, and five and twentie shillings foure pence the yeare in coles amongst them for ever.]

About this time there was at Feuertham in Kent a gentleman named Arden, most cruelle murthe-red and slaine by the procurement of his owne wife.
The which murther, for the horrible nature thereof, although otherwise it may seeme to be but a private matter, and therefore as it were impertinent to this hystorie, I have thought good to set it forth somewhat at large, having the instructions delivered to me by them, that have used some diligence to gather the true understanding of the circumstances. This Arden was a man of a tall and comelie personage, and matched in marriage with a gentlewoman, young, tall, and well favoured of shape and countenance, who chancing to fall in familiaritie with one possie a tailor by occupation, a blacke swart man, servant to the lord North, it happened this possie upon some mislaking to fall out with hir: but the being desirous to be in favour with him againe, sent him a paire of silver dice by one Adam Houle dwelling at the fleure de lice in Feuertham.

After which he resorted to hir againe, and oftentimes laie in Ardens house: in somuch that within two yeares after, he obtained such favour at hir hands, that he laie with hir, or (as the y terme it) kept hir, in abusing hir bodie. And although (as it was said) Arden perceived right well their mutuall familiaritie to be much greater than their honestie, yet because he would not offend hir, and so lose the benefit which he hoped to gaine at some of hir friends hands in bearing with hir lewenesse, which he might have lost if he should have fallen out with hir: he was contented to winke at hir filthie disobedience, and both permitted, and also invited possie verie often to lodge in his house. And thus it continued a good space, before any practise was begun by them against master Arden. She at length inflamed in love with Josbie, and loathing his husband, wished and after practised the meanes how to hasten his end.

There was a painter dwelling in Feuertham, who had skill of poisons, as was reported. She therefore demanded of him, whether it were true that he had such skill in that feat or not: And he denied not but that he had in deed. Pea (said she) but I would have such a one made, as should have most vehement and speedie operation to dispatch the eater thereof. That can I do (quoth he) and forthwith made her such a one, and willed her to put it into the bottome of a porrenger, & then after to powre milke on it. Which circumstance she forgetting, did cleane contrarie, putting in the milke first, and afterward the poison. Now master Arden purposing that daie to ride to Canturburie, his wife brought him his breakefast, which was wont to be milke and butter. He having received a spoonfull or two of the milke, mistooke the taste and colour thereof, and said to his wife, mistresse Ales what milke have you given me here? Wherewithall she tilted it over with her hand, saying, I wene nothing can please you. Then he took horse and road towards Canturburie, and by the waie fell into extreme purging upwards and downewards, and so escaped for that time.

After this, his wife fell in acquaintance with one Græne of Feuertham, servant to sir Anthonie Ager, from which Græne master Arden had wrested a peece of ground on the backside of the abbey of Feuertham, and there had blowes and great threats passed betwixt them about that matter. Therefore she knowing that Græne hated his husband, began to practise with him how to make him awaie, and concluded, that if he could get any that would kill him, he should have ten pounds for a reward. This Græne having doings for his master sir Anthonie Ager, had occasion to go by to London, where his master then laie, and having some charge by with him, desired one Bradshaw a goldsmith of Feuertham that was his neighbor, to accompany him to Grauesend, and he would content him for his pains. This Bradshaw, being a verie honest man, was content, and road with him. And when they came to Rainham downe, they chanced to see three or foure servingmen that were coming from Leeds: and therewith Bradshaw espied coming by the hill from Rochester, one blacke Will, a terrible cruell rusian with a sword and a buckler, and an other with a great staffe on his necke.

Then said Bradshaw to Græne: We are hapie that here cometh some companie from Leeds, for here cometh by against vs as murdering a kinaue as any is in England: if it were not for them we might chance hardlie to escape without losse of our monie and liues. Pea thought Græne (as he after confessed) such a one is for my purpose, and therefore asked: Which is he? Ponder is he quoth Bradshaw, the same that hath the sword and buckler: his name is blacke Will. Now know you that, said Græne? Bradshaw answered, I knew him at Bullongne, where we both serued, he was a soldier, and I was sir Richard Cauendishes man, and there he committed manie robberies and heinous murders on such as travelled betwixt Bullongne and France.

By this time the other companie of servingmen came to them, and they going all together, met with blacke Will and his fellow. The servingmen knew blacke Will, & saluting him, demanded of him whether he were the answerer: By his blood for his life was to sweare almost at euery word I know not, nor care not, but set by my staffe, and euen as it fall leth I go. If thou quoth they wilt go backe againe to Grauesend, we will giue thee thy supper. By his blood (said he) I care not, I am content, haue with you: and so he returned againe with them. Then blacke Will took acquaintance of Bradshaw, saying: fellowe Bradshaw how dost thou? Bradshaw unwilling to renew acquaintance, or to haue ought to doe with so shameles a rusian, said: Why do ye know me? Pea that I do (quoth he) did not we serue in Bullongne together? But ye must pardon me (quoth Bradshaw) for I haue forgotten you.

Then Græne talked with blacke Will, and said: When ye haue supped, come to mine hosts house at such a signe, and I will giue you the sacke and sugar. By his blood (said he) I thanke you, I will come and take it I warrant you. According to his promise he came, and there they made good cheare. Then blacke Will & Græne went and talked apart from Bradshaw, and there concluded together, that if he would kill master Arden, he should haue ten pounds for his labor. Then he answered, By his wounds that I will if I maie know him. Marie to morrow in Poules I will shew him the, said Græne. Then they left their talke, & Græne bad him go home to his hosts house. Then Græne wrote a letter to mistresse Arden, & among other things put in these words: We haue got a man for our purpose, we maie thanke my brother Bradshaw. Now Bradshaw not knowing any thing of this, took the letter of him, and in the morning departed home againe, and deliuered the letter to mistresse Arden, and Græne & blacke Will went by to London at the tide.

At the time appointed, Græne shewed blacke Will master Arden walking in Poules. Then said blacke Will, what is he that goeth after him? Marie said Græne, one of his men. By his blood (said blacke Will) I will kill them both. Pea (said Græne) do not so, for he is of counsell with vs in this matter. By his blood (said he) I care not for that, I will kill them both. Pea said Græne in any wise do not so. Then blacke Will thought to haue killed master Arden in Poules churchyard, but there were so manie gentlemen that accompanied him to dinner, that he misseled of his purpose. Græne shewed all this talke to master Ardens man, whose name was Michaele, which euer after stood in doubt of blacke Will, lest he should kill him. The cause that this Michaele conspired with the rest against his master, was: for that it was determined, that he should marrie a kinswomane of Josbies.

After this, master Arden laie at a certeine parsonage which he held in London, and therefore his man Michaele and Græne agreed, that blacke Will should come in the night to the parsonage, where he should find the doores left open, that he might come in and murder master Arden. This Michaele hauing his master to bed, left open the doores according to the appointment. His master then being in bed, asked him if he had shut fast the doores, and hee said yea: but yet afterwards, fearing lest blacke Will would kill him as well as his master, after he was in bed himselfe, he rose againe and shut the doores, bolting them fast. So that blacke Will coming thither, and finding the doores shut, departed, being disappointed at that time. The next daie blacke Will came to Græne in a great chafe, swearing and starting because he was so deceived, and with manie terrible oaths threatened to kill master Ardens man first, whereoeuer he met him. No (said Græne) do not so, I will first know the cause of shutting the doores.

Then Græne met and talked with Ardens man, and asked of him, why he did not leave open the doores, according to his promise? Marie (said Michaele) I will shew you the cause. My maister yesternight did that he neuer did before: for after I was in bed, he rose vp and shut the doores, and in the morning rated me for leauing them vnshut. And herewith Græne & blacke Will were pacified. Arden being redie to go homewards, his maid came to Græne & said: This night will my maister go doونه. Whereupon it was agreed that blacke Will should kill him on Keinam downe. When maister Arden came to Rochester, his man still fearing that blacke Will would kill him with his maister, picked his horse of purpose, and made him to halt, to the end he might protract the time, and tarie behind. His maister asked him why his horse halted, he said, I know not. Well (quoth his maister) when ye come at the smith here before (betwene Rochester and the hill foot ouer against Chetam) remove his shoe, and search him, and then come after me. So maister Arden rode on: and per he came at the place where blacke Will late in wait for him, there ouertooke him diuerse gentlemen of his acquaintance, who kept him companie: so that blacke Will mist here also of his purpose.

After that maister Arden was come home, he sent (as he vsuallie did) his man to Sheperie to sir Thomas Cheinie, then lord warden of the cinque ports, about certeine businesse, and at his coming alwaies, he had a letter deliuered sent by sir Thomas Cheinie to his maister. When he came home, his mistresse toke the letter and kept it, willing hir man to tell his maister, that he had a letter deliuered him by sir Thomas Cheinie, and that he had lost it; adding that he thought it best that his maister should go the next morning to sir Thomas, because he knew not the matter: he said he would, and therefore he willed his man to be stirring betimes. In this meane while, blacke Will, and one George Shakebag his companion, were kept in a storehouse of sir Anthoine Agers at Dzelton, by Grænes appointment: and thirther came mistresse Arden to see him, bringing and senting him meat and drinke manie times. He therfore lurking there, and watching some opportunitie for his purpose, was willed in anie wise to be vp earlie in the morning, to lie in wait for maister Arden in a certeine bosome close, betwixt Feuertham & the ferrie (which close he must needs passe) there to do his feat. Now blacke Will stirred in the morning betimes, but mist the waie, & taried in a wrong place.

Maister Arden & his man coming on their waie earlie in the morning towards Shornelan, where sir Thomas Cheinie late: as they were almost come to the bosome close, his man alwaies fearing that blacke Will would kill him with his maister, feined that he had lost his purse; Why said his maister, thou foolish knaue, couldst thou not looke to thy purse but lose it? What was in it? Three pounds said he. Why then go thy waies backe againe like a knaue (said his maister) and seeke it, for being so earlie as it is, there is no man stirring, and therefore thou maist be sure to find it, and then come and ouertake me at the ferrie. But neuerthelesse, by reason that blacke Will lost his way, maister Arden escaped yet once againe.
At that time, blacke Will yet thought he should haue bene sure to haue met him homewards: but whether that some of the lord wardens men accompanied him backe to Feuertham, or that being in doubt, for that it was late to go through the bosome close, and therefore toke another waie, blacke Will was disappointed then also.

But now saint Valentines faire being at hand, the conspirators thought to dispatch their diuelish intention at that time. Spolbie minded to picke some quarrell to maister Arden at the faire to fight with him; for he said he could not find in his heart to mur-ther a gentleman in that sort as his wife wished: although she had made a solemne promise to him, and he againe to hir, to be in all points as man and wife together, and thereupon they both receiued the sacrament on a sundaie at London, openlie in a church there. But this deuise to fight with him would not serue, for maister Arden both then and at other times had bene greatlie prouoked by Spolbie to fight with him, but he would not. Now Spolbie had a sister that dwelt in a tenement of maister Ardens nere to his house in Feuertham: and on the faire euen, blacke Will was sent for to come thither, and Græne bringing him thither, met there with mistresse Arden, accompanied with Michaell hir man, and one of hir maids. There were also Spolbie and George Shake-bag, and there they deuised to haue killed him in maner as afterwards he was. But yet Spolbie at the first would not agree to that cowardlie murdering of him, but in a furie slong awaie, and went by the abbie street toward the flower de lice, the house of the aforesaid Adam Foule, where he did often host. But before he came thither now at this time, a messenger ouertooke him, that was sent from mistress Arden, desiring him of all lones to come backe againe to helpe to accomplish the mater he knew of.

Whereupon he returned to his againe, and at his com-ming backe, she fell downe vpon his knees to him, and besought him to go through with the matter, as if he loued hir he would be content to do, sith as she had diuerse times told him, he needed not to doubt, for there was not anie that would care for his death, nor make anie great inquirie for them that should dispatch him.

Thus she being earnest with him, at length he was contented to agree vnto that horrible deuise, and thereupon they conueied blacke Will into maister Ardens house, putting him into a closet at the end of his parlour. Before this, they had sent out of the house all the seruants, those excepted which were pruiue to the deuised murder. Then went Spolbie to the doze, and there stood in a night gowne of silke gir-ded about him, and this was betwixt six and seven of the clocke at night. Maister Arden hauing bene at a neighbors house of his, named Dumphin, & hauing cleared certeine reckonings betwixt them, came home: and finding Spolbie standing at the doze, asked him if it were supper time: I thinke not (quoth Spolbie) it is not yet readie. Then let vs go and plaie a game at the tables in the meane season, said maister Arden. And so they went straight into the parlor: and as they came by through the hall, his wife was walking there, and maister Arden said: How now mistresse Ales? But she made small answer to him.
In the meane time one cheined the wicket doze of the entrie. When they came into the parlor, Spolbie sat downe on the bench, hauing his face toward the place where blacke Will stood. When Michaell maister Ardens man stood at his masters backe, holding a candle in his hand, to shadow blacke Will, that Arden might by no meanes perceiue him comming forth. In their plate Spolbie said thus (which seemed to be the watchword for blacke Wills comming forth) Now make I take you fir if I will. Take me (quoth maister Arden) which waie: With that blacke Will stepped forth, and cast a towell about his necke, so to stop his breath and strangle him. Then Spolbie hauing at his girdle a pelling iron of fourteen pounds weight, stroke him on the hed with the same, so that he fell downe, and gaue a great grone, insomuch that they thought he had bene killed.

Then they bare him awaie, to laie him in the counting house, & as they were about to laie him downe, Arden sent the pangs of death comming on him, he gaue a outcrie led him out of his house, laid him along, toke the monie out of his purse, and the rings from his fingers, and then comming out of the counting house, said; Now the feat is done, give me my monie. So mistres Arden gaue him ten pounds: and he comming to Greene, had a horse of him, and so rode his waies.

After that blacke Will was gone, mistresse Arden came into the counting house, and with a knife gaue him seven or eight picks into the breast. Then they made cleene the parlor, toke a clout, and wiped where it was bloudie, and strewed againe the rushes that were shuffed with strugling, and cast the clout with which they wiped the blood, and the knife that was bloudie, wherewith she had wounded hir husband, into a tub by the wels side; where afterwards both the same clout and knife were found. Thus this wicked woman, with hir complices, most shamefullie murdered hir owne husband, who most entirlye loued hir all his life time. Then she sent for two Londoners to supper, the one named Paine, and the other Cole, that were grocers, which before the murder was committed, were bidden to supper. When they came, she said: I maruell where maister Arden is; we will not tarie for him, come ye and sit downe, for he will not be long. Then Polbie sister was sent for, she came and sat downe, and so they were merie.

Arden's murder
was committed parlor.

After supper, mistres Arden caused hir daughter to plaie on the virginals, and they danted, and she with them, and so seemed to protract time as it were; till maister Arden should come, and she said, I maruell where he is so long; well, he will come anon I am sure, I praie you in the meane while let vs plaie a game at the tables. But the Londoners said, they must go to their host's house, or else they should be shut out at doores, and so taking their leaue, departed. When they were gone, the seruants that were not partie to the murder, were sent abroad into the towne; some to seeke their maister, and some of other errands, all sauing Michaell and a maid, Polbie's sister, and one of mistres Ardens owne daughters. When they toke the dead bodie, and caried it out, to laie it in a field next to the church-yard, and joining to his garden wall, through the which he went to the church. In the meane time it began to snow, and when they came to the garden gate, they remembered that they had forgotten the key, and one went in for it, and finding it, at length brought it, opened the gate, and caried the corps into the same field, as it were ten paces from the garden gate, and laid him downe on his backe streight in his night gowne, with his slippers on: and betwene one of his slippers and his foot, a long rusty or two remained. When they had thus laid him downe, they returned the same way they came through the garden into the house.

They being returned thus backe againe into the house, the doores were opened, and the seruants returned home that had bene sent abroad: and being now verie late, she sent forth hir folks againe to make inquirie for him in diuerse places; namelye, among the best in the towne where he was wont to be, who made answer, that they could tell nothing of him. When she began to make an outcrie, and said; Fewer woman had such neighbors as I haue, and herewith wept: in somuch that hir neighbors came in, and found hir making great lamentation, pretending to maruell what was become of hir husband. Whereupon, the maior and others came to make search for him. The faire was wont to be kept partlie in the towne, and partlie in the abbey; but Arden for his owne priuat lucre & couetous gaine had this present yeare procured it to be wholie kept within the abbey ground which he had purchased; & so reaping all the gaires to himselfe, and breauing the towne of that portion which was wont to come to the inhabitants, got manie a bitter curse. The maior going about the faire in this search, at length came to the ground where Arden laie: and as it happened, Paine the groser getting sight of him, first said; Staie, for me thinke I see one lie here. And so they looking and beholding the bodie, found that it was maister Arden, lieng there throughlie dead, and viewing diligentlie the manner of his bodie & hurts, found the rushes sticking in his slippers, and marking further, espied certaine footsteps, by reason of the snow, betwixt the place where he laie, and the garden doze.

Arden's dead bodie is described by one of his acquaintances.

Then the maior commanded euerie man to staie, and herewith appointed some to go about, & to come in at the inner side of the house through the garden as the waie laie, to the place where maister Ardens dead bodie did lie; who all the waie as they came, perceiued footings still before them in the snow: and so it appeared plainlie that he was brought along that waie from the house through the garden, and so into the field where he laie. Then the maior and his companie that were with him went into the house, and knowing hir euill demeanour in times past, examined hir of the matter: but she desired them and said, I would you should know I am no such woman. When they examined hir seruants, and in the examination, by reason of a peece of his beate and blood found nere to the house in the waie, by the which they caried him forth, and likewise by the knife with which she had thrust him into the breast, and the clout wherewith they wiped the blood awaie which they found in the tub, into the which the same were shrowen; they all confessed the matter, and hir selfe beholding hir husbands blood, said; Oh the blood of God helpe, for this blood haue I shed.

A peece of Ardens beate and in the house espied, as also a bloudie knife and a clout found.

Then were they all attached, and committed to prison, and the maior with others went presentlie to the flower de lice, where they found Polbie in bed: and as they came towards him, they espied his hose and purse stained with some of maister Ardens blood. And when he asked what they meant by their comming in such sort, they said; See, here ye may vnderstand wherefore, by these tokens, shewing him the blood on his hose and purse. Then he confessed the deed, and so he and all the other that had conspi-red the murder, were apprehended and laid in prison, except Greene, blacke Will, and the painter, which painter and George Shakebag, that was also shed before, were neuer heard of. Shortlye were the sessions kept at Feuerham, where all the prisoners were arraigned and condemned. And thereupon being examined whether they had anie other complices, mistres Arden accused Bradshaw, upon occasion of the letter sent by Greene from Greanes end, (as before ye haue heard) which words had none other meaning, but onelie by Bradshaws describing of blacke Wills qualities; Greene iudged him a mate instrument for the execution of their pretended murder. Whereto notwithstanding (as Greene confessed at his death certeine yeares after) this Bradshaw was neuer made partie; howbeit, he was upon this accusation of mistres Arden, immediatlie sent for to the sessions, and indicted, and declaration made against him, as a procurer of blacke Will to kill maister Arden, which proceeded wholie by misvnderstanding of the words contained in the letter which he brought from Greene.

rie truth of the matter, and vpon that occasion he told Greene of blacke Will: neuerthelesse, he was condemned, and suffered. These condemned persons were diuerlie executed in sundrie places, for Michaele maister Ardens man was hanged in chaires at Feuerham, and one of the maids was burnt there, pitifullie bewailing hir case, and cried out on hir mistres that had brought hir to this end, for the which she would neuer forgive hir. Spodie & his sister were hanged in Smithfield at London; mistres Arden was burned at Canturburie the foure and twentieth of March. Greene came againe certaine yeares after, was apprehended, condem- ned, & hanged in chaires in the high waie betwixt Wping & Boughton against Feuerham; blacke Will was burnt on a scaffold at Flushing in Ze- land. Adam Foule that dwelt at the foure de lice in Feuerham was brought into trouble about this matter, and caried vpon to London, with his legs bound vnder the horse bellie, and committed to pri- son in the sparthalle: for that Spodie was heard to saie; Had it not bene for Adam Foule, I had not come to this trouble: meaning that the bringing of the siluer dice for a token to him from mistresse Ar- den, as ye haue heard, occasioned him to renew fa- miliaritie with hir againe. But when the matter was throughlie ripped vp, & that Spodie had cleared him, protesting that he was neuer of knowledge in anie behalfe to the murder, the mans innocencie preferred him.

This one thing seemeth verie strange and nota- ble, touching maister Arden, that in the place where he was laid, being dead, all the propozition of his bo- die might be seene two yeares after and moze, so plaine as could be, for the grasse did not grow there his bodie had touched: but betwene his legs, be- twene his armes, and about the hollownesse of his necke, and round about his bodie, and where his legs, armes, head, or anie other part of his bodie had touched, no grasse grewed at all of all that time. So that manie strangers came in that meane time, be- side the townesmen, to see the print of his bodie there on the ground in that field. Which field he had (as some haue reported) most cruellie taken from a woman, that had bene a widow to one Coke, and after married to one Richard Head a mariner, to the great hinderance of hir and hir husband the said Head: for they had long inioied it by a lease, which they had of it for manie yeares, not then expired: neuerthelesse, he got it from them. For the which, the said Heads wife not onelie exclaimed against him, in theading manie a salt teere, but also cursed him most bitterlie euen to his face, wishing manie a vengeance to light vpon him, and that all the world might wonder on him. Which was thought then to come to passe, when he was thus murdered, and laie in that field from midnight till the morning: and so all that daie, being the faire daie till night, all the which daie there were manie hundreds of people came wondering about him. And thus far touching this horrible and heinous murder of maister Arden. So returne then where we left.

About this time the kings maiestie calling his high court of parlement, held the same at West- minster the thre and twentieth daie of Januarie, in this fift yere of his reigne, and there continued it, untill the fiftenth daie of Aprill in the sixt yere of his said reigne. In this parlement the booke of com- mon prayer, which in some part had bene corrected and amended, was newlie confirmed & established. ¶ In the end of this parlement, namelie the fiftenth of Aprill the infectious sweating sickness began at Spewesburie, which ended not in the north part of England untill the end of September. In this space what number died, it cannot be well accounted: but certeine it is, that in London in few daies nine hundred and sixtie gaue vp the ghost. It began in London the ninth of Iulie, and the twelfth of Iulie it was most vehement: which was so terrible, that people being in best helth, were suddentlie taken, and dead in foure and twentie houres, and twelue, or lesse, for lacke of skill in guiding them in their sweat. And it is to be noted, that this mortalitie fell chiefly 10 or rather vpon men, and those also of the best age, as betwixen thirtie & fortie yeers. The speedie riddance of life procured by this sickness, did so terrifie people of all sorts, that such as could make shift, either with monie or frendship, changed their soile, and leaving places of concourse, betooke them (for the time) to a- bodes, though not altogether solitarie, yet lesse frequented: to conclude, manifold means were made for safetie of life. The first weeke died in Lon- don eight hundred persons.

The manner of this sweat was such, that if men did take anie cold outwarlie, it stroke the sweat in, and immediatlie killed them. If they were suffered to sleepe, commonlie they swooned in their sleepe and departed, or else died immedi- 20 lie vpon their waking. But the waie to escape dan- ger was close keeping moderatlie with some alee and a little drinke, and the same to be posset-ale, and so to keepe them thirtie houres, & then was the dan- ger past; but beware of sudden cold. Before men 30 had learned the manner of keeping, an infinit num- ber perished. This disease at that time followed Englishmen & none other nation; for in Antwerpe and other countries, our Englishmen being there a- mongst diuerse other nations, onelie our English- men were sicke thereof, and none other persons. The consideration of which thing made this nation much afraid thereof, who for the time began to repent and giue almes, and to remember God from whom that plague might well seeme to be sent among vs. But 40 as the disease in time ceased, so our deuotion in short time decayed. At this time also the king with the ad- uise of his priuie counsell, and hauing also great conference with merchants and others, perceiuing that by such coins and copper monies, as had bene coined in the time of the king his father, and now were commonlie currant in the realme; and indeed a great number of them not worth halfe the value that they were currant at, to the great dishono- 50 of the kings maiestie & the realme, and to the deceit & no little hinderance of all the kings maiesties god subiects, did now purpose not onelie the abasing of the said copper monies, but also meant wholie to re- duce them to bullion, to the intent to deliuer fine and good monies for them. And therefore in the mo- neth of Iulie by his graces proclamation, he abased the peece of twelue pence, commonlie called a tes- ton vnto nine pence, and the peece of foure pence vnto thre pence. And in August next following, the peece of nine pence was abased to six pence, and the peece of thre pence vnto two pence, and the pennie 60 to an halfe pennie.

On the eleuenth daie of October, there was a great creation of dukes and earles, as the lord mar- quesse Dorset was created duke of Suffolke, the earle of Warwike made duke of Northumberland, and the earle of Wiltshire made marquesse of Win- chester, & sir William Herbert maister of the house; he also made William Cicill his secretarie knight, maister John Cheke one of his scholemaisters knight, maister Henrie Doble knight, & maister Henrie Reuill knight. The sixteenth daie of the said moneth being fridaie, the duke of Summerfet was againe apprehended, & his wife also, & committed to the tower; with him also were comitted sir Michaele Stanboye,

Stanhope, Sir Thomas Arundell, Sir Kase Mene, Sir Spiles Partridge & other for suspicion of treason and felonie, whereof they were all thortis after indicted.
And so standing indicted, the second daie of December next following, the said duke was brought out of the tower of London with the ar of the tower borne before him, with a great number of billes, gleaves, halberds & pollaxes attending upon him, & so came into Westminster hall, where was made in the middle of the hall a new scaffold, where all the lords of the kings counsell sate as his iudges: and there was he arraigned and charged with manie articles both of felonie and treason. And when after much mild speech he had answered not guiltie, he in all humble manner put himselfe to be tried by his pères: who after long consultation among themselves, gaue their verdict that he was not guiltie of the treason, but of the felonie. The people there present (which was a great number) hearing the lords saie not guiltie, which was to the treason, thinking most certeinlie that he was cleerlie acquitted; and chieldie for that immediatlie upon the pronouncing of those wordes, he that carried the ar of the tower departed with the ar, they made such an outcrie and ioie, as the like hath not bene heard. Which was an evident declaration of their good willes and hartie fauours unto him, whose life they greatlie desired to haue saved, for that he had deserued right well of most (though the good gentleman had some priuat enimies) and had bene as a man maie iustlie saie:

Solamen magnam patrie, solamen amicis.

But neuerthelesse, he was condemned to the death, whereof thortlie after he tasted. The felonie that he was condemned of, was upon the statute made the last peare against rebelles, and unlawfull assemblies, wherein amongst other things is one branch, that whosoever shall procure the death of anie counsellor, that enerie such attempt or procurement shall be felonie. And by force of that statute, the duke of Summerfet, being accompanied with certaine others, was charged that he purposed and attempted the death of the duke of Northumberland, the lord marquisse, the lord of Penbroke, and others of the privie counsell, which by statute was felonie.

After the duke was thus condemned, he was againe returned to the tower, and landed at the crane of the vinetree, and so passed through London, where were both exclamations: the one cried for ioie that he was acquitted, the other cried out that he was condemned. But howsoever they cried, he was convicted to the tower of London, where he remained untill the two and twentieth daie of Januarie next following. The duke being condemned (as is aforesaid) the people spake diuerlie, and murmured against the duke of Northumberland, and against some other of the lords, for the condemnation of the said duke: and also (as the common fame went) the kings maiestie toke it not in good part. Wherefore as well to remoue fond talke out of mens mouths, as also to recreate and refresh the troubled spirits of the yong king; who (as saith Grafton) seemed to take the trouble of his vncke somewhat heauilie: it was deuised, that the feast of Christs nativitie, com-monlie called Christmasse then at hand, should be solemnlie kept at Greenwich with open household, and franke resort to court (which is called keeping of the hall) what time of old ordinarie course there is alwaies one appointed to make sport in the court, called commonlie lord of misrule: whose office is not unknowne to such as haue bene brought up in noble mens houses, and among great house-keepers, which be liberall feasting in that season. There was therefore by order of the counsell, a wise gentleman & learned named George Ferrers, appointed to that office for this peare; who being of better credit & estimation than commonlie his predecessors had bene before, receiued all his commissions and warrants by the name of the maister of the kings pastimes: Which gentleman so well supplied his office, both in the w of sundrie sights and deuises of rare inuentions, and in act of diuerse interludes, and matters of pastime plaid by persons, as not onelic satisfied the common sort, but also were verie well liked and alloued by the counsell, and other of skill in the like pastimes: but best of all by the yong king himselfe, as appeared by his princelie liberalitie in rewarding that seruice.

¶ On mondaie the fourth of Januarie, the said lord of merie disposits came by water to London, Abr. Fl. ex I. Stow 1055. and landed at the tower wharffe, entred the tower, and then rode through tower street, where he was receiued by Maister lord of misrule to John Hainard one of the shiriffes of London, and so conducted through the citie with a great companie of yong lords & gentlemen to the house of Sir George Warne lord maior, where he with the chiefe of his companie dined, and after had a great banquet: and at his departure, the lord maior gaue him a standing cup with a couer of silver and guilt of the value of ten pounds for a reward, and also set a hogshed of wine, and a barrell of beere at his gate, for his traine that followed him. The residue of his gentlemen & ser-uants dined at other aldermens houses, and with the shiriffes, and then departed to the tower wharffe againe, & so to the court by water, to the great commendation of the maior and aldermen, and highlie accepted of the king and counsell.]

This Christmas being thus passed and spent with much mirth and pastime, wherewith the minds and eares of murmurers were metlie well appeased, according to a former determination as the sequele shewed: it was thought now good to proceed to the execution of the iudgement giuen against the duke of Summerfet, touching his conuiction & attendoz of the felonie before mentioned. Whereupon, the two and twentieth daie of Januarie, then next following being fridaie, he was brought out of the tower, and according to the manner, deliuered to the shiriffes of London; and so with a great compa-nie of the gard & others with weapons, was brought to the scaffold where he should suffer, without changing either voice or countenance, other than he was accustomed to vse at other times.

The same morning earelie, the counsellables of e-uerie ward in London (according to a precept directed from the counsell to the maior) straitlie charged euerie household of the same citie, not to depart anie of them out of their houses, before ten of the clocke of that daie: meaning thereby to restraine the great number of people that otherwise were like to haue ben at the said execution. Notwithstanding, by season of the clocke, the tower hill was couered with a great multitude, repairing from all parts of the ci-tie, as well as out of the suburbs. And before eight of the clocke, the duke was brought to the scaffold, inclosed with the kings gard, the shiriffes officers, the warders of the tower, & other with halberds: where as he nothing changing neither voice or countenance, but in a manner with the same gesture which he commonlie vsed at home, kneeling downe upon both his knees, and lifting up his hands, commended himselfe vnto God. After he had ended a few short prayers, standing vp againe, and turning himselfe toward the east side of the scaffold, nothing at all abashed (as it seemed vnto those that stood by) neither with the sight of the ar, neither yet of the hangman, nor of present death, but with the like alacritie and cheerfulness of mind and countenance as before times

at his death.

Derelie beloued friends, I am brought hither to suffer death, albeit I neuer offended against the king, neither by word nor deed, and haue bene alwaies as faithfull and true vnto this realme, as anie man hath bene. But forsomuch as I am by law condemned to die, I do acknowledge my selfe as well as others, to be subiect thereto. Wherefore to testifie mine obedience which I owe vnto the lawes, I am come hither to suffer death, whereunto I willingly offer my selfe with most hartie thanks vnto God, that hath giuen me this time of repentance, who might thorough sudden death haue taken awaie my life, that I neither should haue acknowledged him nor my selfe.

Whereouer (derelie beloued friends) there is yet somewhat that I must put you in mind of, as touching christian religion, which so long as I was in authoritie, I alwaies diligentlie set forth, and furthered to my power. Neither do I repent me of my doings, but reioice therein, sith now the state of christian religion cometh most nere vnto the forme and order of the primitive church. Which thing I esteeme as a great benefit giuen of God, both to you and me, most hartlie exhorting you all, that this which is most purelie set forth vnto you, you will with like thankfulness accept and embrace, and set out the same in your liuing: which thing if you do not, without doubt, greater mischief and calamitie will follow.

Great feare among the people assembled on the tower hill.
Rich. Grafton.
John Stow.

When he had spoken these wordes, suddenlie there was a great noise heard, whereupon the people were straightwaye into a great feare, few or none knowing the cause. Wherefore I thinke it good to write what I saw (saith John Stow) concerning that matter. The people of a certeine hamlet which were warned to be there by seauen of the clocke to giue their attendance on the lieutenant, now came thorough the posterne, and perceiuing the duke to be already on the scaffold, the foremost began to run, crying to their fellows to follow fast after. Which suddenness of these men, being weaponed with bills and halberds, & this running caused the people which first saw them, to thinke some power had come to haue rescued the duke from execution, and therefore cried Awaie awaie. Whereupon the people ran, some one waie, some an other, manie fell into the tower ditch, and they which tarried, thought some pardon had bene brought: some said it thundered, some that the ground moued, but there was no such matter.

Abr. Fl. ex lo. Foxi martyrologio.

This amazement of the people is in other wordes recorded by John Fox in the storie of this dukes troubles & death: which because they be effectually I thinke good to interlace. When the duke had ended his speech (saith he) suddenlie there was a terrible noise heard:

whereupon there came a great feare on all men. This noise was as it had bene the noise of a great storme or tempest, which to some seemed to be heard from a boue: like as if a great deale of gunpowder being inclosed in an armorie, and hauing caught fire, had violently broken out. But to some againe it seemed as though it had bene a great multitude of horsemen running together, or coming vpon them; such a noise was then in the eares of all men, albeit they saw nothing. Whereby it happened, that all the people being amazed without any evident cause, and without anie violence or stroke stricken, they ran awaie, some into the ditches and puddles, and some into the houses thereabout. Other some being affraid with the honour and noise, fell doloure grouelling vnto the ground with their pollaxes & halberds, and most part of them cried out: Iesus saue vs, Iesus saue vs. Those which tarried still in their places, for feare knew not where they were. And I myselfe which was there present among the rest, being also affraid in this hurly burly, stood still altogether amazed, looking when anie man would knocke me on the head. It happened here, as the euangelists write, it did to Christ, when the officers of the high priests & Phariseis coming with weapons to take him, being astonished ran backe, & fell to the ground.

In the meane time, whilst these things were thus in doing, the people by chance spied one sir Anthony Browne riding vnto the scaffold: which was the occasion of a new noise. For when they saw him coming, they coniectured that which was not true, but notwithstanding which they all wished for, that the king by that messenger had sent his uncle pardon: and therefore with great reioicing and casting by their caps, they cried out: Pardon, pardon is come: God saue the king. Thus this good duke, although he was destitute of all mans helpe, yet he saw before his departure, in how great loue and fauour he was with all men. And trulie I do not thinke, that in so great slaughter of dukes as hath bene in England within this few yeares, there was so manie weeping eyes at one time: and not without cause. For all men did see in the decaye of this duke, the publicke ruine of all England, except such as indeed perceiued nothing. The duke in the meane time standing still, both in the same place and mind wherein he was before, shaking his cap which he held in his hand, made a signe vnto the people that they should keepe themselves quiet: which thing being done, & silence obtained, he spake to them the second time in this maner.

The second speech of the duke of Summerfet to the people.

Derelie beloued friends, there is no such matter in hand, as you baineie hope or beleue. It seemeth thus good to almightie God, whose ordinance it is met & necessarie that we be all obedient vnto. Wherefore I praie you all to be quiet, and without tumult: for I am euen now quiet, and let vs soine in praier vnto the Lord, for the preservation of our noble king, vnto whose maiestie I wish continually health, with all felicitie and abundance & all manner of prosperous successe: whereunto the people cried out, Amen. Whereouer, I wish vnto all his counsellors the grace and fauour of God, whereby they may rule althings brightlie with iustice, vnto whome I exhort you all in the Lord to shew your selues obedient, the which is also also verie necessarie for you, vnder the paine of condemnation, and also most profitable for the preservation and safegard of the kings maiestie. And forsomuch as heretofore I haue had oftentimes affaires with diuers men: that it is hard to please euerie man that hath bene offended or injured by me, I most humbly require and aske them forgiveness: but especiallie almighty God, whome thoroughout all my life I haue most greivously offended. And vnto all other, whatsoeuer they be that haue offended me, I doe with my whole heart forgive them.

And once againe (dearely beloued in the Lord) I require that you will keepe your selues quiet and still, least thorough your tumult you might cause me to haue some trouble, which in this case would nothing at all profit me, neither be anie pleasure vnto you. For albeit the spirit be willing and readie, the flesh is fraile and wauering, and thorough your quietnesse I shall be much more the quieter: but if that you fall vnto tumult, it will be great trouble & no gaine at all vnto you. Whereouer, I desire you to beare me witnesse, that I die here in the faith of Iesus Christ, desiring you to helpe me with your prayers, that I maie perseuere constant in the same vnto my liues end.

Then he turning himselfe about knéled downe vpon his knees, vnto whome docto: Cor, which was there present, to counsell and aduertise him, deliuered a certaine scroll into his hand, wherein was contained a brieue confession to God. Which being read, he stood vp againe on his feet, without anie trouble of mind as it appeared, and first had the shirffes farrowell, then the lieutenant of the tower, & certeine other that were on the scaffold, taking them all by the hands. Then he gaue the executioner monie, which done, he put off his gowne, and knéling downe againe in the straw, untied his shirt strings: and then the executioner comming to him, turned downe his collar round about his necke, and all other things which did let and hinder him. Then he couering his face with his owne handkerchiefe, lifting vp his eyes vnto heauen, where his onely hope remained, laid himselfe downe along, shewing no manner of trouble or feare; neither did his countenance change, but that before his eyes were covered there began to appeare a red colour in the middell of his cheeks.

Thus this most meeke and gentle duke lieng along and looking for the stroke, because his doublet couered his necke he was commanded to rise vp and put it off: & then laieng himselfe downe againe vpon the blocke, and calling thus vpon the name of Iesus, laieng: Lord Iesu saue me, as he was the third time repeating the same, euen as the name of Iesu was in uttering, in a moment he was bereft both of head and life; and slept in the Lord Iesus, being taken awaite from all the dangers and euils of this life, and resting now in the peace of God: in the preferment of whose trusty and gospell he alwaies shewed himselfe an excellent instrument and member, and therefore hath receiued the reward of his labours. Thus gentle reader thou hast the true historie of this worthy and noble duke, and if anie man report it otherwise, let it be counted as a lie.

This duke was in high fauour and estimation with king Henrie the eight, of whome he receiued sundrie high & great preferments, by reason that the said king had married ladie Jane his sister, by whome he had issue king Edward the first. He was not onely courtous, wise and gentle, being daile attendant at the court; but forward and fortunate in seruice abroad, as may well appeare in his sundrie volages, both into France and Scotland. He was of nature verie gentle and pitifull, not blemished by any thing so much, as by the death of the admerall his naturall brother, which could not haue bene brought to passe in that sort, without his consent. But of this good duke (to let passe multitude of wordes) maister Fox hath written no lesse tralie than commendable, & no lesse commendable than deservedlie, and no lesse deservedlie than profitable in his historie, whereto I refer the reader for further knowledge. Neuerthelesse of this vertuous duke by waie of application I saie as sometime one said (verie aptlie as some thinke) of the gracions ladie An Bullen,

Disce vos viui, quid dira calumnia possit, Invidia alterius vita comes arcta beate, Et falsis lingua commissa venena susurrat.

The protectors of England collected out of the ancient and moderne chronicles, wherin is set downe the yeare of Christ, and of the king in which they executed that function.

Vpon the death of this duke of Summer-set protector of England, it shall not be misstriving in this place to set downe all the protectors (whereof I can as yet haue intelligence) and who haue bene gouernors, regents, gardians, or deputies of the realme, and of the kings person during his minority and time of his insufficiencie of gouernement; or else of his absence being out of the realme: whereof I haue made an especiall title in my Pantographie of England, in which this my collection of the protectors, although perhaps I shall not set downe all (for Barnardus non videt omnia) yet it is better to haue halfe a loafe than no bread, knowledge of some than of none at all. Thus therefore I begin.

The collectis of Francis Thun
in the yeare 1585.

Guendoline the daughter of Corineus duke of Guendoline.
Coynetwall (after the procurement of warre against hir husband wherein he was slaine) was by common consent (for that hir sonne Hadzane which she had by Loocrine was insufficient by reason of his minority to gouerne the kingdome) made by the Britons ruler of the Ile, in the yeare of the world 2894, and so continued the same by the space of fiftene yeres, vntill hir sonne came to lawfull age.

Partia (the widow of Guenteline the king) by reason that Sicellus hir sonne was not of age conuenient to wield the scepter (as one being but seven yeares old) obtained the gouernement both of the realme and of hir sonnes person, which the most wor-thilie deserved, being a woman of rare vertue and iudgement.

Edred, Ethelred, or Edered (for all these diuersities are found in authors) brother to Edmund king of England, while the sonnes of Edmund (Edwine and Edgar) were for their minorityes insufficient to dispose the kingdome, was appointed protector to his nephewes, in the yeare of Christ 940, who about six or seuen yeares after his protectorship toke on him the kingdome at Kingstone on Easter daie, in the yeare of Christ, as hath Iohn Stow 946, as others haue nine hundred fortie seuen.

Emma the queene of England, the widow of Emma, king Ethelred, and of Canutus, both kings of England iointlie, with Godwine earle of Kent had the gouernement of the realme vnder Harthknot king

Harold.

king of England, who began his reigne in the yeare of Christ 1041.

Harold the sonne of Godwine at the death of king Edward the Confessor (which fell in the yeare of Christ 1066, and the thire and twentieth yeare of the same king) was by the testament of the said king Edward appointed regent of the yong Edgar Atheling (named heire in the life of the said Edward) and of the kingdome, after the death of king Edward, during the minority of the said Edgar. Beside which the like commending of the kingdome to this Harold, in respect of the quene's honour, as that before of the successors right, is set downe by one that liued at that time, and wrote the life of king Edward, of crle Godwine, and of his children, in these words.

Porreth manu (meaning king Edward lying on his death bed, and speaking in the behalfe of Gotha the quene, sister to this Harold) ad predictum nutricium suum fratrem Haroldum, Hanc inquit cum omni regno tutandam tibi commendo, ut pro domina & sorore ut eis fidei serues & honores obsequia, ut quoad vixerit a me adepto non prius honor debito. Commendo pariter etiam eos, qui nationem terram suam reliquerunt causa amoris mei, in hiisque haec omnia fideliter sunt obsequuti: ut suscepit ab eis sita voluntas fidelitate eos tuari & retinere, aut tua defensione conductos cum omnibus que sub me acquisuerunt cum salute ad propria transferri facias, &c. But he, when king Edward was dead, usurped the crowne to himselfe, and shortly after lost both his life and his kingdome.

Odo bishop of Batuor, and William Fitzosborne earle of Hereford.

Odo bishop of Batour, and William Fitzosborne the first, being earle of Kent, and chiefe iustice of England, and the second being earle of Hereford, were gouernours of the realme, in the yeare of our Lord 1067, and the first yeare of William the Conquerour, when he went into Normandie after the conquest and indifferent quieting of the realme.

Lanfranke archbishop of Cantuarburie.

Lanfranke archbishop of Cantuarburie, as appeareth by Matthew Parker, writing in this sort in the life of the said Lanfranke: Absente Gulielmo omnia Lanfranco mandabantur, qui summa prudentia cuncta moderatus, proceres & plebem in officio tranquillum sine ulla motu atque tumultu continebat, adeo ut si quae defectionis suspicio nascebatur, ad eum illico compescendam maximus & potentissimus quisque opem & adiumentum illi imperantiprestitit.

Sir Richard
Lucie chiefe iustice of England.

Sir Richard Lucie knight, chiefe iustice of England was protector of the realme in the twelue yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the second, being the yeare of our Lord 1166, in the absence of the king when he was in Normandie, and in the parts beyond the seas. Which Lucie in the thirtieth yeare of the same king, being the yeare of our redemption 1167, did valiantly resist and polittikelie driue backe the earle of Bullongne inuading the realme. He built the abbey of Leofnes or Westwood in the parish of Crith in Kent (and not in Southfleet as some haue written) in the yeare of Christ 1178, being about the foure and twentieth yeare of king Henrie the second; and further built the castell of Angier in Essex, in the diocese of the bishop of London. He had three Godfreie bishop of Winchester, and three daughters, who after the death of Godfreie their brother were his heires: the eldest daughter of which Sir Richard Lucie, was married to Robert the first called Fitzwater: the second daughter Auelina, was married to Riuers, of whose issue John de Riuers: the third daughter Rose, was married to Richard Marraine, son to king John, as appeareth by a deed (belonging to my selfe, who had the reuerie of Leofnes) beginning thus: Rosa de Douer quondam uxor venerabilis viri Richardi filij regis de Chiltern.

Hugh Pudsey
bishop of Durham.

Hugh Pudsey de Puttaco or Pudsey, nephew to king Stephen, being bishop of Durham, and crle of Northumberland, and William Longchampe bishop of Ely, had the gouernment of the realme for

Richard the first, upon his departure south of the realme to take his iourne into the holie land. For in his absence he appointed this Hugh to haue the rule of the north parts, as chiefe iustice & warden of the realme from Humber to Scotland, deliuering to him also the keeping of the castell of Winchester, the other parts of the realme, with the custodie of the tower, he assigned to the gouernment of William Longchampe bishop of Ely, whome he made chiefe iustice and warden of those east, south and west parts, making him also his chancellor: who being a man of great diligence and knowledge in the administration of things, was yet verie factious and desirous of rule, honour and riches, farre above all measure. And with these two bishops he linked in authoritie by commission Hugh lord Bardolph, William Sparshall the great, earle of Chep, John Fitzgill or Penbrooke, Geoffrey Fitzpeter, and William Brewe, barons, men of great honour, wisdom & discretion. This the king did in the yeare of Christ 1190, and the first yeare of his reigne.

Walter de Constantis sometime chancellor of England, bishop of Lincolne, and now archbishop of Roane, upon the misdemearo; of the pryncer bishop of Ely William Longchampe, about the yeare 1192, had the custodie and gouernment of the realme committed unto him, whilst king Richard the first remained still in the holie warres: who being called from that place in the yeare of Christ 1193 (with Eleanore mother to the king) to come to king Richard then imprisoned in Austria, the archbishop of Cantuarburie Hubert succeeded him in the yeare 1194, whome the said archbishop of Roane procured to be installed in the see of Cantuarburie, which Walter de Constantis (as hath Euereiden) was made bishop of Lincolne in the yeare 1183, and the next yeare after bishop of Roane.

Hubert Walter, or Walter Hubert (for such a transmutation of the name is vsed amongst bishops, graphers) was made (upon the discharge and going of Walter archbishop of Roane beyond the seas to king Richard) gouernor and protector of the realme, before the retorne of Richard the first into England after the said kings imprisonment (by the duke of Austria and the emperor) procured by Sanaricus bishop of Glasseburie and Welles, a kinsman to the emperor, wherof our moderne printed chronicles nor our ancient writers, except one, make any mention. This Hubert died at his manor of Tenham, and was buried at Cantuarburie in the south wall, in the yeare of our redemption 1205, the third ides of Julie, being the seventh yeare of king John.

Eleanore widow to Henrie the second, and mother to Richard the first, was made protectresse of England, after the departure of hir son into France, when he had bene deliuered out of prison: in which office she continued during the life of hir sonne, which he ended in Poitiers in those French warres, by a hurt receiued from one that discharged a crossbow against him, on a fridaie as he besieged Chalons. Touching whose death (with I am now in hand with the same) it shall not be amisse to set downe such seuerall verses composed by seuerall men in seuerall sorts, as I haue read, and are not yet made common to the world, which verses be these, concerning his death and place of buriall, as hereafter followeth:

Pictavis exta ducis sepelie, tollisque Chalucis Corpus dat claudi sub marmore fontis Ebraudi, Nensitria tuq; tegis cor inexpugnabile regis, Sic loca per trina se parat tanta ruina, Nec fuit hoc funus cui sufficeret locus vnus.

Wherof also another composed these following verses some what eloquentlie, as saith Matthew Paris (and so in truth they were, considering that age

Walter de Constantis archbishop of Roane.

Hubert archbishop of Cantuarburie.

Eleanore the widow of Henrie the

An. Reg. 5.

which mostlie bled a rinning kind of Latine verses, induced into the west part of the world by the barbarous Colthes) in his greater historie of the life of king Richard in manner and forme following:

Ad Chalus cecidit rex regni cardo Richardus, Hic ferus his humilis, his agnus, his leopardus, Cassus erat lucis, Chalus per seculi nomen Non intellectum fuerat, sed nominis omen Non patuit, res clausa fuit, sed duce cadente Prodyt in lucem, pro casu lucis adeptus.

Besides which verses of two severall men, it pleaseth my pen to ad also the thirde mans doing, as well for that the number of thre is the holie number, as for that there is nothing so sweet, but that varietie doth refresh it: yet especiallie sith it is delightfull to see the severall inventions of manie wits, this thirde poet therefore, exclaiming against the date in which the said king Richard the first receiued his death wound (being on a fridate) doth thus write:

*O veneris damnosa dies! o fidus amarum!
Ille dies tua nox fuit, & Venus illa venenum, Illa dedit lathum, sed postumus ille dierum, Primus ab undecimo, quo vita victricis ipsam Clauit utrag dies homicida tyrannide mira Transigitur, clausus exclusam, tectus opertum, Proudus incautum, miles inimicus inermem.*

This queene Cleane: the protectresse died in the yere of Christ 1205, being the seuenth of king John. Ceffreie Fitzpeter lord Ludgerfall, who was by Richard the first made chiefe iustice of England, after the remouing of Hubert the archbishop of Canturburie, and was in the first yere of king John girded by him with the sword of the earldome of Essex, was also protector of the realme. Who being a man of great power and authoritie, was by nature gentle, by birth noble, in the lawes cunning, in reuenues great, and to all a good iusticer. This man was a byde to king John, to rektreine his insolencie; since he was confederat and allied in friendship & bloud with all the nobilitie of England: & for that cause was greatlie feared of the k. who said of him, as he did before of the archbishop Hubert, that he then did fullie reigne, when they two were dead. For turning to those which stood by him, when news was brought unto him of the death of Fitz Ceffreie, he sware by Gods fet, that he was then king & lord of England, and not before. Which words he would not vse, when the archbishop Hubert died; because this man was yet liuing, whome the king (as is alreadie said) greatlie feared. And therefore vpon the death of the archbishop, he did oncelie saie that he began to reigne; but now vpon this mans departure out of the world, he said he was become a full lord & absolute king of England. This Ceffreie Fitzpeter died in the yere of our redemption 1212, being about the fourteenth yere of the reigne of the said miserable afflicted king John, who died in the yere of Christ 1216; whose death I haue bene the willing here to mention; because I would set downe his epitaph (not else before set downe in our English chronicles) as I find the same of ancient report:

*Hoc in sarcophago sepelitur regis imago, Qui moriens multum sedauit in orbe tumultum, Et cui connexa dum vixit probra manebant, Hinc mala post mortem timor est ne fata sequantur.
Qui legis hac metuens dum cernis te moriturum, Disito quid rerum pariat tibi meta dierum.*

This Ceffreie Fitzpeter married Beatrice, daughter and heire of William lord Saie, by whom he had issue, Ceffreie Pandenille earle of Essex, & Matod married to Humfreie de Bohune, by whome the Bohunes became earles of Essex.

William Marshall furnaied the great, being earle of Penbroke, was made protector of the realme, & person of the king, after that the king (being nine yeres of age) was crowned in the yere of our Lord 1216. Which office this William (being also marshall of England) vfed so honorable, that he recovered a great part of the nobilitie (which toke part with Leues son of the French king against king John father to this Henrie) to assist the yong king Henrie against the said Leues: who in the time of the said John had obtained a great part of the kingdome of England. By which meanes the said Leues was expelled, and the kingdome wholie recovered to the vse of the said yong king Henrie the third.

This William Marshall married Isabell daughter and heire to Richard Strangbow earle of Penbroke, who made him a happie father in the multitude of his children. For by hir he had five sonnes, all which were in succession marshalls of England, and earles of Penbroke; and five daughters. The sonnes were William, Richard, Gilbert, Walter, and Anselme; who all dieng without issue, the inheritance was deuolued to the five sisters; which were, Matod the eldest, married to Hugh Wigod, in hir right earle marshall; Jone the second, married to Maraine Montbenie, in hir right also earle of Penbroke, as hath Nicholas Triuer; Isabell the third, married to Gilbert de Clare earle of Gloucester; Sibill the fourth, married to William Ferrers erle of Warbie; & Que the fift daughter, married to William de Berehuse, or de Brouse. This William the great died in the yere of our redemption 1219, being the third (as hath Nicholas Triuer) or the fourth (as hath Matthew Westminster) yere of the reigne of the said king Henrie the third, and was buried at the new temple, on Ascension daie, being the seuenteenth calends of Apill: of whome was made this epitaph by Gerualdus Melcheleie, taking vpon him the person of the earle marshall:

Sum quem Saturnum sibi sentit Hibernia, Solem Anglia, Mercurium Normannia, Gallia Martem.

Which signifieth that he was a sharpe corrector and ruler of the Irish, an honor & gloire to the English, a counsellor and dispatcher of the affaires of Normandie, a warlike knight and invincible captain against the Frenchmen.

Petrus derupibus, or Peter of the Roch, being bishop of Winchester, was after the death of William Marshall earle of Penbroke advanced to the protectorship of the king; because that the yong king was almost destitute of anie of his owne kindred that might worthilie haue the rule of his person. For his mother queene Isabell was newlie married to Hugh Bune earle of March in France. This bishop of Winchester (who was both a wise and a stout prelat) being now in possession of the king, and mistrusting that he had entred into a more weightie office than he might well discharge, if all things were not done according to the fauor of the nobilitie, procured diuerse graue and honorable men to be preferred to the kings counsell, and to be associats to him in the administration of the weale publike; and so entred into the administration of his new atchued honor. Which yet he did not long inioie.

But as the bishop was at the first carefull to plant such of the nobilitie about the king, for the support of the realme; so yet himselfe being a Calcoine, did after in the riper yeres of the king prefer to offices about the king such Calcoines as both were of his owne blood and kindred; and by their extraordinary dealing procured the nobilitie with an hard and vndoutfull course to oppose themselves against the king. This Peter was advanced to the seat of Winchester, in the yere of our redemption 1204, being about the first yere of king John. After which earle of Penbroke.

Peter de la Roches.

he went to Rome, and being a prelat more fit to fight than to preach, for Mars than for the muses; did returne from Rome in the yeare of Christ 1205, being about the seventh yeare of king John. He remained bishop about two and thirtie yeares, and died at his manour house of Fernham, on the fift ides of June, in the yeare of our Lord (as haue Matthew Paris and Matthew Westminster) 1238, being the two & twentieth yeare of Henrie the third. Who somewhat before his death, about the one and thirtieth yeare of his bishoprike, went into the holie land with the bishop of Excester. He builded, and indued with possessions manie religious houses: amongst which he founded Wichefield in Hampshire; of which Peter de la Roches, or of the rocks, Matthew Paris maketh a more large discourse.

Hubert de Burow earle of Kent.

Hubert de Burow, constable of Dover castle, earle of Kent, and chiefe iustice of England, being of great account in the realme for his probitie and goodnesse, was made protector of the king and kingdom, in the yeare of our redemption 1221, being the fift yeare of king Henrie the third. This man in the yeare of Christ 1221 (being the same yeare in the which he was made protector) married at Poike, Margaret, sister to Alexander king of Scots. And here I thinke it not amisse to saie somewhat touching the issue of this Hubert of Burow, who in a certene namelesse booke (caried about in the hands of all men) treating of the nobilitie (created since the inuasion of William Conqueror) is said to die without issue: which cannot possible be so, if that be true which I haue seene: which I am led by manie reasons to believe to be most true.

For I haue read of two children which this Hubert had, whereof the one being a sonne, was called Richard de Burow, who was knighted by Henrie the third (as it seemeth to me) after the death of his father: if this Richard be not the same John, of whom Matthew Paris writeth, that in the yeare of Christ 1229, Rex Anglorum Henricus, in die Pentecostes Iohannem filium Huberti Anglie iusticiarium singulorum militum donauit tertio nonas Iunij. The other child was a daughter called Margaret, married to Richard hette to the earldome of Gloucester, as noteth John Beuer in these words: Richardus habes comitis Glouernie Margaretam filiam Huberti de Burgo comitis Cantie in uxorem accepit. This Hubert of Burow was a verie old man, who after manie persecutions by the king, and after so manie chances of both fortunes, departed this world on the fourth ides of Maie, in the yeare of our redemption 1243, being the seuen and twentieth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third at his manour of Wansford, or Wansford. Whose bodie was honorable caried to London, and there buried in the church of the frier preachers, to whom in his life he had giuen great gifts; and amongst other things, his goodlie place which stood not far from the palace of earle Richard of Cornewall (as I with some probable reasons coniecture) nere unto Westminster, which afterward the archbishop of Poike did procure. His wife the countesse of Kent, being likewise verie old, a woman that kept verie great hospitalitie, and that was well beloued, died in the yeare of Christ 1259, being the thre and fortith yeare of Henrie the third, about sixteen years after the death of the earle hir husband.

Walter Greie archbishop of Poike.

Walter Greie archbishop of Poike was made protector of the realme in this sort. The French king hauing vniuersally giuen the earldome of Poitiers to his brother Adolphus; Hugh Bruce earle of March (the greatest of the nobilitie in that prouince) would not do homage vnto Adolphus, but wrote his letters to his son in law king Henrie the third. (Whose mother Eleanore he had married) that if he would come into those parts, he should haue both aid of men, and furniture of war for the perfect restoring of those dominions to the crowne of England. For which cause Henrie the third assembling his power, did with his brother Richard (then lately returned fro Jerusalem) depart the realme in the yeare of our redemption 1242, being the six & twentieth yeare of his gouernment into Poitiers, & left the administration of the kingdom to Walter Greie archbishop of Poike, whilst he should remaine in those parts. Which office the said archbishop held also in the yeare of Christ 1243, being the seauen and twentieth yeare of king Henrie the third. Of this man is more mention made in my collection of the chancellors of England; in this place onely further setting downe, that this Walter died in the yeare of Christ 1255, being about the nine and thirtieth yeare of this Henrie the third, as hath Anonymus M. S.

Eleanore daughter to Richmond earle of Poike, Eleanore, wife to king Henrie the third and quene of England, with Richard earle of Cornewall the kings brother (to whose custodie was committed Edward Longshanks, being after king of England by the name of Edward the first, son to the said king Henrie) were (in the yeare of our redemption 1253, being the seuen and thirtieth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third) appointed gouernors and protectors of the realme in the kings absence, whilst he went into Gascoine, whither he went to pacifie the nobilitie, and to keepe the same in safetie from the French. And because my pen hath here fallen vpon Richard earle of Cornewall, I determine to say somewhat of him in this place, not hauing other occasion offered to me therefore. This Richard the son of king John was borne in the yeare of Christ 1208, being the tenth yeare of the reigne king John. He was made (and so called) earle of Poitiers by Henrie the third, about the ninth yeare of his reigne, in the yeare of Christ 1225, who also that yeare with his uncle William earle of Sarisbury went into Poitiers, where he was tofullie receiued: he putteth the earle of March to flight, he recovereth that which was lost in Gascoine, he went into the holie land, refuseth the kingdom of Apulia offered vnto him, he is chosen emperor, and receiueth that honor at Colen, being there crowned king of the Romans: he subdued Alfontus competitor with him for the empire, he after returneth into England: he is anemie to Simon Montfort and the barons rebelling against his brother king Henrie the third; he is taken prisoner by the barons, and is afterward deliuered: he was created knight and earle of Cornewall in the yeare of our redemption 1225, as hath Matthew Westminster, but as saith William Packington, he was created earle of Cornewall in the yeare of Christ 1227. He married foure wiues, if that Elizabeth his first wife and Isabel the widow of Gilbert de Clare were not all one woman. But leauing that to further knowledge, I do for this time make them but one person; for so in truth it must be, whatsoeuer otherwise shall be shewed in mistaking their names. Elizabeth that was his first wife, as noteth Leland, was buried in the quere of Welsland, being that woman which is called Isabel, and was the daughter of William Marchall earle of Denbroke surnamed the great: and the widow of Gilbert de Clare earle of Gloucester was married to this erle of Cornewall, in the yeare of our Lord 1231 being the fiftieth yeare of king Henrie the third.

This Isabel died in the yeare of our redemption 1240, being the foure and twentieth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third, after this manner. For the being great with child, and nere to the time of hir deliuerance, fell into Merbum isterium: o: the picket, hicket, and deliuering a child into the world, which had life, and was baptised by the name of Nicholas, they both presentlie died thereupon. Which thing when the earle vnderstood being then on his iourneie into Cornwall, he burst out in teares, and greatlie lamented that losse. Wherefore hastilie returning, and leaving his former iourneie, he honorable buried his wife at * Welland or Beauleu, an house of religion builded by king John from the foundation, and replenished with Charterhouse monks.

His second wife was Sinthia or Sanelia, daughter to Richmond earle of Prouince, and sister to the queene of England, wife to king Henrie the third, brother to the said Richard earle of Cornwall, who married the said Sinthia in the yeare of our redemption 1243, being the seuen and twentieth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third. Leland also appointeth to him the third wife, which was Beatrix de Famaissais, whom he called queene of Almaine, & wife to king Richard, brother to Henrie the third. Which ladie died in the yeare of our redemption 1277, being the first yeare of Edward the first, and was buried at the friers minors in Driford. This noble Richard erle of Cornwall died in Februarie at Berkhamsted, in the yeare of Christ 1271, in the five and fiftith yeare of king Henrie the third, as saie Matthew Paris and Matthew Westminster: but Nicholas Triuet referreth his death to the yeare 1270, being the foure and fiftith yeare of Henrie the third: and the chronicle belonging to Cuesham to the yeare 1272, being the six and fiftith yeare of Henrie the third. After whose death his hart was buried in the friers minors of Driford, and his bodie committed to the earth in the monasterie of Hales (being Charterhouse monks) which he had builded at his charge of 10000 marks, which at this daie at five shillings the ounce of silver amounteth to the summe of twentie thousand pounds. He had two sonnes, the one called Henrie by his first wife Isabell; the other called Edmund de Almania by his second wife Sinthia. Henrie was slaine by Simon and Guie of Montfort sonnes of the last Simon Montfort earle of Leicester, in the life of his father Richard in Italie at Citerbo, in the yeare of our redemption 1270. Which fact being done in saint Syluesters church as he was at masse, occasioned the townemen to paint the manner of his death on the wall of the church: and that picture being beheld by a certaine versifier, he was bigged thereupon to compose these following verses:

Regis Theutonici Richardi clara propago, Sternitur Henricus, velut hac designat imago, Dum redit à Tripoli, regum fultus comitum, In crucis obsequio patitur sub gente nocua, Irruit in templum, post missam, stris Guenelonis Perfodit gladius hunc Simonis atque Guidonis, Disposuit Deus ut per eos vir tantus obiret, Ne rescatis his, gens Anglica tota periret, Anno milleno Domini cum septuageno, Atque ducono, Carolo sub rege sereno, Urbe riterbina sit in eius carne ruina, Celi regina precor ut sit ei medicina.

His bones were brought into England, and buried in the monasterie of Hales, where his father was after also buried: but his hart was bestowed in a guilt cup, and placed beside the chaine of saint Edward the Confessor in Westminster abbey. The other sonne to this Richard earle of Cornwall was Edmund of Almaine, who after the death of his father was inuested with the honoz of the earldome of Cornwall, being borne at Berkhamsted in the yeare of our redemption 1250, being the foure and thirtieth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third, to whom his uncle Bonifacius bishop of Canturburie was godfather, and called him Edmund in the honoz of saint Edmund archbishop of Canturburie and Confessor. This Edmund earle of Cornwall married the daughter of Richard earle of Clare, of whome shall be more spoken when we come to treat of him as protector of England.

Boniface the archbishop of Canturburie, with others which follow, were protectors of the realme after this manner, as I haue gathered. It was ordered in the parlement at Driford called Parlementum insanum, that the king should chose forth twelve persons of the realme, and the communalitie of the land other twelve, the which hauing regall authoritie in their hands, might as gardians of the kingdome take in charge vpon them the government of the realme, & should from yeare to yeare prouide for the due election of iustices, chancellors, treasurers, and other officers, and further prouide to see the safe keeping of the castles belonging to the crowne.

These foure and twentie persons appointed to that function, began to order all things at their owne pleasure: in the meane time not forgetting to vse things chieflie to their owne aduantage, as well in prouiding excheats and wards for their children and kindred folks, as also in bestowing of patronages of churches belonging to the kings gift, vnto their owne liking. So that these prouiders which should haue made careful and beneficiall prouisions for the realme, made speedie and plentifull prouision for them and theirs, in so much that neither king nor Christ could get anie thing from these protectors. There be that write, how that there were but twelve or thirtene chosen to be gouernors at this time (which for this present I deme to be the truer opinion) whose names are as follow: Boniface archbishop of Canturburie, the bishop of Worcester, Roger Bigod earle of Norfolk and marshall of England, Simon de Montfort earle of Leicester, Richard de Clare earle of Gloucester, Humfreie Bohune earle of Hereford, Richard Fitzalan earle of Arundell, sir John Mansell chiefe iustice of England, sir Roger lord Spertimer, sir Hugh Bigod, sir Peter de Sanoie, sir James Audley, & sir Peter de Montfort. To these (as some saie) was authoritie onlie giuen to punish all such as trespassed in the breach of anie of the constitutions of the parlement of Driford. Others say that they were made rulers & protectors of the realme, and to dispose thereof, because the king was much misleed in the government of the kingdome by the peruerse counsell of his flatterers.

Which twelve gouernors I suppose did not long continue: for being euerie one priuatlie for himselfe, and so not iointlie for the common-wealth, they grew diuided, and what the one labored to set vp, the other sought to pull downe.

Boniface archbishop of Canturburie the second time, & the bishop of Worcester, with sir Philip Watset, or rather sir Hugh Bigod made chiefe iustice of England by the barons, were appointed in the yeare of our redemption 1260, being the fortie and fourth of king Henrie the third, to haue the government of the realme in the absence of the king, whilst he remained in France at Paris about the affaires of Normandie: at what time a peace was made betwene the kings of England and France.

Gilbert de Clare the second of that name that was earle of Gloucester and Hereford, was the sonne of Richard de Clare erle of Gloucester and Hereford, which died in the yeare of our redemption 1262, being the fiftie & first yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third, and was buried at Tewkesburie, with a great image of silver and gilt vpon his tombe, and the same sword and spurs which he did weare in his life time. Of which Richard these verses were composed for his probitie and rarenelle of vertuous manners maners and conditions, and set vpon his tome:

Hic pudor: Hyppoliti, Paridis gena, sensus Physis, Aeneas pietas, Hectoris iracundia.

This Gilbert (I saie) the sonne of the said Richard was after the death of Henrie the third (which happened in the yeare of our Lord 1277, & in the seuen & fiftith yeare of the reigne of the said king Henrie) in the absence of king Edward the first in the holie warres made gouernour of the realme, vntill the returne of the said king Edward into England, to which function he was appointed by king Henrie the third, lieng on his death-bed: who caused the said Gilbert to sweare to keepe the peace of the land to the behoofe of Edward his sonne. Which he did most faithfully, vntill the second daie of August, in the second yeare of the said king, in which the said king Edward landed in England, being in the yeare of our redemption 1274, at what time the king was honourably interteined of the said Gilbert, and John earle of Warraime (a supporter to him in the charge of the kingdome) at the castell of Tunbridge in Kent, and Wigats in Surrie, which Gilbert with the other peers of the land, immediatlie after the death of king Henrie the third, assembling at the new temple brake the old seale of king Henrie, made a new seale in the name of king Edward, and appointed faithfull officers for the sure keeping and obseruing of the treasure, the riches, the peace, and the lawes of the kingdome.

This Gilbert had two wifes, his first wife was Alice the daughter of Hugh le Bzune erle of March, by whom he had issue a daughter, that was countesse of Fife in Scotland: his second wife was Jone the daughter of king Edward the first, called Jone of Acres, by whom he had one sonne, called Gilbert the third, earle of Gloucester and Hertford, who married Maud the daughter of Richard earle of Ulster in the yeare of Christ 1308 at Waltham, by whom he had issue a sonne, John bozne in the yeare of Christ 1312, being in the first yeare of Edward the second, that died without issue; after the death of which Gilbert the third, his lands and earldomes of Gloucester and Hertford came to the sister of the said Gilbert the third, who was slaine in the battell of Strueling against the Scots in the seuenth (or as others haue the eight) yeare of king Edward the second, whome the Scots would glablie haue kept for ranfome if they had knowne him: but he had forgotten to put on his cote of armes to shew what he was, after which he was brought into England and was buried at Tewkesburie, vpon whose death the two earldomes of Gloucester and Hertford were so disperfed, that there was neuer anie to this daie, that iointlie succeeded or possessed them both. Thus hauing digressed from Gilbert the second, in treating of his sonne Gilbert the third, let vs againe returns to him. He besides his sonne Gilbert the third, had by his wife Jone three daughters; Elenor, first married to Hugh Spenser, second sonne to Hugh Spenser earle of Gloucester, and after his death to William Zouch; Margaret married to Piers de Caueson earle of Cornewall, and after to Hugh Audelcie; and Elizabeth or Isabell married in the yeare of our Lord 1308, being the first yeare of Edward the second, to John the sonne of Richard earle of Ulster. This Gilbert the second, before the marriage of his second wife, was on the fiftenth kalends of August diuorced from Alice his first wife, in the yeare of our redemption 1271, being the six and fiftith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third; and after in Westminster church the last of Apill married his second wife, about the eighteenth yeare of Edward the first being the yeare of Christ 1290, which Gilbert the second, being taken awaie by vntimelie death, departed this world in the yeare of our redemption 1195 (being the thre and twentieth of the reigne of the said Edward the first) who was in word & deed, in commandement and authoritie the greatest person of the kingdome, next to king Edward the first: for which cause he well deserved to haue his sepulture among his worthie ancestors.

Edmund earle of Cornewall, of whome there is somewhat spoken before, being the sonne of Richard king of Almaine, and earle of Cornewall brother to Henrie the third, married Margaret the daughter of Richard de Clare erle of Gloucester, he was made protectour of the Realme by Edward the first in the fourteenth yeare (as some saie) or in the sixteenth, as others saie (for there is so much disagreement amongst authors for the accounts of yeares, as it passeth anie one man to reconcile them in all points) when the said king went into Aragon to reconcile the two kings of Aragon & Naples. He continued in this office in the yeare of Christ 1287, or 1228, as hath Treuet, being the sixteenth yeare of Edward the first, in which he subdued Rife ap Ierdach the Welch prince, rebelling against Edward the first, and ouerthrew the castell of Duffillane (as hath the said Nicholas Treuet) he was lord of Wallingford, did much cost therevpon, and died without issue, as hath Matthew Westminster, in the yeare of Christ 1300: but as hath Thomas Walsingham 1301, leauing the king of England his heire. Yet are there some pedegræes and other authors, and those not the meanest, which saie that he had a daughter, Isabell married to Horice Fitz Harding lord Barkleie: so that these authors, which saie that he died without issue, are to be vnderstood of the issue male, & not of the heire generall: for they account him to die without issue, which leaueeth no posteritie to continue his title of honoz. The which their meaning they make more plaine, in that they saie that after his issuelesse death, the earldome came to the crowne. And here because there is mention made of Wallingford, I will set downe what Leland hath written touching the same, because I desire to make common, and to preserve all whatsoeuer monuments of Leland that come vnto my hands: thus therefore he writeth of Wallingford in his commentaries of England, written in the yeare of our redemption 1542, being the foure and thirtieth yeare of king Henrie the eight in these words.

The towne of Wallingford hath bene a verie notable thing and well walled. The ditch of the towne, and the cress wherevpon the walls stand, be yet manifestlie perceiued, and begin from the castell, going in compasse a good mile and more, and so continueth to Wallingford bridge, a large thing of stone ouer the Thames. There remaine yet the names of these streets amongst others, Thamesstreet, Fishstreet, Woodstreet, Goldsmiths rolo. And by the patents and donation of Edmund earle of Cornewall and lord of the honour of Wallingford, it appeareth that there were fourtene parish churches in Wallingford: and there be men yet alive that can shew the places and churchyards where they stood, at this time there are but thre parish churches. The towne and the castell was soze defaced by the Danes warres, yet they maetlie flourisheth in the time of Richard king of the Romans earle of Cornewall, and brother to Henrie the third, he did much cost vpon the castell which ioineth to the north gate of the towne, and hath thre ditches (as vpon the cresss of the same may appere) large and deepe, about each of the two first ditches (on the cresss of the ground cast out) runneth an embatteled wall now soze in ruine, and for the most part defaced. All the godlie buildings, with the tower and dungeon, be within the third ditch. There is also a collegiat chapell amongst the buildings within the third ditch. Edmund earle of Cornwall son to Richard king of Romans was the first founder and indower of this college. Prince Edward the blacke (as one told me) augmented this college. There is a deane, foure priests, six clerkes, and foure choristers. The late deane before doctoz London that now is, builded a faire steeple of stone at the west end of the collegiat chapell, to the making whereof he defaced (as it is said without licence) a pce of the kings lodging on the east end of the chapell. The deane hath a faire lodging of timber within the castle, and to it is ioined a place for the ministers of the chapell. Thus much Leland for Wallingford, & thus much for Edmund earle of Cornwall and lord of Wallingford.

Edward of Carnarvan prince of Wales, sonne to Edward the first, was in the yeare of our redemption 1295, being the five and twentieth yeare of Edward the first, protector of England, in the absence of his father in Flanders, who because he was of tender yeares, had as tutors and gouernours appointed vnto him Richard bishop of Durham (Eulogium hath the bishop of London) William Spontacite, with diuerse other knights, as Reignold Greie, John Giffard, & Alane Plunket, being wise, discret and expert soldiers.

Piers or Peter de Cauesstone a Gascoine borne, whome king Edward the second so tenderlie loued as that he preferred him before all men, was appointed gardian of the realme in the first yeare of the said king Edward the second, being the yeare of our redemption 1308, when the king went into France and there aboad to marrie Isabell daughter to Philip king of France, before that the said Edward was crowned king of England, as hath Radulphus Higden. Of this Piers I will here saie little, because I haue spoken more largelie of him in my panto-graphie of England.

John de Dokenford bishop of Bath and Wells, was in the yeare of our redemption 1313, being the first yeare of king Edward the second, made protector of the realme in the absence of the said king Edward the second, and his wife quene Isabell, who went into France to solemnize the coronation of Philip (sonne to Philip king of France) who was at that instant created king of Navarre. This Dokenford held the bishopricke about ninetene yeares, he beautified the same with manie goodlie buildings, procured manie priuileges vnto it, and greatlie crated his hundred. He was buried at Welles before the high altar of saint John Baptist.

Henrie Lacie or Lacie earle of Lincoln, and of Salisbury, baron of Halton and of Pontfract, corruptlie called Pontefret, and constable of Chester, was made protector of the realme in the first yeare of Edward the second, being the yeare of our redemption 1310, whilst the king remained in the warres of Scotland. Which Henrie died shortly after in the same yeare, and was buried in the new wooke of Paules, who carried for his armes the purple lion contrary to the cote his ancestors had borne before. This man had done great seruice in the warres in the time of Edward the first, he married Margaret the daughter and heire of William Longespée earle of Salisbury, and had by hir a daughter named Alice, married to Thomas Plantagenet earle of Lancaster, Leicester, and Darbie. This Henrie (as I haue learned of other and read in Leland) had issue a ballard sonne, and hauing amongst manie other lordships the manour of Crantcester besides Cambridge, he gaue the same with other lands vnto that ballard, and commanded that the same Lacie so set vp in Crantcester, should for himselfe and his successors euer name their sonnes and heires by the names of Henrie, which hitherto hath bene religiouslie obserued amongst them. And this was the originall of the houses of the Lacies in Crantcester, as Leland learned of him which was their heire of those lands.

Gilbert de Clare the third earle of Gloucester of that name, after the death of Henrie Lacie, was chosen gouernour of the realme (the king being still in Scotland) during the time that the king shuld make his abode in that countrie. Of this man see before in the discourse of his father Gilbert the second earle of Gloucester and Hertford, and protector of the realme.

Edward prince of Wales and duke of Aquitaine, coming out of France with Isabell in the second yeare of Edward the second, his father was after his landing in England and the taking of his father made gardian of England vnder his father, which office he did not long continue for deposing his father from the kingdome in the yeare of Christ 1326 he assumed the crowne himselfe in his fathers life.

Walter Reynolds archbishop of Canturburie was with others appointed gardian of England on this sort. Edward the third as before attending to the crowne in the yeare of our redemption 1327, as some others more trulie saie 1326, being fourtene yeares of age did then begin his reigne. But because he was so young (not being of power or policie to weld so great a charge) it was decreed in this first yeare of his reigne, that twelue gouernours of the greatest lords within the realme should possesse the gouernement, untill he came to riper yeares, whose names were as inuent: Walter archbishop of Canturburie, the archbishop of Poike, the bishop of Winchester, the bishop of Hereford, Henrie earle of Lancaster, Thomas Brotherton earle marshall, Edmund of Woodstocke earle of Kent, John earle of Warren, the lord Thomas Wake, the lord Henrie Percy, the lord Bluer de Ingham, and the lord John Kesse, who were sworn of the kings counsell and charged with the gouernement of the kingdome as they would answer for the same. But this ordinance continued not long, for in the second yeare of this king, Isabell the kings mother and the lord Roger Mortimer took the whole rule into their hands, in such sort that the king and his counsellors were in all affaires of state, and otherwise, onelie gouerned by their direction. Of this Walter Reynolds the archbishop, because he was sometime chancelor, and sometime treasurer, is more mention made in the large volume of the liues of the chancellors.

John of Eltham earle of Cornwall sonne to Edward the second, had (in the fourth yeare of king Edward the third being the yeare of our redemption 1330) the gouernement of the realme committed vnto him, whilst king Edward the third had passed the seas onelie fiftene hoyses in his companie, apparelled in clothes like vnto merchants, which office the said John of Eltham executed untill the returne of the said king, and before that also when the said Edward the third, in the second yeare of his reigne, did before this time go into France to do his homage. He was made earle of Cornwall in the second yeare of king Edward the third, being the yeare of Christ 1328, and died at Barwik, others saie at St. Johns towne in Scotland, in the month of October 1336, being the tenth yeare of Edward the third, and was honorablie buried at Westminster, for the solemnization of whose buriall the king came out of Scotland about the feast of the Epiphantie.

Edward the Blacke prince, eldest sonne to Edward the third, being about the age of nine yeares, was in the twelwe yere of his father, being the yeare of our redemption 1338, or as saith Matthew Parker 1337, made gardian of England in the absence of his father being as then sailed into Flanders to procure the Flemmings to aid him against the French king. Under which prince as some write (or rather as I for the time take it) equall in commission to him it seemeth that John archbishop of Canturburie had the chiefe rule of the land, because that king Edward after his returne into England, which was about the fouretenth or the fiftenth of his reigne, charged the said bishop with certeine negligences which he vsed in collections of monie, whilst he had the chiefe rule of the land, when he was in the wars of France. Wherefore the words of Matthew Parker in the life of the said John Stratford (saieing that the king held a parlement, in which Omnem regni curiam & gubernationem archiepiscopo commisit) must needs be intended that he had that charge vnder or equallie with the said Blacke prince, as chiefeest counsellor to support the tender yeares of his sonne.

After which also in the yeare of our redemption, as hath the same Matthew Parker 1342, being about the sixteenth of the said Edward the third, the king committed the care & gouernement of the kingdome to the said archbishop, whilst the king was beyond the seas in the warres: for thus writeth the said Parker, fol. 257. Ac paulo post nulla purgatione indicta (speaking of the said bishop vniuersally accused to the king) aut recepta, omnibus penes parlamentum ordinibus pro archiepiscopo deprecantibus, rex eum sua sponte legitime purgatione & excusatum promittit, et eoque multo magis charum quam ante habuit, omnibusque gerendis in Anglia rebus se in militia absente praefecit. Of which archbishop being sometime chancelor and treasurer of England shall be set downe a more large discourse in my large booke of the liues of the chancellors.

Lionell duke of Clarence.

Lionell third sonne to Edward the third, was in the ninth yere of the reigne of the said king Edward the third, being the yeare in which the word became flesh 1345, made gardian of England, in the absence of his father, who as then was sailed into the parts (beyond the seas) of Flanders. Of this man there is more spoken in my following treatise of the dukes of England.

Henrie lord
Perre.

Henrie lord Perre, & Kase lord Percell, when Edward the third was sailed into Normandie, were in the twentieth yere of the reigne of the said Edward the third, being the yeare of our redemption 1346, appointed to be gardians of the realme in his absence with the archbishop of Yorke, the bishop of Lincolne, and Thomas Hatfield bishop of Durham.

Thomas of Woodstocke.

Thomas of Woodstocke being verie yong was made custos or gardian of England, in the yere that God toke on him the forme of a seruant 1359, being the thre & thirtieth of the reigne of the said king Edward the third, when he sailed into France with a 1100 ships. Of this man is more spoken in my discourse of the dukes of England, set downe in the time of quene Elizabeth: and in my treatise of the constables of England, set downe in the time of Henrie the eight pag. 867.

John of Gaunt
duke of Lancaster.

John of Gaunt duke of Lancaster, fourth sonne of Edward the third, because the king his father was feeble and sicklie (being now about thre score & five yeares of age, though Bodinus in his Methodo historiae saie that he died in his climactericall yeare of thre score and thre: for the truth is, that the said Edward the third was fourtене yeares old when he began to reigne, and he reigned about one and fiftie yeares, which make of his age thre score and five yeares, but especiallie for the sorrow which the king inwardlie conceiued for the death of that worthy prince his son, commonlie surnamed the Blacke prince. This John of Gaunt (after the death of the said Blacke prince, which died in the yeare of Christ 1376, being the fiftith yeare of the reigne of Edward the third, whose death was deemed to be hastened by the said John of Gaunt aspiring to the crowne, the plat whereof though it toke not effect in the life of the said John, yet it was performed in his sonne Henrie of Bullingbrooke, who deposed Richard the second) was appointed by his father Edward the third to haue the rule of the realme vnder him, the which he continued during his fathers life, which was not a full yeare after that he had made the said John of Gaunt gouernour of England. After which death of king Edward the third, when Richard the second, a child of eleuen yeares of age began his reigne, in the yeare of our redemption 1377, in the first yeare of the said Richard the second, after his coronation, the said John of Gaunt duke of Lancaster, & Edmund of Langley earle of Cambridge brother to the said John of Gaunt, were appointed to haue the gouernement of the kings person, and the administration of the common-wealth. But shortly after, in the same yere of the king, in the yeare of our redemption 1378, the said John of Gaunt gaue vp the same office. Of this man is more said in my treatise of the dukes of England.

William Courtneie bishop of London (but shortly after his protectorship aduanced vnto the see of Canturburie, in the yeare of Christ 1381, about the ninth of Januarie, being about the fourth of Richard the second, was made gouernor of the realme in this manner. After (as is before said) that the duke of Lancaster had wiselie weied the sickle estate of the realme, and considered that by the euill gouernment of the nobilitie, and inconstant mind of the yong king, there must needs fall a change of the estate, & doubting that if any thing succeeded otherwise than the nobles liked, the cause and negligence might be imputed to him, as one who chafte had the gouernment in his hands (and thanks howsoever the state was ruled he looked for none) did in the end after a few months authoritie (wholie misliking the manners of the court, which commonlie are not of the best in the minority of princes) surrender his protectorship, and obtained licence of the king to depart, and so got him quietlie to his castell of Kenelworth, permitting others to haue the whole waie of the kingdome.

Notwithstanding all which, in the second yeare of Richard the second, about the yeare of Christ 1379 being not altogether carelesse of the kings well doing; this duke before his departing to Kenelworth, caused certeine graue persons with his full consent, to be ordeined, which should haue the gouernement of the kings person, and administration of the common-wealth. The names of whome were, William Courtneie before mentioned, Edmund Mortimer earle of March, Kase Ercunme bishop of Salisbury, and William lord Latimer, with others, of whome for the most part the people had conceiued a good opinion: yet because the said bishop of Salisbury, and the lord Latimer were associat to the rest, and of equall authoritie with them, the commons murmured greatlie against them. The cause for which they so misliked the lord Latimer, was for that he had sometimes bin too much fauouring to dame Alice Piers, concubine to king Edward the third, to whome the said lord Latimer was chiefe chamberleine, & therefore was of him best beloved, which two persons, the lord Latimer, and dame Alice, were by parliament in in the fifth yere of Edward the thirde remoued from the king, for that they miscounselled him, but especiallie sith much mischief grew in the realme by the same Alice Piers. For she being now exalted in pride by ouermuch loue of h<sup>r</sup> Edward the third, would beyond the modestie and maner of women, sit in iudgement with the kings iustices, he with the doctors in the consistorie, turne sentences to what side she would, and require manie things dishonest in themselves, and dishonourable to the king. Of which woman, an old written chronicle belonging to the house of Cuesham, hath deliuered to me these words: Alicia Piers regis concubina supra modum mulierum nimis supergressa sui etiam sexus et fragilitatis femineae immemor, nunc iuxta inficiarios regis nunc in foro ecclesiastico iuxta doctores sedendo, et pro defensione causarum suaderet, et etiam contra iura postulare minime verebatur, unde propter scandalum petierunt ab illo (which was the king) penitus amoveri in parlamento tento anno Domini 1376 Ed. 3. Thus that autho<sup>r</sup>.

And here before I go any further with my protectors, because some curious heads that find not all these matters in the records of the tower, which they daile turne with a churlish hand, or else thinke that nothing may be knowne out of the walles of their office, will seeme to seke a knot in a rush, and saie that I in compasse of some few lines haue written a contrarietie, in saieing that John of Gaunt thirdest after the kingdome, and for that cause hastened the death of his elder brother prince Edward the blacke as Richard the third did the death of his brother George duke of Clarence, which intent could not possible be in John of Gaunt, as appeareth by my owne following words: where I saie that he gaue ouer the protectorship of his nephue, because he would auoid all suspicion of euill gouernement: which he would neuer haue done if he had so ment, that place being so apt for the execution of his purpose, and might giue occasion to him that neuer ment any such matter before, to attempt it being in that place, as Richard duke of Poike did attempt, but not performe it, in the time of Henrie the first; and as Richard duke of Gloucester, being in the same office of protectorship, did not onelie attempt it, but brought to perfection. Whereunto I answer, that all this is no contrarietie, but onelie a manifest shew and confirmation, the one part of my words to the other. For sith he could not in the life of his father Edward the third before the crowning of king Richard the second (as Richard the third did) attaine the crowne, he would not now attempt it (the king being once crowned, and in full possession of the kingdome) so rashlie and vnadvisedlie (as did Richard duke of Poike against Henrie, for which he was in the end slaine) least that thereby his part might seeme to carie the face of a rebellion, as in truth it should haue done. For whosoever either for colour of God, benefit to their countrie, or for whatsoeuer cause, lift by the sword against a crowned king, sitting at the sterne of gouernement, being one of the gods of the earth, the same must needs tend vnto a rebellion, which John of Gaunt would not seeme to execute, & for that cause leauing off his purpose at that time, he did in the end also leaue the whole matter to his son to performe, especiallie sith he afterward perceiued Richard the second so much to fauor and further him with monie, munition, and men, to recouer the kingdome of Castile & Arragon in Spaine, in the right of the wife of the said John of Gaunt. To whom and to his wife (as hath Henrie Knighton) king Richard the second gaue a generall crowne of gold to honour them withall, & shew how interlie he loued them when they both went into Spaine. And for these causes the said John of Gaunt refused the oportunitie

of time & place in the king his nephues minority to execute it. But did he cease it for so, for that sparke although it were a little cooled, was not vtterlie quenched, because he hastened the same in his son, whom he not onelie persuaded, but furthered (after the banishment of his said sonne Henrie of Bullingbroke by Richard the second in the life of the said John of Gaunt) to returne into England, and after his death to challenge by sword the earldome of Lancaster his right inheritance, and vnder the same to reuenge the death of the duke of Gloucester and others: and by that means, when Richard the second was out of the realme of England in Ireland, the said Henrie Bullingbroke sonne of John of Gaunt entered the realme, put downe the king, and got the crowne which his father fought. Thus this much digressing from the protectors, and to returne to that course which I haue in hand, I will leaue the discourse of policies to obtaine kingdoms, because they be no balles for me to bandie, and follow on my former intent as meter for my simplicitie.

Thomas Beauchampe earle of Warwick was in the third yere of Richard the second, being the yere of our redemption 1380, made protector in this sort. In the parlament holden the same yere, at the speciall sute of the lords, and of the commons, the bishops and barons chosen (as you haue heard) before by John of Gaunt to be protectors of the realme, were remoued, and the earle of Warwick especiallie elected to that function, to remaine continually with the king as chiefe gouernor of his roiall person; & one that should giue answer to all foreigners repairing thither, vpon what cause soeuer their coming were; hauing further as ample gouernment of the kingdome giuen vnto him, as the other remoued gouernors had. Being placed in that office by the duke of Lancaster, he died the first ides of Aprill, in the yere of Christ 1401, being the third yere of Henrie the fourth. He married Margaret, the daughter of William lord Ferrers of Grobie; by whome he had issue, Richard earle of Warwick.

Thomas Fitzalane otherwise called Arundell bishop of Ely, the two and twentieth that inioined that seat, being two and twentie yeres of age, and the son of Richard Fitzalane earle of Arundell & Warren, was with others made protector of England in this sort. At a parlament holden at London in the tenth yere of Richard the second, being the yere of Christ 1386, were certeine gouernors of the kingdome elected, because the treasure of the realme had bene imbeilled & lewde waste, nothing to the profit of the king and kingdome, by the couetous and euill gouernment of the deposed officers, which were Michael de la Pole earle of Suffolke lord chancellor, John Foxtham bishop of Durham lord treasurer, & diuerse other persons that ruled about the king.

Now the gouernors elected by this parlament were in number thirtene; and by name Thomas Arundell bishop of Ely, then made lord chancellor; John Gilbert bishop of Hereford made lord treasurer; and Nicholas abbat of Waltham at that time made keeper of the priuie seale; William Courtenie archbishop of Cantuarburie, Alexander Beuill archbishop of Poike, Edmund Langleie duke of Poike, Thomas of Woodstocke duke of Gloucester, William bishop of Winchester, Thomas bishop of Excester, Richard Fitzalane erle of Arundell, John lord Deuereux, and Reinold lord Cobham of Starbozow. These were thus by parlament chosen to haue vnder the king the whole oversight and gouernment of the realme, as by their commission in the statutes of the tenth yere of the said Richard the second it doth in the printed booke appeare.

Thomas Beauchampe earle of Warwick.

Thomas Arundell bishop of Ely.

Edmund Langley duke of York, uncle unto Richard the second, was in the eighteenth yeare of the said Richard, being about the yeare of our redemption 1395, ordeined lord gardian of England, in the kings absence in the realme of Ireland. This protector caused a parlement to be assembled at Westminster: where he dealt so effectualie, notwithstanding the unthankfulness of the burgeses, that a tenth was granted by the cleargie, and a fiftieth by the temporaltie; but not without protestation, that those payments were granted of a meere freewill, for the love they bare to the king, and to have the affaires in Ireland to succeed the better. After this, about foure yeares; king Richard the second in the two and twentieth yeare of his reigne, in the yeare of Christ 1399, making another viage into Ireland (being the last and most unhappie that euer was to him, for before his returne he had in effect lost his realme, which after his coming he lost in deed) did againe in his absence substitute this Edmund duke of York as chiefe gouernor of England. Who in the absence of the king, assembled a power of men against Henrie of Bulkingbroke, now entered into the land to challenge the dukedome of Lancaster after the death of his father John of Gaunt, and vnder that colour to stirpe the crowne. Which Edmund passing into Wales in the thre and twentieth yeare of Richard the second, was receiued into the castell of Barkeleie, & there remained vntill the coming of Henrie of Bulkingbroke. Whom when he perceiued (for the power which the said duke of Lancaster had assembled from all parts of the realme) that he was not of sufficiencie to resist; he came forth into the church that stood without the castell, and there fell to parle with the duke of Lancaster; after which he did neuer forsake the duke of Lancaster, vntill he came to the crowne. Who, if he had faithfullie stood vnto his nephew, might perhaps haue saued vnto him both his crowne and life. Of this man is more said in my treatise of the dukes of England.

Jone de Pammures widow to Henrie
the fourth.

Jone de Pammures sometime duchesse of Britaine, (widow to Philip Montfort, as saith Hypodigma; but Walsingham in his historie calleth him John duke of Britaine; being also the widow of king Henrie the fourth) was substitute gouernor of the realme by hir son in law king Henrie the first, king of England, in the third yeare of his reigne, being the yeare from the birth of the Messias 1415, when the said Henrie the first took his iourne into France to conquer the same. This woman in the seventh yeare of Henrie the first, which was in the yeare of Christ 1419, being suspected (as saith John Stow) to practise witchcraft against the king, was committed to the custodie of John Willelam, or rather John Delham, who appointed nine seruants to attend vpon hir, and brought hir to Deuenseie castell to be gouerned vnder his prouidence. But shortly after clearing hir selfe, she was deliuered. This ladie died at Haueing at the bolwe in Essex the ninth of Iulie in the seventeenth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the first, being the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred thirtie and seven, and was buried at Canturburie with hir husband king Henrie the fourth.

John de
Plantagenet
duke of Bedford.

John duke of Bedford son to Henrie the fourth, & brother to R. Henrie the first, was in the fourth yeare of the reigne of the said Henrie, being the yeare of our redemption 1416, by parlement appointed regent of the realme, to inioie the same office so long as the king was imployed in the French wars. Which place he possessed accordingly; and in the ninth yeare of the victorious prince, king Henrie the first, being gardian of England, he, with Henrie Beauford bishop of Winchester uncle to Henrie the first, and Jaqueline duchesse of Holland remaining then in England, were godfathers, and godmother to Henrie, after king by the name of Henrie the first, the son of Henrie the first; Henrie Chichele archbishop of Canturburie baptizing the child. In the tenth and last yeare of Henrie the first, this John with a strong power conueied quene Katharine wife to Henrie the first, from Southampton into France. This man being duke of Bedford, earle of Armond and of Wendall, constable of England, and warden of the marches of Scotland, died the fourteenth daie of September at Aroue in Normandie, who (hauing also bene regent of France, a most valiant gentleman, and one that kept the parts beyond the seas in great obedience to the crowne of England) had for his yearelie pension 20000 crownes at the least. After whose death all things went backward, and the English lost all that they had beyond the seas, Calis, & those dominions onlie excepted.

This man (I saie) died in the yeare of our redemption 1435, being the thirtieth yeare of the unfortunate government of the deposed king Henrie the first, and was honorablie buried at Aroue in our ladie church there. Touching whome it shall not grieue me to set downe the answer of a French king lately in our age made to one of his nobilitie; saing vnto the king (then being in the said ladie church of Aroue, and beholding the tome of this John of Bedford) that it were convenient that the same tome were defaced and pulled downe; since he was the onelie man that brought the greatest damage that euer happened vnto France. To whom the king said; Hold thy peace foole, God forbid that euer we should do such reproch to him being dead; whome the proudest of our nation durst not looke in the face when he was liuing. This duke John married the second yeare of Henrie the first, in the yeare of Christ 1423, Anne the daughter of John duke of Burgonie, who died in the tenth yeare of Henrie the first, in the yeare of Christ 1433, after which he married Jaques daughter to Peter earle of S. Waule in the same yeare, and yet died without issue. Of this man is mention made in my former discourse of the constables of England, pag. 868.

Humfreie duke of Gloucester brother to Henrie the first, and uncle to Henrie the first, was in the tenth and last yeare of Henrie the first, being the yeare of our Lord 1422, made regent of England, vpon the removing and departure of John duke of Bedford with quene Katharine, wife to Henrie the first into France. In which yeare (happening the lamentable death of that worthy prince king Henrie the first) the said Henrie vpon his death-bed appointed this Humfreie to be protector of the realme; which he did exercise in the time of the minority of Henrie the first, from the time of his first enterance into the kingdome. Who at that time taking vpon him that function, called vnto him graue and wise counsellors; with whose support he might with better honor to the realme, and benefit to the subjects, rule the ship of this kingdome, sailing in the dangerous waues of the kings infancie. By which meanes holding the sterne thereof, directed by the course of iustice, he did most honorablie during his life discharge the dutie of so weightie an office. Who in the fourteenth yeare of Henrie the first, being the yeare of our Lord 1439, did with five hundred faile land at Calis, and for eleuen daies spoiled the low countries and so by Calis returned againe into England. This man in the five & twentieth yeare of king Henrie first, being the yeare of Christ 1447, was in his castell of Ales in Millshire, & coming from thence to the parliament was lodged in the hospitall, and arrested by John lord Beaumont high constable of England. But on the foure and twentieth daie of februarye he died for sorrow as some said, and as John Stow hath noted, because he might not come to his answer. Other write that he was murdered in the night by the queens procurement, to the great griefe of the commons, and in time following to the utter destruction of the king and the queene. He was duke of Gloucester, and also in the right of his wife duke of Holland and Zeland, earle of Penbroke, lord chamberleine of England, and protector of the realme, being highly esteemed of learned men, himselfe also not meanlie furnished with knowledge, having rare skill in astrologie, wherof beside manie other things he compiled a singular treatise, obtaining the name of Tabula directionum, touching whose death I haue read these verses following in John Whethamsted:

*Aemula fors varijs signanter honoribus alch Causavit misere mala multos fere ruina, Latus erat Iulius, unda mensus Ptolomaeus, Iulius Tarrquinus, exul factusque Tydens, Dux nimis propere iam dicta tempora vita Complevit tristis, heu indignatio regis Causa fuit magna, maior detractio falsi, Placis et iuncta fallaci et infidulae, Nam regis patris, quamvis et proximus haeres, Tunc fueratque sum consulor in ordine primus, Vir prudensque pius, vir doctus et ingeniosus, Non tamen erubuit, nec pertimuit, ve pepercit Hunc accusare falsae de proditiōe, Discre quodque suam clam vellet tollere vitam Et sibi surripere violenter iura corona.
Dixit argentum, proprium qui capiat in usum, Desiderat medium quo vindictae aptius ipsum, Sic regem plures comitantes collaterales Sequantur praedon, mediat fraudes, dat dolus ipsam, Fidior in regno regi duce non fuit isto, Illic fide stabili aut maior amator honoris, Et tamen et i Prado voto poritur iniquo, Fraudem consuluit, cum fraude dolum sociavit, Sicque ducem falsi maculans cum proditiōe Obtinuit votum, praedator eratque bonorum Illius, et tristis obijt dux criminis expertus.*

Which duke Humfrie was buried at saint Albons, dieng without issue, after he had married two wives; whereof the first wife was Jacoba or Jaqueline (daughter and sole heire of William of Bavier) being then the lawfull wife to John duke of Bhabant then living, which wife this Humfrie married in England in the yere of our redemption 1424 being the third yere of king Henrie the first, upon which grew great warres, and Humfrie duke of Gloucester challenged the combat of the duke of Burgognie, taking part with his cousine John duke of Bhabant. But in the end the duke of Gloucester left his wife at Apens and returned into England, and thence unto Gaunt, and so into Holland, and the combat staid by means of the duke of Bedford brother to the duke of Gloucester. But after (as it seemeth) the duke of Gloucester was divorced from this dutchesse, and then married Eleanor Cobham (whome he had tenderly loved as his paramour before that) in the yere of our redemption 1428, being the first yere of the reigne of king Henrie the first. This woman in the nineteenth yere of the said Henrie the first (upon the taking of Henrie Bullingbroke for practising necromancie, thereby to consume the king) fled in the night to Westminster for sanctuary. Which caused him to be suspected of treason. Whereupon Bullingbroke confessing that he wrought the same at the procurement of the said Eleanor, desirous to know to what estate she should come unto, the said dame Eleanor did oftentimes for the same fact appeare before the bishop, and in the end was consumed. After which in the twentieth of Henrie the first she did grievous penance therefor, and so escaped with her life. And here because I haue said somewhat of Jaqueline dutchesse of Holland, I thinke it not amisse to adde a little more of her, being a woman of great beautie, and desire of change in performing the pleasures of the flesh; wherefore I will set downe what I haue seene written under the pictures of her and her husband Francis in this sort.

Thomas Beaufort duke of Excester (appointed to that office by Henrie the first on his death-bed) was with Henrie Beaufort bishop of Winchester great uncle to king Henrie the first in the yere of our redemption 1422, being the first yere of the reigne of king Henrie the first (then but nine months old) made protector and gardian of the person of the yong king, to see him tenderly and carefullie brought up and instructed in all such parts as were to be required in the person of a monarch. Which office he left about the fourth yere of king Henrie the first, and died on the twelfth daie at his manor of Crantwich in the said first yere of Henrie the first, being the yere of our redemption 1446: he married Margaret the daughter of Thomas Beuill of Hornesbte.

Richard Beauchampe earle of Warwick son of the former Thomas Beauchampe, being beyond the seas, and there deputie for John duke of Bedford (being regent of France) did (whilest the said regent was come ouer into England) obtaine manie castels in his deputiethip; who being thus imploied in the foren warres, was in his absence out of his countrie (for his singular wisdom and valor) ordered by the three estates of the realme of England in open parliament, to be gouernor of the person of the yong king Henrie the first, in the place of Thomas Beaufort duke of Excester lately deceased: which Richard did not yet forthwith hasten his returne into England, but remained in France for a season, enlarging enlarging the same of his martiall exploits. This his election to the protectorship of the kings person, was in the first yere of Henrie the first, being the yere of our redemption 1426. He died in the yere of our Lord 1439, being the fiftieth yere of the deposed king Henrie the first, at Rone in Normandie the last daie of Maie, as hath John Stow; and the fourth of October next following his corps was honorablie conueied, as well by land as by water from Rone to Warwicke, and there honorablie buried in the college of our ladie church founded by his noble ancestors. He married two wives, the first Elisabeth daughter and heire of Thomas lord Barkleie; by whome he had three daughters, Margaret married to John lord Talbot earle of Shrewesburie, Eleanor married to Thomas lord Rosse, and Elisabeth married to George Nevill lord Latimer. His second wife was Isabell the daughter and heire of Richard lord Spenser, by whome he had issue Henrie duke of Warwicke, and Anne married to Richard Nevill earle of Salisbury.

Richard Plantagenet duke of Yorke.

Richard Plantagenet duke of Yorke, sonne to Richard earle of Cambridge, and father to Edward the fourth king of England, notwithstanding that he made challenge to the crowne against Henrie the first, then in possession thereof, as heire to the house of Yorke, and was to be preferred before the house of Lancaster; and notwithstanding that he was by parliament appointed to weare the crowne after the death of Henrie the first: yet after all this, in the thirteenth and thirtieth yere of the same king, being the yere of our redemption 1455 (such was the imperfection of the king to gouerne) he was appointed protector of the realme, ruling the same at his owne disposition. Which office he did not long inioie, and that most worthilie: for the next yere after being the foure and thirtieth of king Henrie the first, and the yere of our redemption 1456, he was deposed from the same, and queene Margaret wife to Henrie the first tooke againe the absolute regiment into his hands: which duke after in the nine and thirtieth of king Henrie the first, being the yere of our redemption 1460, the thirtieth daie of December, being lord of Wakefield, was there with his sonne the earle of Rutland slaine at the battell commonlie called the battell of Wakefield; of which I haue read these verses in Whehamsted once abbat of saint Albons:

Anno milleno centum quater quoque sena, Terdenoque die, duodeno mense Decembre, Intra Elboracensem iuxta Wakefield comitatum Dux dominus ville fortis pugnantis habuisse Conflictum grandem contra gentem borealem, Ac praeceps plures praerant quae gentibus ipsis, Quod docuit, quia fors quod res fortuna secundas, Pitar habere moras, cecidit dux natus eius, Ac comes insignis fors belli, fors fuit ipsis Obuia, sicque satis regniferat brevis heres Omen id latum tulerat mutamine mestum Defendum multis, ius regni, ius fuit eius.

He married Cicilie daughter to Rafe Nevill first earle of Westmerland, by whome he had issue Edward duke of Yorke, earle of March, and after king of England by the name of Edward the fourth: George Plantagenet duke of Clarence, Richard Plantagenet duke of Gloucester, after king of England by the name of Richard the third: three daughters, Anne married to Henrie Holland duke of Excester, Elisabeth married to John de la Pole duke of Suffolke, and Margaret married to Charles duke of Burgognie.

George Plantagenet duke of Clarence.

George Plantagenet duke of Clarence, and constable of England, sonne of the foresaid duke of Yorke, and brother to king Edward the fourth, with Richard Nevill earle of Warwicke (who set by and pulled downe kings at his pleasure) were after the flight of Edward the fourth out of England into Burgognie to his brother in law (in the tenth yere of the reigne of the said king Edward, being the yere of our redemption 1470, when Henrie the first had by their means readepted the kingdome) made gouernors of the land, which office they inioied not long. For the said Edward the fourth returning into England, in the eleventh yere of his reigne, being the yere of our redemption 1471, reconciled to him the duke of Clarence, did againe put downe king Henrie the first, and due the said earle of Warwicke (sleng awate) at Barnet field (on Easter day) by one of the men of his campe. After this, on the fiftieth daie of Januarie began a parliament, in the eighth yere of the reigne of king Edward the fourth, being the yere of our redemption 1478, where this duke of Clarence was atteinted of treason, and the eleventh of March following he ended his life in a but of malmesie, and was buried at Tewkesburie beside his wife, who being with child died by poison a little before him. Of this man see more in my discourse of the constables of England pag. 869.

Richard Plantagenet third sonne to Richard duke of Yorke, was constable of England and gouernour of the person of the king, of whome is more spoken in my discourse of the constables of England pag. 869. But here mentioning the constables of England, I thinke it better now than not at all, to mention also some imperfection and default in my former discourse of the said constables, set downe by me before in pag. 865. Which default of mine in that place grew by reason of ouermuch hast, which I used in sudden seeking for the same, whereby (according to the old proverbe) I brought forth a blind helpe. For in the former description I haue omitted diuerse the which were constables of England, the names of which were Henrie the first in the life of his father, Agellus, and Robert de Dilie, with others of that line in descent, which Agellus I can not as yet learne to be anie other but Agellus de Dilie, brother to Robert de Dilie that came in with the Conqueror, who gaue Drifordshire vnto the said Robert.

Besides which, if it shall seeme to anie that I haue in my former treatise rashlie written I know not what, & that here I make Henrie the first constable in his father the Conquerors time, & by contrarietie thereto did before make Walter constable also in the Conquerors and William Rufus his time: let them know that there is no contrarietie herein. For Walter might first be constable, & then Henrie the first, and both they in the Conquerors time, this office being taken from the first, and giuen to the latter by the Conqueror. After whose death William Rufus might take it from his brother Henrie, because he would not make him too great in England, for doubt least he might hereby put the crowne in hazard, being fauoured of the people as one borne in England, and for that cause might restore that office to Walter. Againe it maie be, that some men reading that I haue before set downe, that Matilda the emperesse gaue the constableship to Hilto the son of Walter in the first of king Stephan, and that king Stephan tooke that office from Hilto in the first yere of his reigne, and gaue it to Walter Beauchampe, will condemne me therefore of like vnadvised writing: because it seemeth thereby that Stephan tooke it from Hilto before that Hilto had it. Which is not so, for I can proue with some reason and authoritie, that Hilto had it a little before the death of king Henrie the first, and also after his death in part of the first yere of king Stephan, being witness to a deed by king Stephan, made and dated the first of his reigne, to Richard Plantagenet duke of Gloucester.

A digression concerning the constables of England now mentioned before in pag. 865.

Agellus de Dilie constable of England.

Reg. 5.

to which he subscribed his name Milo Constabularius, after which king Stephan might in that yeare take that office from him, and so he did. Which Pawd the empresse understoode, and finding Spilo (noto fallen from king Stephan) one which assisted hir, the better to confront Stephan, gaue the constestable ship to Spilo (accounting hir selfe as quene) in the first of Stephan.

This being thus spoken in defense of that which before I have written pag. 866. let vs go to our other matter concerning the constestables not mentioned before in the said discourse, wherein I find my selfe in a marvellous laberinth (out of which I doubt that the best antiquaries cannot loose themselves, no not he which thinketh and saith that he can controule all men, for I suppose he will be lame in this matter) how all these could be constestables, unless that in the time of Henrie the first, and of king Stephan, as it is most likeliest, there was chopping & changing, putting in and taking out, setting vp and pulling downe one man in diuerse yeares of one and the selfe same king: for king Stephan was sometime a king, and sometime as no king, and then againe a king. And so likewise was it with Pawd the empresse at the same time, bearing hir selfe sometime as quene, and then dejected as no quene. But be it as it will be, I will here set downe what I find in ancient charters and pedegrees touching the constestables of England not before mentioned, leaving the same to others (either to order for succession of time, or to amend for truth of matter) who peraduenture reading these things, which I haue scene and will here set downe, can bestow them in better order than I can, which I earnestlie praie them to do, whereby truth maie be brought to light and perfection; which as yet touching these constestables set downe in this place, seemeth to be obscured and confused untill the time that Roger fitz Piles had that office: for from his time the same is without all controuersie sufficientlie knowne. Wherefore, here before I enter into the descent of the de Milles, who were constestables of England, I will set downe a strange note of three persons witnesses to a deed, dated Primo Stephani, anno Dom. 1136, who doe all subscribe their names as constestables. Which charter being the same wherein king Stephan gaue the manors of Sudton or Sutton to the house of Winchester, the same was amongst other witnesses thus signed, Robertus de Peer constabularius, Milo constabularius, Brientius filius comitis constabularius: all who could not be constestables of England at one time. Wherefore saving correction I suppose that it is out of all controuersie, that neither the first nor the last of these three were constestables of England, but of some other places, as of Dover or other castles. And so to that which I haue further to saie of the kings constestables in one descent and succession of the de Milles, being teamed the kings constestables, both in ancient charters and pedegrees, whereof Nigellus before mentioned seemeth to be one.

This Nigellus was constestable of England in the yeare of our redemption one thousand one hundred and one, being the first yere of king Henrie the first, as may appeare by a deed of confirmation made by Henrie the first touching the cathedrall church of Dorwich, whereof I thinke good to saie somewhat to bring in the prose that this Nigellus was constestable. This church was built for the most part in the time of William Rufus, by Herbert de Losinga the first bishop of Dorwich, who translated the see from Ectford into Dorwich, in the yeare of Christ 1094, which church being finished and consecrated to the holie trinitie, was afterwarde confirmed by Henrie the first, and Pawd his wife, in the first yeare of the said Henrie, being the yeare of our redemption 1101, to the charter whereof signed by king Henrie & Pawd his wife, were manie bishops, noblemen and abbats witnesses, amongst whom are the se two set downe; Nigellus Constabularius, and Rogerus Cancellarius, of which Nigellus thus writeth Leland in his commentaries on the song of the swan in the word Isidis insula: Erat Roberto frater Nigellus nomine, de quo fama non admodum multa refert, which I suppose is this Nigellus de Oille the constestable, as I before said.

Robert de Oille, sonne of the said Nigellus, did succeed his father, and was as may appeare by some authours (who tearme him accordingly) great constestable of England. This man together with his wife Edith were the founders of the religious house of Dineie, touching whom I shall not graue to set downe what I haue gathered out of Leland and others. This Edith obtained of hir husband to build a church in the Ile of Dineie in Dorsetshire, to our sauiour Christ, about the yeare of our redemption 1129, being about the nine and twentieth yeare of king Henrie the first, which church did after grow to be of great renowne and building, the occasion of building whereof is set downe by others in this sort. Edith being in great estimation with Henrie, first married the said Robert de Oille by the kings procurement, which Robert began the priorie of the blacke chanons of Dineie by Dorset, amongst the Isles made by the ruler of Isles or Dulse. This Edith used oftentimes to walke out of Dorset castell with hir gentlewomen for to solace and recreate hir selfe. At what time at a certeine place, as often as she came by the same, certeine pies assembled themselves in a tree, where they chattered and as it were spake vnto hir. This ladie much maruelling at the matter, happening so continually at one time in one place after one order, and with one maner of foules, was manie times astonied and feared therewith, esteeming it a verie strange wonder. Whereupon she sent for one Radulph or Rafe a chanon of saint Frideswide in Dorset, a man of vertuous life & hir confessor, asking his counsell vpon the same. To whom he answered (after that he had scene the order of those pies onelie chattering at hir comming thither) that she should build some church or monastrie in that place. Whereupon she intreated hir husband to build a priorie, and so he did, making that Radulph the first prioer of that house. All which matter, that is the comming of Edith to Dineie, Radulph waiting on hir, and the tree with the pies were all extant (at the generall dissolution of the abbeies in the time of Henrie the eight) to be scene painted on the north side of the high altar, in the arch of the wall ouer Ediths tombe in Dineie priorie, vpon which tombe there late a stone image of Edith in the habit of a boinesse holding a hart in hir right hand. This Robert de Oille was buried in Dineie in the verie middle of the presbiterie, vnder a flat marble stone; wherevpon was a flowred crosse portraied, which Robert had issue Henrie de Oille, baron of Hochnoton, & the kings constestable, which married Margerie the daughter of Humfreie de Bohune, by whom that Henrie had issue Henrie de Oille baron of Hochnoton, and the kings constestable which died without issue. Thus this much by waie of digression, touching the constestables of England, left out in my former discourse of those officers. And so againe to the protectors.

Katharine the daughter of Ferdinando king of Spaine, and wife to king Henrie the eight, was (in the absence of the said king beyond the seas in the warres of Turuine and Larnie) made regent of the realme, in the yeare of Christ 1513, and the first yeare of king Henrie the eight, she had bene the widow of Arthur prince of Wales, eldest sonne vnto king Henrie the seauenth, and eldest brother to king Henrie

Robert de Oille constestable of England.

The foundati on of the abbey of Dineie in the yeare of Christ 1129, being about the thirteenth yeare of Henrie the first, as some write.

The foundati on of the cathedrall church of Dorwich.

Henrie the eight, who after the death of that Arthur was by dispensation of the pope married to Henrie after king, by the name of Henrie the eight, being younger brother of the said Arthur, from which king Henrie he was afterward not onelie divorced, in the one and twentieth of his reigne, being the yeare of Christ 1529, but after by parlement also in the foure and twentieth of the kings reigne, in the yeare of Christ 1532, disgraced from the name of quene, and from thenceforth appointed onlie to be called the princeesse dowager of prince Arthur, about five yeers after which she died on the eight of Januarie, being the yeare of our redemption 1535, which was the seauen and twentieth yeare of king Henrie the eight, and was honourable buried in the abbey of Peterborough, for which cause afterward in the generall dissolution of the abbeyes, when all those houses were spoiled, this abbey was not onelie for his buriall there spared and not defaced, but also further honored with a greater title, and turned into a bishoprike, by the said king Henrie the eight.

Katharine Par, the daughter of sir Thomas Par, lord of Kirkbie Rendall, and wife to king Henrie the eight, was by patent made protectresse of the realme of England, when king Henrie the eight went in person to the wars of Bullongne, on the thirteenth of Julie in the yeare of our redemption 1544, being the six and thirtieth yeare of the triumphant reigne of the said king. This ladie Katharine being the lord Latimers widow, was married to the king at Hampton court, one the twelfth of Julie being the five and thirtieth yeare of his reigne, and the yeare of Christ 1543, who hauing no issue by the king, was after the kings death married to Thomas Seimer knight, lord Seimer of Sudley and high admerall of England.

Edward Seimer knight, viscount Beauchampe earle of Hereford, & after duke of Summerfet, was protector of the kings person, and of the kingdome, in the first yeare of king Edward the sixt, his nephue which was in the yeare of our redemption 1546, the king being then but nine yeares old. Of this man is more spoken in my following discourse of all the dukes of England by creation or descent since the conquest, with which duke of Summerfet, the last in office of protectorship, Francis Thim knitteth vp this simple discourse of the protectors of England of the kings person.

Abr. Fl. ex I. S.
1551.

Curtis, alderman of London committed to ward for recreuend words and signes to the lord chancellor.

Anno Reg. 6.
Sir Rafe Crane & other executed.
House blowne vp with gunpowder.

Master of horsemen before the king in Greenwich park.

Dukes.

¶ On the 17 of February, on which date were receiued the bookes of the reliefe of all the wards of London, towards the new hospitals, by the kings commissioners, the counsell dined at maister Compers the shiriffe, and after dinner maister Thomas Curtis alderman came thither to speake with the lord chancellor for a matter he had depending afoze him in the chancery, but for his misdemeanour in words and signes to the lord chancellor at that time, the said maister Curtis was committed to ward in the Fleet. ] The six and twentieth of February, sir Rafe Crane and sir Miles Patridge were hanged on the tolwer hill; & sir Michaell Stanhope with sir Thomas Arundell were beheaded there. The last of Aprill, through negligence of the gunpowder makers, a certeine house nere the tolwer of London, with thre last of powder was blowne vp and burnt, the gunpowder makers being fiftene in number, were all slaine.

The sixtenth of Maie was a godlie muster of horsemen made before the king, in the parke at Greenwich, vnder the kings banner his band of pensioners, in number a hundred and fiftie, euerie pensioner two great horses and a gelding, the lord Wake their lieutenant. The duke of Northumberland, great maister of the kings household vnder the white lion & the ragged staffe fiftie. The duke of Suffolke vnder the vnicorne in the starre a hundred and ten. The lord marquisse of Winchester, high treasurer, vnder his banner the falcon, one hundred men. The marquisse of Northampton high chamberleine vnder the maidenhead a hundred. The earle of Bedford lord priue seale vnder the gose a hundred. The earle of Warwike maister of the kings horses vnder the white lion fiftie. The earle of Huntingdon vnder his banner fiftie. The earle of Rutland vnder the peacocke fiftie. The earle of Penbroke vnder the greene dragon fiftie. The lord Darcie vnder the madens bodie fiftie. The lord Cobham vnder the Saracens head, fiftie. The lord Clinton lord admerall vnder the anchor, fiftie. The lord warden of the five ports, vnder the rose in the sunne beames, one hundred.

Not long after the death of the said duke of Summerfet and his complices, it chanced the reuerend father in God maister doctor Ridley then bishop of London, to preach before the kings maiestie at Westminster. In the which sermon he made a fruitful and godlie exhortation to the rich, to be mercifull vnto the poze, and also to moue such as were in authoritie, to trauell by some charitable waie & means, to comfort and relieue them. Wherevpon the kings maiestie being a prince of such towardnesse and vertue for his yeares, as England before neuer brought forth, and the same also being so well retained and brought vp in all godlie knowledge, as well by his deere vncle the late protector, as also by his vertuous and learned schoolmaisters, was so careful of the good gouernement of the realme, and chiefe in to be and prefer such things as most speciallie touched the hono: of almightie God. And vnderstanding that a great number of poze people did swarme in this realme, and chiefe in the citie of London, and that no good order was taken for them, did suddenlie and of himselfe send to the said bishop as soon as his sermon was ended, willing him not to depart, vntill that he had spoken with him (and this that I now write was the verie report of the said bishop Ridley) who according to the kings commandement gaue his attendance. And so sone as the kings maiestie was at leisure, he called for him, and made him to come vnto him in a great gallerie at Westminster, where (to his knowlege) and the king also told him so, there was present no mo persons than they two, and therefore made him sit downe in one chaire, and he himselfe in another, (which as it seemed) were before the coming of the bishop there purposed set, & caused the bishop (maugre his tech) to be couered, and then entered communication with him in this sort.

First giuing him most hartie thanks for his sermon and god exhortation, he therein rehearsed such speciall things as he had noted, and that so manie, that the bishop said; Trulie, trulie for that was com- monlie his oth I could neuer haue thought that excellencie to haue bene in his grace, that I beheld and saw in him. At the last, the kings maiestie much commended him for his exhortation for the reliefe of the poze. But my lord (saith he) ye willet such as are in authoritie to be carefull therof, and to deuise some good order for their reliefe, wherein I thinke you meane me, for I am in highest place, and therefore am the first that must make answere vnto God for my negligence, if I should not be carefull therein, knowing it to be the expresse commandement of almightie God, to haue compassion of his poze and needy members, for whome we must make an account vnto him. And trulie my lord, I am before all things most willing to trauell that waie, and I notable

and beautifull saying of Edward the bishop Ridley.

"doubt nothing of your long and appoyued wisdom
"and learning, who hauing such good zeale as wisheth "helpe vnto them, but that also you haue had some "conference with others, what waies are best to be ta-

"and therefore I praeie you saie your mind.

The citizens
of London came to be admitted in the hospitals of the city.

The bishop thinking least of that matter, and being amazed to heare the wisdom and earnest zeale of the king, was (as he said himselfe) so astonied, that he could not well tell what to saie: but after some pause, said that as he thought at this present for some entrance to be had, it were good to practise with the citie of London, because the number of the poore there are verie great, & the citizens are manie & also wise: and he doubted not but they were also both pitiffull & mercifull, as the maior & his brethren, & other the worshipfull of the said citie. And that if it would please the kings maiestie to direct his gracious letter vnto the maior of London, willing him to call vnto him such assistants as he should thinke meet, to consult of this matter, for some order to be taken therein, he doubted not but god should follow thereof. And he himselfe promised the king to be one himselfe that should earnestlie trauell therein.

The king forthwith not onelie granted his letter, but made the bishop tarie vntill the same was written, and his hand and signet set therevnto, and commanded the bishop not onelie to deliuer the said letter himselfe, but also to signifye vnto the maior, that it was the kings speciall request and expresse commandement, that the maior should therein trauell, and as sone as he might conuenientlie giue him knowledge how farr he had proceeded therein. The bishop was so iolous of the hauing of this letter, and that he had now an occasion to trauell in that god matter, wherein he was marvellous zealous, that nothing could moze haue pleased and delighted him: wherefore the same night he came to the maior of London, who then was sir Richard Dobs knight, and deliuered the kings letter, and shewed his message with effect.

The maior
of London was so pleased
with the good deed,

The maior not onelie iolouslie receiued this letter, but with all speed agreed to set forward this matter, for he also fauoured it verie much. And the next daie being mondaie, he desired the bishop of London to dine with him: and against that time, the maior promised that he would send for such men, as he thought meetest to talke of this matter, and so he did.
And sent first for two aldermen and six commoners, and afterward were appointed moze, to the number of foure and twentie. And in the end after sundrie meetings (for by meane of the god diligence of the bishop it was well followed) they agreed vpon a booke that they had deuised, wherein first they considered of nine speciall kinds and sorts of poore people, and those same they brought in these three degrees:

These of

These degrees of poore.

- 1 The poore by impotencie are also diuided into three kinds,
that is to saie:
- 2 The poore by casualtie are of three kinds,
that is to saie:
- 3 The thixtles poore are three kinds in like wise, that is to saie:

The poore by impotencie.
Poore by casualtie.
The thixtles poore.

- 1 The fatherlesse poore mans child.
- 2 The aged, blind, and lame.
- 3 The diseased person, by leprosie, dropsie, &c.
- 4 The wounded souldier.
- 5 The decayed householder.
- 6 The visited with grievous disease.
- 7 The riotor that consumeth
all.
- 8 The vagabond that will abide in no place.
- 9 The idle person, as the strumpet and others.

For these sorts of poore were prouided thre seuerall houses, first for the innocent and fatherlesse, which is the beggers child, and is in deed the sad and bre-der of beggerie, they prouided the house that was late Graie friers in London, and now is called Christes hospitall, where the poore children are trained in the knowledge of God, and some vertuous exercise to the ouerthrowe of beggerie. For the second degree is prouided the hospitall of saint Thomas in Southwoke, & saint Bartholomew in west Smithfield, where are continuallie at least two hundred diseased persons, which are not onelie there lodged and cured, but also fed and nourished. For the third degree they prouided Bridewell, where the vagabond and idle strumpet is chastised and compelled to labour, to the ouerthrowe of the vicious life of idleness.
They prouided also for the honest decayed householder, that he should be relieved at home at his house, and in the parish where he dwelled by a weekelie reliefe and pension. And in like manner they prouided for the lazer to keepe him out of the citie from clapping of distres, and ringing of bells, to the great trouble of the citizens, and also to the dangerous infection of manie, that they should be relieved at home at their houses with seuerall pensions.

Now after this god order taken, and the citizens by such meanes as were deuised, willing to further the same, the report therof was made vnto the kings maiestie: and his grace for the aduancement hereof, was not onelie willing to grant such as should be the ouersers and gonerors of the said houses a corporation and authoritie for the gouernement thereof: but also required that he might be accounted as the chiefe founder and patrone thereof. And for the furtherance of the said worke, and continuall maintenance of the same, he of his mere mercie and goodnesse granted, that where before certeine lands were giuen to the maintenance of the house of the Sa-uioie, founded by king Henrie the seventh, for the lodging of pilgrims and strangers, and that the same was now made but a lodging of loiterers, vagabonds, and strumpets that laie all daie in the fields, and at night were harboured there, the which was rather the maintenance of beggerie, than the reliefe of the poore, gaue the same lands, being first surren-dred into his hands by the maister and fellows there (which lands were of the yearelie value of six hundred pounds) vnto the citie of London, for the maintenance of the foundation aforesaid.

And for a further reliefe, a petition being made to the kings maiestie for a licence to take in mort-maine, or otherwise without licence, lands to a cer-teine yearelie value, and a space left in the patent for his grace to put in what summe it would please him; he looking on the void place, called for pen and inke, and with his owne hand wrote this summe, in these wordes (four thousand marks by yeare) and then said in the hearing of his counsell: Lord God I yeld the most hartie thanks, that thou hast giuen me life thus long, to finish this worke to the glorie of thy name.
After which foundation established, he liued not a bone two daies, whose life would haue bene wished equall to the patriarchs, if it might haue pleased God so to haue protracted the same. But he was too good a prince for so bad a people, and therefore God remoued him, and translated him to his owne kingdome, foresaieing the euent of something which in his secret counsell he had purposed, against a nation that knew not the benefit of the acceptable time of grace: wherein God by this paterlesse princes means ment all god to this land, as might be gathered by the reformation of religion, wherein the kings care was exceeding great, as his desire to establish Gods glorie was zealous: according to that notable

But to returne where we left. By example of the charitable act of this vertuous yong king, sir William Chester knight and alderman of London, and John Calthrop citizen and draper of the said citie, at their owne proper costs and charges made the bricke walles and way on the backside that leadeth from the said new hospitall, unto the hospitall of saint Bartholomewes, and also couered and bauted the towne ditch from Alderigate to Fleetgate, which before was verie noisome and contagious to the said hospitall.

Richard Cas-

This hospitall being thus erected and put in good order, there was one Richard Castell alias Casteller, thomaker, dwelling in Westminster, a man of great trauell and labor in his facultie with his owne hands, and such a one as was named the cocke of Westminster, for that both winter and summer he was at his worke before foure of the clocke in the morning. This man thus trullie and painfullie labouring for his lining, God blessed and increased his labours so abundantly, that he purchased lands and tenements in Westminster, to the yearelie value of fourtie and foure pounds. And hauing no child, with the consent of his wife (who furnished him, & was a ver-tuous & good woman) gaue the same lands wholie to Christs hospitall aforesaid, to the reliefe of the innocent and fatherlesse children, and for the succor of the miserable, foure and sicke, harborred in the other hospitals about London, whose example God grant manie to followe.

Great fishes,

Sebastian Sabato.

The thirde of August, at Midlenton eleuen miles from Oxford, a woman brought forth a child which had two perfect bodies from the nauill byward, and were so ioined together at the nauill, that when they were laid in length, the one head & bodie was eastward, and the other west: the legs for both the bodies grew out at the midd where the bodies ioined, and had but one issue for the excrements of both bodies: they liued eightene daies, and were women children. The eight of August were taken at Min-horow three great fishes called dolphins: & the week following at Blackewall were six more taken, and brought to London, the least of them was more than anie horse. ]

Such about this season there were three notable ships set forth and furnished for the great adventure of the vnknowne voiage into the east by the north seas. The great doer and encourager of which voiage was Sebastian Sabato an English man, bozne at Biffow, but was the sonne of a Genowaite. These ships at the last arrived in the coun-trie of Pokouta, not without great losse and danger, and namelie of their capteine, who was a woo-thy and aduenturous gentleman, called sir Hugh Willoughbie knight, who being tossed and driuen by tempest, was at the last found in his ship frozen to death and all his people. But now the said voiage and trade is greatly advanced, and the merchants aduenturing that waie, are notwile by act of parlement incorporated and indued with sundrie priuileges and liberties.

Three maria-ges betwene great estates.

About the beginning of the month of Maie next following, there were three notable mariages concluded, & shortly after solemnized at Durham place.
The first was betwene the lord Wilford Dunleie, the fourth sonne of the duke of Northumberland, and the ladie Jane, eldest daughter to Henrie duke of Suffolke, & the ladie Francis his wife, was the daughter of Marie second sister to king Henrie the eight, first married to Lewis the French king, and after to Charles Brandon duke of Suffolke. The second ma-riage was betwene the lord Herbert, son and heire to William earle of Penbroke, and the ladie Katharine, second daughter of the said ladie Francis, by the said Henrie duke of Suffolke. And the thirde was betwene Henrie lord Hastings, sonne and heire to Francis earle of Huntington, and ladie Katharine youngest daughter to the forenamed duke of Northumberland.

These mariages were compassed & concluded chief-lie upon purpose to change & alter the order of succession to the crowne, made in the time of king Henrie the eight, from the said kings daughters, Marie and Elizabeth, and to conuie the same immediatlie after the death of king Edward to the house of Suffolke, in the right of the said ladie Francis: wherein the said yong king was an earnest trauelier in the time of his sicknesse, & all for feare that if his sister Marie, being next heire to the crowne, should succeed, that she would subuert all his lawes and statutes made concerning religion, wherof he was most carefull: for the continuance wherof he sought to establish a meet order of succession, by the aliance of great houses by waie of marriage, which neuer-thelesse were of no force to serue his purpose. For tending to the disheriting of the rightfull heirs, they proued nothing prosperous to the parties: for two of them were soon after made frustrate, the one by death, the other by diuorfe.

In the meane while, the king became euerie daie more sicke than other of a consumption in his lungs, so as there was no hope of his recouerie. Whereupon those that then bare chiefe authoritie in coun-cell, with other prelates and nobles of the realme, called to them diuerse notable persons, learned as well in diuinitie as in the lawes of the land, namelie bishops, iudges, & other, who fell to consultation upon this so weightie cause, and lastly concluded upon the deuise of king Edwards will, to declare the said ladie Jane, eldest neece to king Henrie the eight, and wife to the said lord Wilford, to be rightfull heire in succession to the crowne of England, without respect had to the statute made in the five and thirtieth yeare of king Henrie the eight: the true meaning of which statute they did impugne and ouerthrow by di-uerse subtill sinister constructions of the same, to disherit the said kings daughters, to whom the succession of the crowne of England of right appertei-ned, as well by the common lawes of this realme, as also by the said statute made in the said five and thirtieth yeare of king Henrie, as aforesaid. To which new order of succession, all the said kings counsell, with manie bishops, lords, doctors and iudges of the realme subscribed their names, without refusal of anie, except sir James Hales knight, one of the iu-stices of the common pless, who being called to this counsell, would in no wise giue his assent, either by word or writing, as ye shall heare more in the hystorie of queene Marie.

Now when these matters were thus concluded, and after confirmed by a number of hands, as aforesaid, then the noble prince king Edward the sixt, by long lingering sicknesse and consumption of his lungs aforesaid, approached to his death, and departed out of this life the first daie of Iulie, in the seuenth yeare of his reigne, and seuentieth of his age, after he had reigned and noblie gouerned this realme six yeares, five moneths, and eight daies. And a little before his departing, lifting up his eyes to God, he prayed as followeth.

not my will, but thy will be done.
Lord I commit my spirit to thee, oh Lord

Edward.

Thus did this good yong king yeld vp to God his ghost the first daie of Iulie (as before is mentioned) whome if it had pleased God to haue spared with longer life, not unlike it was, but he should haue so gouerned this English common-wealth, that he might haue bene comparable with any of his noble predecessors: so that the losse of so towardlie a yong king, greatlie discomforted the whole English nation, that looked for such a reformation in the state of the common-wealth at his hands, as was to be wished for of all good subiects: which bred such a liking in them toward him, that euen among verie traitorous rebels his name yet was had in reuerence, although otherwise they neuer so much forgot their dutie both towards him and other, appointed to gouerne vnder him, through a malicious and most wilfull error; as if his tender yeares had not sufficientlie warranted his roiall authoritie, but that the same had bene vi-sured by others against his will and pleasure.

Edward

And as he was interlie beloued of his subiects, so with the like affection of kindnes he loued them againe, of nature and disposition meeke, much inclined to clemencie, euer hauing a regard to the sparing of life. There wanted in him no promptnes of wit, gra-uitie of sentence, ripenesse of iudgement, as his age might beare, fauour and loue of religion was in him from his childehood, his skill and knowledge in sciences, besides his other excellent vertues, were such, that to them he seemed rather borne than brought vp.
It maie seme verie strange, that in his yong yeares (as maister Fox reporteth of him) he could tell and recite all the poets, hauens, and crakes, not within his owne realme onelie, but also in Scotland, and likewise in France, what comming in there was, how the tide serued in euerie of them; moreover, what burthen, and what wind serued for the com-ming into each haven: also of all his iustices, magistrates, and gentlemen that bare any authoritie within his realme, he knew their names, their houskeeping, their religion and conuersation what it was. He had a singular respect to iustice, a vertue most commendable in a prince, and chieflie to the dispatch of poore mens lites. He perfectly understood the Latine tong, the French, the Greeke, Italian, and Spanishe, neither was he ignorant (saith Cardanus) in Logike, in the principles of naturall philosophie, or in musicke.

To conclude, his towardlinesse was such in all herocall vertues, noble gifts, and markable qualities conuenient for his princelie estate, that so much was hoped for in his roiall person (if he had liued till triall might haue bene had of the praue) as was to be wished for in any one prince that euer had rule ouer this noble realme. ¶ The eight of Iulie, the lord maior of London was sent for to the court, then at Greenwich, and to bring with him sherlbermen, as manie merchants of the Staple, and as manie merchant aduenturers, vnto whom by the counsell was secretlie declared the death of king Edward, and also whom he had ordeined to the succession of the crowne by his letters patents, to the which they were sworn, and charged to keepe it secret. ¶ But now to proceed with the doings that followed. Immediately after the death of this so worthie a prince king Edward, the aforesaid ladie Jane was proclaimed queene of this realme by the found of trumpet, that is to saie, the ninth daie of Iulie, at which proclamation were present the lords of the counsell, the maior of London, with others.

Cheape, with both his eares nailed, and cleane cut off, for words speaking at time of the proclamation of ladie Jane. At the which execution was a trumpet blowne, and a herald read his offense, in presence of one of the shiriffes, &c. About fiue of the clocke the same daie in the afternone, Pinion Sanders, master to the said Gilbert Pot, and John Owen a gunner, comming from the tower of London, by water in a bierrie, and shooting London bysso, towards the blacke friers, were drowned at saint Maries

The ladie Marie, a little before lieng at Honeidon in Hartfordshire, hauing intelligence of the state of the king hir brother, and of the secret practise against hir: by the aduise of hir friends, with all speed toke hir iourney toward hir house of Kenninghall in Pos-folke, intending there to remaine, untill she could make hir selfe more strong of hir friends and allies, and to call vnto the lords of the counsell in forme as followeth.

A letter of the ladie Marie sent to the lords of the counsell, wherein she claimeth the croune now after the decease of hir brother king Edward.

MY lords we greet you well, and haue re-ceiued sure aduertisement, that our dearest brother the king our late souer-aigne lord is departed to Gods mercie: which newes, how they be wofull to our heart, he onelie knoweth, to whose will and pleasure we must and doe humble submit vs, and all our wils. But in this so lamentable a case, that is to wit, now after his maiesties departure and death, concerning the crowne and gouernance of this realme of England, with the title of France, and all things thereto belonging that hath bene prouided by act of parlement, and the testament and last will of our dearest father, besides other circumstances aduan-cing our right: you know, the realme, and the whole world knoweth, the rolles and records appeare by the authoritie of the king our said father, and the king our said brother, and the subiects of this realme, so that we herelie trust that there is no true subiect that is, can, or would pretend to be ignorant thereof: and of our part we haue our selues caused, and as God shall aid and strength vs, shall cause our right and title in this behalfe to be published and proclaimed accor-dinglie. And albeit this so weightie a matter seemeth strange, that the dieng of our said brother vpon thursdaie at night last past, we hitherto had no knowledge from you thereof: yet we consider your wisdomes and prudence to be such, that hauing easies amongst you debated, pondered, and well weighed this present case with our estate, with your owne estate, the commonwealth, and all our honours, we shall and may conceiue great hope and trust, with much assurance in your loialtie and seruice, and therefore for the time interpret and take things not to the worst, and that ye yet will like noblemen to like the best. For the lesse, we are not ignorant of your consultations to vnder the provisions made for our prement, nor of the great bands and provisions for cible, whereunto ye be assembled and prepared, by whom, and to what end, God and you know, and nature can feare some euill. But be it that some consideration politike, or what soeuer thing else hath moued you thereto, yet doubt you not my lords, but we can take all these your doings in gracious part, being also right readie to remit and fullie pardon the same, with that frellie to escheue bloudshed & vengeance against all those that can or will intend the same, trusting also assuredly you will take and accept this grace and vertue in good part, as appertineth, and that we shall not be forced to vse this seruice of other our true subiects and frends, which in this our iust and rightfull case, God (in whose whole assistance is) shall send vs. Therefore my lords, we requite you, and charge you, and enerie of you, that enerie of you of your allegiance which you owe to God and vs, and to none other, for our honour, and the suretie of our realme, onelic imploie your selues and forthwith upon receit hereof cause our right and title to the crowne and government of this realme, to be proclaimed in our cite of London, and such other places as to your wisdoms shall seme good, and as to this case appertineth, not failing hereof, as our verie trust is in you: and thus our letter signed with our owne hand shall be your sufficient warrant in this behalfe. Given vnder our Signet at our manor of Weningall the ninth of Julie 1553.

To this letter of the ladie Marie, the lords of the counsell answered againe as followeth.

MAdam, we haue receiued your letters the ninth of this instant, declaring your supposed title, which you iudge your selfe to haue to the imperall crowne of this realme, and all the dominions thereto belonging. For answer wherof, this is to aduertise you, that forsomuch as our soueraigne ladie quene Jane is, after the death of our soueraigne lord Edward the first, a prince of most noble memorie, inuested and possessed with the iust and right title of the imperall crowne of this realme, not onelic by god order of old ancient god lawes of this realme; but also by our late soueraigne lords letters patents, signed with his owne hand, and sealed with the great seale of England, in presence of the most part of the nobles, counsellors, iudges, with diuers other graue and sage personages, assenting and subscribing to the same: we must therefore, as of most bounde dutie and allegiance, assent vnto hir said grace, and to none other, except we should (which faithfull subiects cannot) fall into gracious and unspeakeable enormities. Wherefore we can no lesse do, but for the quiet both of the realme and you also, to aduertise you, that forsomuch as the dispute made betwene the king of famous memorie king Henrie the eight, and the ladie Katharine your mother, was necessarie to be had, both by the euertlasting lawes of God, and also by the ecclesiasticall lawes, and by the most part of the noble and learned vniuersities of christendome, and confirmed also by the sundrie acts of parlements, remaining yet in their force, and thereby you iustlie made illegitimate, and inheritable to the crowne imperall of this realme; and the rules, dominions, and possessions of the same: you will vpon iust consideration hereof, and of diuers other causes lawfull to be alleged for the same, and for the iust inheritance of the right line, and goodlie orders taken by the late king Edward the first, and greatest personages aforesaid, surcease, by any pretense to ber and molest any of our soueraigne ladie quene Jane hir subiects, from the true faith and allegiance due vnto hir grace, assuring you, that if you will for respect theto your selfe quiet and obedient (as you ought) you shall find vs all, and seuerall, readie to do you any seruice that we with dutie may, and to be glad of your quietnesse, to preserve the common state of this realme, where in you may be otherwise gracious vnto vs, to your selfe, and to them. And thus we bid you most hartlie well to fare. From the towne of London this ninth of Julie.

Your ladieships freends shewing your selfe an obedient subiect,

All these aforesaid, except onelic the duke of Northumberland, and Sir John Gates, were either by speciall fauour, or speciall or generall pardon, discharged for this offence against hir committed, after hir comming to be quene. But now vpon the receit of this answer, vnderstanding by hir frends that she could not lie in suretie at Weningall, being a place open & easie to be approached, she removed from thence vnto hir castell of Fremingham, standing in a wood countrie, & not so easie to be innaded by hir enemies. So some as the counsell heard of hir sudden departure, and considering that all came not to passe as they supposed; they caused speiallie a power of men to be gathered together. And first they agreed that the duke of Suffolke father to the new made quene, should haue the conduct and leading of the armie.

But afterward it was deuised and decreed vpon further considerations, and by the speciall means of the ladie Jane his daughter, who taking the matter heauilie, with weeping teares, made request to the whole counsell, that hir father might tarrie at home in hir companie. Where vpon the counsell perswaded with the duke of Northumberland, to take that voyage vpon him, saying, that no man was so fit therfore: because that he had achieved the victorie in Suffolke once already, and was therefore so feared, that none durst once lift vp their weapon against him: besides that, he was the best man of warre in the realme, as well for the ordering of his camps and souldiers, both in battell and in their tents, as also by experience, knowledge and wisdom; he could both animate his armie with iustie persuasions, and also pacifie and allate his enemies pride with his stout courage, or else to dissuade them (if need were) from their enterprisse. Finally, said they, this is the short and the long, the quene will in no wise grant, that hir father shall take it vpon him: wherefore (quoth they) we thinke it good, if it may please your grace, it lieth in you to remedie the matter. With these & the like persuasions the duke was allured to put himselfe desperatlie vpon hazard:

Non morte horrenda non vllis teritis armis.

Insomuch that he retained vpon their talke, and said: Well then, sith ye thinke it good, I and mine will go, not doubting of your fidelitie to the quenes maiestie.

Ladie Marie removed to her castle of Fremingham.

The counsell perswaded the duke to undertake this enterprisse.

malesie, which now I leaue in your custodie. So that night he sent for both lordes, knights, and other that should go with him, and caused all things to be prepared accordingly. Then went the counsell in to the ladie Jane, and told hir of their conclusion, who humbly thanked the duke for reseruing hir father at home, and beseeched him to vse his diligence: where to he answered, that he would do what in him laye. The morrow following, great preparation was made, the duke earlie in the morning called for his owne harnesse, and saw it made readie at Durham place, where he appointed all his retinue to meet. The same daie carts were laden with munition and artilerie, and field peeces were set forward.

The same forenone the duke moued effaynes the counsell to send their powers after him, as it was before determined, the same to meet with him at Newmarket, and they promised they would. He said further to some of them: My lordes, I and these other noble personages, with the whole armie that now go forth, as well for the behalfe of you & yours, as for the establishing of the quenes highnesse, shall not onlie aduenture our bodies and liues amongst the bloodie strokes and cruell assaults of our aduersaries in the open fields: but also we do leaue the conseruation of our selues, children, and families at home here with you, as altogether committed to your truth and fidelities: whome, if we thought ye would through malice, conspiracie, or dissention leaue vs your frends in the byers, and betraie vs; we could as well sundrie waies forsee and prouide for our owne safegardes, as anie of you by betraising vs can do for yours. But now upon the onelie trust and faithfullnesse of your honours, whereof we thinke our selues most assured, we do hazard our liues. Which trust and promise if ye shall violate, hoping thereby of life and promotion: yet shall not God count you innocent of our bloods, neither acquite you of the sacred and holie oth of allegiance, made freely by you to this vertuous ladie the quenes highnesse, who by your and our intilement is rather of force placed therein, than by hir owne seeking and request. Consider also, that Gods cause, which is the preferment of his word, & feare of papists entrance, hath bene (as ye haue here before alwaies said) the originall ground whereupon ye euen at the first motion granted your goodwills and consents thereunto, as by your handwritings appeareth; and thinke not the contrarie, but if ye meane deceit, though not forthwith, yet hereafter God will reuenge the same.

I can saie no more, but in this troublesome time with you to vse constant hearts, abandoning all malice, enuie, and priuat affections. And therewithall the first courte for the lordes came vp, wherefore the duke shut vp his talke with these words. I haue not spoken to you in this sort upon anie mistrust I haue of your truths, of which alwaies I haue euer hither to conceiued a trustie confidence, but I haue put you in remembrance thereof, what chance of variance so euer might grow amongst you in mine absence: and this I praye you, with me not worthe good speed in this to me, than ye would haue to your selues. My lord, saith one of them, if ye mistrust anie of vs in this matter, your grace is farre deceiued, for which of vs can wash his hands cleane thereof? And if we should shrink from you as from one that were culpable, which of vs can excuse himselfe to be gilliesse? Therefore herein your doubt is too farre cast. I praye God it be (quoth the duke) let vs go to dinner: and so they sat downe. After dinner the duke went in to the quene, where his commission was by that time sealed, for his lieutenantship of the armie, and then took his leaue of hir, and so did certeine other lordes also.

Then as the duke came through the counsell chamber, he took his leaue of the earle of Arundell, who prayed God be with his grace, saying he was soie it was not his chance to go with him and beare him companie, in whose presence he could find in his heart to spend his blood euen at his fat. Then the earle of Arundell took Thomas Louell the dukes boie by the hand, and said: Farewell gentle Thomas with all my heart. Then the duke, with the lord marquisse of Northampton, the lord Greie, and diuerse other took their charge, and went to Durham place, and to White h. where that night they mustered their men: and the next daie in the morning the duke departed with the number of six hundred men, or thereabouts. And as they rode through Shoredich, said the duke to the lord Greie: The people please to see vs, but not one saith God speed vs. The same daie sir John Gates and other went out after the duke.

Now as the duke went forward on his waie (with his commission from the whole counsell, and his warrant under the broad seale of England, without mistrust of that which after sortuned to his owne destruction, as in the historie of quene Marie shall appeare, accompanied with no small number of lordes and gentlemen, hauing notwithstanding his times prescribed, and his iourneies appointed by the counsell, to the intent he would not seme to do any thing but upon warrant) what a do there was, what stirring on euerie side, what sending, what riding and posting, what letters, messages, & instructions went to and fro, what talking among the souldiers, what hartburning among the people, what faile pretences outwardlie, inwardlie what priuie practises there were, what speeding and sending forth ordinance out of the towre, yea euen the same daie that quene Marie at euen was proclaimed quene, what rumors, and comming downe of souldiers as there was from all quarters, a world it was to see, and a processe to declare, enough to make (as saith master Fox) a whole volume, euen as big as an Atlas.

The greatest helpe that made for the ladie Marie, was the short iourneies of the duke, which by commission were assigned unto him before, as aboue is mentioned: and happilie not without the politike forecast of some in fauour of the ladie Marie: for the longer the duke lingered in his voiage, the ladie Marie the more increased in puissance, the hearts of the people being mightilie bent vnto hir. Whereupon the in the meane time remaining at Fremingham, and hearing of this preparation against hir, gathered together such power of the noblemen & other hir frends in that countrie, as she could get. And first of all, the noblemen that came vnto hir aid, were the earles of Suffolke, Bath, and Wyndesore, the lord Wentworth, sir Thomas Cornwallis, sir Henrie Terningham, sir William Malgraue, with diuerse other gentlemen and commons of the countie of Suffolke and Suffolke. Here (as master Fox noteth) the Suffolke men being the first that resorted to hir, promised hir their aid and helpe to the uttermost of their powers, so that she would not go about to alter the religion which hir brother had established, and was now vsed and exercised through the realme. To this condition they agreed, with such promise, as no man would haue doubted that anie inuocation of matters in religion should haue followed, by hir sufferance or procurement during hir reigne: but how soon she forgot that promise, it shall shortly after plainlie appeare.

In this meane season, the lord Windso, sir Edmund Beekham, sir Robert Darcie, and sir Edward Hastings, called the commoners of the shire of Buckingham; vnto whome sir John Williams, which afterward was lord Williams of Thame, sp in m m y. and and sir Leonard Chamberleine, with the cheefe power of Dorsetshire. And out of Dorsetshire came sir Thomas Tresham, and a great number of gentlemen out of diuerse parts, whose names were too long to rehearse. These capitaine with their companies being thus assembled in warlike manner, marched forward towards Dorsetshire to the aid of the ladie Marie, and the further they went, the more their power increased.

About this time sir Shypp well manned, that were appointed to lie before Portsmouth, and to haue taken the ladie Marie if she had fled that waie, were by force of weather driuen into the hauen, where one maister Jerningham was raising power on the ladie Maries behalfe, who hearing thereof, came thither. Whereupon the capitaine took a bote and went to the ships, but the sailers and souldiers asked maister Jerningham what he would haue, and whether he would haue their capitaine or no, and he said yea. Marie said they, ye shall haue them or we will throw them into the bottome of the sea. But the capitaine said forthwith, that they would serue quene Marie willingly, and so brought forth their men, and conueied with them their great ordinance. Of the coming of these ships the ladie Marie was wonderfull ioyous, and afterward doubted little the dukes puissance: but when newes thereof was brought to the tower, each man there began to draw backward: and over that, word of a greater mischance was brought to the tower: that is to saie, that the noblemens tenants refused to serue their lords against quene Marie.

ple in the title of quene Jane, &c.

The duke thought long for his succors, and wrote somewhat sharpe to the councell at the tower in that behalfe, as well for lacke of men as munition, but a slender answer had he againe. And from that time forward, certeine of the councell, to wit, the erle of Penbrooke, and sir Thomas Cheineie lord warden, and other, sought to get out of the tower to consult in London, but could not. On the sixteenth of Iulie, being sundae, doctor Ridsleie bishop of London, by commandement of the councell, preached at Pauls crose, where he vehementlie perswaded the people in the title of the ladie Jane, late proclaimed quene, and inuicied earnestlie against the title of ladie Marie, &c. The same sixteenth of Iulie, the lord treasurer was gone out of the tower to his house in London at night, and forthwith about seauen of the clocke the gates of the tower vpon a sudden were shut vp, and the keyes borne vp to the ladie Jane, which was for feare of some packing in the lord treasurer: but he was fetched againe to the tower about twelue of the clocke in the night.]

The lords of the councell suspecting that all would go against them, procla-
med the ladie
Marie quene.

The lords of the councell, being in this meane while at London, after they vnderstood how the better part of the realme were inclined, and hearing euerie daie newes of great assemblies, began to suspect the sequell of this enterprise. So that providing for their owne suertie, without respect of the duke (who now was at Burie) they fell to a new councell, and lastlie by assent made proclamation at London in the name of the ladie Marie, by the name of Marie quene of England, France, & Ireland, defender of the faith, & of the churches of England & Ireland supremie head. Of which proclamation, after the duke of Northumberland, being then at Burie, was aduertised by letters of discomfirt from the councell, he incontinentlie, according to the new order receiued from them, returned with his power againe to Cambridge. Now so sudden change of minds forthwith appeared in his armie, that they which before seemed most forward in that quarrell, began first to flie from him, & so euerie man shifting for himselfe, he that late before was furnished of such multitude of souldiers, was suddenlie forsaken of all sauing a few, whose perills were ioined with his.

But now before I proceed anie further in the historie of quene Marie, who was now receiued and proclaimed quene, as then to succeed hir brother, I will speake somewhat of the learned men that wrote & published anie pamphlets or treatises in his daies, as in deed there were manie: but for that the more part of them died in quene Maries time, or in the quenes maiesties time that now is, or else are yet liuing, I do omit those here, meaning to speake of them hereafter, if God shall permit, as occasion maie serue. For the residue that ended their liues in this kings daies, these I find: David Clapham a lawyer and well sene in the Latine tong, wrote sundrie treatises; Robert Calbot a prebendarie of Norwich, verie skillfull in antiquities; Edward Hall a counsellor in the common law, but excellentlie sene in histories, wrote a notable chronicle of the union of the two houses of Yorke & Lancaster.

Furthermore Richard Tracie of Lodington in Gloucestershire, an esquier, and verie well learned, sonne to William Tracie; doctor Joseph an excellent preacher; George Jole a Bedfordshire man, that wrote diuerse treatises concerning diuinitie, and died either in the last yeare of king Edward, or in the beginning of quene Maries reigne, as appeareth by maister Bale; Alexander Warkleie a Scot, a notable poet, and a good rhetorician, departed this life in the yeare one thousand five hundred fiftie and two; William Hugh a Northshireman, wrote besides other things, a notable treatise called the troubled mans medicine, he deceased by the burking of a beine, in the yeare one thousand five hundred fiftie and nine; Thomas Sterneholde borne in South Hampton, turned into English meter seuen & thirtie psalmes chosen forth of Dauides psalter. Of strangers that liued and died here in this kings daies, excellentlie learned, and renowned for such treatises as they published to the world, Martine Bucer and Paulus Fagius are most famous. To end now with this part of the booke concerning king Edward, I haue thought good to set downe Ierom Cardans verses, written as an epitaph of him (and recorded by maister Fox in his historie) as here followeth:

*Elete nefas magnum, sed tota flebilis orbe Mortales, vester corrui omnis honor.
Nam regum decum, & inuenum flos, spique bonorum, Delicia seculi, & gloria gentis erat.
Dignus Apollineis lachrymis, doctaque Minerva: Eloquulus heu miserè concidit ante diem.
Te cumulo dabimus misera, supremæque stentis Munera, Melpomene tristia fata canet.*
